W. W. Norton & Company has been independent since its founding in 1923, when William Warder Norton and Mary D. Herter Norton first published lectures delivered at the People's Institute, the adult education division of New York City's Cooper Union. The Nortons soon expanded their program beyond the Institute, publishing books by celebrated academics from America and abroad. By mid-century, the two major pillars of Norton's publishing program-trade books and college texts-were firmly established. In the 1950s, the Norton family transferred control of the company to its employees, and today-with a staff of four hundred and a comparable number of trade, college, and professional titles published each year-e-W. W. Norton & Company stands as the largest and oldest publishing house owned wholly by its employees.

Preface to the Fifth Edition

What is a poem? The definitions offered over the centuries are almost as numerous as the examples in this book. Although no two people may settle on the qualities all poems share, it might not be foolish to say that the best definition of poetry encompasses all definitions-even those that contradict each other. Poetry, after all, encourages us to embrace paradox and contradiction, the unexpected, the never-thought-of (and also, paradoxically, the universal, the shared, the familiar). Poetry began as song and continues as song; it is usually best appreciated when spoken or sung by a human voice. Since the advent of writing, however, the act of reading a poem on the page has added new dimensions to our experience. In these pages, we necessarily feature the written pleasures of poetry-even in those poems that were meant originally as song. What all these poems share, we hope, is something in the manner of their telling that cannot be achieved any better way. The best poems, too, make a claim on our memory. W. H. Auden wrote that "of the many definitions of poetry, the simplest is still the best: 'memorable speech.' " Many poems in this book have been part of English-speaking culture for centuries, while the newest poems here might well lodge in readers' memories in the future.

This Fifth Edition of The Norton Anthology of Poetry brings together more than eighteen hundred such records from "the round earth's imagined corners." We have set out to provide readers with a wide and deep sampling of the best poetry written in English. That previous editions have succeeded in this endeavor, within the limits of the pages available in a single volume, seems manifest in the acceptance of those editions by teachers and students alike. But as our friend and advisor M. H. Abrams has said in another context, "a vital literary culture is always on the move," both in the appearance of new works and in the altering response to existing texts: hence a Fifth Edition, which broadens and refines that cultural tradition. We believe that the vitality of our literary culture has been demonstrated by this collaboration.

In assembling the new edition, we have aimed to respond to the practical criticism and informed suggestions provided by teachers who have used the anthology. Our goal has been to make the anthology an even better teaching tool for their classes. In response to instructors' requests, a number of important works by major poets have been added to the Fifth Edition, among them a selection from Beowulf, in Seamus Heaney's prize-winning translation; Chaucer, "The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale"; Spenser, "The Shepheardes Calendar: Aprill" and book 1, canto 2 of The Faerie Queene; Shakespeare, ten additional sonnets; Milton, Book 4 of Paradise Lost; Wroth, seven additional sonnets; Swift, "Verses on the Death of Or. Swift"; Keats, "Lamia"; Eliot, "Little Gidding" and "The Hollow Men." We have worked toward a balance between the older and the newer. Instructors committed to teaching the rich diversity-of forms and techniques as well as historical and geographic range-of English-language poetry in the twentieth century will welcome the Fifth Edition's increased attention to world poetry in English as well as the greater range of American voices. Among the seventeen poets newly included are Richard Wright, Weldon Kees, Robyn Sarah, Charles Bernstein, Anne Carson, Vikram Seth, and Simon Armitage. In addition to expanding representation, we have reconsidered, and in some instances reselected, the work of poets retained from earlier editions. Among the poets reselected are John Ashbery, Adrienne Rich, Derek Walcott, Seamus Heaney, Michael Ondaatje, Yusef Komunyakaa, Agha Shahid Ali, Jorie Graham, Carol Ann Duffy, and Li-Young Li,

The vernacular tradition, in which the poet "Anon" has spoken eloquently over the centuries, is brought forward from medieval lyrics and Elizabethan and Jacobean poems to African American spirituals and popular ballads of the twentieth century. Teachers can trace the history of the epic by comparing openings and selections from Beowulf, The Faerie Queene, Paradise Lost, Killigrew's (unfinished) Alexandreis, Pope's Rape of the Lock, and Wordsworth's Prelude. The tradition of light verse, too, can be traced from Lewis Carroll, W. S. Gilbert, and Edward Lear to Ogden Nash and Dorothy Parker to Wendy Cope, James Fenton, and John Updike.

We continue to expand opportunities for teaching intertextual "dialogues" among poets: the addition of Donne's "A Hymn to God the Father," for instance, allows that poem to be read with Jonson's hymn of the same name. Among the pairs entirely new to this edition: Elizabeth Bishop's "Casablanca" responds to Felicia Dorothea Hemans's poem of that title, which was, as Bishop knew, one of the most often taught and recited poems of the nineteenth century. Also new are Aphra Behn's "The Disappointment" and John Wilmot, earl of Rochester's "The Imperfect Enjoyment," which together form a dialogue about impotence. Other poetic dialogues present English-language responses to foreign sources, which may be secular-a Petrarchan sonnet, for instance, such as the one rendered in English by Wyatt ("Whoso List to Hunt") and by Spenser (Amoretti 67)-or biblical: we now include four versions of Psalms 58 and 114, ranging from Mary Sidney's to Christopher Smart's. Some poetic conversations present different perspectives on culturally fraught issues: a set of eighteenth-century poems on "spleen"-a malady strikingly like the one we call depression today-includes texts by Anne Finch, Alexander Pope, and Matthew Green; a newly augmented cluster of poems on the meaning of the color black includes Edward Herbert's "Sonnet of Black Beauty," Mary Wroth's sonnet 22 ("Like to the Indians)," Henry King's "The Boy's Answer to the Blackmoor," and Phillis Wheatley's "On Being Brought from Africa to America." We continue to emphasize call-and-response patterns that extend across periods: our selection from William Cowper's The Task includes the lines that inspired part of Coleridge's "Frost at Midnight"; and we invite readers to consider Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" with Raleigh's "The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd," then both of these poems with C. Day Lewis's elegiac, war-shocked "Two Songs," which reprises them as well as Jean Elliot's "The Flowers of the Forest." In turn, Elliot's and Lewis's poems may be set in dialogue with Pete Seeger's modern ballad "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?" To bring these potential dialogues to readers' attention, we have provided a number of cross-referencing annotations and expanded the discussion of intertextual pairs and groups in the Course Guide.

The Fifth Edition includes not merely the lyric and the epigrammatic but instead the entire range of poetic genres in English. Among the many longer poems are Aemilia Lanyer's "The Description of Cooke-ham" and Richard Howard's "Nikolaus Mardruz to his Master Ferdinand, Count of Tyrol, 1565," as well as teachable excerpts from John Skelton's "Phillip Sparow" and "Colin Clout," Charlotte Smith's "Beachy Head," Elizabeth Barrett Browning's Aurora Leigh) William Carlos Williams's "Asphodel, That Greeny Flower," and James Merrill's The Changing Light at Sandover. Although it is impossible to include all of The Faerie Queene) Paradise Lost) The Prelude) Song of Myself, or The Dream Songs) readers will find representative and self-sufficient selections from each of these works.

Three other features within the anthology facilitate its usefulness in the classroom. An indispensable aid in helping students become better readers and interpreters of poetry, Margaret Ferguson's new essay, "Poetic Syntax," addresses a perennial stumbling block-how to recognize, describe, analyze, and appreciate syntactic ambiguity in English poetry. Among the "types of ambiguity" (to borrow William Empson's phrase) discussed in the essay are those involving parts of speech, elisions, and punctuation, as well as the difficulties that the poet's traditional license to invert normal English word order can create for readers. Jon Stallworthy's essay, "Versification," has been selectively expanded to offer clearer explanations of rhyme, plus more attention to forms such as prose poetry, found poetry, and shaped poetry and to the metrics of Old and Middle English and Renaissance verse. In addition, the appendix of biographical sketches has been updated, streamlined, and cross-referenced to the individual poets.

Editorial Procedures

The order is chronological, poets appearing according to their dates of birth and their poems according to dates of publication in volume form (or estimated dates of composition in the case of Old and Middle English poets). The publication date is printed at the end of each poem, and to the right; when two dates are printed, they indicate published versions that differ in an important way. Dates on the left, when given, are those of composition. Many of our texts are modernized to help readers, but we continue an ongoing project of remarking editorial decisions in annotations, to let teachers and students consider issues pertaining to the materiality and complex histories of many poems in the anthology.

Annotation in the Fifth Edition has been thoroughly revised. In keeping with recent developments in editing, we have introduced notes that mention significant textual variants. These are intended to spark classroom discussion about poems whose multiple versions challenge the idea of textual "authority." We have added many notes that provide contextual information and clarify archaisms and allusions; however, as in previous editions, we minimize commentary that is interpretive rather than, in a limited sense, explanatory. As further help with teaching poetic syntax, we have added notes that discuss syntactical difficulties.

Marginal glosses for archaic, dialect, or unfamiliar words have been reconsidered and, for many poems, increased in number. For the convenience of the student, we have used square brackets to indicate titles supplied by the editors and have, whenever a portion of a text has been omitted, indicated that omission with three asterisks.

Instructors have long made inventive use of the rich intertextuality of The Norton Anthology of Poetry. Three supplemental resources-two in print and one online-expand the possibilities for teachers who wish to convey how poems speak to each other across time, place, and tradition through literal borrowings, form, theme, cultural concern, and conventions. Teaching with The Norton Anthology of Poetry: A Guide for Instructors, by Tyler Hoffman, makes available to teachers varied reading lists that help shape a course or courses along a number of lines-according to form, figurative language, traditions and countertraditions, and topics-and to establish relationships among poets and poems of different genres, periods, and concerns. Also for instructors, Teaching Poetry: A Handbook of Exercises for Large and Small Classes, by Allan J. Gedalof, offers innovative ideas and exercises for structuring a class centered on performance and discussion. Instructors should visit www.wwnorton.com for further information about obtaining these materials. For students, a new Web site, The Norton Poetry Workshop Online (www.wwnorton.com/nap), prepared by James F. Knapp (based on his innovative Norton Poetry Workshop CD-ROM), contains texts and recordings of thirty of the most-taught poems from the anthology, supported by a rich array of multimedia, exercises, and study aids.

We are indebted to our predecessors, the editors emeriti of The Norton Anthology of Poetry, whose presence on the title page signals their ongoing contribution, and to M. H. Abrams, advisor to the Norton English list, for his wise and ready counsel. We also thank the staff at Norton who helped this book come into being: Julia Reidhead used her remarkable resources of energy, intelligence, and good humor to keep the book on course; Diane O'Connor guided the book through production; Erin Dye gracefully facilitated communications and meetings; Nancy Rodwan and Margaret Gorenstein handled the massive task of securing permissions; and Eileen Connell capably oversaw the interrelated projects of the Web site and the Course Guide. Our development editor, Kurt Wildermuth, paid attention to (and in many cases perfected) the book's "minute particulars" in ways that William Blake would have admired. Kurt also kept a steady eye on the book's larger shape and primary goal: to bring English-language poems originating in different times and places to modern readers-who will, we hope, find pleasure within these covers.

1. Csedmon's "Hymn" is probably the earliest extant Old English poem (composed sometime between 658 and 680). Old English texts have been preserved in copies of the Latin Ecclesiastical History of the English People, written by the great scholar Bede (ea. 673-735). Bede tells how Credrnon, an illiterate herdsman employed by the monastery of Whitby, miraculously received the gift of religious song, was received by the monks as a lay brother, and founded a school of Christian poetry. At feasts where the farmhands took turns singing and playing the harp, Csedrnon would withdraw to his bed in the stable whenever the harp was passed his way. One night a man appeared to him in a dream and commanded, "Ca-dmon, sing me something." When Czedrnon protested that he didn't know how to sing, the man insisted and told him to sing about the Creation. "At this, Credmon immediately began to sing verses in praise of God the Creator, which he had never heard before." (After transcribing the hymn, Bede remarks that "this is the general sense but not the exact order of the words that [Czedmon] sang in his sleep; for it is impossible to make a literal translation, no matter how well written, of poetry into another language without losing some of the beauty and dignity." Bede refers here to his translation of the poem from Old English to Latin, but the poem also changes significantly from an oral to a written medium.) After Csedmon told the story to his foreman, the monks tested him to establish that the gift was from God, and he composed other religious poems based on biblical stories they told him. The Germanic tribes had oral poets (the Beowulf poet portrays such a bard, or "scop," performing in the mead hall), and Csedrnon might have been trained as such a singer but concealed his knowledge of pagan poetry-what Bede calls "vain and idle songs." The "Hymn" is typical of Germanic verse: two half-lines, each containing two stressed and two or more unstressed syllables, linked by alliteration; interweaving of syntactically parallel formulaic expressions. For example, eight of the poem's half-lines consist of varying epithets for God: "Weard" (Guardian), "Meotod" (Measurer), "Wuldor-Fsederu" (Glory-Father), "Drihten" (Lord), "Scyppend" (Creator), and "Frea" (Master). The poem is given here in a West Saxon form with a literal interlinear translation by John Pope. In Old English spelling, æ (as in Credmon's name and line 3) is a vowel symbol that has not survived; it represents the vowel of Modern English cat; Þ (line 2) and ð (line 7) both represent the sound th. The large space in the middle of the line indicates the caesura. The alliterating sounds that connect the half-lines have been italicized.

2. Le., when he established the beginning of every wonder.

3. Later manuscript copies have "eorl>an" (earth) in place of "relda" (West Saxon ield, meaning "men's").

FROM BEOWULF[1]

[Introduction: History and Praise of the Danes; Account of Grendel's Attacks on Heorot]

So. The Spear-Danes in days gone by and the kings who ruled them had courage and greatness.
We have heard of those princes' heroic campaigns.
There was Shield Sheafson,[2] scourge of many tribes,
a wrecker of mead-benches, rampaging among foes.
This terror of the hall-troops had come far.
A foundling to start with, he would flourish later on as his powers waxed and his worth was proved.
In the end each clan on the outlying coasts
10 beyond the whale-road had to yield to him and begin to pay tribute. That was one good king.
Afterward a boy-child was born to Shield,
a cub in the yard, a comfort sent by God to that nation. He knew what they had tholed, suffered 15 the long times and troubles they'd come through without a leader; so the Lord of Life,
the glorious Almighty, made this man renowned.
Shield had fathered a famous son:
Beow's name was known through the north.
20 And a young prince must be prudent like that,
giving freely while his father lives
so that afterward in age when fighting starts steadfast companions will stand by him and hold the line. Behavior that's admired
25 is the path to power among people everywhere.
Shield was still thriving when his time came and he crossed over into the Lord's keeping.
His warrior band did what he bade them
when he laid down the law among the Danes:
30 they shouldered him out to the sea's Hood,[3]
the chief they revered who had long ruled them.
A ring-whorled prow rode in the harbor,
ice-clad, outbound, a craft for a prince.
They stretched their beloved lord in his boat,
35 laid out by the mast, amidships,
the great ring-giver. Far-fetched treasures were piled upon him, and precious gear.
I never heard before of a ship so well furbished

1. This epic poem was written in an Old English dialect sometime between the first part of the eighth century and the tenth century. Preserved in a late tenth-century manuscript, it was probably composed by a literate poet following the versification and style of Germanic oral poetry; the translation here is by the Irish poet Seamus Heaney (b. 1939; see pp. 1899-1910). The poem deals with the Germanic forebears of the English people, specifically the Danes, who inhabited the Danish island of Zealand, and the Geats of southern Sweden. In recounting the heroic feats of Beowulf of the Geats, the poem mixes elements of Christian tradition (the Germanic settlers in England had been converted to Christianity by the time the poem was written) with the heroic ideals of a non-Christian, warrior society.

2. A mythical king of the Scyldings (Danes), of divine origin and associated with agricultural fertility. Shield is the father of Beowulf the Dane, not Beowulf of the Geats.

3. Sea burials for chieftains, such as this one for Shield Sheafson, were probably more mythical than historical.

with battle-tackle, bladed weapons
40 and coats of mail. The massed treasure was loaded on top of him: it would travel far on out into the ocean's sway.
They decked his body no less bountifully with offerings than those first ones did
45 who cast him away when he was a child and launched him alone out over the waves.[4]
And they set a gold standard up high above his head and let him drift to wind and tide, bewailing him
50 and mourning their loss. No man can tell,
no wise man in hall or weathered veteran
knows for certain who salvaged that load.
Then it fell to Beow to keep the forts.
He was well regarded and ruled the Danes
55 for a long time after his father took leave of his life on earth. And then his heir,
the great Halfdane, held sway
for as long as he lived, their elder and warlord.
He was four times a father, this fighter prince:
60 one by one they entered the world,
Heorogar, Hrothgar, the good Halga,
and a daughter, I have heard, who was Onela's queen,
a balm in bed to the battle-scarred Swede.
The fortunes of war favored Hrothgar.
65 Friends and kinsmen flocked to his ranks,
young followers, a force that grew to be a mighty army. So his mind turned to hall-building: he handed down orders for men to work on a great mead-hall 70 meant to be a wonder of the world forever;
it would be his throne-room and there he would dispense his God-given goods to young and old—
but not the common land or people's lives.
Far and wide through the world, I have heard,
75 orders for work to adorn that wallstead were sent to many peoples. And soon it stood there finished and ready, in full view,
the hall of halls. Heorot was the name
he had settled on it, whose utterance was law.
80 Nor did he renege, but doled out rings
and torques[5] at the table. The hall towered, its gables wide and high and awaiting a barbarous burning. That doom abided, but in time it would come: the killer instinct
85 unleashed among in-laws, the blood-lust rampant.[6]
Then a powerful demon, a prowler through the dark,

4. Shield appeared from the sea as a child, apparently on a divinely ordained mission.

nursed a hard grievance. It harrowed him to hear the din of the loud banquet
every day in the hall, the harp being struck 90 and the clear song of a skilled poet telling with mastery of man's beginnings,
how the Almighty had made the earth
a gleaming plain girdled with waters;
in His splendor He set the sun and the moon
95 to be earth's lamplight, lanterns for men, and filled the broad lap of the world
with branches and leaves; and quickened life
in every other thing that moved.
So times were pleasant for the people there
100 until finally one, a fiend out of hell, began to work his evil in the world.
Grendel was the name of this grim demon haunting the marches, marauding round the heath
and the desolate fens; he had dwelt for a time
105 in misery among the banished monsters,
Cain's clan, whom the Creator had outlawed
and condemned as outcasts.[7] For the killing of Abel
the Eternal Lord had exacted a price:
Cain got no good from committing that murder
110 because the Almighty made him anathema, and out of the curse of his exile there sprang
ogres and elves and evil phantoms
and the giants too who strove with God
time and again until He gave them their reward.
115 So, after nightfall, Grendel set out for the lofty house, to see how the Ring-Danes were settling into it after their drink, and there he came upon them, a company of the best asleep from their feasting, insensible to pain 120 and human sorrow. Suddenly then the God-cursed brute was creating havoc:
greedy and grim, he grabbed thirty men
from their resting places and rushed to his lair, flushed up and inflamed from the raid,
125 blundering back with the butchered corpses.
Then as dawn brightened and the day broke,
Grendel's powers of destruction were plain:
their wassail? was over, they wept to heaven revelry
and mourned under morning. Their mighty prince, 130 the storied leader, sat stricken and helpless,
humiliated by the loss of his guard,
bewildered and stunned, staring aghast
at the demon's trail, in deep distress.
He was numb with grief, but got no respite
135 for one night later merciless Grendel

7. Grendel's descent is traced back to the biblical Cain, son of Adam and Eve. For the crime of killing his brother Abel, Cain was marked by God and sentenced to roam the earth as an outcast (Genesis 4).

struck again with more gruesome murders.
Malignant by nature, he never showed remorse.
It was easy then to meet with a man shifting himself to a safer distance
140 to bed in the bothies,[8] for who could be blind to the evidence of his eyes, the obviousness
of the hall-watcher's hate? Whoever escaped kept a weather-eye open and moved away.
So Grendel ruled in defiance of right,
145 one against all, until the greatest house
in the world stood empty, a deserted wallstead.
For twelve winters, seasons of woe,
the lord of the Shieldings suffered under his load of sorrow; and so, before long,
150 the news was known over the whole world.
Sad lays were sung about the beset king,
the vicious raids and ravages of Grendel,
his long and unrelenting feud,
nothing but war; how he would never 155 parley or make peace with any Dane
nor stop his death-dealing nor pay the death-price.[9]
No counselor could ever expect fair reparation from those rabid hands.
All were endangered; young and old
160 were hunted down by that dark death-shadow who lurked and swooped in the long nights on the misty moors; nobody knows where these reavers° from hell roam on their errands. marauders
So Grendel waged his lonely war,
165 inflicting constant cruelties on the people,
atrocious hurt. He took over Heorot, haunted the glittering hall after dark,
but the throne itself, the treasure-seat,
he was kept from approaching; he was the Lord's outcast.
170 These were hard times, heartbreaking
for the prince of the Shieldings; powerful counselors,
the highest in the land, would lend advice,
plotting how best the bold defenders
might resist and beat off sudden attacks.
175 Sometimes at pagan shrines they vowed offerings to idols, swore oaths that the killer of souls[1] might come to their aid and save the people. That was their way, their heathenish hope; deep in their hearts
180 they remembered hell. The Almighty Judge of good deeds and bad, the Lord God,
Head of the Heavens and High King of the World, was unknown to them. Oh, cursed is he

8. "The Irish word bothog means 'hut' or 'shanty,' often for unmarried workers on a farm. Grendel occupies Heorot, the seat of Danish culture, and ignores the outlying buildings" [Editor Daniel Donoghue's note, from Beowu/f: A Verse Translation (Norton Critical Edition)].
9. A Germanic law, called wergild, required compensatory payment by a criminal to the victim of a crime or to the victim's kin.

who in time of trouble has to thrust his soul
185 in the fire's embrace, forfeiting help;
he has nowhere to turn. But blessed is he who after death can approach the Lord
and find friendship in the Father's embrace.
So that troubled time continued, woe
190 that never stopped, steady affliction
for Halfdane's son, too hard an ordeal.
There was panic after dark, people endured raids in the night, riven by the terror.

[The Fight with Grendel]

Then out of the night
came the shadow-stalker, stealthy and swift.
The hall-guards were slack, asleep at their posts,
705 all except one; it was widely understood that as long as God disallowed it,
the fiend could not bear them to his shadow-bourne.
One man[2] however, was in fighting mood,
awake and on edge, spoiling for action.
710 In off the moors, down through the mist-bands
God-cursed Grendel came greedily loping.
The bane of the race of men roamed forth,
hunting for a prey in the high hall.
Under the cloud-murk he moved toward it 715 until it shone above him, a sheer keep of fortified gold. Nor was that the first time he had scouted the grounds of Hrothgar's dwelling-
although never in his life, before or since,
did he find harder fortune or hall-defenders.
720 Spurned and joyless, he journeyed on ahead and arrived at the bawn.[3] The iron-braced door turned on its hinge when his hands touched it.
Then his rage boiled over, he ripped open
the mouth of the building, maddening for blood, 725 pacing the length of the patterned floor
with his loathsome tread, while a baleful light, flame more than light, flared from his eyes.
He saw many men in the mansion, sleeping,
a ranked company of kinsmen and warriors
730 quartered together. And his glee was demonic, picturing the mayhem: before morning
he would rip life from limb and devour them, feed on their flesh; but his fate that night
was due to change, his days of ravening

2. I.e., Beowulf.
3. "Fortified outwork of a court or castle" [from Heaney's note to line 523].

735 had come to an end.
Mighty and canny,
Hygelac's kinsman was keenly watching
for the first move the monster would make.
Nor did the creature keep him waiting but struck suddenly and started in;
740 he grabbed and mauled a man on his bench,
bit into his bone-Iappings, bolted down his blood and gorged on him in lumps, leaving the body utterly lifeless, eaten up hand and foot. Venturing closer,
745 his talon was raised to attack Beowulf where he lay on the bed, he was bearing in with open claw when the alert hero's comeback and armlock forestalled him utterly.
The captain of evil discovered himself
750 in a handgrip harder than anything he had ever encountered in any man on the face of the earth. Every bone in his body quailed and recoiled, but he could not escape.
He was desperate to flee to his den and hide
755 with the devil's litter, for in all his days
he had never been clamped or cornered like this.
Then Hygelac's trusty retainer recalled his bedtime speech, sprang to his feet and got a firm hold. Fingers were bursting,
760 the monster back-tracking, the man overpowering.
The dread of the land was desperate to escape,
to take a roundabout road and flee
to his lair in the fens. The latching power in his fingers weakened; it was the worst trip
765 the terror-monger had taken to Heorot.
And now the timbers trembled and sang,
a hall-session that harrowed every Dane
inside the stockade: stumbling in fury,
the two contenders crashed through the building.
770 The hall clattered and hammered, but somehow survived the onslaught and kept standing:
it was handsomely structured, a sturdy frame
braced with the best of blacksmith's work inside and out. The story goes
775 that as the pair struggled, mead-benches were smashed and sprung off the floor, gold fittings and all.
Before then, no Shielding elder would believe there was any power or person upon earth
capable of wrecking their horn-rigged hall
780 unless the burning embrace of a fire engulf it in flame. Then an extraordinary wail arose, and bewildering fear came over the Danes. Everyone felt it who heard that cry as it echoed off the wall, 785 a God-cursed scream and strain of catastrophe,

the howl of the loser, the lament of the hell-serf
keening his wound. He was overwhelmed, manacled tight by the man who of all men
was foremost and strongest in the days of this life.
790 But the earl-troop's leader was not inclined to allow his caller to depart alive:
he did not consider that life of much account
to anyone anywhere. Time and again,
Beowulf's warriors worked to defend 795 their lord's life, laying about them
as best they could, with their ancestral blades.
Stalwart in action, they kept striking out on every side, seeking to cut straight to the soul. When they joined the struggle 800 there was something they could not have known at the time, that no blade on earth, no blacksmith's art
could ever damage their demon opponent.
He had conjured the harm from the cutting edge of every weapon. But his going away
805 out of this world and the days of his life would be agony to him, and his alien spirit would travel far into fiends' keeping.
Then he who had harrowed the hearts of men
with pain and affliction in former times
810 and had given offense also to God found that his bodily powers failed him.
Hygelac's kinsman kept him helplessly locked in a handgrip. As long as either lived,
he was hateful to the other. The monster's whole 815 body was in pain; a tremendous wound appeared on his shoulder. Sinews split and the bone-Iappings burst. Beowulf was granted the glory of winning; Grendel was driven under the fen-banks, fatally hurt,
820 to his desolate lair. His days were numbered,
the end of his life was coming over him,
he knew it for certain; and one bloody clash
had fulfilled the dearest wishes of the Danes.
The man who had lately landed among them,
825 proud and sure, had purged the hall,
kept it from harm; he was happy with his nightwork
and the courage he had shown. The Geat captain had boldly fulfilled his boast to the Danes:
he had healed and relieved a huge distress,
830 unremitting humiliations, the hard fate they'd been forced to undergo,
no small affliction. Clear proof of this could be seen in the hand the hero displayed
high up near the roof: the whole of Grendel's

[The Last SurvivorJs Speech]

Death had come and taken them all in times gone by
and the only one left to tell their tale,
the last of their line, could look forward to nothing
2240 but the same fate for himself: he foresaw that his joy in the treasure would be brief."
A newly constructed barrow stood waiting, on a wide headland
close to the waves, its entryway secured.
Into it the keeper of the hoard had carried 2245 all the goods and golden ware worth preserving. His words were few:
"Now, earth, hold what earls once held and heroes can no more; it was mined from you first by honorable men. My own people
2250 have been ruined in war; one by one they went down to death, looked their last on sweet life in the hall. I am left with nobody to bear a sword or to burnish plated goblets, put a sheen on the cup. The companies have departed.
2255 The hard helmet, hasped with gold,
will be stripped of its hoops; and the helmet-shiner
who should polish the metal of the war-mask sleeps;
the coat of mail that came through all fights,
through shield-collapse and cut of sword,
2260 decays with the warrior. Nor may webbed mail range far and wide on the warlord's back beside his mustered troops. No trembling harp, no tuned timber, no tumbling hawk
swerving through the hall, no swift horse
2265 pawing the courtyard. Pillage and slaughter have emptied the earth of entire peoples."
And so he mourned as he moved about the world,
deserted and alone, lamenting his unhappiness day and night, until death's flood brimmed up in his heart.

4. This passage comes near the end of the poem. Beowulf, now an old king who has ruled the Geats for fifty years, must fight a fierce flying dragon that guards a treasure hoard and terrorizes the region. These lines tell the history of the treasure: it is the accumulated wealth of a tribe of warriors, now perished. The "only one left to tell their tale" is the last survivor of the tribe. He carries the treasure to the barrow where his people are buried and speaks these words on the transience of earthly things. The Old English lines coincide with lines 2247-66 of the translation.

I am a lonely being, scarred by swords,
Wounded by iron, sated with battle-deeds,
Wearied by blades. Often I witness war,
Perilous fight, nor hope for consolation,
That any help may rescue me from strife
Before I perish among fighting men;
But hammered swords, hard edged and grimly sharp,
Batter me, and the handwork of the smith
Bites in the castles; I must ever wait
10 A contest yet more cruel. I could never
In any habitation find the sort
Of doctor who could heal my wounds with herbs;
But cuts from swords ever increase on me
Through deadly contest, both by day and night.

My dress is silent when I tread the ground
Or stay at home or stir upon the waters.
Sometimes my trappings and the lofty air
Raise me above the dwelling-place of men,
And then the power of clouds carries me far
Above the people; and my ornaments
Loudly resound, send forth a melody

1. The Old English riddles, like their counterparts in Latin poetic tradition (from which many of them are derived), are poems in which beings or objects from ordinary life are presented disguised in metaphoric terms. The riddles below, translated by Richard Hamer, are among those found in the Exeter Book, a tenth-century manuscript collection of Old English poetry. The "answers" appear in note 3 below.

And clearly sing, when I am not in touch
With earth or water, but a flying spirit.

A moth ate words; a marvellous event
I thought it when I heard about that wonder,
A worm had swallowed some man's lay," a thief
In darkness had consumed the mighty saying
With its foundation firm. The thief was not
One whit the wiser when he ate those words."

[Riddle 3 in Old English]

THE WIFE'S LAMENTI

I sing this song about myself, full sad,
My own distress, and tell what hardships I
Have had to suffer since I first grew up,
Present and past, but never more than now;
I ever suffered grief through banishment.
For since my lord departed from this people
Over the sea, each dawn have I had care
Wondering where my lord may be on land.
When I set off to join and serve my lord,
10 A friendless exile in my sorry plight,
My husband's kinsmen plotted secretly
How they might separate us from each other
That we might live in wretchedness apart
Most widely in the world: and my heart longed.
15 In the first place my lord had ordered me
To take up my abode here, though I had
Among these people few dear loyal friends;
Therefore my heart is sad. Then had I found

2. A short poem intended to be sung.
3. The solutions to these riddles are shield, swan, and bookworm, respectively.
1. This poem appears in the Exeter Book, a tenth-century manuscript collection of Old English poetry, immediately following a series of riddles. Different translations offer somewhat different interpretations of the poem; the one below, by Richard Hamer, suggests that the poem is a dramatic monologue spoken by a wife separated from her husband. Some critics have suggested that the poem may be an allegory in which the speaker represents either the soul or the children of Israel during the Babylonian captivity.

A fitting man, but one ill-starred, distressed,
20 Whose hiding heart was contemplating crime,
Though cheerful his demeanor. We had vowed
Full many a time that nought should come between us
But death alone, and nothing else at all.
All that has changed, and it is now as though
25 Our marriage and our love had never been,
And far or near forever I must suffer
The feud of my beloved husband dear.
So in this forest grove they made me dwell,
Under the oak-tree, in this earthy barrow.
30 Old is this earth-cave, all I do is yearn.
The dales are dark with high hills up above,
Sharp hedge surrounds it, overgrown with briars,
And joyless is the place. Full often here
The absence of my lord comes sharply to me.
35 Dear lovers in this world lie in their beds,
While I alone at crack of dawn must walk
Under the oak-tree round this earthy cave,
Where I must stay the length of summer days,
Where I may weep my banishment and all
40 My many hardships, for I never can
Contrive to set at rest my careworn heart,
Nor all the longing that this life has brought me.
A young man always must be serious,
And tough his character; likewise he should
45 Seem cheerful, even though his heart is sad
With multitude of cares. All earthly joy
Must come from his own self. Since my dear lord
Is outcast, far off in a distant land,
Frozen by storms beneath a stormy cliff
50 And dwelling in some desolate abode
Beside the sea, my weary-hearted lord
Must suffer pitiless anxiety.
And all too often he will call to mind
A happier dwelling. Grief must always be 55 For him who yearning longs for his beloved.

THE SEAFARER[1]

From the Anglo-Saxon

May I for my own self song's truth reckon,
Journey's jargon, how I in harsh days

1. This poem appears in the Exeter Book, a tenth-century manuscript collection of Old English poetry. This translation, by the American poet Ezra Pound (1885-1972; see pp. 1295-1310), was published in 1912; it ends at line 99. The end of the Old English poem, from Richard Hamer's translation, is provided in note 8 below. The poem realistically describes the hardships of a seafaring life, but some critics suggest that it is also a Christian allegory in which life is represented as a difficult journey over rough seas toward the harbor of heaven. Pound's translation plays down the Christian elements of the poem.

Hardship endured oft.
Bitter breast-cares have I abided,
Known on my keel- may a care's hold,
And dire sea-surge, and there loft spent
Narrow nightwatch nigh the ship's head
While she tossed close to cliffs. Coldly afflicted,
My feet were by frost benumbed.
10 Chill its chains are; chafing sighs
Hew" my heart round and hunger begot — strike
Mere't-weary mood. Lest man know not — sea
That he on dry land loveliest liveth,
List how I, care-wretched, on ice-cold sea,
15 Weathered the winter, wretched outcast
Deprived of my kinsmen;
Hung with hard ice-flakes, where hail-sour" flew, — hailstorms
There I heard naught save the harsh sea
And ice-cold wave, at whiles the swan cries,
20 Did for my games the gannet'so clamor, — large seahird's
Sea-fowls' loudness was for me laughter,
The mews" singing all my mead-drink. — seagulls'
Storms, on the stone-cliffs beaten, fell on the stern
In icy feathers; full oft the eagle screamed
25 With spray on his pinion." — wing
Not any protector
May make merry man faring needy.
This he little believes, who aye in winsome? life — pleasant
Abides 'mid burghers? some heavy business, — citizens
Wealthy and wine-flushed, how I weary oft
30 Must bide above brine."
Neareth nightshade, snoweth from north,
Frost froze the land, hail fell on earth then,
Corn of the coldest. Nathless" there knocketh now
The heart's thought that I on high streams
35 The salt-wavy tumult traverse alone.
Moaneth alway my mind's lust
That I fare forth, that I afar hence
Seek out a foreign? fastness." — remote / place
For this there's no mood-lofty man over earth's midst,
40 Not though he be given his good, but will have in his youth greed;
Nor his deed to the daring, nor his king to the faithful
But shall have his sorrow for sea-fare
Whatever his lord will.
He hath not heart for harping, nor in ring-having 45 Nor winsomeness to wife, nor world's delight
Nor any whit else save the wave's slash,
Yet longing comes upon him to fare forth on the water.
Bosque" taketh blossom, cometh beauty of berries, — grove
Fields to fairness, land fares brisker,
50 All this admonisheth man eager of mood,

2. The timber of a ship or boat upon which the framework of the whole is built.
3. I.e., must live a life at sea.
4. Nevertheless. Corn: small, hard particles or grains.

The heart turns to travel so that he then thinks
On flood-ways to be far departing.
Cuckoo calleth with gloomy crying,
He singeth summerward, bodeth sorrow,
55 The bitter heart's blood. Burgher knows not-
He the prosperous man-what some perform
Where wandering them widest draweth.
So that but now my heart burst from my breastlock,
My mood 'mid the mere-flood,
60 Over the whale's acre, would wander wide."
On earth's shelter cometh oft to me,
Eager and ready, the crying lone-flyer," cuckoo
Whets for the whale-path the heart irresistibly,
O'er tracks of ocean; seeing that anyhow
65 My lord deems to me this dead life
On loan and on land," I believe not
That any earth-weal eternal standeth
Save there be somewhat calamitous
That, ere a man's tide go, turn it to twain.
70 Disease or oldness or sword-hate
Beats out the breath from doom-gripped body.
And for this, every earl whatever, for those speaking after-
Laud of the living, boasteth some last word,
That he will work ere he pass onward,
75 Frame on the fair earth 'gainst foes his malice,
Daring? ado,° . . . brave / deeds
So that all men shall honor him after
And his laud beyond them remain 'mid the English,"
Aye, for ever, a lasting life's-blast,
80 Delight 'mid the doughty." valiant
Days little durable,
And all arrogance of earthen riches,
There come now no kings nor Cresars" emperors
Nor gold-giving lords like those gone.
Howe'er in mirth most magnified
85 Who'er lived in life most lordliest,
Drear all this excellence, delights undurable!
Waneth the watch, but the world holdeth.
Tomb hideth trouble. The blade is layed low.
Earthly glory ageth and seareth.
90 No man at all going the earth's gait,
But age fares against him, his face paleth,
Gray-haired he groaneth, knows gone companions,
Lordly men, are to earth o'ergiven,
Nor may he then the flesh-cover, whose life ceaseth,
95 Nor eat the sweet nor feel the sorry,
Nor stir hand nor think in mid heart,
And though he strew the grave with gold,

5. Pound changes the original here by substituting "mood" for the a.E. term for "thoughts" and then by omitting a line describing the thoughts returning to the speaker "with greed and longing."

6. Behind Pound's phrase "on loan and on land" is an a.E. phrase meaning "briefly on Earth."

7. In the original, the sense is "with the angels," not "mid the English."

His born brothers, their buried bodies
Be an unlikely treasure hoard."

8. Pound's translation omits the part of the original sentence that describes the gold buried with the brother's corpse as something that can "bring no help to the soul that's full of sins, / Against God's wrath, although he [the dead person] hide it here / Ready before his death while yet he lives." The ensuing lines, in Hamer's translation, go as follows:

Great is the might of God, by which earth moves;
For He established its foundations firm,
The land's expanses, and the sky above.
Foolish is he who does not fear his Lord,
For death will come upon him unprepared.
Blessed is he who humble lives; for grace
Shall come to him from heaven. The Creator
Shall make his spirit steadfast, for his faith
Is in God's might. Man must control himself
With strength of mind, and firmly hold to that,
True to his pledges, pure in all his ways.
With moderation should each man behave
In all his dealings with both friend and foe.
No man will wish the friend he's made to burn
In fires of hell, or on an earthly pyre,
Yet fate is mightier, the Lord's ordaining
More powerful than any man can know.
Let us think where we have our real home,
And then consider how we may come thither;
And let us labor also, so that we
May pass into eternal blessedness,
Where life belongs amid the love of God,
Hope in the heavens. The Holy One be thanked
That He has raised us up, the Prince of Glory,
Lord without end, to all eternity.
Amen.

1. This is one of the earliest Middle English lyrics presenting the Passion of Christ (his Crucifixion at Calvary), a subject that occurs frequently in Middle English lyrics. This poem, which was perhaps originally part of a longer one on the Passion, is notable for its wordplay: e.g., "sonne" means both "sun" and "son"; and the "wode" of line 1 refers both to the woods behind which the sun is setting and to Christ's wooden cross; "rode" (line 2) also plays on "cross" (the Old English rood), as does "tre" (line 3).
2. Face. According to John 19.25, Christ's mother, the Virgin Mary, witnessed the Crucifixion. Me reweth: I pity.
3. This song about summer or spring "coming in" is one of the earliest surviving Middle English lyrics. It is written, with music, in a manuscript that was owned by a religious house.

4. Farts: thought to derive from the Old English [eortan, although some commentators suggest a derivation from the Latin vertere, "to turn" or "to cavort."
5. Cease ("swik") thou never now, i.e., don't ever stop.
6. The first line translates the Latin title: "Where are now those who lived before us?" This lyric is part of an extensive medieval tradition of ubi sunt poems lamenting the mutability of human life and institutions; for an Old English example, see "The Seafarer" (p. 12).

3. He gave it [his life] for thee; thou repay him for it. Yelde: yield.
4. Against his foe take thou that staff [the cross] and revenge him upon that thief [the Devil].
5. Right belief, or true faith.
6. Then try to strengthen your hand; an allusion to the "shield of faith" (Ephesians 6.16).
7. I.e., the point of your staff.
8. Make the traitor say the word (of surrender). Some editors place a comma after "word" and a period after "londe" in the next line. Our editorial decision about punctuating these difficult lines-a decision that breaks the pattern of syntactically self-contained stanzas-requires "thereinne" of line 49 to be interpreted as "wherein."
9. Help us to flee from sin-with a play on "sunne" (line 58) and "sone" (line 59).

The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale[1]

The Prologue

Experience, though noon auctoritee
Were in this world, is right ynough for me
To speke of wo that is in mariage:
For lordinges,? sith I twelf yeer was of age- gentlemen
Thanked be God that is eterne on live-
Housbondes at chirche dore- I have had five
(If I so ofte mighte han wedded be),

1. The Wife of Bath's prologue and tale have no link to a preceding tale and together occupy different positions in the many manuscript versions of The Canterbury Tales. Most scholars agree, however, that the Wife's powerful voice begins a sequence of tales dealing with marriage. In her prologue, the Wife draws on and often comically questions classical and Christian traditions of antiwoman and antimarriage discourse in various genres. At once embodying and satirizing common stereotypes of women drawn from Christian and classical "authorities" (whom she sometimes comically misquotes), the Wife speaks from a position shaped, she claims, by her "experience," rather than by "auctoritee." In so doing, she reminds us that many fewer women than men had access to literacy-and its cultural prestige-during the Middle Ages than do today. This was, in part, because fewer girls than boys received formal education, but also because literacy was commonly defined as mastery of Latin, the language of the Church and the priesthood, which was often inaccessible or incomprehensible to women and to laymen. In creating a female character who uses a version of the English vernacular to engage in witty battle with generations of literate clerks and their writings about women, Chaucer engages in lively but also serious play in an arena of (ongoing) cultural debate.

The Wife's tale illustrates some of the claims she makes in her prologue about women's right to be "sovereign" (to rule) over men. While the Wife's prologue draws on contemporary history and her own life story, her tale transports us to a distant, largely fictional world of chivalric romance. Although the Wife at one point "interrupts" her fairy tale to continue the authority-citing debate of the prologue, her argument is mostly carried by a plot that combines elements from two traditional stories found in many European languages: that of a knight and a "loathlv" lady and that of a man whose life depends on his being able to answer a certain question.

2. The actual wedding ceremony was performed at the church door.

3. Once. Ne ... nevere: in Middle English, double negatives reinforce each other rather than cancel each other out.
4. Cana, a town in Galilee where Christ attended a wedding and turned water into wine (see John 2.1).
5. Hark also, 10, what a sharp word to the purpose.
6. Christ was actually referring to a sixth man, with whom the Samaritan woman was living but to whom she was not married (cf. John 4.16-19).
7. Le., increase (see Genesis 1.28).
8. Both the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures explain marriage as a union between husband and wife that requires the man to leave his parents to become "one" with his wife; see Genesis 2.24 and Matthew 19.5.
9. Le., of two or eight marriages. The Wife is referring to successive rather than simultaneous marriages.
1. Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines (I Kings 11.3).
2. I.e., so happy was he with life.
3. Whom I have cleaned out of everything worthwhile.
4. Of their lower purse (Le., testicles) and their money box.
5. Practical experiences in various works.

9. "It is good for a man not to touch a woman" (I Corinthians 7.1).
1. I.e., what this metaphor may refer to.
2. This is all there is to it.
3. Frailty I call it unless.
4. I.e., his or her own.
5. The Wife distinguishes between "virginitee" for unmarried persons and "continence" for husbands and wives.
6. Footsteps. In Matthew 19.21, Christ tells a rich man to give up his wealth if he wishes to gain riches in heaven.
7. And made by so perfectly wise a maker.

Thanne maistou chese" wheither thou wolt sippe — choose

8. In the descriptions of the miracle of the loaves and fishes, it is actually John, not Mark, who mentions barley bread (6.9).
9. In the vocabulary of romance, dangerous refers to the disdainfulness with which a highborn woman rejects a lover. The Wife means she will not withhold sexual favors, in emulation of God's generosity (line 156).
I. When he wishes her to.
2. Le., as long as I am alive, he does not even control his body.

3. "He who will not be warned by the example of others shall become an example to others." The Wife wrongly attributes this proverb to the Almagest, an astronomical work by the second-century Greek astronomer and mathematician Ptolemy.
4. If I speak according to my fancy.
5. I set no store by it.
6. I.e., there was no need for me to make any further effort.
7. Set no value on.
8. I.e., be busy constantly
9. At Dunmow, a side of bacon was awarded to the couple who after a year of marriage could claim no quarrels, no regrets, and the desire, if freed, to remarry one another.

The Wife draws on some of the anti-female Latin texts in jankyn's book, while resembling Trotula and Heloise in being capable of engaging in learned discourse with clerks.
7. Art of Love, by the Roman poet Ovid (43 B.C.E-?17 C.E.). Parables of Salomon: the biblical book of Proverbs.

8. In one of Aesop's fables, the lion, shown a picture of a man killing a lion, asked who painted the picture. The suggestion is that had the artist been a lion, the roles would have been reversed.
9. I.e., clerks and women, astrologically ruled by Mercury and Venus, respectively.
1. Because of their contrary positions (as planets), each one descends (in the belt of the zodiac) as the other rises; hence one loses its power as the other becomes dominant.
2. I.e., Mercury is deprived of power in Pisces (the sign of the fish), where Venus is most powerful.

3. In Greek mythology, Dejanira unwittingly gave Hercules a poisoned shirt, which hurt him so much that he committed suicide by fire.
4. From St. Jerome, the Wife borrows a story about the ancient Greek philosopher Socrates having two wives; many other sources relate the story of his patiently enduring the torments of his shrewish wife, Xantippa.
5. Pasiphae, Greek mythological figure who had intercourse with a bull.
6. Clytemnestra, Greek mythological figure who, with her lover, Aegisthus, slew her husband, Agamemnon.
7. Amphiaraus, betrayed by his wife, Eriphyle, and forced to go to the war against Thebes.
8. I.e., Lucilla, who was said to have poisoned her husband, the poet Lucretius, with a potion designed to keep him faithful. Livia murdered her husband on behalf of her lover, Sejanus.

2. Casts off her undergarment.
3. I.e., a fair woman who is not chaste is like a gold ring in a sow's nose. The Wife here makes a biblical proverb even more derogatory toward women than it is in the original (cf. Proverbs 11.22: "As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman without discretion").
4. Le., hit.
5. Le., but in the end, after great difficulty and complaint, we fell into accord, i.e., made it up between the two of us.

5. Repay your trouble.
6. That wears.
7. In the courtly love tradition, the lady's lightest word was her lover's law. Here, the knight claims that women want to exercise the same dominion over their husbands.

In al the court ne was ther wif ne maide
1050 Ne widwe that contraried" that he saide, contradicted
But saiden he was worthy han° his lif. to have
And with that word up sterte" that olde wif, started
Which that the knight sawgh sitting on the greene;
"Mercy," quod she, "my soverein lady queene,
1055 Er that youre court departe, do me right.
I taughte this answere unto the knight,
For which he plighte me his trouthe there
The firste thing I wolde him requere" require
He wolde it do, if it laye in his might.
1060 Bifore the court thanne praye I thee, sire knight,"
Quod she, "that thou me take unto thy wif,
For we! thou woost that I have kept" thy lif. saved
If I saye fals, say nay, upon thy fay."
This knight answerde, "Allas and wailaway,
1065 I woot right wel that swich was my biheeste.° promise
For Goddes love, as cheese a newe requeste: choose
Taak al my good and lat my body go."
"Nay thanne," quod she, "I shrewe" us bothe two. curse
For though that I be foul and old and poore,
1070 I nolde for al the metal ne for ore
That under erthe is grave" or lith" above, buried / lies
But if thy wif I were and eek thy love."
"My love," quod he. "Nay, my dampnacioun!? damnation
Allas, that any of my nacioun? family
1075 Sholde evere so foule disparaged" be." degraded
But al for nought, th'ende is this, that he
Constrained was: he needes moste hire wedde,
And taketh his olde wif and gooth to bedde.
Now wolden some men saye, paraventure,
1080 That for my necligence I do no cure"
To tellen you the joye and al th'array
That at the feeste was that ilke day.
To which thing shortly answere I shal:
I saye ther nas no joye ne feeste at al;
1085 Ther nas but hevinesse and muche sorwe.
For prively he wedded hire on° morwe," in / the morning
And al day after hidde him as an owle,
So wo was him, his wif looked so foule.
Greet was the wo the knight hadde in his thought:
1090 Whan he was with his wif abedde brought,
He walweth" and he turneth to and fro. tosses
His olde wif lay smiling everemo,
And saide, "O dere housbonde, benedicite,? bless ye
Fareth" every knight thus with his wif as ye? behaves
1095 Is this the lawe of King Arthures hous?
Is every knight of his thus daungerous?" standoffish
I am youre owene love and youre wif;
I am she which that saved hath youre Iif;
And certes yit ne dide I you nevere unright.

8. I do not take the trouble.

1100 Why fare ye thus with me this firste night?
Ye faren like a man hadde lost his wit.
What is my gilt? For Goddes love, telle it,
And it shal been amended if I may."
"Amended!" quod this knight. "Allas, nay, nay,
1105 It wol nat been amended neveremo.
Thou art so lothly" and so old also, hideous
And therto comen of so lowe a kinde," lineage
That litel wonder is though I walwe and winde.? turn
So wolde God myn herte wolde brestel'" break
1110 "Is this," quod she, "the cause of youre unreste?"
"Ye, certainly," quod he. "No wonder is."
"Now sire," quod she, "I coude amende al this,
If that me liste, er it were dayes three,
SOD we! ye mighte bere you unto me.? provided that

1. Probably composed between 1360 and 1387, The Vision of Piers Plowman is a long religious, social, and political allegory. It is written in alliterative verse in a west-midlands dialect, which differs in many ways from that used by Chaucer in the nearly contemporaneous Canterbury Tales. Piers survives in several distinct versions, which scholars refer to as the A-, B-, C-, and Z-texts. The A-text (about twenty-four hundred lines) breaks off inconclusivelv; the B-text, which we follow here, is about four thousand lines longer. The C-text is poetically and doctrinally more conservative. Recently, scholars have focused on the Z-text as possibly being an earlier text than the other three. That a large number of manuscripts (and two sixteenth-century printed editions) survive suggests that the poem was quite popular during the early modern period.

The poem takes the form of a dream vision, a popular genre during the Middle Ages in which the author presents a story as the dream of the main character. The selection here from the poem's prologue introduces the dreamer's vision of the Field of Folk, which represents fourteenth-century English society and its failures to live in accordance with Christian principles.

2. I.e., 1 dressed in garments as if I were either a sheep or a shepherd.
3. Perhaps meaning one without holy works to his credit, but not necessarily one of sinful works. In habite ... heremite: thus the simple clothes resemble those of a hermit.
4. Traveling forth on a May morning often initiated a dream vision in medieval poetry. As the setting of the vision, the "Malverne Hills," in the West Midlands, are generally thought to have been the site of Langland's early home (if such a person existed; see biographical sketch, p. 2107).
5. I.e., a marvel ("ferly") that seemed to be from fairyland.
6. Le., looked toward the east on high, toward the sun. Both the east and the sun symbolize Christ.
7. This phrase has several possible meanings, including "well or wonderfully made" and "made like a tree," i.e., like the cross.
8. Found. The fair field of folk is commonly interpreted as a representation of the world, situated between heaven (the tower) and hell (the dungeon in the valley).
9. I.e., and won that which wasters destroyed with gluttony. An opposition between winners and wasters was a common idea during the period.

1. I.e., and dressed themselves accordingly, disguised in an outward show of finery.
2. I.e., like anchorites and hermits who keep to their cells, instead of coveting to wander C'cairen") about the land ("con tree") to indulge their bodies ("likame") with a luxurious way of life ("likerous Iiflode"). An anchorite (male) or anchoress (female) vowed to live a reclusive, religious life in a cell.
3. A proverbial term for sinners.
4. Le., they devise fantasies and make fools of themselves even though they possess intelligence if they should choose to work.
5. Perhaps an allusion to St. Paul's words in 2 Thessalonians 3.10: "For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat."
6. "He who utters foul speech" (Latin) is the Devil's servant; the quotation is not from St. Paul (nor does Langland say it is), but it bears some resemblance to his words in Ephesians 5.4 and Colossians 3.8.
7. I.e., until their bellies and their bags were crammed to the brimful; a bag was carried by beggars for receiving the food bestowed on them as alms.
8. A term for robbers; "roberdes" men were lawless vagabonds, notorious for their crimes during the period when Piers Plawman was written.
9. Le., pilgrims and palmers pledged themselves to visit famous shrines of the day. Palmers were pilgrims who had gone to the Holy Land and carried a palm leaf or a badge in token of their journey. The shrine of St. james, or Santiago, was a famous place of pilgrimage in Spain, and one of the four pilgrimages assigned as penance for particularly grave sins. Rome was known for its many shrines.
1. The Walsingham shrine was the most famous shrine in England dedicated to the Virgin Mary,

2. Lubbers ("lobies") or tall ("longe") idle louts, who are loath to work C'swynke"), disguised themselves as hermits to have their comfort. Copes: the special dress of friars or monks.
3. The four orders of friars: the Carmelites, Augustinians; Dominicans, or Jacobins; and Franciscans.
4. Complaints were frequently made in medieval literature that friars interpreted ("glosed") the Scriptures to serve their own purposes.
5. I.e., many of these masters can ("mowe") dress themselves as they like.
6. Le., since Charity (or those who claim to work for it) has become a merchant and first ("chief") to hear the confessions ("shryve") of noblemen; alluding to money received by friars for hearing confessions.
7. I.e., unless Holy Church and they ("hii": i.e., the friars) hold together better, then great misfortune ("meschief") on Earth ("molde") is coming.
8. I.e., as if he were a priest. A pardoner was empowered by the pope to supply an indulgence for a sin, in return for some payment toward the Church. An indulgence granted remission of punishment by the Church for the sin, but not forgiveness from the guilt of the sin. While the payment was supposed to be a voluntary contribution to the works of the Church, the system was open to the kind of abuse shown in this pardoner. A papal bull was a formal statement of "indulgence," and the seals of bishops in whose diocese the pardoner was (ostensibly) licensed to preach were affixed to it.
9. I.e., he struck ("bonched") them with his document ("brevet"), and bleared their eyes, and thus got ("raughte") rings and brooches with his bull ("rageman": a long parchment with ragged edges), in payment for pardon.
1. Le., thus you give your gold to help gluttons, and hand it ("leneth") to wretches ("losels") who indulge in lechery.
2. Seal of authorization. Worth bathe his eris: i.e., worthy to have his ears, being alert and vigilant.
3. Le., it is not with the bishop's permission that the rogue preaches. Thus, the pardoner has illicitly obtained the bishop's seal; moreover, he has bribed the parish priest and divides the money with him.

4. Le., and sing Masses for payment; simony: the practice of buying or selling ecclesiastical preferment. After the plague caused depopulation and a loss of tithes and income, many priests went to London to make money by saying Masses for the souls of rich dead persons.
5. Le., those who have responsibility under Christ, and clerical tonsure (or "crownynge": the part of a monk's or priest's head that has been shaved) as a symbol of their responsibility to hear the confessions of their parishioners, instead reside ("Liggen") in London during Lent (the busiest time of the Christian year) and at other times C'ellis").
6. In the courts, those serving the king claim dues arising to him from guardianship cases ("wardes"), meetings held in each ward ("wardemotes"), lost property ("weyves") and stray animals ("streyves"). The Exchequer ("Cheker") was the commission to receive revenue and the audit of accounts; the Chancery C'Chauncelrie") heard petitions addressed to the king.
7. Condemn. A consistory court was held by a bishop or his official to consider any case in which an ecclesiastic was involved.
8. In Matthew 16.15, Christ tells Peter: "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."
9. The four cardinal virtues: prudence, temperance, fortitude, and justice.
1. Closing gates. A rough translation of Latin cardinalis, which is derived from cardo, or hinge; thus the power of the four cardinal virtues is made into the power of the hinges on the gates to heaven, where Christ rules. The word "cardinals" also plays on a double meaning, referring to the cardinals of the papal consistory.
2. I.e., but of the cardinals (or church officials) who grabbed ("kaughte") that name, and presumed to claim they have the power St. Peter had to name a pope, I will not find fault with them. Perhaps an allusion to the French cardinals who elected an antipope in 1378 (Clement VII, a Frenchman), thus creating the Great Schism.
3. Election of popes; also, a reference to salvation.

FROM PEARL[1]
1375-1400

I

Perle plesaunte to prynces paye	Pearl," the precious prize of a king,
To clanly clos in golde so clere	Chastely set in cherished gold,
Oute of Oryent I hardyly saye	In all the East none equalling,
Ne proued I neuer her precios pere	No peer to her could I behold.
So rounde so reken in vche arave	So round, so rare, a radiant thing,
So smal so smope her sydeg were	So smooth she was, so small of mold,
Quere so euer I jugged gemme3 gaye	Wherever I judged gems glimmering
I sette hyr sengely in synglure	I set her apart, her price untold.
Alias I leste hyr in on erbere	Alas, I lost her in earth's green fold;
10 þur3 gresse to grounde hit fro me yot	Through grass to the ground, I searched in vain.
I dewyne fordolked of luf daungere	I languish alone; my heart grows cold
Of þat pryuy perle wythouten spot	For my precious pearl without a stain."

Sypen in þat spote hit fro me sprange	Since in that spot it slipped from me,
Ofte haf I wayted wyschande þat wele	I lingered, longing for that delight
15 Pat wont watj whyle deuoyde my wrange	That from my sins once set me free
& heuen my happe & al my hele	And my happiness raised to the highest height.
Pat dotg bot prych my hert prange	Her going wounds me grievously;

I. Pearl was written in the latter half of the fourteenth century by an unknown author who probably lived in the northwest midlands of England. The one manuscript of the poem still extant also contains the poems Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, Purity, and Patience, all generally thought to be by the same author. Pearl, in the form of a dream vision, a popular convention of the time, is an elegy on the death of a child, perhaps the poet's daughter. Many scholars, however, read the poem as an allegory. In the poem's 101 stanzas, the dreamer carries on a dialogue with the Pearl maiden, who instructs him in Christian doctrine. The intricate pattern of the poem involves rhyme and repeated words and phrases that link the stanzas, forming, finally, a circular structure. The translation used here was done by Sara deFord and a group of her students at Goucher College. The translators chose to print their translation side by side with the original in Middle English (they modernized only the capitalization). They have attempted to remain true to the original form, retaining, where possible, the four-beat alliterative line, rhyme pattern, and repetition of words and phrases of the original. The first five stanzas of the poem, reproduced here, recount the narrator's grief at the loss of his Pearl, and the beginning of the "slumber" that will produce his dream vision of the maid. (The roman numerall above our selection marks the first five-stanza section of the original text.)

2. In medieval tradition, the pearl symbolizes the pure and precious.

3. The translators note that the word "spot" is used in the first five stanzas, but because of the limited rhyme possibilities, they have substituted "stain" in the terminal position.

	My breste in bale bot bolne & bele	It burns my breast both day and night.
	3et þoȝt me neuer so swete a sange	Yet I never imagined a melody
20	As stylle stounde let to me stele	So sweet as she, so brief, and slight.
	For sope þer fleten to me fele	But memory flowed through my mind's sight:
	To penke hir color so clad in clot	I thought how her color in clods" had lain
	O moul pou marreg a myry iuele	O dust that dims what once was bright,
	My priuy perle wythouten spotte	My precious pearl without a stain.

25	Pat spot of spyseg [mol t nedeg sprede	Rare spices on that spot must spread:
	Per such rycheg to rot is runne	Such riches there to rot have run,
	Blomeg blayke & blwe & rede	Blooms of yellow and blue and red,
	Per schyneg ful schyr agayn þe sunne	Their sheen a shimmer against the sun.
	Flor & fryte may not be fede	Flower and fruit nor faded nor dead,
30	Per hit doun drof in moldeg dunne	Where the pearl dropped down in mouldering dun;"
	For vch gresse mot grow of grayne3 dede	Each grass from a lifeless grain is bred,
	No whete were elleg to wonej wonne	Else to harvest no wheat were won:"
	Of goud vche goude is ay bygonne	Always from good is good begun.
	So semly a sede moȝt fayly not	So seemly? a seed could not die in vain,
35	Pat spryg ande spyceg vp ne sponne	That sprig nor spice there would be none
	Of þat precios perle wythouten spotte	Of that precious pearl without a stain.

	To þat spot þat I in speche expoun	To the spot which I in speech portray,
	I entred in þat erber grene	I entered in that arbor green,
	In Augoste in a hY3 seysoun	In August on a holy day,
40	Quen corne is coruen wyth crokej kene	When the corn is cut with sickles keen.
	On huyle þer perle hit trendeled doun	On the little rise where my pearl rolled away,

4. I.e., clods of earth.
5. "Moldej dunne" may be translated "dark clods of earth."
6. Christ uses this metaphor in reference to his own Crucifixion: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit" (John 12.24).
7. Beautiful.

	Schadowed þis wortej ful schyre & schene	The fairest flowers formed a screen:
	Gilofre gyngure & gromylyoun	Gillyflower, ginger, gromwell spray,
	& pyonys powdered ay bytwene	With peonies" powdered in between.
45	3if hit wat3 semly on to sene	If they were seemly to be seen,
	A fayr reflayr 3et fro hit flot	Far sweeter the scents from that domain,
	Per wonys þat worpyly I wot & wene	More worthy her dwelling, well I ween,?
	My precious perle wythouten spot	My precious pearl without a stain.

	Bifore þat spot my honde I spenn[e]d	I mourned, hands clenched, before that mound,
50	For care ful colde þat to me cajt	For the piercing cold of grief had caught
	A deuely dele in my hert denned	Me in the doleful dread and bound
	Pa3 resoun sette myseluen sa3t	My heart, though reason solace sought.
	I playned my perle þat þer watg spenned	I longed for my pearl, locked in the ground,
	Wyth fyrte skylle3 þat faste fa3t	While fierce contentions in me fought.
55	Pa3 kynde of Kryst me comfort kenned	In Christ, though comfort could be found,
	My wreched wylle in wo ay wrayte	My wretched will was still distraught.
	I felle vpon þat floury fla3t	I fell upon that flowery plot.
	Suche odour to my hemeg schot	Such odors eddied in my brain,
	I slode vpon a slepyng-slagte	To sudden slumber I was brought
60	On þat precjijos perle wythouten spot	By that precious pearl without a stain.

Although it whilom" were to me pleasere, formerly
It fill enough it doth mine heart today,
And doth° me wish I clothed had my bier[6]- makes
God have her soul, I can no better say.

2. The occasion of the poem is the approaching New Year; New Year's Day was the day for gift-giving during the Middle Ages. The speaker asks what gift he can give his love, who is dead. He can endow Masses, but the poem itself, a ballade, is a symbolic gift in memory of the lady.
3. Person; the speaker wants to show everyone that he does not forget his lady.
4. Le., I will serve this dead woman ("her") to the best of my power.
5. I.e., if anything else could help her, I would pay any cost.
6. A movable stand on which a corpse is placed before burial; i.e., I wish that I had died.

I. The poems in this section do not appear in chronological order, since they cannot be dated with any certainty. Like the "Anonymous Lyrics of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries" (see pp. 15-19), these works often blend religious and secular themes; the line between sacred love and erotic love is particularly ambiguous in poems such as "I Have a Young Sister" and "The Corpus Christi Carol."

English poems explicitly titled "carols" first appear in fifteenth-century manuscripts. In earlier centuries, the term usually denoted a ring-dance accompanied by singing that originated in France (the French carole) and was fashionable during Chaucer's lifetime. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, carols were poems with uniform stanzas often rhyming aaab and linked by the last rhyme to a "burden," or refrain. The burden typically appears at the beginning of the carol and after each stanza. Carols initially treated many subjects, even celebrations of battle victories as in the "Carol of Agincourt" below. Gradually, however, they became associated, as they are today, with the feast of Christmas.

2. This poem survives only in a fifteenth-century manuscript collection of carols. It explores the theological idea of the felix culpa (Latin, "happy fault"). The poet, in a kind of humorous, courtly gesture, identifies the happy event not as humankind's redemption but as the elevation of the Virgin Mary as queen of heaven. I-hounden: bound.

3. One tradition placed the Creation at about 4000 H.C.E.

4. I.e., if the apple had not been taken.

5. "Thanks be to God!" (Latin).

6. This poem celebrating the purity of Christ's mother and the mystery of Christ's birth from a virgin appears in a manuscript containing a variety of English ballads and carols as well as several songs in Latin.

7. A triple pun: mateless, matchless, and spotless.

8. A covert made of leafy branches; also, a bedchamber.

He cam also stille
Ther his moder lay
15 As dewe in Aprille
That falleth on the spray." budding twig

Moder and maiden? virgin
Was nevere noon but she:
Well may swich? a lady such

Noel) noel) noel . . .

Now man may to heaven wend;" go
Now heaven and earth to him they bend;

9. A word sung as an expression of joy, originally to commemorate Christ's birth; in this carol, included with music in two fifteenth-century manuscripts, the refrain celebrates both Christ and his virgin mother.
1. Figuratively, the repose of death; also, inactivity or sluggishness.
2. I.e., takes the prize; also, takes the foremost position; also, with a pun on bearing a child.
3. I.e., joy, delight.
4. According to medieval Catholic doctrine, Mary, as queen of heaven, had the power to intercede for those sent to hell.

25 He that was foe now is our friend.
This is no nay that I you tell.[5]

Noel, noel, noel . . .

Now, blessed brother, grant us grace

Then hadde it no stone.
When the dove was an ey," — egg
Then hadde it no bone.

25 When the briar was unbred,"[6]
Then hadde it no rinde.
When the maiden hath that she loveth,
She is without longinge.

5. I.e., what I tell you cannot be denied.

6. Unknown, i.e., still in the seed.

Timor Mortis?

In what estate! so ever I be
  Timor mortis conturbat me.

As I went on a merry morning,
I heard a bird both weep and sing.
This was the tenore of her talking: meaning
  "Timor mortis conturbat me."

I asked that bird what she meant.
"I am a musket- both fair and gent;" gentle, noble

7. Makes me rise. Croweth me day: crows at daybreak.
8. I.e., down to the base or imbedded portion of the spurs.
9. The title and refrain of this poem come from a prayer recited (in Latin) during the Catholic religious rite known as the Office of the Dead. "Since I have been sinning daily and repenting not," the prayer says, "the fear of death dismays me" (timor mortis conturbat me). A number of other medieval lyrics use the same line as their refrain, as does the later poem by William Dunbar (see p. 86). This poem is unusual in combining the carol form with a narrative convention-that of the "unexpected encounter"-typical of the chanson d'aventure (French, "adventure song").
1. Condition; also, more specifically, an allusion to the medieval view of society as divided into three great "estates": the nobility, the clergy, and the workers.
2. Male sparrowhawk.

For dread of death I am all shent:? ruined
10 Timor mortis conturbat me.

"When I shall die, I know no day;
What country or place I cannot say;
Wherefore this song sing I may:
Timor mortis conturbat me.

15 "[esu Christ, when he should die,
To his Father he ganO say, began [to}
'Father,' he said, 'in Trinity,"
Timor mortis conturbat me.'

"All Christian people, behold and see:
20 This world is but a vanity
And replete with necessity.
Timor mortis conturbat me.

The Corpus Christi Carol"

Lully, lullay, lully, lullay, 5
The falcon hath born my make° away. mate

He bore him up, he bore him down,
He bore him into an orchard brown.

In that orchard there was a hall
That was hanged with purple and pall.° black velvet

3. The Christian doctrine that God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost form one true, eternal God.
4. The title of this carol, Latin for "body of Christ," alludes both to the sacrament of the Holy Communion and to a feast of the Church in celebration of that sacrament. The appearance of the words on a stone in the poem's final line has led some critics to interpret the wounded knight as the crucified Christ and/or as the "Fisher King," a Christianized version of a hero in an ancient fertility myth.
The version of the carol printed here first appears in a sixteenth-century manuscript anthology, and some scholars believe that the poem dates from that century rather than from the fifteenth. The late dating has given rise to a historical-allegorical interpretation that takes the knight as a figure for King Henry VIII (1492-1547). He divorced his first wife, Katherine of Aragon, to marry Anne Boleyn, whose heraldic badge was a falcon.
5. This lullabylike refrain appears only in the version of the carol printed here, although several other versions have been recorded by folk-song collectors.

Lully, lullay, lully, lullay, ...

And in that hall there was a bed,
10 It was hanged with gold so red.

Lully, lullay, lully, lullay, ...

And in that bed there lieth a knight,
His woundes bleeding day and night.

Lully, lullay, lully, lullay, ...

15 By that bed's side there kneeleth a may" maiden
And she weepeth both night and day.

Lully, lullay, lully, lullay, ...

And by that bed's side there standeth a stone,
Corpus Christi written thereon.

Oure kinge went forth to Normandy
With grace and might of chivalry." men at arms
Ther God for him wrought mervelusly:
Wherefore Englonde may calle and cry.

Deo gracias ...

6. This lyric survives, with music, in an early sixteenth-century manuscript. Although it seems to be a secular love song, several Tudor composers used it in settings of the Mass.
7. This is one of several poems in carol form celebrating the English victory over the French at Agincourt in 1415. This version is accompanied by music for solo voices and chorus. Contemporary accounts record a number of celebratory processions on Henry V's triumphant return to London at which such songs were sung. "Carol" is used here in the sense of a poem in short stanzas with a burden, or refrain, repeated after each stanza.
8. Return thanks to God, England, for victory (Latin).

9. Display of his military forces. Henry laid siege to and captured the French port of Harfleur shortly before the victory at Agincourt.
1. I.e., in spite of French boasts or threats.
2. Le., he spared, no doubt, neither the great nor the humble. Some editors print this line without punctuation, in which case it may be read: he avoided no dangers, great or small.
3. Le., may he save our king.
4. This poem; which dates from about 1450, examines the paradox of the sacrament of the bread used in the Communion service. According to the doctrine of transubstantiation, the bread becomes the living body of Christ.
5. Two, probably a reference to the bread and the wine of the Eucharist.

6. This poem is an early type of "emblem poem," a verse that interprets a symbolic picture. In a manuscript from the early 1500s, the poem appears to the right of the face of a naked and wounded Christ, who is offering a kneeling supplicant a large and bleeding heart ("hert") with a wound in its center.
1. Makers, poets.
2. The fear of death dismays me (Latin); a line from the liturgical Office of the Dead. Cf. the anonymous fifteenth-century poem with the same refrain (p. 82).
3. Le., now dance and be merry, now likely to die.
4. Estates. Society was said to be divided into three estates, or groups: those who ruled, those who prayed, and those who labored.

5. Those practicing the art of magic.
6. I.e., no clever conclusions help them.
7. Three English poets. The Monk of Bery: John Lydgate (I 370?-1451?) wrote a great variety of verse; he was considered second only to Chaucer during the sixteenth century. Cower: John Cower (I325?-1408), whose main poem is the Confessio Amantis.
8. The first in a list of Scots poets, some well-known (e.g., Dunbar's contemporary Robert Henryson, line 82), some obscure; Dunbar presented Waiter Kennedy (line 89) as his adversary in the poem Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedie.

9. The "clerkly" author is not known, but Arthurian romances focusing on the hero Gawain were popular in Scotland. Sir Gilbert Hay (d. 1456) translated from French the poem The Buik [i.e., Book] of Alexander.
1. Le., Death has taken the practice of poetry from Mercer.
2. A Scots poet. Stobo: a name for John Reid, priest and secretary to James 11, Ill, and IV.
3. I.e., lies truly on the point of death.
4. Of necessity, I must be his next prey.

5. This Easter hymn depicts Christ's Resurrection as a battle with the Devil. Dunbar draws on the narrative of the harrowing of hell in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, in which Christ journeys to hell to free virtuous souls born before his coming.
6. Champion, i.e., one who fights on behalf of another.
7. The Lord is risen from the grave (Latin); the line echoes the opening of the Matins, or Easter-morning church service.
8. Ajar, i.e., with his mouth open.
9. Roman goddess of the dawn.
1. Greek and Roman god of sunlight, prophecy, music, and poetry.

With Mannerly Margery Milk and Ale.

IS Ywis? ye deal uncourteously; for certain
What, would ye frumple? me? now fy! wrinkle, muss up

I. Two copies of this poem survive, with considerable variation between them. Critics disagree about which lines belong to which speaker and about what "happens" between the third and fourth stanzas. The refrain could be divided between Margery and James, or it could be spoken by a third party, as is suggested by an early musical setting that makes the poem a song for three voices.

The title is an epithet for a servant girl. Mannerly: well-mannered, with a possible ironic reflection on a serving girl's aspirations.

2. Variously meant foolish, finicky, or lascivious. "Clerk" originally denoted a member of the clergy (from Latin, clericus), but it became a general name for a scholar or student.

3. Parrot; a symbol of vanity.

4. Expressions of contemptuous rejection: fiddlesticks, poppycock, nonsense.

5. A contemptuous name. Cup: contracted (?) from go up; sometimes an exclamation of derision, remonstrance, or surprise, sometimes a command (get along, get out; get up; also, a command to a horse, giddy up). Christian Clout: an epithet for a rural fellow.

6. Le., a large amount.

7. Jamesweed, ragwort, useless stuff. Straw: expression of contempt.

8. Le., an ordinary riding horse (as distinct from a warhorse or a plowhorse); a prostitute.

9. I.e., go look after farm animals.

What, and ye shall be my pigesnye?[1]
By Christ, ye shall not, no hardely:" indeed
I will not be japed- bodily!
20 Gup, Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!
With Mannerly Margery Milk and Ale.

Walk forth your way, ye cost me nought;
Now have I found that I have sought:
The best cheap flesh that ever I bought.
25 Yet, for his love that all hath wrought,
Wed me, or else I die for thought.
Gup, Christian Clout, your breath is stale!

As fair Isaphill,>

1. Pet; also, a common flower.
2. Tricked, with a reference to sexual intercourse.
3. This poem is one of ten lyrics included in Skelton's The Garland of Laurel, in which the poet is crowned with a laurel wreath (the symbol of poetic achievement) by the countess of Surrey and her ladies; in return, he writes a poem in praise of each of them. "Margaret Hussey," while not identified with any certainty, was perhaps the daughter of Simon Blount of Mangotsfield and married to John Hussey; she died in August 1492. Mistress: title for an upper-class married woman; a courteous form.
4. Meaning daisy, the flower.
5. A hawk bred and trained to fly high.
6. Hypsipyle, mythological daughter of Thaos, king of Lernnos, saved her father when the women of Lemnos killed the men of the island, bore twin sons to Jason, and was then deserted by him. She endured slavery while searching for her father and her sons.

From Colin Clout!

HEREAFTER FOLLOWETH A LITTLE BOOK CALLED COLIN CLOUT,
COMPILED BY MASTER SKELTON, POET LAUREATE.[2]

Quis consurget mecum adversus malignantes? aut quis stabit mecum adversus operantes iniquitatem? Nemo, Dominel?

What can it avail"
To drive forth a snail,
Or to make a sail
Of an herring's tail;
To rhyme or to rail,
To write or to indict,
Either for delight
Or else for despight;
Or books to compile
Of divers manner of style, ID
Vice to revile
And sin to exile;

7. An aromatic herb, believed to soothe pain.
8. A mixture of perfumed or aromatic substances made into a ball.
9. Cassandra, mythological daughter of Priam, king of Troy; another figure of steadfastness. After she refused him as a lover, the god Apollo made her a prophet whom listeners would always disbelieve, as they did when she foretold the fall of Troy.
1. Colin, from the Latin colonus (farmer), was a stock name for a person of humble birth in the late medieval and Renaissance periods; "clout" has multiple meanings relevant to the poetic persona that Skelton creates and that Spenser significantly imitates in his Shepheardes Calender (see "April]," P: 159). Skelton plays on meanings not only of humble birth but also of satirical force: "clout" (variously spelled in this era) can signify a patch of cloth such as those worn by vagrant clerks, a clot or clod of earth (recalling Langland's persona Piers Plowman; see p. 71), a type of rough shoe, and also a blow with the hand. In this poem of more than twelve hundred lines, Skelton uses his verse as a satirical weapon against bishops and archbishops of the English Church who placed worldly ambitions above their ecclesiastical duties. Skelton's prime opponent is Cardinal Thomas Wolsey (ea. 1475-1530), who rose to and fell from great power during Henry VIII's reign (1509-47), and who began the dissolution of monasteries-a process of alleged "reform" that Skelton abhorred.
2. In 1488, Skelton received the honorable title of "laureate" from Oxford University.
3. Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers? or who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity? (Latin); from Psalm 94.14. No one, lord (Latin); from John 8.11.
4. I.e., what good can it do. The first four lines and many others in the poem are based on well-known proverbs.

To teach or to preach,
As reason will reach?
15 Say this, and say that,
His" head is so fat,
He wotteth" never what — knows
Nor whereof he speaketh;
He crieth and he creaketh,
20 He prieth and he peeketh,"
He chides and he chatters,
He prates and he patters,
He clitters" and he clatters, — chatters
He meddles and he smatters,
25 He gloses" and he flatters; — interprets
Or if he speak plain,
Then he lacketh brain,
He is but a fool;
Let him go to school,
30 On a three footed stool
That he may down sit,
For he lacketh wit;
And if that he hit
The nail on the head,
35 It standeth in no stead;
The devil, they say, is dead,
The devil is dead."
It may well so be,
Or else they would see
40 Otherwise, and flee
From worldly vanity,
And foul covetousness,
And other wretchedness,
Fickle falseness,
45 Variableness,
With unstableness.
And if ye stand in doubt
Who brought this rhyme about,
My name is Colin Clout.
50 I purpose" to shake out — aim
All my connying bag,
Like a clerkly hag;"
For though my rhyme be ragged,
Tattered and jagged,
55 Rudely rain beaten,

5. Apparently refers to the poet as seen by his detractors, who scorn him whether he writes and prophesies through allegory or speaks "plainly" (line 26).
6. I.e., he pries into things and goads us (or, possibly, he pries and peeks into things).
7. Based on a proverbial saying, these lines evidently express the reaction of an imaginary audience that doesn't want to be bothered by Skelton's critique of evil.
8. Wandering clerks (members of the clergy) typically carried pouches; although "hag" usually referred to an old woman, it was sometimes used as a general term of abuse. The image of the clerk's "connying" bag, to which the poet compares his own bag of poetic tricks, plays on the meanings of cunning both as "knowledge" and as "cheating," duping through cleverness.

Rusty and moth eaten,
If ye take well therewith,
It hath in it some pith." meaning

Phillip Sparow?

 Whan I remember again
How my Phillip was slain,

Pyramus and Thisbe,"
As then befell? to me: happened

9. This poem of approximately 1,380 lines begins with a long elegy (lines 1-884) for the pet sparrow of a gentlewoman named Jane Scrope. (The second part eulogizes Jane, and in the third part Skelton defends himself against a detractor.) Imitating classical elegies for dead birds by Catullus and Ovid and perhaps also the description of how a fox killed Chantekler's daughter in William Caxton's early printed translation of the Dutch Reynard the Fox (1481), Skelton's poem makes Jane the first-person comic narrator of the first part, interweaving her lamenting verse (in the running-rhyme form known as "Skeltonic": see "Versification," pp. 2046-47) with Latin phrases from the solemn Catholic funeral service called the Office of the Dead.
1. See note 2, p. 92.
2. I shall please [the Lord] (Latin); from Psalm 114.9. "Placebo," like all other citations of the Psalms in this poem (cited according to their numbering in the Catholic Bible known as the Vulgate), is used in the Vespers, or evening service of the Office of the Dead. The spacing of the syllables suggests the plainsong music of the Mass.
3. I love [the Lord, because he hath heard my voice] (Latin); from Psalm 114.1.
4. Musical notes used at the close of the Office of the Dead.
5. Refers to the black robes worn by members of the Benedictine order. Carow: Carrow Abbey, where Jane Scrope went to live after her mother was widowed for the second time, in 1502. Aseniornun named Margery is mentioned in the records of this abbey, which was founded by the Benedictines.
6. List of people for whom the nuns prayed with the "beads" of their rosaries.
7. "Hail Mary"; the previous Latin phrase opens the Lord's Prayer ("Our Father which ...").
8. A prayer about Christian beliefs (from credere, Latin for "to believe") that was typically printed, along with the "Hail Mary" and "Our Father," on the first page of elementary reading books (primers). Skelton probably refers to the "corner" of the "creed" because only part of that prayer usually fit on the first page of the primer.
9. Lovers tragically separated in a story told by Ovid (Metamorphoses) and Chaucer (Legend of Good Women), among others.

I wept and I wailed,
The tears down hailed;
25 But nothing it availed[1]
To call Phillip again,
Whom Gib our cat hath slain.
  Gib, I say, our cat
Worrowed[2] her on that
30 Which I loved best:
It can not be expressed
My sorowful heaviness,
But all without redress;
For within that stound," — moment
35 Half slumb'ring, in a sound" — faint
I fell down to the ground.
  Unneth" I cast mine eyes — scarcely
Toward the cloudy skies:
But when I did behold
40 My sparow dead and cold,
No creature but that would
Have rewed" upon me, — had pity
To behold and see
What heaviness did me pang;" — affect with pain
45 Wherewith my hands I wrang,
That my sinews cracked,
As though I had been racked," — tortured
So pained and so strained
That no life wellnigh remained.
50 I sighed and I sobbed,
For that I was robbed
Of my sparow's life.
O maiden, widow, and wife,
Of what estate ye be,
55 Of high or low degree,
Great sorow thana ye might see, — then
And learn to weep at" me! — from
Such pains did me fret,
That mine heart did beat,
60 My visage pale and dead,
Wan, and blue as lead;
The pangs of hateful death
Wellnigh had stopped my breath.

Of these historious? tales, — historical
To fill bougets" and maleso — bags / pouches
With books that I have read,
Yet I am nothing sped . . .[3]

1. I.e., it did no good.
2. Worried, i.e., bit. "Gib," short for Gilbert, was a standard name for a cat, as Phillip was for a pet sparrow.
3. I.e., I've gotten nowhere.

For, as I tofore° have said, before
770 I am but a young maid,
And cannot in effect
My style as yet direct° control
With English words elect:° well chosen
Our natural tongue is rude,[4]
775 And hard to be ennewed° revived
With polished terms lusty;
Our language is so rusty,
So cankered,° and so full infected
Of frowards,° and so dull, badly formed words
780 That if I would apply° try
To write ornately,[5]
I wot° not where to find know
Terms to serve my mind.

Wherefore hold me excused
If I have not well perused° studied carefully
815 Mine English half abused;
Though it be refused,
In worth I shall it take,[6]
And fewer wordes make.
But, for my sparow's sake,
820 Yet as a woman may,
My wit I shall assay
An epitaph to write
In Latin plain and light,
Whereof the elegy

Flos volucrum formose, valet!
Philippe, sub isto
Marmore jam recubas,
Qui mihi carus eras.
830 Semper erunt nitido
Radiantia sidera ctelo;
Impressusque mea
Pectore semper eris.
Per me laurigerum
835 Britonum Skeltonida vatem
Htec cecinisse licet

4. Uneducated, lacking in polish.
5. With rhetorical embellishment of the kind taught in the grammar schools, which focused during Skelton's era on Latin rather than English composition and which were generally closed to girls.
6. I.e., I'll take it in good part.
7. Although Jane claims to write the following lines, Skelton implicitly (and perhaps ironically) undermines her claim by switching to Latin; he explicitly asserts his own authorship of the entire first part of the poem in lines 827-44. Translated, lines 826-43 go as follows: "Farewell, flower of birds, beautiful onel Phillip, you lie now beneath this marble, you who were dear to me. So long as the stars shine in the sky, you will always be engraved in my heart. By me, Skelton, the laureate poet of Britain, these things could be sung under a feigned likeness. She whose bird you were is a maiden of surpassing beauty. Nias [presumably one of the classical water nymphs known as 'naiads'] was fair, but Jane is lovelier; Corinna was learned, but Jane is wiser." Corinna is the woman who laments her dead parrot in Ovid's Amores.

Ficta sub imagine texta.

EARLY MODERN BALLADSI

The Douglas Tragedy-

I

"Rise up, rise up, now, Lord Douglas," she says,
"And put on your armor so bright;
Let it never be said that a daughter of thine
Was married to a lord under night.

"Rise up, rise up, my seven bold sons,
And put on your armor so bright,
And take better care of your youngest sister,
For your eldest's awa" the last night." away

He's mounted her on a milk-white steed,
10 And himself on a dapple gray,
With a bugelet" horn hung down by his side, small bugle
And lightly they rode away.

To see what he could see,
15 And there he spied her seven brethren bold,
Come riding over the lea. ° meadow

8. I remember it well (French); Skelton uses this phrase elsewhere in his poetry.
I. The following ballads exist in numerous versions, many of which are printed in the great collection of F. J. Child, English and Scottish Popular Ballads (five volumes, 1882-98). Child's different versions, designated by alphabetical letters here and in his edition, reveal different political and ethical interpretations of a given story. Ballads often contain topical allusions, and most popular ballads from the fourteenth through the seventeenth centuries, in contrast to later literary instances of the genre, were sung to well-known tunes. While some ballads originated as folk songs and were written down (and/or printed) much later (sometimes centuries later), other ballads were initially made to be read-and sold-as printed objects. Even manuscript or printed versions of ballads, among the latter being the "broadsides" printed cheaply on single sheets and sold at fairs and by peddlers along the road, might subsequently be orally transmitted, since they could be heard and memorized by the non- or partially literate person.
2. From Child, No. 7.B.

"Light down, light down, Lady Margret," he said,
"And hold my steed in your hand,
Until that against your seven brethren bold,
20 And your father, I mak a stand."

She held his steed in her milk-white hand,
And never shed one tear,
Until that she saw her seven brethren fa',? fall
And her father hard fighting, who loved her so dear.

25 "O hold your hand, Lord William!" she said,
"For your strokes they are wondrous sair;" sore
True lovers I can get many a ane," one
But a father I can never get mair.:" more

O she's ta'en out her handkerchief,
30 It was o' the holland? sae" fine, linen / so
And aye she dighted? her father's bloody wounds, dressed
That were redder than the wine.

"O choose, 0 choose, Lady Margret," he said,
"O whether will ye gangOor bide?" go
35 "I'll gang, I'll gang, Lord William," she said,
"For ye have left me no other guide."

10

He's lifted her on a milk-white steed,
And himself on a dapple gray,
With a bugelet horn hung down by his side,
40 And slowly they baith rade away.

11

O they rade on, and on they rade,
And a' by the light of the moon,
Until they came to yon wane water, dark
And there they lighted down.

45 They lighted down to tak a drink
Of the spring that ran sae clear,
And down the stream ran his good heart's blood,
And sair she 'gan to fear.

13

"Hold up, hold up, Lord William," she says,
50 "For I fear that you are slain."
" 'Tis naething but the shadow of my scarlet cloak,
That shines in the water sae plain."

14

O they rade on, and on they rade,
And a' by the light of the moon,
55 Until they cam to his mother's ha" door, hall
And there they lighted down.

15

"Get up, get up, lady mother," he says,
"Get up, and let me in!
Get up, get up, lady mother," he says,
60 "For this night my fair lady I've win.

16

"O mak my bed, lady mother," he says,
"O mak it braid" and deep, broad
And lay Lady Margret close at my back,
And the sounder I will sleep."

17

65 Lord William was dead langO ere midnight, long
Lady Margret lang ere day,
And all true lovers that go thegither,? together
May they have mair luck than they!

Lord William was buried in St. Mary's kirk," church
70 Lady Margret in Mary's choir;
Out o' the lady's grave grew a bonny red rose,
And out o' the knight's a briar.

19

And they twa met, and they twa plat,° plaited
And fain they wade be near; would
75 And a' the warld might ken° right weel know
They were twa lovers dear.

20

But by and rade the Black Douglas,
And wow but he was rough!
For he pulled up the bonny briar,
80 And flang 't in St. Mary's Loch." lake

"O where ha' you been, Lord Randal, my son?
And where ha' you been, my handsome young man?"
"I ha' been at the greenwood; mother, mak my bed soon,
For I'm wearied wi' huntin', and fain wade lie down." would

"And wha" met ye there, Lord Randal, my son? who
And wha met you there, my handsome young man?"
"O I met wi' my true-love; mother, mak my bed soon,
For I'm wearied wi' huntin', and fain wad lie down."

"And what did she give you, Lord Randal, my son?
10 And what did she give you, my handsome young man?"
"Eels fried in a pan; mother, mak my bed soon,
For I'm wearied wi' huntin', and fain wad lie down."

"And wha gat your leavin's, Lord Randal, my son?
And wha gat your leavin's, my handsome young man?"
15 "My hawks and my hounds; mother, mak my bed soon,
For I'm wearied wi' huntin', and fain wad lie down."

"And what becam of them, Lord Randal, my son?
And what becam of them, my handsome young man?"
"They stretched their legs out and died; mother, mak my bed soon,
20 For I'm wearied wi' huntin', and fain wad lie down."

"O I fear you are poisoned, Lord Randal, my son!
I fear you are poisoned, my handsome young man!"
"O yes, I am poisoned; mother, mak my bed soon,
For I'm sick at the heart, and I fain wad lie down."

25 "What d' ye leave to your mother, Lord Randal, my son?
What d'ye leave to your mother, my handsome young man?"
"Four and twenty milk kye"; mother, mak my bed soon, kine, cattle
For I'm sick at the heart, and I fain wad lie down."

"What d' ye leave to your sister, Lord Randal, my son?
30 What d' ye leave to your sister, my handsome young man?"

3. Child, No. 12.A.

"My gold and my silver; mother, mak my bed soon,
For I'm sick at the heart, and I fain wad lie down."

"What d' ye leave to your brother, Lord Randal, my son?
What d' ye leave to your brother, my handsome young man?"
35 "My houses and my lands; mother, mak my bed soon,
For I'm sick at the heart, and I fain wad lie down."

"What d' ye leave to your true-love, Lord Randal, my son?
What d' ye leave to your true-love, my handsome young man?"
"I leave her hell and fire; mother, mak my bed soon,
40 For I'm sick at the heart, and I fain wad lie down."

The Three Ravens[4]

There were three ravens sat on a tree,
Down a down, hay down, hay down.
There were three ravens sat on a tree,
With a down,
There were three ravens sat on a tree,
They were as black as they might be.
With a down derry, derry, derry, down, down.

The one of them said to his mate,
"Where shall we our breakfast take?"

10 "Down in yonder greene field,
There lies a knight slain under his shield.

"His hounds they lie down at his feet,
So well they can their master keep.

"His hawks they fly so eagerly," fiercely
15 There's no fowl dare him come nigh."

Down there comes a fallow[5] doe,
As great with young as she might go.

4. Child, No. 26; first printed in a songbook in 1611. All stanzas follow the pattern of the first, with the refrain in lines 2, 4, and 7, and the first line repeated in line 5.
5. A species of pale-brownish or reddish-yellow deer.

She lift up his bloody head
And kissed his wounds that were so red.

20 She got him up upon her back
And carried him to earthen lake.° ditch

She buried him before the prime;"
She was dead herself ere even-song time.

10

God send every gentleman
25 Such hawks, such hounds, and such a leman." lover, sweetheart

The Twa Corbies"

As I was walking all alane,
I heard twa corbies making a mane;" moan
The tane" unto the t'other say, one
"Where sall? we gangO and dine to-day?" shall / go

"In behint you auld? fail° dyke,° old / turf/ ditch
I wot° there lies a new slain knight; know
And naebody kens? that he lies there, knows
But his hawk, his hound, and lady fair.

"His hound is to the hunting gane,? gone
ID His hawk to fetch the wild-fowl hame,
His lady's ta'en another mate,
So we may mak our dinner sweet.

"Ye'll sit on his white hause-bane," neck bone
And I'll pike? out his bonny blue een" pick / eyes
15 Wi' ae? lock o' his gowden" hair one / golden
We'll theek" our nest when it grows bare. thatch

"Mony? a one for him makes mane, many
But nane" sall? ken° where he is gane; none / shall / know
O'er his white banes,° when they are bare, bones
20 The wind sall blaw for evermair."

6. According to Catholic Church ritual, the first hour of the day, between 6 and 9 A.M.
7. The two ravens. First printed in Sir Waiter Scott's Minstrelsy ofthe Scottish Border (1802-03), this ballad is a cynical version of "The Three Ravens," above.

Sir Patrick Spens"

I

The king sits in Dumferling town,
  Drinking the blude-reid? wine: blood-red
"O whar will I get guide sailor, good
  To sail this ship of mine?"

Up and spak? an eldern knicht, spoke
  Sat at the king's richt knee:
"Sir Patrick Spens is the best sailor
  That sails upon the sea."

The king has written a braid? letter
IQ And signed it wi' his hand,
And sent it to Sir Patrick Spens,
  Was walking on the sand.

The first line that Sir Patrick read,
  A loud lauch" lauched he; laugh
15 The next line that Sir Patrick read,
  The tear blinded his ee." eye

"O wha is this has done this deed,
  This ill deed done to me,
To send me out this time o' the year,
20 To sail upon the sea?

"Mak haste, mak haste, my mirry men all,
  Our guid ship sails the morn."
"O say na sae," my master dear, so
  For I fear a deadly storm.

25 "Late, late yestre'en I saw the new moon
  Wi' the auld moon in hir arm,
And I fear, I fear, my dear master,
  That we will come to harm."

8. Child, No. 58.A. This ballad, first printed in 1765, tells a story that may be based on two voyages of thirteenth-century Scots noblemen to conduct princesses to royal marriages. Margaret, daughter of Alexander Ill, was married in 128 I to Eric of Norway, and many members of her escort were drowned on the voyage home. Her daughter, also named Margaret, was drowned with her escort on the way to a marriage in Scotland in 1290. In Child version H, Patrick is sent to Norway to bring the king's daughter home. In all versions, Patrick is sent to sea against his will.

9. Broad, i.e., long.

O our Scots nobles were richt laith° — loath
30 To weet° their cork-heeled shoon,° — wet / shoes
But lang ore a' the play were played — before
Their hats they swam aboon.[1]

O lang,° lang may their ladies sit, — long
Wi' their fans into their hand,
35 Or ere they see Sir Patrick Spens
Come sailing to the land.

10

O lang, lang may the ladies stand
Wi' their gold kerns° in their hair, — combs
Waiting for their ain dear lords,
40 For they'll see them na mair.

11

Half o'er, half o'er to Aberdour
It's fifty fadom deep,
And there lies guid Sir Patrick Spens
Wi' the Scots lords at his feet.

The Unquiet Grave[2]

"The wind doth blow today, my love,
And a few small drops of rain;
I never had but one true-love,
In cold grave she was lain.

"I'll do as much for my true-love
As any young man may;
I'll sit and mourn all at her grave
For a twelvemonth and a day."

The twelvemonth and a day being up,
10 The dead began to speak:
"Oh who sits weeping on my grave,
And will not let me sleep?"

" 'T is I, my love, sits on your grave,
And will not let you sleep;

1. I.e., their hats swam above (them).
2. Child, No. 78.A; from a nineteenth-century version collected in the journal Folk Lore Record.

15 For I crave one kiss of your clay-cold lips,
And that is all I seek."

"You crave one kiss of my clay-cold lips,
But my breath smells earthy strong;
If you have one kiss of my clay-cold lips,
20 Your time will not be long.

" 'T is down in yonder garden green,
Love, where we used to walk,
The finest flower that e'er was seen
Is withered to a stalk.

25 "The stalk is withered dry, my love,
So will our hearts decay;
So make yourself content, my love,
Till God calls you away."

The Wife of Usher's Well[3]

There lived a wife at Usher's Well,
And a wealthy wife was she;
She had three stout and stalwart sons,
And sent them o'er the sea.

They hadna been a week from her,
A week but barely ane,° one
Whan word came to the carlin° wife old
That her three sons were gane.

They hadna been a week from her,
10 A week but barely three,
Whan word came to the carlin wife
That her sons she'd never see.

"I wish the wind may never cease,
Nor fashes° in the flood, troubles
15 Till my three sons come hame to me,
In earthly flesh and blood."

3. Child, No. 79.A; from Sir Walter Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802-03).

It fell about the Martinmass,"
When nights are lang and mirk,? murky
The carlin wife's three sons came hame,
20 And their hats were o' the birk.° birch

It neither grew in syke" nor ditch, trench
Nor yet in any sheugh;" furrow
But at the gates o' Paradise,
That birk grew fair eneugh.

25 "Blow up the fire, my maidens,
Bring water from the well;
For a' my house shall feast this night,
Since my three sons are well."

And she has made to them a bed,
30 She's made it large and wide,
And she's ta'en her mantle" her about, cloak
Sat down at the bed-side.

Up then crew the red, red cock,
And up and crew the gray;
35 The eldest to the youngest said,
" 'T is time we were away."

10

The cock he hadna crawed but once,
And clapped his wings at a',
When the youngest to the eldest said,
40 "Brother, we must awa'.

11

"The cock doth craw, the day doth daw,
The channerin" worm doth chide; fretting
Gin" we be missed out o' our place, if
A sair" pain we maun" bide. sore I must 12

45 "Fare ye weel, my mother dear!
Fareweel to barn and byre!" cowhouse
And fare ye weel, the bonny lass,
That kindles my mother's fire!"

4. The feast of St. Martin (Pope Martin I, martyred 655 C.E.), November 11.

Bonny Barbara Allan[5]

I

It was in and about the Martinmas" time,
When the green leaves were a falling,
That Sir John Crserne, in the West Country,
Fell in love with Barbara Allan.

He sent his man down through the town,
To the place where she was dwelling:
"O haste and come to my master dear,
Gin? ye be Barbara Allan." if

O hooly," hooly rose she up, slowly, gently
10 To the place where he was lying,
And when she drew the curtain by:
"Young man, I think you're dying."

"O it's I'm sick, and very, very sick,
And 'tis a' for Barbara AIlan."
15 "O the better for me ye s" never be, shall
Though your heart's blood were a-spilling.

"O dinna" ye mind, young man," said she, don't
"When ye was in the tavern a drinking,
That ye made the healths gae" round and round, go 20 And slighted Barbara Allan?"

He turned his face unto the wall,
And death was with him dealing:
"Adieu, adieu, my dear friends all,
And be kind to Barbara AIlan."

25 And slowly, slowly raise she up,
And slowly, slowly left him,
And sighing said, she could not stay,
Since death of life had reft him.

She had not gane a mile but twa,
30 When she heard the dead-bell ringing,

5. Child, No. 84.A; from the Tea Table Miscellany (1763).

6. See note 4, p. 106.

And every jow° that the dead-bell geid,° — stroke / gave
It cried, "Woe to Barbara Allan!"

"O mother, mother, make my bed!
O make it saft and narrow!
35 Since my love died for me to-day,
I'll die for him to-morrow."

Mary Hamilton[7]

Word's gane to the kitchen,
And word's gane to the ha',° — hall
That Marie Hamilton gangs° wi' bairn° — goes / child
To the hichest° Stewart of a'. — highest

He's courted her in the kitchen,
He's courted her in the ha',
He's courted her in the laigh cellar,[8]
And that was warst of a'.

She's tied it in her apron
10 And she's thrown it in the sea;
Says, "Sink ye, swim ye, bonny wee babe!
You'll ne'er get mair o' me."

Down then cam the auld queen,
Goud° tassels tying her hair: — gold
15 "O Marie, where's the bonny wee babe
That I heard greet° sae° sair?"° — cry / so / sorely

"There was never a babe intill° my room, — in
As little designs to be;
It was but a touch o' my sair° side, — sore
20 Come o'er my fair body."

7. Child, No. 173.A. This ballad, first cited in 1790 and first printed in the early nineteenth century, is probably set at the court of Mary Stuart (1542-1587). According to the Calendar of State Papers, Mary, queen of Scotland, had four maids-in-waiting who bore her first name. The Protestant writer John Knox, hostile both to female rulers and to Catholics like Mary Stuart, denounced one of the maids-in-waiting for murdering a child she had conceived illicitly with the court apothecary (History of the Reformation). Most versions of the story in ballad form identify the baby's father as the king, probably alluding to Lord Darnley, Mary Stuart's frequently unfaithful second husband. Different versions of the ballad offer different views on Mary Hamilton's degree of guilt for the child's death. Child believes that this ballad alludes to events that occurred in the Russian court of Peter the Great (1672-1725) rather than in that of Mary Stuart.

8. Low cellar, basement.

"O Marie, put on your robes o' black,
Or else your robes o' brown,
For ye maun" gang wi' me the night, must
To see fair Edinbro' town."

25 "I winna" put on my robes o' black, won't
Nor yet my robes o' brown;
But I'll put on my robes o' white,
To shine through Edinbro' town."

When she gaed" up the Cannogate,? went
30 She laughed loud laughters three;
But when she cam down the Cannogate
The tear blinded her ee." eye

When she gaed up the Parliament stair,
The heel cam aff her shee;
35 And lang ore she cam down again before
She was condemned to dee.

When she cam down the Cannogate,
The Cannogate sae free,
Many a lady looked o'er her window,
40 Weeping for this lady.

11

"Ye need nae weep for me," she says,
"Ye need nae weep for me;
For had I not slain mine own sweet babe,
This death I wadna dee.

45 "Bring me a bottle of wine," she says,
"The best that e'er ye ha'e,
That I may drink to my weil-wishers,
And they may drink to me.

"Here's a health to the jolly sailors,
50 That sail upon the main;
Let them never let on to my father and mother
But what I'm coming hame.

9. The Canongate is the Edinburgh street leading uphill from Holyrood House (where the queen and the "four Maries" of line 69 lived) to the Tolbooth, which was both jail and judicial chamber and, on occasion, the place where Parliament (line 33) sat.

"Here's a health to the jolly sailors,
  That sail upon the sea;
55 Let them never let on to my father and mother
  That I cam here to dee.

"Oh little did my mother think,
  The day she cradled me,
What lands I was to travel through,
60 What death I was to dee.

16

"Oh little did my father think,
  The day he held up me,
What lands I was to travel through,
  What death I was to dee,

17

65 "Last night I washed the queen's feet,
  And gently laid her down;
And a' the thanks I've gotten the night'
  To be hanged in Edinbro' town!

18

"Last night there was four Maries,
70 The night there'll be but three;
There was Marie Seton, and Marie Beton,
  And Marie Carmichael, and me."

Get Up and Bar the 000r[2]

I

It fell about the Martinmas' time,
  And a gay time it was then,
When our goodwife got puddings to make,
  And she's boiled them in the pan.

The wind sae" cauld blew south and north, so
  And blew into the floor;
Quoth our goodman to our goodwife,
  "Cae" out and bar the door." go

Should rise and bar the door.

Then by there came two gentlemen,
At twelve o'clock at night,
And they could neither see house nor hall,
20 Nor coal nor candle-light.

"Now whether is this a rich man's house,
Or whether is it a poor?"
But ne'er a word wade ane o' them speak, would
For barring of the door.

25 And first they ate the white puddings,
And then they ate the black;
Though muckle? thought the goodwife to hersel, much, a lot
Yet ne'er a word she spak.

Then said the one unto the other,
30 "Here, man, tak ye my knife;
Do ye tak aff" the auld man's beard, off
And I'll kiss the goodwife."

"But there's nae water in the house,
And what shall we do then?"
35 "What ails ye at" the pudding-brao,° -broth
That boils into the pan?"

10

O up then started our goodman,
An angry man was he:
"Will ye kiss my wife before my een,° eyes
40 And scad" me wi' pudding-breej?" scald / -broth

Then up and started our goodwife,
Gied" three skips on the floor: gave

4. Le., what's the matter with.

"Goodman, you've spoken the foremost word,
Get up and bar the door."

The Bitter Withy[5]

As it fell out on a holy day,
The drops of rain did fall, did fall,
Our Saviour asked leave of his mother Mary
If he might go play at ball.

"To play at ball, my own dear son,
It's time you was going or gone,
But be sure let me hear no complain of you,
At night when you do come home."

It was upling scorn and downling scorn,[6]
10 Oh, there he met three jolly jerdins; fellows
Oh, there he asked the jolly jerdins
If they would go play at ball.

"Oh, we are lords' and ladies' sons,
Born in bower or in hall, chamber
15 And you are some poor maid's child
Borned in an ox's stall."

"If you are lords' and ladies' sons,
Borned in bower or in hall,
Then at last I'll make it appear
20 That I am above you all."

Our Saviour built a bridge with the beams of the sun,[7]
And over it he gone, he gone he.
And after followed the three jolly jerdins,
And drownded they were all three.

25 It was upling scorn and downling scorn,
The mothers of them did whoop and call,

5. This ballad was first published in full in 1905, but is believed to be of much earlier origin. It describes an event found not in canonical Christian writings but rather in pseudo-evangelical chronicles of Christ's childhood. Withy: willow.

6. Le., there was scorn everywhere ("upling," "downling"),

7. The miracle of the bridge of sunbeams derives from a legend about Christ frequently found in medieval lives of the saints.

Crying out, "Mary mild, call home your child,
For ours are drownded alL"

Mary mild, Mary mild, called home her child,
30 And laid our Saviour across her knee,
And with a whole handful of bitter withy
She gave him slashes three.

Then he says to his mother, "Oh! the withy, oh! the withy,
The bitter withy that causes me to smart, to smart,
35 Oh! the withy, it shall be the very first tree
That perishes at the heart."

The Knight and Shepherd's Daughter"

I

There was a shepherd's dochter
Kept sheep on yonder hill;
Bye cam a knicht frae? the High College," from
And he wade haec his will. would / have

Whan he had got his wills o her,
His will as he has taen:? taken
"Wad ye be sae" gudeO and kind so / good
As tell to me your name?"!

"Some ea's me Jock, some ea's me John,
10 Some disna" keno my name, do not / know
But whan I 'm into the king's court,
Mitchcock- is my name."

"Mitchcock! hey!" the lady did say,
And spelt it oure" again; over
15 "If that's your name in the Latin tongue,
Earl Richard is your name!"

O jutnpt he upon his horse,
And said he wad go ride;

8. This Scottish ballad has several variants in which the identities of the knight and the shepherd's daughter differ but the events and outcome are similar. The version printed here, the C variant of Child Ballad No. 110, is from Kinloch'sAncient Scottish Ballads.
9. King's court.
1. The shepherd's daughter asks this question.
2. The knight gives the shepherd's daughter a false name (though she is not fooled).

Kilted° she her green claithing, tucked up
20 And said she wad na° bide." not / stay

The knicht rade on, the lady ran,
A live-lang simmer's° day, summer's
Till they cam to a wan° water dark
Was calld the river Tay.[3]

25 "Jump on behind, ye weill-faurd° may,° well-favored / maid
Or do ye chuse to ride?"
"No, thank ye, sir," the lady said,
"I rather chuse to wade";
And afore that he was mid-water,
30 She was at the ither side.

"Turn back, turn back, ye weill-faurd may,
My heart will brak in three:"
"And sae did mine in yon bonny hill-side,
Whan ye was [na] lat me be."

35 "Whare gat ye that gay° claithing fine
This day I see on thee?"
"My mither was a gude milk-nurse,
And a gude nourice° was she; nurse
She nursd the Earl of Stockford's daughter,
40 And gat aw this to me."

10

Whan she cam to the king's court,
She rappit wi a ring;[4]
Sae ready as the king himsel
Was to let the lady in!

11

45 "There is a knicht into your court
This day has robbed me:"
"O has he taen your gowd,° he says, gold
"Or has he taen your fee?"° wealth, possessions

"He has na taen my gowd," she says,
50 "Nor yet has he my fee;
But he has taen my maiden-head,
The flowr o° my fair bodie." of

3. The longest river in Scotland.

4. I.e., rapped with the door knocker.

13

Then out bespak" the queen hersel, spoke
Wha sat by the king's knee:
55 There's na a knicht in awe our court all
Wad hae dune that to thee,
Unless it war my brither, Earl Richard,
And forbid it it war he!"

14

Wad ye ken your love,
60 Amang a hunder" men? hundred
"I wad," said the bonnie ladie,
"Amang five hunder and ten."

15

The king made aw his merry men pass,
By ane,? by twa, and three; one
65 Earl Richard us'd to be the first man,
But he was hinmost man that day.

16

He cam hauping? on ane foot, hopping
And winking with ae? ee;? one / eye
But "Ha! ha!" said the bonnie ladie,
70 "That same young man are ye."

17

He's taen" her up to a hie towr-head taken
And offerd her hunder punds in a glove:"
"Oin" ye be a courteous maid, if
Ye 'll choice" anither love." choose

18

75 "What care I for your hunder pund?
Na mair" than ye wad for mine; more
What's a hunder pund to me,
To a marriage wi a king!"

19

Whan the marriage it was oure,
80 And ilk" ane took them horse, each
"It never set a beggar's brat
At nae knicht's back to be."?

5. Le., God forbid (it)!
6. Le., a hundred pounds tied up in a glove (which he offers in exchange for having to marry her).
7. I.e., it never suited a beggar's child to ride behind a lord.

The ladie met wi a beggar-wife,
And gied her half o crown:
85 "Tell aw your neebours, whan ye gang hame,
That Earl Richard's your gude-son."o — son-in-law

21

"O hold your tongue, ye beggar's brat,
My heart will brak in three";

26

110 "Hold your tongue, ye beggar's brat,
My heart will brak in three";
"And sae did mine on yon bonnie hillside,
Whan ye wadna lat me be."

8. Line 92 is missing; like most folk ballads, this poem was transcribed from sung versions. Other printed versions suggest, however, that the line describes how the nettles were spread on the ground.
9. Le., you would have to pull ("pu") the plough as well as she does.

1. I.e., and eat till she was full.
2. The bottom of her bowl.
3. A linen fabric made in Holland.
4. Woven patches of coarse wool and flax.
5. Child's brackets indicate that stanza 25 had been inserted in Kinloch's copy of Ancient Scottish Ballads.

27

"I wish I had drank the well-water
115 Whan first I drank the wine!
Never a shepherd's dochter
Wad hae been a love o mine."

28

"O I wish I'd drank the well-water
Whan first I drank the beer,
120 That ever a shepherd's dochter
Shoud hae been my only dear!"

* * *[6]

29

"Ye'll turn about, Earl Richard,
And mak some mair" o me; more
An ye mak me lady o ae puir plow,?
125 I can mak ye laird? o three." lord

But your face I coud never see."?

ANONYMOUS ELIZABETHAN AND JACOBEAN POEMS

Love Me Little, Love Me Long'

Love me little, love me long,
Is the burden? of my song. refrain
Love that is too hot and strong
Burneth soon to waste.
Still, I would not have thee cold,
Not too backward, nor too bold;
Love that lasteth till 'tis old
Fadeth not in haste.
Love me little) love me long)
10 Is the burden of my song.

6. Child's asterisks signal a gap in the story.
7. I.e., if you make me the lady of one poor plow (the area of land one plow will till in a year).
8. With the suggestion that she can make the knight lord of three plows, the story begins to reveal that the shepherd's daughter is high born. In some versions, however, her social status is mysterious at the end; and in one text, the knight is revealed to be a blacksmith's son whereas the lady is a king's daughter.
1. This song was registered in 1569-70 with the Stationers' Company, which authorized all printed texts from 1557 onward. Our source is the Extracts from the Stationers' Company (1848).

If thou lovest me too much,
It will not prove as true as touch;"
Love me little, more than such,
For I fear the end.
15 I am with little well content,
And a little from thee sent
Is enough, with true intent
To be steadfast friend.
Love me little, love me long,
20 Is the burden of my song.

Say thou lov'st me while thou live;
I to thee my love will give,
Never dreaming to deceive
Whiles that life endures.
25 Nay, and after death, in sooth,
I to thee will keep my truth,
As now, when in my May of youth;
This my love assures.
Love me little, love me long,
30 Is the burden of my song.

Constant love is moderate ever,
And it will through life persever;
Give me that, with true endeavor
I will it restore.
35 A suit of durance? let it be, durability
For all weathers that for me,
For the land or for the sea,
Lasting evermore.
Love me little, love me long,
40 Is the burden of my song.

Winter's cold, or summer's heat,
Autumn's tempests on it beat,
It can never know defeat,
Never can rebel.
45 Such the love that I would gain,
Such the love, I tell thee plain,
Thou must give, or woo in vain;
So to thee, farewell!
Love me little, love me long,
50 Is the burden of my song.

2. Touchstone or basanite; gold or silver rubbed on touchstone produces a streak, the appearance of which was formerly used as a test for the purity of the metal.

Fine Knacks for Ladies[3]

Fine knacks for ladies, cheap, choice, brave and new!
Good pennyworths-but money cannot move:
I keep a fair but for the fair to view;
A beggar may be liberal of love.
Though all my wares be trash, the heart is true,
The heart is true.

Great gifts are guiles° and look for gifts again; deceits
My trifles come as treasures from my mind.
It is a precious jewel to be plain;
10 Sometimes in shell the orient'st° pearls we find. most lustrous
Of others take a sheaf, of me a grain!
Of me a grain!

Within this pack pins, points,[4] laces, and gloves,
And divers toys fitting a country fair;
15 But in my heart, where duty serves and loves,
Turtles and twins,[5] court's brood, a heavenly pair.
Happy the heart that thinks of no removes!
Of no removes!

To His Love[6]

Come away! come, sweet love!
The golden morning breaks;
All the earth, all the air,
Of love and pleasure speaks.

Teach thine arms then to embrace,
And sweet rosy lips to kiss,
And mix our souls in mutual bliss.
Eyes were made for beauty's grace,
Viewing, rueing, love's long pain,
10 Procured by beauty's rude disdain.

Come away! come, sweet love!
The golden morning wastes,

3. This anonymous peddler's song was set for lute accompaniment by John Dowland, a well-known Elizabethan composer, and included in his Second Book of Songs or Airs (1600).
4. Laces (such as shoelaces) with the ends tagged or pointed for convenience in lacing.
5. Turtledoves C'turtles") and the "heavenly pair" of twins, Castor and Pollux of the constellation Gemini, were symbols of true love and constancy.
6. From England's Helicon (1600), an influential anthology of verse.

While the sun from his sphere
His fiery arrows casts,
15 Making all the shadows fly,
Playing, staying in the grove,
To entertain the stealth of love.
Thither, sweet love, let us hie" go
Flying, dying, in desire,
20 Wing'd with sweet hopes and heavenly fire.

Come away! come, sweet love!
Do not in vain adorn
Beauty's grace that should rise
Like to the naked morn.
25 Lilies on the river's side,
And fair Cyprian" flowers new-blown,
Desire no beauties but their own;
Ornament is nurse of pride.
Pleasure, measure love's delight.
30 Haste then, sweet love, our wished flight!

Weep You No More, Sad Fountains"

Weep you no more, sad fountains;
What need you flow so fast?
Look how the snowy mountains
Heaven's sun doth gently waste.
But my sun's heavenly eyes
View not your weeping,
That now lie sleeping
Softly, now softly lies
Sleeping.

10 Sleep is a reconciling,
A rest that peace begets.
Doth not the sun rise smiling
When fair at even" he sets? evening
Rest you then, rest, sad eyes,
15 Melt not in weeping
While she lies sleeping
Softly, now softly lies
Sleeping.

1603

7. An allusion to Venus, Roman goddess of love and beauty; the center of her cult was the island of Cyprus.

8. From John Dowland's Third Book of Songs or Airs (1603).

There Is a Lady Sweet and Kind?

There is a lady sweet and kind,
Was never face so pleased my mind;
I did but see her passing by,
And yet I love her till I die.

Her gesture, motion and her smiles,
Her wit, her voice, my heart beguiles,
Beguiles my heart, I know not why,
And yet I love her till I die.

Her free behavior, winning looks,
10 Will make a lawyer burn his books.
I touched her not, alas, not I,
And yet I love her till I die.

Had I her fast betwixt mine arms,
Judge you that think such sports were harms,
15 Were't any harm? No, no, fie, fie!
For I will love her till I die.

Should I remain confinèd there,
So long as Phoebus' in his sphere,
I to request, she to deny,
20 Yet would I love her till I die.

Cupid- is winged and doth range;
Her country so my love doth change,
But change she earth, or change she sky,
Yet will I love her till I die.

1607

The Silver Swan"

The silver swan, who living had no note,
When death approached, unlocked her silent throat;
Leaning her breast against the reedy shore,
Thus sung her first and last, and sung no more:
"Farewell, all joys; Oh death, come close mine eyes;
More geese than swans now live, more fools than wise."

9. From Thomas Ford's Music of Sundry Kinds (1607).
1. Apollo, Greek and Roman god of the sun.
2. Roman god of erotic love.

3. From Orlando Gibbons's First Set of Madrigals and Motets (1612). Gibbons, one of the last madrigalists, may be implying an analogy between himself and the swan.

A Song Bewailing the Time of Christmas, So Much Decayed in England"

Christmas is my name, far have I gone, have I gone, have I gone,
have I gone without regard,
Whereas great men, by flocks they be flown, they be flown,
they be flown, they be flown to London ward,
Where they in pomp and pleasure do waste that which Christmas had wont? to feast; been accustomed
Wellay day.
Houses where music was wonted" to ring, accustomed
Nothing but bats, and owls now do sing
10 Wellay day, wallay day, wallay day, where should I stay.

Christmas bread and beef is turned into stones, into stones, into stones,
Into stones and silken rags.
And lady money" it doth sleep, it doth sleep, it doth sleep,
It doth sleep in misers' bags.
15 Where many gallants once abound,
Nought but a dog and a shepherd is found,
Wellay day.
Places where Christmas revels did keep,
Are now become habitations for sheep.
20 Wallay day, wallay day, wellay day, where should I stay.

Pan, the shepherd's god, doth deface, doth deface, doth deface,
doth deface, Lady Ceres' crown,"
And tilliges? doth decay, doth decay, doth decay, plowed land
doth decay in every town."
25 Landlords their rents so highly enhance,
That Peares the plowman" barefoot doth dance,
Wellay day.

Farmers that Christmas would entertain,
hath scarsely withal them selves to maintain,
30 Wellay day, wellay day, wellay day, where should I stay.

4. This lament for Christmas festivities banned by Protestants after the Reformation (and for other social changes the speaker deplores) comes from a manuscript in the British Library (MS. Additional 38599); a longer version of the poem was printed around 1635.

5. Probably a reference to the money traditionally given out for charity on "Lady Days," dates in the Roman Catholic calendar devoted to celebrating events in the life of the Virgin Mary. One such celebration occurred (before the Reformation) on December 8, when the Virgin's immaculate conception was honored.

6. Ceres was the Roman goddess of grain and hence of the harvest; Pan, Greek god of shepherds and huntsmen, here symbolizes Protestant "iconolasts," who frequently "defaced" Catholic rituals and works of art, especially beheading or otherwise mutilating statues of religious figures in Catholic churches.

7. Probably a reference to the practice of "enclosure," whereby peasant farmers who were tenants of a manor lost their traditional access to "common" lands; during the sixteenth century, many wealthy landowners enclosed "tilled" land for the sake of the sheep being raised for England's expanding wool trade.

8. Peares is a traditional name for a plowman; cf. William Langland, "Piers Plowman" (p. 71).

Go to the Protestant, he'll protest, he'll protest, he'll protest,
he will protest and boldly boast,
And to the Puritan, he is so hot, he is so hot, he is so hot,
he is so hot he will burn the roast,
35 The Catholic good deeds will not scorn,
nor will not see poor Christmas forlorn,
Wellay day.
Since Holiness no good deeds will do,
Protestants had best turn Papists too,
40 Wellay day, wellay day, wellay day, where should I stay.

Pride and Luxury doth devour, doth devour, doth devour, doth devour house keeping quite,° completely
And beggary doth beget, doth beget, doth beget, doth beget in many a knight.
45 Madam foro sooth" in coach she must reel in / truth
Although she wear her hose out at heel,
Wellay day.
And on her back were that for her weed,
that would both me, and many other feed,
50 Wellay day, wellay day, wellay day, where should I stay.

Briefly for to end, here I find, here I find,
here I find such great vacation" emptying
That some great houses do seem to have, seem to have,
seem to have,
for to have some great purgation,
55 With purging pills, such effects they have showed,
that out of doors, their owners they have spewed."
Wellay day.
And when Christmas goes by and calls,
Nothing but solitude, and naked walls,
60 Wellay day, wellay day, wellay day, where should I stay.

Philemel's cottages are turned into gold, into gold,
Into gold for harboring jove.'
And great mens' houses up for to hold, up for to hold,
up for to hold, make great men moan,
65 But in the city they say they do live,
Where gold by handfuls away they do give,
Wellay day.
And therefor thither I purpose to pass,
hoping at London to find the golden ass,
70 I'll away, I'll away, I'll away, I'll no longer stay.

ea. 1624 1635

9. Probably a reference to the widespread "dissolution" of ecclesiastical manors that began during the reign of Henry VIII; the king (and his successors) raised money by dispossessing monasteries of their lands and houses.

1. An allusion to the classical myth of Philemon, a poor man who was visited by Jove and Mercury in disguise. For entertaining the gods well, Philemon and his wife, Baucis, were rewarded by having their cottage transformed into a luxurious temple.

Tom o' Bedlam's Song"

From the haggO and hungry goblin — haggard
That into rags would rend ye,
All the spirits that stand by the naked man
In the Book of Moons- defend ye!
That of your five sound senses
You never be forsaken,
Nor wander from your selves with Tom
Abroad to beg your bacon.

While I do sing "anvfood, anyfeeding,
10 Feeding, drink or clothing,"
Come dame or maid, be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.

Of thirty bare years have I
Twice twenty been enraged," — mad
15 And of forty been three times fifteen
In durance" soundly caged. — confinement, prison
On the lordly lofts of Bedlam,
With stubble soft and dainty,
Brave bracelets strong, sweet whip's ding-dong,
20 With wholesome hunger plenty.

And now I sing "anvfood, anyfeeding, ...

With a thought I took for Maudlin"
And a cruse" of cockle" pottage," — pitcher / shellfish / soup
With a thing thus tall, sky bless you all,
25 I befell into this dotage.
I slept not since the Conquest,"
Till then I never waked,
Till the roguish boy" of love where I lay — Cupid
Me found and stripped me naked.

30 And now I sing "anvfood) anyfeeding, ...

When I short have shorn my sour face
And swigged my horny barrel,
In an oaken inn I pound my skin
As a suit of gilt apparel.
35 The moon's my constant Mistress,

2. This poem, like a number of other anonymous lyrics, purports to be sung by a madman, Tom, from "Bedlam," that is, the Hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem, an asylum in London that housed the mentally ill from the fifteenth century on. The earliest known version of this poem is in a manuscript of songs and verses in the British Museum (MS. Additional 24665). Edgar in Shakespeare's King Lear assumes the persona of "Poor Tom," and this poem has been echoed by writers from Ben Jonson through Sir Waiter Scott to Rudyard Kipling.

3. Probably an astrological book.

4. Tom's "lady" is frequently named Maudline (short for Magdalene and probably an allusion to the Christian Scripture character Mary Magdalene).

5. William of Normandy's conquest of England, in 1066.

And the lowly owl my marrow,
The flaming Drake? and the Nightcrow make — male duck
Me music to my sorrow.

While I do sing "anyfood, anyfeeding, ...

40 The palsy plagues my pulses
When I priggO their pigs or pullen,° — steal/chicken
Your culvers? take, or matchless make — wood pigeons
Your Chanticleare,> or sullen.
When I want provant," with Humfry — food
45 I SUp,7 and when benighted,
I repose in Paul's with waking souls,
Yet never am affrighted.

But I do sing "anyfood, anyfeeding, ...

I know more than Apollo,"
50 For oft, when hee lies sleeping,
I see the stars at bloody wars
In the wounded welkin" weeping; — sky
The moon embrace her shepherd,
And the queen of Love her warrior,
55 While the first doth horn the star of morn,
And the next the heavenly Farrier.[9]

While I do sing "anyfood, anyfeeding, ...

The Gipsy Snap and Pedro!
Are none of Tom's comrados.
60 The punk I scorn and the cut purse sworn
And the roaring boys bravado.
The meek, the white, the gentle,
Me handle, touch, and spare not,
But those that cross Tom Rynosseros
65 Do what the panther dare not.

Although I sing "anyfood, anyfeeding, ...

With an host of furious fancies,
Whereof I am commander,
With a burning spear, and a horse of air,
70 To the wilderness I wander.
By a knight of ghosts and shadows

6. I.e., take away your rooster's mate.
7. Refers to the legendary "Duke Humphrey's Walk," in front of St. Paul's Cathedral in London ("Paul's," line 46), where the poor congregated.
8. Greek and Roman god of poetry and the sun.
9. In Greek mythology, the Moon loved the shepherd Endymion, and Venus, the goddess of love, preferred Mars, the god of war, to her husband, Hephaestos, the god of metalworking and hence a "heavenly Farrier," or horseshoer. The verb "horn," printed as "born" in some texts of the poem, suggests an image of the new moon "embracing" the morning star; in the second clause governed by this verb, there is a play on horn's figurative meaning as cuckold.
1. Le., a gypsy rogue (with "Snap" probably connoting thievery) and a Spaniard.

I summoned am to tourney? take part in a tournament
Ten leagues beyond the wide world's end.
Me thinks it is no journey.

75 Yet will I sing "any food, any feeding, ...

The Long Love, That in My Thought Ooth Harbor!

The long? love, that in my thought doth harbor,? enduring / lodge
And in mine heart doth keep his residence,
Into my face presseth with bold pretense,
And therein campeth, spreading his banner.2
She that me learneth" to love and suffer, teaches
And wills that my trust and lust's negligence
Be reined" by reason, shame and reverence,
With his hardiness" taketh displeasure. boldness
Wherewithal, unto the heart's" forest he fleeth,
10 Leaving his enterprise with pain and cry;
And there him hideth, and not appeareth.
What may I do when my master feareth
But in the field with him to live and die?
For good is the life, ending faithfully.

Whoso List[5] to Hunt

Whoso list to hunt, I know where is an hind," female deer
But as for me, alas, I may no more:
The vain travail hath wearied me so sore.

*Though Wyatt apparently meant to publish a collection of his poems, only a few of the poems were printed before his death (several appeared in The Court of Venus, a collection published between 1536 and 1540). Most of his works circulated in manuscript among aristocratic readers. After his death, however, the printer Richard Tottel published ninety-seven poems attributed to Wyatt-along with forty attributed to Henry Howard, earl of Surrey (ea. 1517-1547; see pp. 137-40) and Nicholas Grimald (I519?-1562?), respectively, and some by "Uncertain Authors"-in the book Songs and Sonnets (I557).

The Egerton manuscript (E. MS.) contains a number of poems in Wyatt's hand as well as his corrections of poems in other scribes' hands. Whenever possible, we have used this manuscript's versions of Wyatt's poems. We also print poems from the Devonshire manuscript (D. MS.) and several others in which some ofWyatt's texts are preserved. Where modernization may obscure puns or affect Wyatt's meter, we give original spellings in the notes.

I. Translated from Petrarch, Rime 140. Cf. the translation by Henry Howard, earl of Surrey, "Love, That Doth Reign and Live within My Thought" (p. 137).

2. Raising the flag, i.e., taking up a position for battle and, figuratively, blushing.

3. Checked; with a probable pun on reigned.

4. With a pun on heart and hart (as deer).

5. Whoever likes.

I am of them that farthest cometh behind;
Yet may I by no means my wearied mind
Draw from the deer: but as she fleeth afore,
Fainting I follow. I leave off therefore,
Since in a net I seek to hold the wind.
Who list her hunt, I put him out of doubt,
10 As well as I may spend his time in vain:
And, graven with diamonds, in letters plain
There is written her fair neck round about:
Noli me tangere." for Caesar's I am;
And wild for to hold, though I seem tame.

E. NIS.

My Galley[7]

My galley charged" with forgetfulness — lauded
Thorough" sharp seas in winter nights doth pass — through
'Tween rock and rock; and eke" mine enemy, alas, — also
That is my lord," steereth with cruelness;
And every oar a thought in readiness,
As though that death were light in such a case.
An endless wind doth tear the sail apace
Of forced sighs and trusty fearfulness.
A rain of tears, a cloud of dark disdain,
10 Hath done the wearied cords? great hinderance;
Wreathed with error and eke with ignorance.
The stars' be hid that led me to this pain;
Drowned is reason that should me consort,° — accampuny
And I remain despairing of the port.

E. MS.

They Flee from Me

They flee from me that sometime did me seek
With naked foot stalking in my chamber.
I have seen them gentle tame and meek
That now are wild and do not remember

6. Touch me not (Latin). The phrase (in Italian in Petrarch) has roots both in Petrarch's sonnet Rime I90-Wyatt's main source-and in the Bible (see especially the Catholic Bible, the Vulgate: John 20.17 and Matthew 22.21). Renaissance commentators on Petrarch maintained that the deer in Caesar's royal forest wore collars bearing a similar inscription, to prevent anyone from hunting the animals. The allusion raises questions about Wyatt's relation to King Henry VIII ("Caesar," line 13). Wyatt was accused during his lifetime of having been the lover of Anne Boleyn, who became Henry VIII's second wife and a major cause of his break with the Roman Catholic Church.
7. It is difficult to say with certainty when Wyatt intended an -ed ending to be pronounced as a second syllable and when not. Hence no attempt has been made to mark syllabic endings with an accent in any ofWyatt's poems (although in this particular poem such endings may occur in lines I, 8, 11, and 13). Wyatt's poem is based 011 Petrarch's Rime 189.
8. Le., the god of love.
9. The worn lines of the sail, with a possible pun 011 the Latin for heart (cor, cordis).
I. Le., the lady's eyes.

That sometime they put themselves in danger
To take bread at my hand; and now they range
Busily seeking with a continual change.

Thanked be fortune, it hath been otherwise
Twenty times better;' but once in special
10 In thin array after a pleasant guise"
When her loose gown from her shoulders did fall,
And she me caught in her arms long and small;" slender
Therewithal sweetly did me kiss,
And softly said Dear heart," how like you this?

15 It was no dream: I lay broad waking.[5]
But all is turned thorough" my gentleness through
Into a strange fashion of forsaking;
And I have leave to go of her goodness[6]
And she also to use newfangleness.
20 But since that I so kindly?am served,
I would fain know what she hath deserved.

E. MS.

Patience, Though I Have Not

Patience, though I have not
The thing that I require,
I must of force, God wot,° knows
Forbear my most desire;"
For no ways can I find
To sail against the wind.

Patience, do what they will
To work me woe or spite,
I shall content me still
10 To think both day and night,
To think and hold my peace,
Since there is no redress.

Patience, withouten blame,"
For I offended nought;
15 I know they know the same,
Though they have changed their thought.
Was ever thought so moved
To hate that it hath loved?

2. I.e., better on twenty occasions or twenty times better.
3. In a thin gown made in a pleasing fashion.
4. With a pun on heart and hart (as deer); "sweetly" (line 13) is spelled "swetely" in Wyatt's original and perhaps was pronounced with three syllables.
5. I.e., wide awake.
6. Because of her goodness (ironic).
7. I.e., in the way typical of female nature, or "kind"; in a way that the narrator deserves (according to his "nature," or being repaid "in kind"); with kindness (ironic). Spelled "kyndely" in Wyatt's original and perhaps thus pronounced with three syllables. Newfangleness: a new fashion; novelty or inconstancy in her erotic relationships with men.
8. Le., restrain or endure my strongest desire.
9. I.e., when one is without blame.

Patience of all my harm,[1]
20 For fortune is my foe;
Patience must be the charm
To heal me of my woe:
Patience without offence
Is a painful patience.

E. MS.

My Lute Awake!

My lute awake! Perform the last
Labor that thou and I shall waste,
And end that I have now begun;
For when this song is sung and past,
My lute be still, for I have done.

As to be heard where ear is none,
As lead to grave in marble stone,
My song may pierce her heart as soon;[2]
Should we then sigh, or sing, or moan?
10 No, no, my lute, for I have done.

The rocks do not so cruelly
Repulse the waves continually
As she my suit and affection.
So that I am past remedy:
15 Whereby my lute and I have done.

Proud of the spoil that thou hast got
Of simple hearts through love's shot,[3]
By whom, unkind, thou hast them won,
Think not he hath his bow forgot,
20 Although my lute and I have done.

Vengeance shall fall on thy disdain,
That makest but game on earnest pain;[4]
Think not alone under the sun
Unquit° to cause thy lovers plain,° unrequited / lamentation
25 Although my lute and I have done.

Perchance thee lie withered and old,
The winter nights that are so cold,
Plaining in vain unto the moon;
Thy wishes then dare not be told;
30 Care then who list,° for I have done. likes

1. I.e., in all the harm I suffer.
2. I.e., it is as likely that sound will be heard with no ear to hear it, or soft lead will be able to engrave ("grave") hard marble, as it is that my song will move her. "Ear" is spelled "ere" in Wyatt's manuscript.
3. The arrow of Cupid (Roman god of erotic love). "Through" is spelled "thorough" in Wyatt's original, perhaps indicating a two-syllable pronunciation. The referent for "thou" is unclear.
4. Makes fun of or plays games with one in pain.

And then may chance thee to repent
The time that thou hast lost and spent
To cause thy lovers sigh and swoon;
Then shalt thou know beauty but lent,
35 And wish and want as I have done.

Now cease, my lute, this is the last
Labor that thou and I shall waste,
And ended is that we begun;
Now is this song both sung and past:
40 My lute be still, for I have done.

E. MS.

Is It Possible

Is it possible
That so high debate,
So sharp, so sore, and of such rate," pace; value
Should end so soon and was begun so late?
Is it possible?

Is it possible
So cruel intent,
So hasty heat and so soon spent,
From love to hate, and thence for to relent?
10 Is it possible?

Is it possible
That any may find
Within one heart so diverse mind,
To change or turn as weather and wind?
15 Is it possible?

Is it possible
To spy it in an eye[5]
That turns as oft as chance on die?[6]
The troth" whereof can any try? truth, faith
20 Is it possible?

It is possible
For to turn so oft,
To bring that lowest that was most aloft,
And to fall highest[7] yet to light soft?
25 It is possible.

5. I.e., to spy love; the eyes were often said to be where a person's true feelings could be seen.
6. I.e, as often as fortune changes in tosses of the dice. "Turns" is spelled "tornys" in Wyatt's original, perhaps indicating a two-syllable pronunciation.
7. From the highest place. The imagery here plays on the Renaissance figure of the wheel of life, the frequent turning of which causes people's fortunes to rise and fall unpredictably.

All is possible,
Whosoo listO believe; — whoever / cares to Trust therefore first, and after preve:"
As men wed ladies by license and leave,
30 All is possible.

Forget Not Yet

Forget not yet the tried intent
Of such a truth as I have meant,
My great travail so gladly spent
Forget not yet.

Forget not yet when first began
The weary life ye know since whan," — when
The suit, the service none tell? can.
Forget not yet.

Forget not yet the great assays," — trials
10 The cruel wrong, the scornful ways,
The painful patience in denays,° — denials
Forget not yet.

Forget not yet, forget not this,
How long ago hath been and is 15 The mind that never meant amiss,
Forget not yet.

Forget not then thine own approved,1
The which so long hath thee so loved,
Whose steadfast faith yet never moved,
20 Forget not this.

Blame Not My Lute

Blame not my lute, for he must sound
Of this or that as liketh me;
For lack of wit the lute is bound
To give such tunes as pleaseth me;
Though my songs be somewhat strange
And speaks such words as touch thy change,"
Blame not my lute.

8. Le., learn by experience.
9. Give an account of, estimate. In courtly rhetoric, "service" often meant the actions of a male lover.
1. I.e., the one of whom you approved.
2. I.e., the lute "speaks"-probably through a change of musical key and/or rhythm-in a way that reflects the lady's change of heart.

My lute, alas, doth not offend,
Though that perforce he must agree
10 To sound such tunes as I intend
To sing to them that heareth me;
Then though my songs be somewhat plain,
And toucheth some that use to fain,"
Blame not my lute.

15 My lute and strings may not deny
But as I strike they must obey;
Break not them then so wrongfully,
But wreak" thyself some wiser way; avenge
And though the songs which I endite? compose
20 Do quite thy change with rightful spite, answer
Blame not my lute.

Spite asketh spite and changing change,
And falsed" faith must needs be known, betrayed
The fault so great, the case so strange,
25 Of right it must abroad be blown:
Then since that by thine own desert
My songs do tell how true thou art,
Blame not my lute.

Blame but thy self that hast misdone
30 And well deserved to have blame;
Change thou thy way so evil begun
And then my lute shall sound that same;
But if till then my fingers play
By thy desart their wonted" way, usual
35 Blame not my lute.

Farewell, unknown, for though thou break
My strings in spite with great disdain
Yet have I found out for thy sake
Strings for to string my lute again;
40 And if perchance this foolish rhyme
Do make thee blush at any time
Blame not my lute.

D.MS.

What Should I Say

What should I say
Since faith is dead,
And truth away
From you is fled?
Should I be led

3. Le., some who used to "feign," meaning both dissemble and desire.

With doubleness?
Nay, nay, Mistress!"

I promised you
And you promised me,
10 To be as true
As I would be;
But since I see
Your double heart,
Farewell my part![5]

15 Though for to take
It is not my mind
But to forsake-
I am not blind-
And as I find
20 So will I trust.
Farewell, unjust!

Can ye say nay?
But you said
That I alway? — always 25 Should be obeyed;"
And thus betrayed
Ora that I wistO- — before / knew
Farewell, unkist!" — unkissed

D.MS.

Lucks, My Fair Falcon?

Lucks, my fair falcon, and your fellows all,
How well pleasant it were your liberty!
Ye not forsake me that fair might ye befall."
But they that sometime" liked my company: — formerly
Like lice away from dead bodies they crawl.
Lo what a proof in light adversity!
But ye my birds, I swear by all your bells,9
Ye be my friends, and so be but few else.

Ad. Ms.

4. Title for an upper-class married woman; a courteous form.
5. Share in the relationship; spelled "perte" in Wyatt's original, suggesting a pun on the French word for loss (perte).
6. Some contemporary marriage services included a vow by the woman to obey the man; the point raises the possibility that the poem is addressed to the speaker's wife.
7. This poem appears in one manuscript (Additional MS. 36529) in the British Museum; it also appears in an early printed anthology (Tottel's Miscellany, 1557), with the title "Of Such as Had Forsaken Him." The speaker addresses a falcon whose name evidently puns on luck and on the Latin word for light, lux. The first printed version of the poem gives the falcon's name as "Lux," whereas all the manuscripts give it as "Iuckes," possibly pronounced with two syllables. Scholars speculate that the poem was written shortly before Wyatt was imprisoned in 1541.
8. Le., you do not forsake me so that fair fortune (good luck) will come to you. This line, with its compressed syntax, begins a contrast between the faithful falcon and unfaithful humans.
9. A bell was attached by a leather strap to each leg of a falcon.

Stand Whoso List!

Stand whoso list upon the slipper" top slippery
Of court's estates," and let me here rejoice;
And use me quiet without let or stop," hindrance
Unknown in court, that hath such brackish" joys:
In hidden place, so let my days forth pass,
That when my years be done, withouten noise,
I may die aged after the common trace." way
For him death gripeth right hard by the crope" throat
That is much known of other; and of himself alas,
10 Ooth die unknown, dazed with dreadful" face.

Arundel Castle MS.

Mine Own John Poins"

Mine own John Poins, since ye delight to know
The cause why that homeward I me draw,
And flee the press of courts whereso they go,"
Rather than to live thrall, under the awe
Of lordly looks, wrapped within my cloak,
To will and lust learning to set a law;"
It is not for because I scorn and mock
The power of them, to whom fortune hath lent
Charge over us, of right, to strike the stroke:"
10 But true it is that I have always meant
Less to esteem them than the common sort,
Of outward things that judge in their intent,
Without regard what doth inward resort."
I grant sometime that of glory the fire
15 Ooth touch my heart: mea list" not to report I! care
Blame by honor and honor to desire.'
But how may I this honor now attain
That cannot dye the color black a liar?2
My Poins, I cannot frame me tune to feign,3
20 To cloak the truth, for praise without desert,
Of them that list all vice for to retain."

1. This poem, a translation of Seneca's play Thyestes, lines 391-404, was printed in a quite different version by Tottel under the title "Of the Mean and Sure Estate." Whoso list: whoever likes.
2. Society was said to be divided into three groups: those who ruled, those who prayed, and those who labored.
3. Spoiled, like water that has gone bad.
4. Has a variety of possible meanings, including awful, terrified, and frightening.
5. Wyatt's friend; a member of Henry Vl11's court. This verse epistle of informal satire is based on the tenth satire of the Italian poet Luigi Alamanni (1495-1556), but Wyatt Anglicizes it and adds personal details. It apparently was written during Wyatt's banishment from court in 1536.
6. In Renaissance England, the royal court frequently moved residence, sometimes through highly elaborate "progresses," or processions.
7. Le., learning to set a law to (or keep in check) my passions. Lust: pleasure.
S. Le., rightfully empowered to command and to punish us.
9. l.e., to have less esteem for them than do the common people (line 11), who base their judgment on what appears outwardly (lines 12-13).
1. l.e., I have no wish to represent faults as virtues or pleasure as honor.
2. A common proverb held that black will take no other hue.
3. I.e., shape my style falsely.
4. I.e., desire to keep vice in their service.

I cannot honor them that sets their part
With Venus and Bacchus" all their life long;
Nor hold my peace of them although I smart.
25 I cannot crouch nor kneel to do so great a wrong,
To worship them, like God on earth alone,
That are as wolves these sely" lambs among. innocent
I cannot with my words complain and moan,
And suffer naught; nor smart without complaint,
30 Nor turn the word that from my mouth is gone.
I cannot speak and look like a saint,
Use wiles" for wit or make deceit a pleasure, cunning
And call craft" counsel, for profit still to paint;" scheming / flatter
I cannot wrest the law to fill the coffer
35 With innocent blood to feed myself fat,
And do most hurt where most help I offer.
I am not he that can allow" the state accept
Of high Caesar and damn Cato to die,
That with his death did 'scape out of the gate
40 From Caesar's hands (if Livy do not lie)"
And would not live where liberty was lost:
So did his heart the common weal apply.[7]
I am not he such eloquence to boast,
To make the crow singing as the swan,"
45 Nor call the lion of coward beasts the most?
That cannot take a mouse as the cat can:
And he that dieth for hunger of the gold
Call him Alexander;[1] and say that Pan
Passeth Apollo in music manifold;'
50 Praise Sir Thopas for a noble tale,
And scorn the story that the Knight told."
Praise him for counsel that is drunk of ale;
Grin when he laugheth that beareth all the sway,
Frown when he frowneth and groan when he is pale;
55 On others' lust to hang both night and day:
None of these points would ever frame in me;"
My wit is naught-I cannot learn the way.
And much the less of things that greater be,
That asken help of colors of device"
60 To join the mean° with each extremity, middle
With the nearest virtue to cloak" alway the vice: soften; cover
And as to purpose likewise it shall fall,
To press" the virtue that it may not rise;" to press down

5. Venus was the Roman goddess of love and beauty; Bacchus, the Roman god of wine.
6. The Roman historian Livy recounts the death of Cato the Younger, a statesman who committed suicide rather than submit to Julius Caesar's tyranny.
7. I.e., so did his heart practice the common good.
8. Swans supposedly sang beautifully just before dying.
9. Nor call a lion (a symbol of bravery) a coward.
1. Say that he is Alexander the Great, who was said to prefer glory and action to riches; i.e., he cannot say that one who is greedy for gold instead prefers glory.
2. The Greek god Pan played simple ditties on his pipe; the Greek and Roman god Apollo played divine melodies on his lyre.
3. Chaucer's tale of Sir Thopas (in The Canterbury Tales) is a deliberately dull parody that is cut off after a few stanzas by the Host. The Knight's tale, according to other pilgrims, is "a noble storie."
4. Le., suit my character.
5. Artful language that "colors," or falsifies,
6. Le., and intention will be subsumed by the deceit.

As drunkenness good fellowship to call;
65 The friendly foe with his double face
Say he is gentle and courteous therewithal;
And say that favel° hath a goodly grace — flattery
In eloquence; and cruelty to name
Zeal of justice and change in time and place;
70 And he that suff'reth offense without blame
Call him pitiful; and him true and plain
That raileth reckless? to every man's shame.
Say he is rude that cannot lie and feign;
The lecher a lover; and tyranny
75 To be the right of a prince's reign.
I cannot, I. No, no, it will not be.
This is the cause" that I could never yet — reason
Hang on their sleeves that weigh as thou mayst see
A chip? of chance more than a pound of wit. — small amount
80 This maketh me at home to hunt and hawk
And in foul weather at my book to sit.
In frost and snow then with my bow to stalk,
No man doth mark whereso I ride or go;
In lustyleas" at liberty I walk, — pleasant / meadows
85 And of these news I feel nor weal° nor woe, — happiness
Save that a clog" doth hang yet at my heel:
No force" for that for it is ordered so, — matter
That I may leap both hedge and dike? full well.
I am not now in France to judge the wine,
90 With sav'ry sauce those delicates to feel;[1]
Nor yet in Spain where one must him incline
Rather than to be, outwardly to seem.
I meddle not with wits that be so fine,
Nor Flanders' cheer letteth not my sight to deem 95 Of black and white," nor taketh my wit away
With beastliness, they beasts do so esteem;
Nor am I not where Christ is given in prey
For money, poison, and treason at Rome,"
A common practice used night and day:
100 But here I am in Kent and Christendom
Among the Muses" where I read and rhyme;
Where if thou list, my Poins, for to come,
Thou shalt be judge how I do spend my time.

E. MS.

7. Rants abusively.
8. Heavy object tied to a prisoner's foot to impede motion.
9. Ditch, used as a boundary.
1. To savor exquisite food.
2. I.e., to be able to tell the difference between black and white. Flanders' cheer: in the sixteenth century, the Flemings were notorious for drinking. Letteth: hinders.
3. In Tottel's Miscellany, an anthology published in 1557, during the reign of the Catholic Queen Mary, these lines read: "where truth is given prey / For money, poison and treason; of some."
4. In Greek mythology, nine sister goddesses who presided over song and poetry and the arts and sciences. Wyatt had extensive lands in Kent and could retire there when out of favor at court. He was elected to Parliament from Kent shortly before his death.

The Soote Season[1]

The soote? season, that bud and bloom forth brings, — sweet
With green hath clad the hill and eke? the vale; — also
The nightingale with feathers new she sings;
The turtle? to her make? hath told her tale. — turtledove / mate
Summer is come, for every spray now springs;
The hart hath hung his old head on the pale;"
The buck in brake" his winter coat he flings, — the hushes
The fishes float with new repaired scale;
The adder all her slough away she slings,
10 The swift swallow pursueth the flies small;
The busy bee her honey now she mings.? — discharges
Winter is worn, that was the flowers' bale." — harm
And thus I see among these pleasant things,
Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs.

Love, That Doth Reign and Live within My Thought"

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought,
And built his seat within my captive breast,
Clad in the arms? wherein with me he fought, — heraldic insignia
Oft in my face he doth his banner rest.
But she that taught me love and suffer pain,
My doubtful hope and eke? my hot desire — also
With shamefast" look to shadow and refrain, — shamefaced
Her smiling grace converteth straight to ire.
And coward Love, then, to the heart apace" — quickly
10 Taketh his flight, where he doth lurk and plain,° — complain
His purpose lost, and dare not show his face.
For my lord's guilt thus faultless bide? I pain, — endure
Yet from my lord shall not my foot remove:"
Sweet is the death that taketh end by love.

1. Translated and adapted from Petrarch, Rime 310; first published, along with poems by Wyatt and others, in Tottel's Miscellany (1557), an early anthology.
2. I.e., has hung his antlers on the paling, or fence.
3. Translated from Petrarch, Rime 140. Compare the translation by Sir Thomas Wyatt, "The Long Love, That in My Thought Doth Harbor" (p, 126).
4. I.e., I will not leave his side.

Wyatt Resteth HereS

Wyatt resteth here, that quick" could never rest; living
Whose heavenly gifts increased by disdain,"
And virtue sank the deeper in his breast;
Such profit he of envy could obtain.
A head where wisdom mysteries[7] did frame,
Whose hammers beat still in that lively brain
As on a stithy," where some work of fame anvil
Was daily wrought, to turn to Britain's gain.
A visage stern and mild, where both did grow,
10 Vice to contemn, in virtues to rejoice,
Amid great storms, whom grace assured so,
To live upright, and smile at fortune's choice.
A hand that taught what might be said in rhyme;
That reft" Chaucer the glory of his wit; bereft
IS A mark, the which-s-unperfited," for time- uncompleted
Some may approach, but never none shall hit.
A tongue that served in foreign realms his king;
Whose courteous talk to virtue did enflame
Each noble heart; a worthy guide to bring 20 Our English youth, by travail, unto fame.
An eye whose judgment no affect" could blind, passion
Friends to allure, and foes to reconcile;
Whose piercing look did represent a mind
With virtue fraught, reposed, void of guile.
25 A heart where dread yet never so impressed
To hide the thought that might the truth advance;
In neither fortune lost, nor so repressed,
To swell in wealth, nor yield unto mischance.
A valiant corps," where force and beauty met, body
30 Happy, alas! too happy, but for foes,
Lived, and ran the race that nature set;
Of manhood's shape, where she the mold did lose.
But to the heavens that simple soul is fled,
Which left with such as covet Christ to know"
35 Witness of faith that never shall be dead,
Sent for our health, but not received so.
Thus, for our guilt, this jewel have we lost;
The earth his bones, the heavens possess his ghost.

5. Surrey's epitaph on Thomas Wyatt (1503-1542; see pp. 126-36), published in 1542, soon after Wyatt's death.
6. I.e., by others' disdain (as in line 4, of others' "envy").
7. Hidden or subtle meanings.
8. Le., Christians.

So Cruel Prison?

So cruel prison how could betide,° alas, befall
As proud Windsor?' Where I in lust" and joy pleasure
With a king's son my childish? years did pass youthful
In greater feast than Priarn's- sons of Troy;
Where each sweet place returns a taste full sour:
The large green courts where we were wont to hove"
With eyes cast up unto the maidens' tower,
And easy sighs, such as folk draw in love;
The stately sales," the ladies bright of hue, halls
10 The dances short, long tales of great delight;
With words and looks that tigers could but rue,"
Where each of us did plead the other's right;
The palm play," where, despoiled" for the game, handball / disrobed
With dazèd eyes oft we by gleams of love
15 Have missed the ball and got sight of our dame,
To bait" her eyes, which kept the leads above;
The graveled ground, with sleeves tied on the helm,>
On foaming horse, with swords and friendly hearts,
With cheer, as though the one should overwhelm;
20 Where we have fought, and chased oft with darts,
With silver drops the meads" yet spread for ruth," meadows / pity
In active games of nimbleness and strength,
Where we did strain, trailed by swarms of youth,
Our tender limbs that yet shot up in length;
25 The secret groves which oft we made resound
Of pleasant plaint and of our ladies' praise,
Recording soft what grace each one had found,
What hope of speed, what dread of long delays;
The wild forest, the clothed holt° with green, small wood
30 With reins avaled," and swift ybreathed" horse, slackened / exercised
With cry of hounds and merry blasts between,
Where we did chase the fearful hart aforce;" strenuously
The void walls eke" that harbored us each night, also
Wherewith, alas, revive within my breast
35 The sweet accord; such sleeps as yet delight,
The pleasant dreams, the quiet bed of rest;
The secret thoughts imparted with such trust,
The wanton talk, the divers change of play,
The friendship sworn, each promise kept so just,

9. As a boy and young man, Surrey had enjoyed the life at Windsor Palace as the close friend of Henry Fitzroy, an illegitimate son of Henry VIII. In 1537, a year after the death of his friend, Surrey was imprisoned temporarily at Windsor for striking another courtier.
1. Le., how could proud Windsor (Castle) have become such a cruel prison?
2. Priarn, king of Troy in Homer's Iliad.
3. Accustomed to linger.
4. The tiger conventionally symbolized unfeeling savagery.
5. To feed or to attract. The "leads" from which the lady watches may be either a leaded window or a flat, leaded roof.
6. A knight would customarily tie a favor received from a lady to his sleeve or helmet and wear it into a joust or a battle. Graveled ground: tilt yard, i.e., space strewn with gravel for jousting.

40 Wherewith we passed the winter nights away.
And with this thought the blood forsakes my face,
The tears berain" my cheeks of deadly hue, wet
The which as soon as sobbing sighs, alas,
Upsupped" have, thus I my plaint renew: absorbed
45 0 place of bliss, renewer of my woes,
Give me accompC-where is my noble fere?O companion
Whom in thy walls thou didst each night enclose,
To other lief,? but unto me most dear! beloved
Echo, alas, that doth my sorrow rue,
50 Returns thereto a hollow sound of plaint.
Thus I, alone, where all my freedom grew,
In prison pine with bondage and restraint;
And with remembrance of the greater grief
To banish the less, I find my chief relief.

ANNE ASKEW
1521-1546

The Ballad Which Anne Askew Made and Sang When She Was in Newgate'

Like as the armèd knight
Appointed to the field,
With this world will I fight
And faith shall be my shield.?
  Faith is that weapon strong
Which will not fail at need;
My foes therefore among
Therewith will I proceed.
  As it is had in strength
10 And force of Christ's way,
It will prevail at length
Though all the devils say nay.
  Faith in the father's old
Obtained rightwiseness" righteousness
15 Which make me very bold
To fear no world's distress.

7. I.e., tell me.

1. Askew was arrested and examined for heresy in June 1545. She was released, but was arrested again in June 1546, subjected to torture, and burned at the stake the next month. This ballad was included in the Protestant Bishop John Bale's two accounts of her examination and death, printed in 1546 and 1547, respectively. Newgate: a London prison.

2. Ephesians 6.13-17 exhorts the Christian to put on "the whole armor of God," including "the shield of faith, with which ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked."

I now rejoice in heart
And hope bid me do so,
For Christ will take my part
20 And ease me of my woe.
Thou sayst lord, who so kneck,[3]
To them wilt thou attend;
Undo therefore the lock
And thy strong power send.
25 More enemies now I have
Than hairs upon my head
Let them not me deprave,° villify
But fight thou in my stead.
On thee my care I cast
30 For all their cruel spite
I set not by their haste,[4]
For thou art my delight.
I am not she that list° chooses
My anchor to let fall
35 For every drizzling mist
My ship substantial.
Not oft use I to write
In prose nor yet in rhyme,
Yet will I show one sight
40 That I saw in my time.
I saw a royal throne
Where Justice should have sit,
But in her stead was one
Of modie° cruel wit. wrathful
45 Absorbed° was rightwiseness swallowed up
As of the raging flood;
Satan in his excess
Sucked up the guiltless blood.
Then thought I, Jesus lord,
50 When thou shalt judge us all,
Hard is it to record
On these men what will fall.
Yet lord I thee desire
For that° they do to me, what
55 Let them not taste the hire° reward
Of their iniquity.[5]

3. Knocks. Matthew 7.7: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you."
4. I have no regard for their rashness.
5. Christ on the cross also asks mercy for his persecutors: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Luke 23.34).

QUEEN ELIZABETH I
1533-1603

When I Was Fair and Young[1]

When I was fair and young, then favor graced me.
Of many was I sought their mistress" for to be, sweetheart
But I did scorn them all and answered them therefore:
Go, go, go, seek some other where, importune me no more.

How many weeping eyes I made to pine in woe,
How many sighing hearts I have not skill to show,
But I the prouder grew and still this spake therefore:
Go, go, go, seek some other where, importune me no more.

Then spake fair Venus' son.? that proud victorious boy,
10 Saying: You dainty dame, for that you be so coy,
I will so pluck your plumes" as you shall say no more:
Go, go, go, seek some other where, importune me no more.

As soon as he had said, such change" grew in my breast
That neither night nor day I could take any rest.
15 Wherefore I did repent that I had said before:
Go, go, go, seek some other where, importune me no more.

[The Doubt of Future Foes Exiles My Present Joy][5]

The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy,
And wit me warns to shun such snares as threaten mine annoy;"
For falsehood now doth flow, and subjects' faith doth ebb,
Which should not be if reason ruled or wisdom weaved the web.
But clouds of joys untried do cloak aspiring minds,
Which turn to rain of late repent by changed course of winds.

1. This poem is found with many variations in five manuscripts. We follow Leicester Bradner, The Poems of Queen Elizabeth, in using the British Museum's Harleian 7392 as the basis for our text. The Bodleian Library's Rawlinson manuscript, written between 1590 and 1600, also contains a version of the poem and states, furthermore, that it was written when Elizabeth "was suposed to be in love with mounsyre," that is, her French suitor, the duke of Alençon. Some modern scholars doubt that Elizabeth wrote the poem, but all accept it as an important cultural document about her.
2. Cupid, Roman god of erotic love, was the son of Venus, goddess of love and beauty.
3. I.e., remove your pride; a reference to the brightly colored plumes of the peacock, a traditional symbol of pride.
4. One manuscript, in the Folger Library, substitutes "care" for "change."
5. This poem is written in poulter's measure-alternating lines of six and seven beats (see "Versification," p. 2047)-a popular form at this time (see Philip Sidney, "What Length of Verse?" p. 210). It appears to answer a sonnet written by Elizabeth's Catholic cousin Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, in which Mary, who had fled to England from imprisonment in Scotland in 1568, asks to see Elizabeth. Until her execution in 1587, Mary was a constant threat, the impetus of many plots to depose Elizabeth and seat herself on the English throne. "The daughter of debate" in line 11 and the "foreign banished wight" in line 13 apparently refer to Mary.
Versions of this poem appear in six manuscripts and two early printed texts, including George Puttenham's Art of English Poesy (1589). Our text follows that of Bodleian MS. Rawlinson, thought to have been compiled around 1570.
Doubt: danger or thing to be dreaded.
6. I.e., cause me discomfort or trouble.

The top of hope supposed the root upreared shall be,"
And fruitless all their grafted guile,8 as shortly ye shall see.
The dazzled eyes with pride, which great ambition blinds,
10 Shall be unsealed by worthy wights? whose foresight falsehood finds.
The daughter of debate that discord aye doth sow
Shall reap no gain where former rule still peace hath taught to know.
No foreign banished wight! shall anchor in this port;
Our realm brooks? not seditious sects, let them elsewhere resort. allows
15 My rusty sword through rest shall first his edge employ
To poll their tops? that seek such change or gapeO for future joy. long

[Ah Silly Pug, Wert Thou So Sore Afraid][3]

Ah silly pug, wert thou so sore afraid,
Mourn not (my Wat") nor be thou so dismayed,
It passeth fickle fortune's power and skill,
To force my heart to think thee any ill.
No fortune base thou sayest shall alter thee,
And may so blind a witch" so conquer me?
No no my pug, though fortune were not blind,
Assure thy self she could not rule my mind.
Fortune I know sometimes doth conquer kings
10 And rules & reigns on earth & earthly things,
But never think fortune can bear the sway,
If virtue watch & will not her obey.
Ne" chose I thee by fickle fortune's rede," neither / advice
Ne" she shall force me altere with such speed nor / to change
15 But if to try this mistress jest with thee,
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -[6]
Pull up thy heart, suppress thy brackish" tears, salty
Torment thee not, but put away thy fears;
Dead to all joys & living unto woe,
Slain quite by her that ne're gave wiseman blow
20 Revive again & live without all dread,
The less afraid the better thou shalt speed.° succeed, prosper

ca. 1578-88 1992

7. Variants on this line include: "The top of hope suppressed the root upreared [i.e., exalted] shall be" and "The top of hope supposed the root of ruth [sorrow] will be."
8. The image of grafting, or inserting a shoot into the root stock of another tree or plant, suggests that conspirators have attempted to plant their own seditious thoughts in the minds of others.
9. People. Unsealed: unsewn or unopened, as the eyes of a hawk in the sport of hawking.
I. Le., no person exiled to a foreign land.
2. I.e., cut off their heads.
3. This poem was written in answer to a poem by Sir Waiter Ralegh, probably "Fortune Hath Taken Thee Away, My Love" (p. 158). Silly: deserving of pity or compassion; also foolish, lacking in judgment, helpless, defenseless, insignificant, or lowly. Pug: a term of endearment.
4. A diminutive of Waiter.
5. Fortune was often personified as a fickle woman and sometimes depicted as blind or blindfolded.
6. A line of the poem may be missing at this point; alternatively, the queen may have written lines 13-IS as a triplet of near-rhymes.

GEORGE GASCOIGNE*
ea. 1534-1577

And If I Did, What Then?

"And if I did, what then?
Are you aggrieved therefore?
The sea hath fish for every man,
And what would you have more?"

Thus did my mistress once
Amaze my mind with doubt,
And popped a question for the nonce.'
To beat my brains about.

Whereto I thus replied:
10 "Each fisherman can wish
That all the sea at every tide
Were his alone to fish.

And so did I, in vain;
But since it may not be,
15 Let such fish there as find the gain,
And leave the loss for me.

And with such luck and loss
I will content myself,
Till tides of turning time may toss
20 Such fishers on the shelf.

And when they stick on sands,
That every man may see,
Then will I laugh and clap my hands,
As they do now at me."

For That He Looked Not upon Her

You must not wonder, though you think it strange,
To see me hold my louring? head so low, sullen
And that mine eyes take no delight to range
About the gleams which on your face do grow.
The mouse which once hath broken out of trap
Is seldom 'ticed? with the trustless bait, enticed
But lies aloof for fear of more mishap,
And feedeth still in doubt" of deep deceit. suspicion
The scorched fly, which once hath 'scaped the flame,
10 Will hardly come to play again with fire,

"Cascoignc's poems were first published in A Hundred Sundry Flowers (1573), the source of our texts.

Because your blazing eyes my bale? have bred. anguish

Gascoigne's Lullaby

Sing lullaby, as women do,
Wherewith they bring their babes to rest,
And lullaby can I sing too,
As womanly as can the best.
With lullaby they still the child,
And if I be not much beguiled,
Full many wanton babes have I,
Which must be stilled with lullaby.

First, lullaby, my youthful years,
10 It is now time to go to bed,
For crooked age and hoary hairs
Have won the haven within my head.
With lullaby then, youth, be still,
With lullaby content they will,
15 Since courage quails" and comes behind, shrinks
Go sleep, and so beguile thy mind.

Next, lullaby, my gazing eyes,
Which wonted were" to glance apace." directly
For every glass may now suffice
20 To show the furrows in my face.
With lullaby then wink' awhile,
With lullaby your looks beguile.
Let no fair face nor beauty bright
Entice you eft" with vain delight. after

25 And lullaby, my wanton will,
Let reason's rule now rein thy thought,
Since all too late I find by skill? experience
How dear I have thy fancies bought.
With lullaby now take thine ease,
30 With lullaby thy doubts appease.
For trust to this, if thou be still,
My body shall obey thy will.

Ekeo lullaby, my loving boy, also
My little Robin," take thy rest.
35 Since age is cold and nothing coy," lascivious
Keep close thy coin," for so is best.

2. Le., close my eyes; also, blink.
3. Which were accustomed.
4. I.e., shut your eyes.
5. I.c., a nickname for his penis.
6. Le., don't expend your semen; with a play on "coin" as money and as a sound in the poet's name.

With lullaby be thou content,
With lullaby thy lusts relent.
Let others pay which? hath mo" pence; who /more
40 Thou art too poor for such expense.

Thus, lullaby, my youth, mine eyes,
My will, my ware, and all that was.
I can no mo delays devise,
But welcome pain, let pleasure pass.
45 With lullaby now take your leave,
With lullaby your dreams deceive,
And when you rise with waking eye,
Remember Gascoigne's lullaby.

FROM A SWEET NOSEGAY

A Communication Which the Author Had to London, Before She Made Her Will[1]

The time is come, I must depart
from thee, ah famous city;
I never yet to rue my smart," pain
did find that thou had'st pity.
Wherefore small cause there is, that I should grieve from thee to go;
But many women foolishly,
like me, and other moe,° more
Do such a fixèd fancy set,
10 on those which least deserve,
That long it is ere wit we get away from them to swerve.
But time with pity oft will tell
to those that will her try,
15 Whether it best be more to mell,° mix with or utterly defy.
And now hath time me put in mind
of thy great cruelness,

I. This poem and the poetic testament that follows it conclude Whitney's A Sweet Nosegay (1573), a collection of poems that begins with 110 verse couplets of advice explicitly borrowed from Hugh Plat's Flowers of Philosophy (1572). While Plat's c1assicizing verses were aimed at an audience of university men and lawyers, Whitney's book seems designed for less privileged readers of both sexes. Her "will," occasioned not by impending death but rather by the poverty that compels her to leave London, plays on the fantasy that all of the city's riches are the author's to bequeath as she likes.

That never once a help would find,
20 to ease me in distress.
Thou never yet would'st credit give to board me for a year;
Nor with apparel me relieve,
except thou payed were.
25 No, no, thou never did'st me good,
nor ever wilt, I know.
Yet am I in no angry mood,
but will, or ere" I go,
In perfect love and charity,
30 my testament here write,
And leave to thee such treasury,
as I in it recite.
Now stand aside and give me leave
to write my latest will;
35 And see that none you do deceive
of that I leave them till."

From The Manner of Her Will, & What She Left to London, and to All Those in It, at Her Departing

I whole in body, and in mind,
but very weak in purse,
Do make, and write my testament
for fear it will be worse.
And first I wholly do commend my soul and body eke,° — also
To God the Father and the Son,
so long as I can speak.
And after speech, my soul to him,
10 and body to the grave,
Till time that all shall rise again,
their Judgement for to have.
And then I hope they both shall meet,
to dwell for aye? in joy; — ever 15 Whereas" I trust to see my friends — when released from all annoy.
Thus have you heard touching my soul,
and body what I mean:
I trust you all will witness bear,
20 I have a steadfast brain.
O God, now let me dispose such things,
as I shall leave behind,
That those which shall receive the same,
may know my willing mind.

2. In early modern English, "or" was often used with "ere" to mean "before."

3. I.e., of what I leave to them.

25 I first of all to Loridon leave,
because I there was bred,
Brave buildings rare, of churches store,
and Paul's to the head."
Between the same, fair treats there be,
30 and people goodly store;
Because their keeping craveth" cost, requires
I yet will leave him" more. them
First for their food, I butchers leave,
that every day shall kill;
35 By Thames" you shall have brewers' store, river Thames
and bakers at your will.
And such as orders do observe,
and eat fish thrice a week,"
I leave two streets, full fraught therewith,"
40 they need not far to seek.
Watling Street, and Canwick Street,
I full of woolen" leave;
And linen store in Friday Street,
if they me not deceive.
45 And those which are of calling such,
that costlier they require,
I mercers" leave, with silk so rich, textile merchants
as any would desire."
In Cheap of them, they store shall find,
50 and likewise in that street,
I goldsmiths leave, with jewels such,"
as are for ladies meet.° suitable

Now when the folk are fed and clad
90 with such as I have named,
For dainty mouths, and stomachs weak
some junckets" must be framed. sweet cakes
Wherefore I potecaries leave,
with banquets in their shop;"
95 Physicians also for the sick,
Diseases for to stop..
Some roysters" still must bide in thee, revellers
and such as cut it out;'

4. The greatest of the "store" (supply) of London's sixteenth-century churches was St. Paul's Cathedral.
5. Evidently playing on religious and secular meanings of "order," i.e., the clergy (those "in orders") and also anyone who obeyed the Act of 1563, which sought to stimulate the fishing trade by decreeing that fish was to be eaten three days a week rather than the two days stipulated in an Act of 1548.
6. PossiblyOld Fish Street, London's original fish market, and New Fish Street, in a different part of the city. There were, however, other streets in which fish was sold.
7. Possibly an ironic allusion to the Sumptuary Laws that prevented persons below certain social ranks (or "callings," a Protestant term for vocations) from wearing luxurious fabrics.
8. I.e., she bequeathes to goldsmiths their own street, Goldsmith's Row, which was on the south side of Cheapside Market ("Cheap"); there, those who "require costlier" things may find many (a "store") of them.
9. Apothecaries carried not only drugs but also spices; hence one could supply "banquets" in their shops.
1. Show off.

That with the guiltless quarrel will,
100 to let their blood about.
For them I cunning surgeons[2] leave,
some plasters to apply,
That ruffians may not still be hanged,
nor quiet persons die.

To all the bookbinders by Paul's,
because I like their art,
195 They every week shall money have,
when they from books depart.
Among them all, my printer must have somewhat to his share;
I will my friends these books to buy
200 of him, with other ware.
For maidens poor, I widowers rich
do leave, that oft shall dote:
And by that means shall marry them,
to set the girls afloat.
205 And wealthy widows will I leave
to help young gentlemen;
Which when you have, in any case,
be courteous to them then:
And see their plate? and jewels eke" silverware I also 210 may not be marred with rust;
Nor let their bags too long be full,
for fear that they do burst.

225 And Bedlam[3] must not be forgot,
for that was oft my walk:
I people there too many leave,
that out of tune do talk.

235 At th' Inns of Court, I lawyers leave
to take their case in hand.
And also leave I at each Inn
of Court, or Chancery,[4]
Of gentlemen, a youthful roote," rout, throng
240 full of activity,
For whom I store of books have left,
at each bookbinder's stall:
And part of all that London hath,
to furnish them withal.

2. Surgeons generally practiced "manual" arts of healing and operating in the early modern era and hence were often regarded as distinct from (and inferior to) physicians (see line 95).
3. The Hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem, for the mentally ill; cf. "Tom o' Bedlam's Song" (p. 124).
4. The court of the lord chancellor of England, in which a number of young men lived and trained as clerks; the Inns of Court housed and trained students in the Common Law.

245 And when they are with study cloyed," — overfed
to recreate their mind,
Of tennis courts, of dancing schools,
and Fence" they store shall find. — fencing
And every Sunday at the least,
250 I leave to make them sport,
In divers places players," that — actors
of wonders shall report.
Now, London, have I (for thy sake) within thee, and without,"
255 As comes into my memory, dispersed 'round about
Such needful things as they should have,
here left now unto thee;
When I am gone, with conscience,
260 let them dispersed be.
And though I nothing namèd have,
to bury me withal,
Consider that above the ground,
annoyance be I shall.
265 And let me have a shrouding sheet
to cover me from shame,
And in oblivion bury me,
and never more me name.
Ringings nor other ceremonies
270 use you not for cost,
Nor at my burial, make no feast,
your money were but lost.

This xx of October, I,
in ANNO° DOMINI,o — year I of our Lord
A thousand, v.° hundred seventy-three, — five 315 as almanacs descry," — show
Did write this will with mine own hand,
and it to London gave;
In witness of the standers-by,
whose names, if you will have,
320 paper, pen and standish? were, — writing stand
at that same present by," — nearby
With Time, who promised to reveal
so fast as she could buy
The same, lest of my nearer kin
325 for any thing should vary;"
So finally I make an end
no longer can I tarry.

5. A number of the places and institutions described, including the theaters, were outside the city proper, in suburbs called the "liberties."

6. I.e., lest anything should change for my close relatives, Time promised to reveal my bequests as fast as she could buy them.

[My Prime of Youth Is but a Frost of Cares][1]

My prime of youth is but a frost of cares,
My feast of joy is but a dish of pain,
My crop of corn is but a field of tares," weeds
And all my good is but vain hope of gain;
The day is past, and yet I saw no sun,
And now I live, and now my life is done.

My tale was heard and yet it was not told,
My fruit is fallen and yet my leaves are green,
My youth is spent and yet I am not old,
10 I saw the world and yet I was not seen;
My thread is cut and yet it is not spun.?
And now I live, and now my life is done.

I sought my death and found it in my womb,
I looked for life and saw it was a shade,
15 I trod the earth and knew it was my tomb,
And now I die, and now I was but made;
My glass? is full, and now my glass is run, hourglass
And now I live, and now my life is done.

A Vision upon the Fairy Queen[1]

Methought I saw the grave where Laura- lay,
Within that temple where the vestal flame"
Was wont" to burn; and, passing by that way, accustomed
To see that buried dust of living fame,
Whose tomb fair Love, and fairer Virtue kept:
All suddenly I saw the Fairy Queen;

1. This poem, first printed as "Tychborne's Lamentation," was preserved in more than thirty manuscripts written soon after Tichbcrne's execution on a charge of conspiring with other Catholics against Queen Elizabeth's life. Our text is from the Tanner MS. (in Oxford's Bodleian Library); the first owner of this manuscript noted that Tichborne had written the poem "with his own hande ... not three days before his execution."
2. An allusion to the Fates, three goddesses in classical mythology; they spun the thread that determined the length of a person's life, cutting it when he or she was destined to die.

1. This poem appeared in both the 1590 and the 1596 editions of Edmund Spenser's epic poem The Faerie Queene (see p. 165).
2. The woman to whom the Italian poet Petrarch (1304-1374) addressed his sonnet sequence; with a pun on "laurel," a symbol of poetic achievement.
3. The sacred fire, guarded by virgin priestesses, in the temple of Vesta, Roman goddess of the hearth; thus an allusion to Laura's chastity and purity.

At whose approach the soul of Petrarch wept,
And, from thenceforth, those Graces[4] were not seen:
For they this queen attended; in whose stead
10 Oblivion laid him down on Laura's hearse:° tomb
Hereat the hardest stones were seen to bleed,
And groans of buried ghosts the heavens did pierce:
Where Homer's spright[5] did tremble all for grief,
And cursed the access of that celestial thief!

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd[6]

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee and be thy love.

Time drives the flocks from field to fold
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel[7] becometh dumb;
The rest complains of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields[8]
10 To wayward winter reckoning yields;
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,° bitterness
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle,[9] and thy posies
15 Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten-
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,° buttons
All these in me no means can move
20 To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last and love still breed,
Had joys no date[1] nor age no need,
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.

4. I.e., Love and Virtue.
5. Ghost of the ancient Greek poet credited with composing the epic poems the Iliad and the Odyssey.
6. Written in reply to Christopher Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" (p. 256).
7. In Greek mythology, Philomela was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not speak. She wove the story in a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. Later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus, she sings a mournful song in the springtime.
8. I.e., carelessly cultivated fields; also, fields with luxuriant summer growth.
9. A long dress, often worn under an outer garment.
1. I.e., terminal date.

The Passionate Man's Pilgrimage

Give me my scallop-shell- of quiet,
My staff of faith to walk upon,
My scrip" of joy, immortal diet,
My bottle of salvation,
My gown of glory, hope's true gage,O — pledge
And thus I'll take my pilgrimage.

Blood must be my body's balmer," — embalmer
No other balm" will there be given,
Whilst my soul like a white palmer"
10 Travels to the land of heaven,
Over the silver mountains,
Where spring the nectar fountains;
And there I'll kiss
The bowl of bliss,
15 And drink my eternal fill
On every milken hill.
My soul will be a-dry" before, — dried out, thirsty
But after it will ne'er thirst more;"
And by the happy blissful way
20 More peaceful pilgrims I shall see
That have shook off their gowns of clay?
And go appareled fresh like me.
I'll bring them first
To slake" their thirst, — quench
25 And then to taste those nectar suckers," — confections
At the clear wells
Where sweetness dwells,
Drawn up by saints in crystal buckets.

And when our bottles and all we
30 Are filled with immortality,
Then the holy paths we'll travel,
Strewed with rubies thick as gravel,
Ceilings of diamonds, sapphire floors,
High walls of coral, and pearl bowers," — chambers
35 From thence to heaven's bribeless hall
Where no corrupted voices brawl,
No conscience molten into gold,
Nor forged accusers bought and sold,
No cause deferred, nor vain-spent journey,

2. A scallop shell or something resembling it was worn as the sign of a pilgrim.
3. Pilgrim's knapsack or bag.
4. Aromatic preparation for embalming the dead.
5. Person wearing a palm leaf as a sign that he or she had made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land.
6. Alludes to John 4.14: "But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst. . . ." In line 16, "milken hill" alludes to the Promised Land as a land flowing in milk and honey (joshua 5.6).
7. Earth, i.e., earthly bodies.

40 For there Christ is the king's attorney,
Who pleads for all, without degrees," respect to rank
And he hath angels," but no fees.
When the grand twelve million jury
Of our sins and sinful fury,
45 'Gainst our souls black verdicts give,
Christ pleads his death, and then we live.
Be thou my speaker, taintless pleader,
Unblotted lawyer, true proceeder;
Thou movest salvation even for alms," charitable deeds
50 Not with a bribed lawyer's palms.
And this is my eternal plea
To him that made heaven, earth, and sea,
Seeing my flesh must die so soon,
And want" a head to dine next noon, need, lack 55 Just at the stroke when my veins start and spread,
Set on my soul an everlasting head.
Then am I ready, like a palmer fit,"
To tread those blest paths which before I writ.

The Lie

Go, soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless errand;
Fear not to touch the best;
The truth shall be thy warrant." guarantee, proof
Go, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lie.[1]

Say to the court, it glows
And shines like rotten wood;
Say to the church, it shows
10 What's good, and doth no good.
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lie.

Tell potentates," they live rulers
Acting by others' action;
15 Not loved unless they give,
Not strong but by a faction.
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lie.

8. A punning reference to the gold coin of that name, ten shillings in value.
9. Outfitted (refers back to the first stanza); Ralegh is imagining his death by beheading, which occurred in 1618. When he wrote this poem, he was in prison, charged with treason.
1. To "give the lie" means to contradict, or to prove the falsity of something.

Tell men of high condition,
20 That manage the estate,"
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate.
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.

25 Tell them that brave it most,"
They beg for more by spending,
Who, in their greatest cost,
Seek nothing but commending.
And if they make reply,
30 Then give them all the lie.

Tell zeal it wants" devotion; lacks
Tell love it is but lust;
Tell time it is but motion;
Tell flesh it is but dust.
35 And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lie.

Tell age it daily wasteth;
Tell honor how it alters;
Tell beauty how she blasteth;" withers
40 Tell favor how it falters.
And as they shall reply,
Give everyone the lie.

Tell wit how much it wrangles
In tickleO points of niceness; delicate, unreliable
45 Tell wisdom she entangles
Herself in overwiseness.
And when they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie.

Tell physic? of her boldness; medicine
50 Tell skill it is pretension;
Tell charity of coldness;
Tell law it is contention.
And as they do reply,
So give them still the lie.

55 Tell fortune of her blindness;
Tell nature of decay;
Tell friendship of unkindness;
Tell justice of delay.
And if they will reply,
60 Then give them all the lie.

2. Condition of human beings with respect to worldly prosperity; also, an implied analogy between England and a nobleman's estate or land.

3. Le., show off the most; also, to dress extravagantly.

Tell arts they have no soundness,
But vary by esteeming;
Tell schools they want profoundness,
And stand too much on seeming.
65 If arts and schools reply,
Give arts and schools the lie.

Tell faith it's fled the city;
Tell how the country erreth;
Tell° manhood shakes off pity; say how
70 Tell virtue least preferreth."
And if they do reply,
Spare not to give the lie.

So when thou hast, as I
Commanded thee, done blabbing'<-; revealing secrets
75 Although to give the lie
Deserves no less than stabbing-
Stab at thee he that will,
No stab the soul can kill.

Nature, That Washed Her Hands in Milk

Nature, that washed her hands in milk,
And had forgot to dry them,
Instead of earth took snow and silk,
At love's request to try them,
If she a mistress could compose
To please love's fancy out of those.

Her eyes he would should be of light,
A violet breath, and lips of jelly;
Her hair not black, nor overbright,
10 And of the softest down her belly;
As for her inside he'd have it
Only of wantonness and wit.

At love's entreaty such a one
Nature made, but with her beauty
15 She hath framed a heart of stone;
So as love, by ill destiny,
Must die for her whom nature gave him,
Because her darling would not save him.

4. Le., tell virtue that it succeeds least (less than vice does).

But time (which nature doth despise,
20 And rudely gives her love the lie,
Makes hope a fool, and sorrow wise)
His hands do neither wash nor dry;
But being made of steel and rust,
Turns snow and silk and milk to dust.

25 The light, the belly, lips, and breath,
He dims, discolors, and destroys;
With those he feeds but fills not death,
Which sometimes" were the food of joys. formerly
Yea, time doth dull each lively wit,
30 And dries all wantonness with it.

Oh, cruel time! which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust;
Who in the dark and silent grave
35 When we have wandered all our ways
Shuts up the story of our days."

If Cynthia Be a Queen, a Princess, and Supreme"

If Cynthia be a queen, a princess, and supreme,
Keep these among the rest," or say it was a dream,
For those that like, expound, and those that loathe express
Meanings according as their minds are moved more or less;
For writing what thou art, or showing what thou were,
Adds to the one disdain, to the other but despair,
Thy mind of neither needs, in both seeing it exceeds.

5. Another version of this stanza, traditionally supposed to have been written by Ralegh on the night before his execution, was published in 1628. In it, the first three words are changed to "Even such is time," and the following couplet is added at the end: "And from which earth, and grave, and dust / The Lord shall raise me up, I trust." The poem as a whole existed only in manuscript until 1902.
6. This enigmatic poem probably was written at a time when Ralegh had fallen out of the quecn's favor. It appears in a manuscript before a fragment of the longer poem "The Ocean to Cynthia." The "thou" of the poem may be the queen, Ralegh, or a third party. Cynthia: also known as Diana, the virgin goddess of the moon, chastity, the hunt, and childbirth. The figure of Cynthia was often used for Queen Elizabeth I and was one she approved of. By referring to himself as the "Ocean," Ralegh suggests that the queen rules him as the moon rules the tides.
7. If Ralegh is addressing himself, "keep" may mean "don't send to her"; if the poet addresses the queen, he is telling her to keep his verses with the rest of the many poems of courtly love and praise she has received from him and other court poets.

[Fortune Hath Taken Thee Away, My Love]"

Fortune hath taken thee away, my love,
My life's soul and my soul's heaven above;
Fortune hath taken thee away, my princess;
My only light and my true fancy's mistress.

Fortune hath taken all away from me,
Fortune hath taken all by taking thee.
Dead to all joy, I only live to woe,
So fortune now becomes my mortal foe.

In vain you eyes, you eyes do waste your tears,
10 In vain you sighs do smoke forth my despairs,
In vain you search the earth and heaven above,
In vain you search, for fortune rules in love.

Thus now I leave my love in fortune's hands,
Thus now I leave my love in fortune's bands,
IS And only love the sorrows due to me;
Sorrow henceforth it shall my princess be.

I joy in this, that fortune conquers kings;
Fortune that rules on earth and earthly things
Hath taken my love in spite of Cupid's? might;
20 So blind a dame! did never Cupid right.

With wisdom's eyes had but blind Cupid seen,
Then had my love my love for ever been;
But love farewell; though fortune conquer thee,
No fortune base shall ever alter me.

Before 1589 1992

8. This poem appears to have been written to Queen Elizabeth I, who replied to it with her poem "Ah Silly Pug, Wert Thou So Sore Afraid" (p. 143). Both poems are included in a manuscript of the 1620s in the Wiltshire record office, and both were written before 1589; George Puttenham quotes from both poems in his Art of English Poesy, published in that year.

9. Cupid, the Roman god of erotic love, is often depicted as a blind and winged boy.

I. Fortune was often personified as a fickle woman and sometimes depicted as blind or blindfolded. "Fortune My Foe" was a popular tune.

EDMUND SPENSER*
1552-1599

FROM THE SHEPHEARDES CALENDER[1]

Aprill

"Because Spenser adopted many archaisms to lend an antique appearance to his poetry, the English poet Ben Jonson (1572-1673; see pp. 323-45) said that Spenser "writ no language." For example, he imitated the archaic form of the participle common in Chancer in which y represents a reduced form of the Old English prefix ge. Spenser was innovative as well: he coined many new words and played-often fancifully-with the native and foreign etymologies of English words. He thus participated in a project dear to the hearts of many educated Elizabethan writers-"enriching" the vernacular with borrowings from classical and modern languages and dialects to create a "kingdom of our own language," as Spenser called it in a letter to his friend the writer Gabriel Harvey (1550-1630).

Because Spenser's verbal wit depends in part on showing words' multiple meanings and various "roots," historical and imaginary, we have not modernized Spenser's texts except in minor ways. We regularize i's, j's, u's, and v's according to modern conventions, replace dipthongs with separate characters, and occasionally repunctuate lines when they seem particularly difficult for modern readers. We also print in roman type words italicized in the editions printed during Spenser's lifetime. (In general, we follow the first editions of his texts except in the case of The Faerie Queene, where we rely on the 1596 edition rather than the one of 1590.) Finally, to aid the reader in pronouncing and scanning Spenser's poetry, which often plays on correspondences and differences between the way words sound and the ways in which they appear on the page, we add some metrical accents.

1. Spenser's first independently published work, a series of twelve interlinked poems that draws on several literary genres including the classical eclogue, or short pastoral poem, the calendar-almanac, the romance, the beast fable, the satire, and the Petrarchan lyric (from the fourteenth-century Italian poet Petrarch). Spenser presents himself following a career path famously modeled by the ancient Roman poet Virgil: the young poet prepares for epic endeavor by writing pastoral poems. Each "aeglogue" (Spenser's deliberately old-fashioned English rendering) is named after a month and contains several parts. First comes a woodcut depicting the month's zodiacal sign and the poem's dramatic scenario. Then comes a brief prose "Argument," a synopsis of the poem's action. Following that are the verse text of the eclogue and then one or more verbal emblems, or "mottos," usually one for each of the poem's speakers. Finally, there are lengthy glosses on parts of the poem and on the emblems.

The glosses, and perhaps the "Arguments," are conspicuously attributed to someone designated only by the initials "E. K." This figure first appears as the author of the Calender's dedicatory epistle to Gabriel Harvey (see preceding note) and has been identified both as Harvey and as Spenser, who would be adopting a scholarly, even pedantic persona to promote his reputation as an important poet. E. Ko's glosses, which include explications of difficult or archaic words as well as learned, and sometimes critical, discussions of Spenser's poetic texts, are usually published in full with the eclogues. Here, we incorporate those of E. K's glosses that seem especially useful to the modern reader; they too retain original spellings.

Aegloga Quarta[2]

ARGUMENT

This Aeglogue is purposely intended to the honor and prayse of our most gracious sovereigne, Queene Elizabeth. The speakers herein be Hobbinoll and Thenott, two shepheardes: the which Hobbinoll being before mentioned, greatly to have loved Colin, is here set forth more largely, complayning him of that boyes great misadventure in Love, whereby his mynd was alienate and with drawen not onely from him, who moste loved him, but also from all former delightes and studies, aswell in pleasaunt pyping, as conning' ryming and singing, and other his laudable exercises. Whereby he taketh occasion, for proofe of his more excellencie and skill in poetrie, to recorde' a songe, which the sayd Colin sometime made in honor of her Majestie, whom abruptely he termeth Elysa.[5]

THENOT HOBBINOLL

Tell me good Hobbinoll, what garres thee greete?6
What? hath some Wolfe thy tender Lambes ytorne?
Or is thy Bagpype broke, that soundes so sweete?
Or art thou of thy loved lasse forlorne?? forsaken

Or bene thine eyes attempred to the yeare,?
Quenching the gasping furrowes thirst with rayne?
Like April shoure, so stremes the trickling teares
Adowne thy cheeke, to quenche thy thristye? payne. thirsty

HOBBINOLL

Nor thys, nor that, so muche doeth make me mourne,
10 But foro the ladde, whome long I lovd so deare, that
Nowe loves a lasse, that all his love doth scorne:
He plongd in payne, his tressed" locks dooth teare. curled

Shepheards delights he dooth them all forsweare,
Hys pleasaunt Pipe, whych made us meriment,
15 He wylfully hath broke, and doth forbeare
His wonted songs, wherein he all outwent."

2. I.e., Fourth Eclogue; "Aprill" thus alludes to Virgil's Fourth Eclogue, which joyously predicts the return of a "virgin" goddess and associates the mythical Golden Age ruled by the goddess Astraea with the era of Virgil's patron, Caesar Augustus. Drawing not only on Virgil's poem but also on medieval Christian texts that read it as foretelling Christ's birth through the "vessel" of the Virgin Mary, Spenser fashions his eclogue as a complex compliment to England's Queen Elizabeth I (1533-1604; see pp. 142-43).

The woodcut for "April!" shows the shepherd Colin Clout-Spenser's autobiographical persona -piping a song in honor of Elizabeth ("Elysa," the shepherd's queen). She is shown with her ladies of the court; the shepherds Thenot and Hobbinol are in the background, and the astrological sign for April, Taurus the bull, is at the top.

3. I.e., learning.

4. Remember.

5. I.e., he called Elizabeth "Elysa" because it's shorter. For Spenser's learned contemporaries, the name would also have recalled "Elissa," the ancient Carthaginian queen whom Virgil called "Dido" and depicted falling fatally in love with the Trojan hero Aeneas. In many non-Virgilian versions of this queen's story, Dido is named "Elissa" and remains a chaste widow; in that guise, she was often honorifically linked to England's queen Elizabeth.

6. "Causeth thee [to] weepe and complain" [E. K.].

7. "Agreeable to the season of the yeare, that is April!, which moneth is most bent to shoures and seasonable rayne: to quench ... the drought" (E. K.].

8. His usual songs, which surpassed those of all others.

THENOT

What is he for a Ladde," you so lament?
Ys love such pinching payne to them, that prove?" experience it
And hath he skill to make! so excellent,
20 Yet hath so little skill to brydle love?

HOBBINOLL

Colin thou kenst,? the Southerne shepheardes boye:? knowest
Him Love hath wounded with a deadly darte.
Whilome on him was all my care and joye,
Forcing" with gyfts to winne his wanton heart. striving

25 But now from me hys madding? mynd is starte,° foolish / broken away
And woes" the Widdowes daughter of the glenne:" woos
So nowe fayre Rosalind hath bredde? hys smart,° caused / hurt
So now his frend is chaunged for a frenne." stranger

THENOT

But if hys ditties bene so trimly dight," adorned
30 I pray thee Hobbinoll, recorde" some one: sing
The whiles our flockes doe graze about in sight,
And we close shrowded in thys shade alone.

HOBBINOL

Contented I: then will I singe his laye" song
Of fayre Elisa, Queene of shepheardes all:"
35 Which once he made, as by a spring he laye,
And tuned it unto the Waters fall.

Ye dayntye Nymphs, that in this blessed Brooke
doe bathe your brest,
For sake your watry bowres, and hether looke,
40 at my request:
And eke you Virgins, that on Parnasse dwell,
Whence floweth Helicon the learned well,"
Helpe me to blaze?
Her worthy praise,
45 Which in her sexe doth all excell.

9. "What maner of Ladde is he?" [E.K].
1. "To rime and versifye" [E. K]. The English word poet comes from the Greek word poiein, to make.
2. "Seemeth hereby that Colin perteyneth to some Southern noble man" [E. K]. Spenser may be referring to the earl of Leicester, a courtier with whom Queen Elizabeth was romantically linked; more likely, the reference is to Bishop John Young, for whom Spenser served as secretary while composing the Calender.
3. "He calleth Rosalind the Widowes daughter of the glenne, that is, of a country hamlet or borough [the word may also mean "a wooded mountain valley"]' which I thinke is rather sayde to concele the person, then simply spoken. For it is well knowen ... that shee is a Gentle woman of no meane house" [E. K].
4. "In all this songe is not to be respected, what the worthinesse of her Majestie deserveth, nor what to the highnes of a Prince is agreeable, but what is moste comely for the meanesse of a shepheards witte, or to conceive, or to utter" [E. K]
5. "The nine Muses ... whose abode the Poets faine to be on Parnassus, a hill in Greece" [E. K]. In Greek mythology, the Muses were nine sister goddesses who presided over song, poetry, and the arts and sciences.
6. A blazon was a poem cataloging and praising a lady's various physical features.

Of fayre Elisa be your silver song,
    that blessed wight:" person
The flowre of Virgins, may shee florish long,
    In princely plight.° condition
50 For shee is Syrinx daughter without spotte,
Which Pan the shepheards God of her begot:[7]
    So sprong her grace
    Of heavenly race,
No mortall blemishe may her blotte.

55 See, where she sits upon the grassie greene,
    (O seernely" sight) pleasing
Yclad in Scarlot like a mayden Queene,
    And Ermines white.
Upon her head a Crernosin" coronet, crimson
60 With Damaske roses and Daffadillies set:
    Bayleaves betweene,
    And Primroses greene
Embellish" the sweete Violet.

Tell me, have ye seene her angelick face,
65   Like Phoebe fayre?"
Her heavenly haveour," her princely grace hearing
    can you well compare?
The Redde rose medled with the White yfere,[1]
In either cheeke depeincten° lively chere. depict
70   Her modest eye,
    Her Majestie,
Where have you seene the like, but there?

I sawe Phoebus thrust out his golden hedde,
    upon her to gaze:
75 But when he sawe, how broade her beames did spredde," it did him amaze.
He blusht to see another Sunne belowe,
Ne durst againe his fyrye" face out showe: fiery
    Let him, if he dare,
80   His brightnesse compare
With hers, to have the overthrowe."

Shewe thy selfe Cynthia" with thy silver rayes,
    and be not abasht:

7. In Greek mythology, "Syrinx is the name of a Nymphe of Arcadie, whom when Pan being in love pursued.... By Pan is here meant the most famous and victorious King, her highnesse Father, late of worthy memorye K Henry the eyght" [E. K]. "Without spotte" qualifies "Syrinx," not "daughter," thus covertly repudiating the scandals surrounding Anne Boleyn (1507?-1536), second wife of King Henry VIII (1491-1547) and mother of Elizabeth.

8. "Bcautifve and set out" [E. K], i.e., by contrast of colors.

9. In Greek mythology, "the Moone, whom the Poets faine to be sister unto Phoebus, that is the Sunne" [E. K].

1. "Together" [E. K]. Medled: mingled. Henry and Elizabeth were descended from the houses of Lancaster and York (symbolized, respectively, by the red rose and the white rose), whose conflicting claims to the throne caused the Wars of the Roses (1453-97).

2. The lady outshining the sun is a Petrarchan motif.

3. Le., have the victory.

4. "The Moone" [E. K]. A common epithet for Queen Elizabeth.

When shee the beames of her beauty displayes,
85 0 how art thou dasht?
But I will not match her with Latonaes seede,
Such follic great sorow to Niobe did brcede."
Now she is a stone,

5. Niobe boasted that her seven sons and seven daughters made her superior to Latona, a goddess, whose two children, Apollo and Diana, then slew Niobe's entire progeny, after which her sorrow transformed her to stone. Cf. Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.148-312.
6. Belle honne: "homely spoken for a fayre mayde or Bonilasse" [E. K].
7. "Overlaboured and sunneburnt" [E. K].
8. "Be the signe of honor and victory ... and eke [also] of famous Poets" [E. K]; i.e., the garland or crown of laurel, given as a prize in ancient Greece.
9. "Be three sisters, the daughters of Jupiter, whose names are Aglaia, Thalia, Euphrosyne ... whom the Poetes feyned to be Goddesses of al bountie and comelines" [E. K].
1. Called. E. K records the ancient view that every spring and fountain had a goddess, or water nymph, as its sovereign.
2. According to E. K, the nymph of flowers and green herbs; her name signifies greenness.

Olives bene for peace,

Sicker" I hold him, for a great fon," — surely / fool
That loves the thing, he cannot purchase.
160 But let us homeward: for night draweth on,
And twincling starres the daylight hence chase.

3. Of prime importance. Elizabeth was celebrated in the 1570s for the continuous peace her reign had brought.
4. A band of lace or silk, sold during the fair of St. Audrey.
5. The following lines list flowers common in pastoral poetry: "Coronations" are carnations; "Sops in wine," clove pinks; "Daffadowndillies," daffodils; "Pawnce," pansies; "Chevisaunce," maybe a species of wallflower; "flowre Delice," fleur de lis, a kind of iris.
6. "Is the conclusion. For having so decked her prayses and comparisons, he returneth all the thanck of hys laboure to the excellencie of her Majestic" [E. K].
7. Among you all.
8. Le., for they that are so foolishly inclined are heedless of everything.

FROM THE FAERIE QUEENE

The First Booke

Contayning
The Legende of the Knight of the Red Crosse, or
Of Holinesse'

I

Lo I the man, whose Muse? whilome" did maske, formerly
As time her taught, in lowly Shepheards weeds,"
Am now enforst a far unfitter taske,
For trumpets sterne to chaunge mine Oaten reeds,"
And sing of Knights and Ladies gentle" deeds; noble
Whose prayses having slept in silence long,
Me, all too meane, the sacred Muse arceds"
To blazon" broad emongst her learned throng:
Fierce warres and faithfullloves shall moralize my song.

9. These emblems are the words Aeneas speaks to his mother, Venus, disguised as a huntress: "What name shall I know you by, maiden? Surely a goddess" (Aeneid 1.327-28).

I. In a letter to the English poet Sir Waiter Ralegh (ea, 1552-1618; see pp. 151-58) published with the first edition, Spenser declares that his principal intention in writing the poem is "to fashion a gentleman or noble person in virtuous and gentle discipline." Thus he sets forth a plan to write twelve books, each one having a hero distinguished for one of the private virtues; twelve books on the public virtues will follow. The six books that Spenser completed (the first three published in 1590, the remaining three published in 1596) present the virtues of Holiness, Temperance, Chastity, Friendship, Justice, and Courtesy. In addition, two cantos on Mutability (the principle of constant change in nature) were published in 1609 after Spenser's death, although no known authority exists for their division and numbering, or for the running title, "The Seventh Booke."

The title of the poem contains a dual reference to its character, Gloriana, the Fairy Queen, who bids the poem's heroes to set out on particular adventures, and to Queen Elizabeth I (1533-1603; see pp. 142-43), England's ruler from 1558 until 1603, or for almost all of Spenser's life; as an "Allegory, or darke conceit" (again, a claim that Spenser makes in the letter to Ralegh), the poem mirrors Elizabeth not only in the figure of Gloriana but also in several other characters. In addition to various modes of allegory, the poem draws on many Renaissance genres, some of the most important being the courtesy book, the romance, and the epic.

2. One of nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts.

3. Garments; i.e., the poet who before wrote humble pastoral poetry. Lines 1-4 imitate verses prefixed to Renaissance editions of the ancient Roman poet Virgil's epic poem the Aeneid and signal Spenser's imitation of Virgil, who began his poetic career with pastoral poetry and moved on to the epic, a move that Spenser copied (with the 1579 publication of The Shepheardes Calender, followed by the 1590 publication of The Faerie Queene). Spenser's organization of each book into twelve cantos also imitates the twelve books of Virgil's Aeneid.

4. Or pipes, a symbol of pastoral poetry. Trumpets: a symbol of epic poetry.

5. Commands and instructs. Sacred Muse: perhaps Clio, the Muse of history, often said to be the eldest of the nine Muses; or perhaps Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry; the "holy Virgin chiefe of nine" (line 10) also seems to refer to one of these two Muses.

6. To proclaim (from blaze, to announce by blowing a trumpet).

10 Helpe then, 0 holy Virgin chiefe of nine,
Thy weaker" Novice to performe thy will, too weak
Lay forth out of thine everlasting scryne" coffer or shrine
The antique rolles, which there lye hidden still,
Of Faerie knights and fairest Tanaquill,?
15 Whom that most noble Briton Princes so long
Sought through the world, and suffered so much ill,
That I must rue his undeserved wrong:
O helpe thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong.

And thou most dreaded impe? of highest Jove,
20 Faire Venus sonne, that with thy cruell dart
At that good knight so cunningly didst rove," shoot
That glorious fire it kindled in his hart," heart
Lay now thy deadly Heben" bow apart, ebony
And with thy mother milde come to mine ayde:
25 Come both, and with you bring triumphant Mart," Mars
In loves and gentle jollities arrayd,
After his murdrous spoiles and bloudy rage allayd.

And with them eke," 0 Goddesse heavenly bright, also
Mirrour of grace and Majestie divine,
30 Great Lady of the greatest Isle, whose light
Like Phoebus larnpe.' throughout the world doth shine,
Shed thy faire beames into my feeble eyne,
And raise my thoughts too humble and too vile,
To thinke of that true glorious type of thine,
35 The argument" of mine afflicted stile:" subject
The which to heare, vouchsafe, 0 dearest dred' a-while.

Canto 1

The Patron ₀ of true Holinesse, sponsor or pattern
Foule Errour doth defeate:
Hypocrisie him to entrappe,
Doth to his home entreate.

A Gentle Knight was pricking? on the plaine, riding briskly
Ycladd in mightie armes and silver shielde,
Wherein old dints of deepe wounds did remaine,

7. The wife of Tarquin, the first Etruscan king of Rome; noted for her chastity; i.e., a reference to Gloriana.
8. I.e., Arthur, first named in canto 9.
9. Offspring, i.e., Cupid, Roman god of love, whose arrows ("cruell dart," line 21) caused their victims to fall in love; he was the son of Venus, goddess of love and beauty. Mars, god of war and lover of Venus, was often said to be Cupid's father, but Spenser stresses the line of descent from jove, Venus's father and ruler of the gods.
1. The sun; Phoebus Apollo was the Roman god of the sun; Spenser is comparing Apollo to Queen Elizabeth, the "Coddesse" of line 28.
2. Humble pen; also, "stile" may refer to the poem itself.
3. Object of awe and fear. Vouchsafe: bestow (i.e., confer your ear upon my poem).

The cruell markes of many a bloudy fielde;
Yet armes till that time did he never wield:
His angry steede did chide his foming bitt,
As much disdayning to the curbe to yield:
Full jolly' knight he seemd, and faire did sitt,
As one for knightly giusts? and fierce encounters fitt.? jousts / suited

IQ But on his brest a bloudie Crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore,
And dead as living ever him ador'd:
Upon his shield the like was also scor'd,
15 For soveraine hope, which in his helpe he had:
Right faithfull true" he was in deede and word,
But of his cheere" did seeme too solemne sad;" face / grave
Yet nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad.? dreaded

Upon a great adventure he was bond,° going; bound by a vow
20 That greatest Gloriana to him gave,
That greatest Glorious Queene of Faerie lond,
To winne him worship," and her grace to have, honor
Which of all earthly things he most did crave;
And ever as he rode, his hart" did earne" heart / yearn
25 To prove his puissance" in battell brave strength
Upon his foe, and his new force to learne;
Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

A lovely Ladie rode him faire beside,
Upon a lowly Asse more white then° snow, than 30 Yet she much whiter, but the same did hide
Under a vele, that wimpled" was full low, lying in folds
And over all a blacke stole" she did throw, shawl
As one that inly? mourned: so was she sad, inwardly
And heavie sat upon her palfrey slow:
35 Seemed in heart some hidden care she had,
And by her in a line a milke white lambe she lad." led

So pure an innocent, as that same lambe,
She was in life and every vertuous" lore," moral/doctrine
And by descent from Royalllynage came
40 Of ancient Kings and Queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from East to Westerne shore,
And all the world in their subjection held;
Till that infernall feend with foule uprore" revolt

4. The range of meanings includes gallant, handsome, amorous, brave, cheerful.
5. Echoes Revelation 19.11: "And 1 saw heaven opened; and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True. . . ."

Forwasted" all their land, and them expeld: laid waste
45 Whom to avenge, she had this Knight from far cornpeld." summoned

Behind her farre away a Dwarfe did lag,
That lasie seemd in being ever last,
Or wearied with bearing of her bag
Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past,
50 The day with cloudes was suddeine overcast,
And angry Jove an hideous storme of raine
Did poure into his Lernans" lap so fast,
That every wight" to shrowd? it did constrain, creature / take cover
And this faire couple eke? to shroud themselves were also fain.° obliged

55 Enforst to seeke some covert nigh at hand,
A shadie grove not far away they spide,
That promist ayde the tempest to withstand:
Whose loftie trees yclad with sommers pride,
Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide,
60 Not perceable? with power of any starre: penetrable
And all within were pathes and alleies wide,
With footing worne, and leading inward farre:
Faire harbour that them seemes; so in they entred arre.

And foorth they passe, with pleasure forward led,
65 Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
Which therein shrouded from the tempest dred,° fearful
Seemd in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
Much can° they prayse the trees so straight and hy, did
The sayling Pine," the Cedar proud and tall,
70 The vine-prop Elme, the Poplar never dry,
The builder Oake, sole king of forrests all,
The Aspine good for staves, the Cypresse funerall.

The Laurell, meed" of mightie Conquerours reward
And Poets sage, the Firre that weepeth still,
75 The Willow worne of forlorne Paramours,
The Eugh obedient to the benders will,
The Birch for shaftes, the Sallow for the mill,

6. His lover, i.e., the earth.
7. Spenser's catalog of trees imitates similar catalogs in Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls, Virgil's Aeneul, and Ovid's Metamorphoses. Ships or masts were made of "Sayling" pine; the "Poplar" grew by water; the "Oake" was used in building; the "Cypresse" was used to decorate graves. Garlands made from the "Laurel]" were a sign of military or poetic achievement; the "Firre" continually exudes resin; the "Eugh" (yew) was traditionally used for bows; the "Sallow" (willow) was associated with stagnant water like that found at a millpond; the "Mirrhe" (myrrh), used as incense because of its sweet smell, was one of the gifts presented by the wise men to the infant Christ; the "Beech" was used to make the axle of the war chariot, according to Homer's Iliad; the "Platane" is perhaps listed as a classical contrast (as Socrates and his friends sat by a plane tree, in Plato's Phaedrus 230b) to the olive tree, with its Christian associations; the "Holme" (holly) was suitable for carving.

The Mirrhe sweete bleeding in the bitter wound,
The warlike Beech, the Ash for nothing ill,
80 The fruitful Olive, and the Platane round,
The carver Holme, the Maple seeldom inward sound.

10

Led with delight, they thus beguile" the way, wile away; charm
Untill the blustring storme is overblowne;
When weening? to returne, whence they did stray, intending
85 They cannot finde that path, which first was showne,
But wander too and fro in wayes unknowne,
Furthest from end then, when they neerest weene."
That makes them doubt, their wits be not their owne:
So many pathes, so many turnings seene,
90 That which of them to take, in diverse" doubt they been. distracting

11

At last resolving forward still to fare,
Till that some end they finde or in or out,
That path they take, that beaten seemd most bare,
And like to lead the labyrinth about;" out of 95 Which when by tract° they hunted had throughout, track
At length it brought them to a hollow cave,
Amid the thickest woods. The Champion stout" brave Eltsoones" dismounted from his courser brave, soon after
And to the Dwarfe a while his needlesse spere? he gave.

12

100 Be well aware, quoth then that Ladie milde,
Least suddaine mischiefe" ye too rash provoke: misfortune
The danger hid, the place unknowne and wilde,
Breedes dreadfull doubts: Oft fire is without smoke,
And perill without show: therefore your stroke
105 Sir knight with-hold, till further triall made.
Ah Ladie (said he) shame were to revoke" draw back
The forward footing for an hidden shade:
Vertue gives her selfe light, through darkenesse for to wade.

13

Yea but (quoth she) the perill of this place
110 I better wot" then° you, though now too late know / than
To wish you backe returne with foule disgrace,
Yet wisedome warnes, whilest foot is in the gate,
To stay the steppe, ere forced to retrate." retreat
This is the wandring wood, this Errours den,
115 A monster vile, whom God and man does hate:
Therefore I read" beware. Fly fly (quoth then advise
The fearefull Dwarfe:) this is no place for living men.

8. I.e., think to be nearest to it.
9. "Needlesse" because the spear is generally used only on horseback.

14

But full of fire and greedy hardiment," boldness
The youthfull knight could not for ought" be staide, anything
120 But forth unto the darksome hole he went,
And looked in: his glistringO armor made shining
A litle glooming light, much like a shade,
By which he saw the ugly monster plaine,
Halfe like a serpent horribly displaide,
125 But th' other halfe did womans shape retaine,
Most lothsom, filthie, foule, and full of vile disdaine.? loathsomeness

15

And as she lay upon the durtie ground,
Her huge long taile her den all overspred,
Yet was in knots and many boughtes" upwound, coils
130 Pointed with mortall sting. Of her there bred
A thousand yong ones, which she dayly fed,
Sucking upon her poisonous dugs, eachone
Of sundry shapes, yet all ill favored:
Soone as that uncouth" light upon them shone, unfamiliar
135 Into her mouth they crept, and suddain all were gone.

16

Their dam upstart, out of her den effraide,° alarmed
And rushed forth, hurling her hideous taile
About her cursed head, whose folds displaid" extended
Were stretcht now forth at length without entraile." winding
140 She lookt about, and seeing one in mayle
Armèd to point;' sought backe to turne againe;
For light she hated as the deadly bale," injury
Ay° wont" in desert darknesse to remaine, ever / accustomed
Where plaine none might her see, nor she see any plaine.

17

145 Which when the valiant Elfe[2] perceiv'd, he lept
As Lyon fierce upon the flying pray,
And with his trenchand" blade her boldly kept sharp
From turning backe, and forced her to stay:
Therewith enrag'd she loudly gan to bray,
150 And turning fierce, her speckled taile advaunst,
Threatning her angry sting, him to dismay:" defeat
Who nough" aghast, his mightie hand enhaunst:? now / raised up
The stroke down from her head unto her shoulder glaunst.

18

Much daunted with that dint," her sence was dazd, blow
155 Yet kindling rage, her selfe she gathered" round, coiled
And all attonce her beastly body raizd
With doubled forces high above the ground:

1. Fully armed.
2. Literally, fairy; but Spenser often uses the term to designate a knight from his imagined Faerie Land rather than from Britain-as, here, Redcrosse Knight, who is later described as "a Faeries sonne" (but who is ultimately revealed to be a changeling "of Saxon kings ... in Britaine land" [1.lO.64-65]).

Tho" wrapping up her wrethed sterne arownd, then
Lept fierce upon his shield, and her huge traine? tail
160 All suddenly about his body wound,
That hand or foot to stirre he strove in vaine:
God helpe the man so wrapt in Errours endlesse traine.

19

His Lady sad to see his sore constraint," fettered state
Cride out, Now now Sir knight, shew what ye bee,
165 Add faith unto your force, and be not faint:
Strangle her, else she sure will strangle thee.
That when he heard, in great perplexitie,
His gall" did grate for griefeO and high disdaine, anger
And knitting all his force got one hand free,
170 Wherewith he grypt her gorgeO with so great paine, throat
That soone to loose her wicked bands did her constraine.

20

Therewith she spewd out of her filthy maw
A floud of poyson horrible and blacke,
Full of great lumpes of flesh and gobbets raw,"
175 Which stunck so vildly, that it forst him slacke
His grasping hold, and from her turne him backe:
Her vomit full of bookes and papers was,"
With loathly frogs and toades, which eyes did lacke,
And creeping sought way in the weedy gras:
180 Her filthy parbreake? all the place defiled has. vomit

21

As when old father Nilus> gins to swell
With timely? pride above the Aegyptian vale, seasonal
His fattie? waves do fertile slime outwell, rich
And overflow each plaine and lowly dale:
185 But when his later spring gins to avale," subside
Huge heapes of mudd he leaves, wherein there breed
Ten thousand kindes of creatures, partly male
And partly female of his fruitfull seed;
Such ugly monstrous shapes elswhere may no man reed." see

22

190 The same so sore annoyed has the knight,
That welnigh choked with the deadly stinke,
His forces faile, ne can no longer fight.
Whose corage when the feend perceived to shrinke,
She poured forth out of her hellish sinke?
195 Her fruitfull cursed spawne of serpents small,
Deformed monsters, fowle, and blacke as inke,

3. Gall bladder, considered the seat of anger.
4. Chunks of undigested food.
5. Among other meanings, the "bookes and papers" may include a reference to Catholic books and pamphlets that attacked the Protestant Queen Elizabeth, in which case Error may be, among other things, an allegorical representation of the Catholic Church.
6. The Nile River, which runs from East Africa to the Mediterranean Sea in Egypt, was commonly said to breed strange monsters.
7. I.e., her mouth.

Which swarming all about his legs did crall,
And him encombred sore, but could not hurt at all.

23

As gentle Shepheard in sweete even-tide,
200 When ruddy Phoebus gins to welke" in west, sink
High on an hill, his flocke to vewen wide,
Markes? which do byte their hasty supper best; observes
A cloud of combrous" gnattes do him molest, encumbering
All striving to infixe their feeble stings,
205 That from their noyance he no where can rest,
But with his clownish? hands their tender wings rustic
He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their murmurings.

24

Thus ill bestedd,? and fearfull more of shame, situated
Then of the certaine perill he stood in,
210 Halfe furious unto his foe he came,
Resolv'd in minde all suddenly to win,
Or soone to lose, before he once would lin;? cease
And strooke at her with more then manly force,
That from her body full of filthie sin
215 He raft? her hatefull head without remorse; struck off
A streame of cole black bloud forth gushed from her corse." corpse

25

Her scattred brood, soone as their Parent deare
They saw so rudely? falling to the ground, violently
Croning full deadly, all with troublous feare,
220 Cathred themselves about her body round,
Weening" their wonted entrance to have found thinking
At her wide mouth: but being there withstood
They flocked all about her bleeding wound,
And sucked up their dying mothers blood,
225 Making her death their life, and eke" her hurt their good. also

26

That detestable sight him much amazde,
To see th' unkindly? Impes? of heaven accurst, unnatural/offspring
Devoure their dam; on whom while so he gazd,
Having all satisfide their bloudy thurst,
230 Their bellies swolne he saw with fulnesse burst,
And bowels gushing forth: well worthy end
Of such as drunke her life, the which them nurst;
Now needeth him no lenger labour spend,
His foes have slaine themselves, with whom he should contend.

27

235 His Ladie seeing all, that chaunst, from farre
Approcht in hast to greetO his victorie, congratulate
And said, Faire knight, borne under happy" starre, auspicious

Who see your vanquisht foes before you lye:
Well worthy be you of that Armorie,? — armor
240 Wherein ye have great glory wonne this day,
And proov'd your strength on a strong enimie,
Your first adventure: many such I pray,
And henceforth ever wish, that like succeed it may.

28

Then mounted he upon his Steede againe,
245 And with the Lady backward sought to wend;" — go
That path he kept, which beaten was most plaine,
Ne ever would to any by-way bend,
But still did follow one unto the end,
The which at last out of the wood them brought.
250 So forward on his way (with God to" frend)? — as a/friend
He passed forth, and new adventure sought;
Long way he travelled, before he heard of ought.

29

At length they chaunst to meet upon the way
An aged Sire, in long blacke weedes? yclad," — garments / dressed
255 His feete all bare, his beard all hoarie? gray, — ancient
And by his belt his booke he hanging had;
Sober he seemde, and very sagely sad,° — pensive
And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,
Simple in shew, and voyde of malice bad,
260 And all the way he prayed, as he went,
And often knockt his brest, as one that did repent.

3°

He faire the knight saluted, louting" low, — bowing
Who faire him quited," as that courteous was: — answered
And after askèd him, if he did know
265 Of straunge adventures, which abroad did pas.
Ah my deare Sonne (quoth he) how should, alas,
Silly" old man, that lives in hidden cell, — simple
Bidding his bcades" all day for his trespas,
Tydings of warre and worldly trouble tell?
270 With holy father sits not with such things to mell.° — meddle

31

But if of daunger which hereby doth dwell,
And homebred evill ye desire to heare,
Of a straunge man I can you tidings tell,
That wasteth all this countrey farre and neare.
275 Of such (said he) I chiefly do inquere,
And shall you well reward to shew the place,
In which that wicked wight his dayes doth weare:? — spend
For to all knighthood it is foule disgrace,
That such a cursed creature lives so long a space.

8. Saying his prayers, i.e., counting rosary beads.

32

280 Far hence (quoth he) in wastfull? wildernesse — desolate
His dwelling is, by which no living wight
May ever passe, but thorough great distresse.
Now (sayd the Lady) draweth toward night,
And well I wote," that of your later" fight — know / recent 285 Ye all forwearied be: for what so strong,
But wanting rest will also want of might?
The Sunne that measures heaven all day long,
At night doth baite" his steedes the Ocean waves emong. — feed

33

Then with the Sunne take Sir, your timely rest,
290 And with new day new worke at once begin:
Untroubled night they say gives counsell best.
Right well Sir knight ye have advised bin,
(Quoth then that aged man.] the way to win
Is wisely to advise:" now day is spent; — take thought
295 Therefore with me ye may take up your In? — lodging
For this same night. The knight was well content:
So with that godly father to his home they went.

34

A little lowly Hermitage it was,
Downe in a dale, hard by a forests side,
300 Far from resort of people, that did pas
In travell to and froe: a little wyde" — apart
There was an holy Chappell edifyde,° — built
Wherein the Hermite dewly wont? to say — was accustomed
His holy things? each morne and eventyde: — prayers
305 Thereby a Christall streame did gently play,
Which from a sacred fountaine welled forth alway.

35

Arrived there, the little house they fill,
Ne looke for entertainement, where none was:
Rest is their feast, and all things at their will;
310 The noblest mind the best contentment has.
With faire discourse the evening so they pas:
For that old man of pleasing wordes had store,
And well could fileD his tongue as smooth as glas; — polish
He told of Saintes and Popes, and evermore
315 He strowd an Ave-Mary? after and before.

36

The drouping Night thus creepeth on them fast,
And the sad humour! loading their eye liddes,
As messenger of Morpheus- on them cast
Sweet slombring deaw, the which to sleepe them biddes.

9. Hail Mary (Latin); a Catholic prayer.
1. Heavy moisture, the "deaw" (line 319) of sleep.
2. Greek god of sleep and of dreams.

320 Unto their lodgings then his guestes he riddes:? dispatches
Where when all drownd in deadly? sleepe he findes, deathlike
He to his study goes, and there amiddes
His Magick bookes and artes of sundry kindes,
He seekes out mighty charmes, to trouble sleepy mindes.

37

325 Then choosing out few wordes most horrible,
(Let none them read) thereof did verses frame,
With which and other spelles like terrible,
He bade awake blacke PIu toes griesly Dame,"
And cursed heaven, and spake reprochfull shame
330 Of highest God, the Lord of life and light;
A bold bad man, that dared to call by name
Great Gorgon," Prince of darknesse and dead night,
At which Cocytus quakes, and Styx is put to flight.

38

And forth he cald out of deepe darknesse dred
335 Legions of Sprights, the which like little Hycs"
Fluttring about his ever damned hed,
A-waite whereto their service he applyes,
To aide his friends, or fray" his enimies: frighten
Of those he chose out two, the falsest twoo,
340 And fittest for to forge true-seeming lyes;
The one of them he gave a message too,
The other by him selfe staide other worke to doo.

39

He making speedy way through spersed" ayre, dispersed
And through the world of waters wide and deepe,
345 To Morpheus house doth hastily repaire.
Amid the bowels of the earth full steepe,
And low, where dawning day doth never peepe,
His dwelling is; there Tethys" his wet bed
Doth ever wash, and Cynthia still[7] doth steepe
350 In silver deaw his ever-drouping hed,
Whiles sad" Night over him her mantle black doth spred. sober

4°

Whose double gates he findeth locked fast,
The one faire fram'd of burnisht Yvory,
The other all with silver overcast;
355 And wakefull dogges before them farre do lye,
Watching to banish Care their enimy,
Who oft is wont? to trouble gentle Sleepe. accustomed
By them the Sprite doth passe in quietly,

3. Persephone: Greek goddess of the underworld, wife of Pluto, and patron of witches.
4. Demogorgon, whose power is so great that the mention of his name causes hell's rivers (Cocytus and Styx) to quake.
5. The simile connects him to Beelzebub, lord of the flies.
6. Roman goddess of the sea; wife of Neptune.
7. Continually. Cynthia: Roman goddess of the moon.

And unto Morpheus comes, whom drowned deepe
360 In drowsie fit he findes: of nothing he takes keepe." notice

41

And more, to lulle him in his slumber soft,
A trickling streame from high rocke tumbling downe
And ever-drizling raine upon the loft,
Mixt with a murmuring winde, much like the sowne" sound
365 Of swarming Bees, did cast him in a swowne:? faint
No other noyse, nor peoples troublous cryes,
As still? are wont t'annoy the walled towne, always
Might there be heard: but carelesse? Quiet lyes, free from care
Wrapt in eternall silence farre from enemyes.

42

370 The messenger approching to him spake,
But his waste wordes returnd to him in vaine: wasted
So sound he slept, that nought mought? him awake. might
Then rudely he him thrust, and pusht with paine," effort
Whereat he gan to stretch: but he againe
375 Shooke him so hard, that forced him to speake.
As one then in a dreame, whose dryer braine"
Is tost with troubled sights and fancies" weake, fantasies
He mumbled soft, but would not all" his silence breake. altogether

43

The Sprite then gan more boldly him to wake,
380 And threatned unto him the dreaded name
Of Hecate:? whereat he gan to quake,
And lifting up his lumpish head, with blame
Halfe angry askèd him, for what he came.
Hither (quoth he) me Archimago' sent,
385 He that the stubborne Sprites can wisely tame,
He bids thee to him send for his intent
A fit false dreame, that can delude the sleepers sent." senses

44

The God obayde, and calling forth straight way
A diverse" dreame out of his prison darke, distracting
390 Delivered it to him, and downe did lay
His heavie head, devoide of careful]" carke," anxious / concerns
Whose sences all were straight benumbd and starke.° paralyzed
He backe returning by the Yvorie dorc,?
Remounted up as light as chearefull Larke,
395 And on his litle winges the dreame he bore
In hast unto his Lord, where he him left afore.

8. Renaissance ideas of physiology held that being too "dry," or lacking a proper balance of bodily moisture, resulted in troubled dreams.

9. A Greek goddess of Hades; associated with witches, magic, and dreams.

1. Archmagician or chief deceiver, from the Latin archi (first) + magus (magician); also, the arch-imago, or chief image-maker.

2. According to Homer's Odyssey and Virgil's Aeneid, false dreams came through the ivory door.

45

Who all this while with charmes and hidden artes,
Had made a Lady of that other Spright,
And fram'd of liquid ayre her tender partes
400 So lively,° and so like in all mens sight, lifelike
That weaker? sence it could have ravisht quight: too weak
The maker selfe for all his wondrous witt,
Was nigh beguiled with so goodly sight:
Her all in white he clad, and over it
405 Cast a blacke stole, most like to seeme for Una" fit.

46

Now when that ydle" dreame was to him brought, unsubstantial
Unto that Elfin knight he bad him fly,
Where he slept soundly void of evill thought,
And with false shewes abuse his fantasy,° imagination
410 In sort? as? he him schooled privily: the way / that
And that new creature borne without her dew,"
Full of the makers guile, with usage sly
He taught to imitate that Lady trew,
Whose semblance she did carrie under feigned hew." form

47

415 Thus well instructed, to their worke they hast
And comming where the knight in slomber lay
The one upon his hardy head him plast,° placed
And made him dreame of loves and lustfull play,
That nigh his manly hart? did melt away, heart
420 Bathed in wanton blis and wicked joy:
Then seemed him his Lady by him lay,
And to him playnd,? how that false winged boy," complained
Her chast hart had subdewd, to learne Dame pleasures toy."

48

And she her selfe of beautie soveraigne Queene
425 Faire Venus seemde unto his bed to bring
Her, whom he waking evermore did weene? think
To be the chastest flowre, that aye did spring ever
On earthly braunch, the daughter of a king,
Nowa loose Leman? to vile service bound: lover
430 And eke the Graces seemed all to sing,
Hymen iô Hymen, dauncing all around,
Whilst freshest Flora? her with Yvie girlond crownd.

49

In this great passion of unwonted? lust, unaccustomed
Or wonted feare of doing ought amis,

3. One, unity (Latin). Many Elizabethan readers would have known the Latin phrase Una Vera Fides (one true faith).
4. Unnaturally.
5. Cupid.
6. Lustful play. Dame pleasures: Venus.
7. Flower goddess; sometimes referred to as sexually unchaste. Graces: handmaids of Venus; here, they sing in praise of the marriage bed. Hymen: Greek god of marriage.

435 He started up, as seeming to mistrust? suspect
Some secret ill, or hidden foe of his:
Lo there before his face his Lady is,
Under blake stole hyding her bayted hooke,
And as halfe blushing offred him to kis,
440 With gentle blandishment° and lovely? looke, flattering speech / loving
Most like that virgin true, which for her knight him took.

5°

All cleane dismayd to see so uncouth? sight, strange
And halfe enraged at her shamelesse guise,
He thought have slaine her in his fierce despight:" indignation
445 But hasty heat tempring with sufferance wise,
He stayde his hand, and gan himselfe advise
To prove his sense, and tempt? her faigned truth. test
Wringing her hands in wemens pitteous wise,
Tho? can? she weepe, to stirre up gentle ruth,? then / did / pity
450 Both for her noble bloud, and for her tender youth.

51

And said, Ah Sir, my liege Lord and my love,
Shall I accuse the hidden cruell fate,
And mightie causes wrought in heaven above,
Or the blind God, that doth me thus amate," dismay 455 For" hopèd love to winne me certaine hate? instead of
Yet thus perforce? he bids me do, or die. forcibly
Die is my dew:" yet rew" my wretched state pity
You, whom my hard avenging destinie
Hath made judge of my life or death indifferently.

52

460 Your owne deare sake forst me at first to leave
My Fathers kingdome, There she stopt with teares;
Her swollen hart° her speach seemd to bereave, heart
And then againe begun, My weaker yeares
Captiv'd to fortune and frayle worldly feares,
465 Fly to your faith for succour and sure ayde:
Let me not dye in languor" and long teares. sorrow
Why Dame (quoth he) what hath ye thus dismayd?
What frayes" ye, that were wont to comfort me affrayd? frightens

53

Love of your selfe, she said, and deare? constraint dire
470 Lets me not sleepe, but wast the wearie night
In secret anguish and unpittied plaint,
Whiles you in carelesse sleepe are drowned quight.
Her doubtfull words made that redoubted? knight
Suspect her truth: yet since no untruth he knew,
475 Her fawning love with foule disdainefull spight" contempt

8. I.e., I deserve to die.
9. Dreaded; also, doubting again. Doubtful!: fearful; also, questionable.

He would not shend,? but said, Deare dame I rew,? reject / pity
That for my sake unknowne such griefe unto you grew.

54

Assure your selfe, it fell not all to ground;
For all so deare as life is to my hart,° heart
480 I deeme your love, and hold me to you bound;
Ne let vaine feares procure? your needlesse smart," cause / harm
Where cause is none, but to your rest depart.
Not all content, yet seemd she to appease" cease
Her mournefull plaintes, beguiled0 of her art, deprived
485 And fed with words, that could not chuse but please,
So slyding softly forth, she turnd" as to her ease. returned

55

Long after lay he musing at her mood,
Much griev'd to thinke that gentle Dame so light,'
For whose defence he was to shed his blood.
490 At last dull wearinesse of former fight
Having yrockt a sleepe his irkesome spright,"
That troublous dreame gan freshly tosse his braine,
With bowres, and beds, and Ladies deare delight:
But when he" saw his labour all was vaine, the dream
495 With that misformed spright he" backe returnd againe. the dream

Canto 2

The guilefull great Enchaunter parts
The Redcrosse Knight from Truth:
Into whose stead faire falshood steps)
And workes him wofull ruth:" harm

10 When those accursed messengers of hell,
That feigning dreame," and that Faire-forged Spright

1. I.e., so unchaste.
2. Tired or troublesome spirit (as mind or soul, but stressing the hero's similarity to the "misformed spright" of line 495, sent by Archimago).
1. I.e., by this time the "northerne Waggoner"- the constellation Bootes seen as the driver of the "tearne" of the seven bright stars in Ursa Major- had set behind the North Star.
2. The sun's chariot. Chaunticlere: a common name for a rooster.
3. I.e., the dream has caused the Knight to "feign" in the senses of "to desire" and "to imagine falsely":

Came to their wicked maister, and gan tell
Their bootelesse" paines, and ill succeeding night: useless
Who all in rage to see his skilfull might 15 Deluded so, gan threaten hellish paine
And sad Proserpines" wrath, them to affright.
But when he saw his threatning was but vaine,
He cast about, and searcht his balefull° bookes againe. deadly

Eftsoones? he tooke that miscreated faire, soon after 20 And that false other Spright, on whom he spred
A seeming body of the subtile? aire, rarefied
Like a young Squire, in loves and Iusty-hed
His wanton dayes that ever loosely led,
Without regard of armes and dreaded fight:
25 Those two he tooke, and in a secret bed,
Covered with darknesse and misdeeming" night, misleading
Them both together laid, to joy in vaine delight.

Forthwith he runnes with feigned faithfull hast
Unto his guest, who after troublous sights
30 And dreames, gan now to take more sound repast," rest
Whom suddenly he wakes with fearefull frights,
As one aghast with feends or damned sprights,
And to him cals, "Rise rise unhappy Swaine,? rustic youth
That here wex? old in sleepe, whiles wicked wights? grow / creatures
35 Have knit themselves in Venus shamefull chaine;
Come see, where your false Lady doth her honour staine."

All in amaze he suddenly up start
With sword in hand, and with the old man went;
Who soone him brought into a secret part,
40 Where that false couple were full closely menta mingled
In wanton lust and lewd embracement:
Which when he saw, he burnt with gealous fire,
The eye of reason was with rage yblent," blinded
And would have slaine them in his furious ire, 45 But hardly" was restreined of° that aged sire. with difficulty / by

Returning to his bed in torment great,
And bitter anguish of his guiltie sight,
He could not rest, but did his stout heart eat,
And waste his inward gall with deepe despight,? waste / malice
50 Yrkesorne" of life, and too long lingring night. tired
At last faire Hesperus" in highest skie

see canto I, stanzas 46-47.
4. Roman name for Persephone, who in Greek mythology was seized and held captive by Piu to, god of the underworld.
5. The evening and morning star, i.e., the planet Venus.

Had spent his lampe, and brought forth dawning light,
Then up he rose, and clad him hastily;
The Dwarfe him brought his steed: so both away do fly.

55 Now when the rosy-fingred Morning faire,
Weary of aged Tithones> saffron bed,
Had spred her purple robe through deawy aire,
And the high hils Titan° discovered," the sun / revealed
The royall virgin shooke off drowsy-heel,
60 And rising forth out of her baser" bowre, too lowly
Lookt for her knight, who far away was fled,
And for her Dwarfe, that wont" to wait each houre: was accustomed
Then gan she waile and weepe, to see that woefull stowre." affliction

8

And after him she rode with so much speede
65 As her slow beast could make; but all in vaine:
For him so far had borne his light-foot steede,
Pricked with wrath and fiery fierce disdaine," indignation
That him to follow was but fruitless paine;
Yet she her weary limbes would never rest,
70 But every hill and dale, each wood and plaine
Did search, sore grieved in her gentle brest,
He so ungently left her, whom she lovèd best.

But subtill" Archimago, when his guests cunning
He saw divided into double parts,
75 And Una wandring in woods and forrests,
Th' end of his drift,° he praisd his divelish arts plot
That had such might over true meaning harts;" hearts
Yet rests not so, but other meanes doth make,
How he may worke unto her further smarts:" harm
80 For her he hated as the hissing snake,
And in her many troubles did most pleasure take.

10

He then devisde himselfe how to disguise;
For by his mightie science" he could take knowledge
As many formes and shapes in seeming wise,
85 As ever Proteus? to himselfe could make:
Sometime a fowle, sometime a fish in lake,
Now like a foxe, now like a dragon fell,° fierce
That of himselfe he oft for feare would quake,
And oft would flie away. 0 who can tell
90 The hidden power of herbes, and might of Magicke spell?

6. Tithonus, in Roman mythology the husband of Aurora, goddess of the dawn.
7. A Greek sea god who could change his shape at will (Odyssey 4.398-424). In seeming wise: in appearance.

11

But now seemde best, the person to put on
Of that good knight, his late beguiled" guest:
In mighty armes he was yclad anon,° soon
And silver shield: upon his coward brest
95 A bloudy crosse, and on his craven crest
A bounch of haires discolourd" diversly:" colored / variously
Full jolly" knight he seemde, and well addrest," gallant / armed
And when he sate upon his courser free,9
Saint Ceorge' himself ye would have deemed him to be.

12

100 But he the knight, whose sernblaunt" he did beare, likeness
The true Saint George was wandred far away,
Still flying from" his thoughts and gealous feare; because of
Will was his guide,2 and griefe led him astray.
At last him chaunst to meete upon the way
105 A faithlesse Sarazin' all armed to point,
In whose great shield was writ with letters gay
Sans" foy:" full large of limbe and every joint without /faith
He was, and carèd not for God or man a" point.° at / all

13

He had a faire companion of his way,
110 A goodly Lady clad in scarlot red,
Purfled? with gold and pearle of rich assay," embroidered / value
And like a Persian mitre" on her hed headdress
She wore, with crownes and owches? garnished, brooches
The which her lavish" lovers to her gave;" extravagant
115 Her wanton° palfrey" all was overspred unruly / lady's saddle horse
With tinsell trappings, woven like a wave,
Whose bridle rung with golden bels and bosses" ornaments brave." handsome

14

With faire disport? and courting dalliaunce? diversion / talk
She intertainde her lover all the way:
120 But when she saw the knight his speare advaunce,
She soone left off her mirth and wanton play,
And bad her knight addresse him to the fray:
His foe was nigh at hand. He prickt with pride

8. Deluded, deceived by guile; but contrast its use at canto 1, line 82. To put on: to assume.
9. Le., noble horse.
1. I.e., Archimago now assumes not only the Redcrosse Knight's appearance but also the saintly identity that the Knight will acquire after his earthly adventures are over; the Knight will later learn that he is to become England's dragon-slaying patron, Saint George (10.61.8).
2. In Christian thought, the faculty of the will is below and should be guided by the faculty of reason, but the Knight's is "blinded" (see stanza 5, line 7) by passion.
3. I.e., Saracen, a name loosely and usually negatively denoting non-Christians and, more specifically, the Turkish or Arabic enemies of medieval Christian "crusaders."
4. The lady's clothes associate her with the Whore of Babylon (Revelation 17.3-4): "And I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls." She represents false religion, especially what Protestants saw as the pomp and hypocrisy of Rome.

And hope to winne his Ladies heart that day,
125 Forth spurrèd fast: adowne his coursers side
The red bloud trickling staind the way, as he did ride.

15

The knight of the Redcrosse when him he spide,
Spurring so hote with rage dispiteous,° — cruel
Gan fairely couch° his speare, and towards ride: — lower
130 Soone meete they both, both fell° and furious, — fierce
That daunted° with their forces hideous, — dazed
Their steeds do stagger, and amazèd stand,
And eke° themselves too rudely rigorous,° — also / violent
Astonied° with the stroke of their owne hand, — stunned
135 Do backe rebut,° and each to other yeeldeth land. — recoil

16

As when two rams stird with ambitious pride,
Fight for the rule of the rich fleecèd flocke,
Their hornèd fronts so fierce on either side
Do meete, that with the terrour of the shocke
140 Astonied° both, stand sencelesse as a blocke, — stunned, made stonelike
Forgetfull of the hanging° victory: — in the balance
So stood these twaine, unmovèd as a rocke,
Both staring fierce, and holding idely
The broken reliques° of their former cruelty. — remnants

17

145 The Sarazin sore daunted with the buffe° — blow
Snatcheth his sword, and fiercely to him flies;
Who well it wards, and quyteth° cuff with cuff: — requites
Each others equall puissaunce° envies, — strength
And through their iron sides with cruell spies° — looks
150 Does seeke to perce: repining° courage yields — angry
No foote to foe. The flashing fier flies
As from a forge out of their burning shields,
And streams of purple bloud new dies the verdant fields.

18

"Curse on that Crosse," quoth then the Sarazin,
155 "That keepes thy body from the bitter fit;[5]
Dead long ygoe I wote° thou haddest bin, — thought
Had not that charme from thee forwarnèd° it: — prevented
But yet I warne thee now assurèd° sitt, — securely
And hide thy head." Therewith upon his crest
160 With rigour° so outrageous he smitt, — violence; rigidity
That a large share° it hewd out of the rest, — piece
And glauncing downe his shield, from blame° him fairely blest.° — harm / preserved

5. Death pangs.

19

Who thereat wondrous wroth,° the sleeping spark — angry
Of native vertue° gan eftsoones° revive, — strength / soon after 165 And at his haughtie helmet making mark,
So hugely° stroke, that it the steele did rive,° — mightily / tear apart
And cleft his head. He tumbling downe alive,
With bloudy mouth his mother earth did kis
Greeting his grave: his grudging° ghost did strive — complaining
170 With the fraile flesh; at last it flitted is,
Whither the soules do fly of men, that live amis.

20

The Lady when she saw her champion fall,
Like the old ruines of a broken towre,
Staid not to waile his woefull funerall,° — death
175 But from him fled away with all her powre;
Who after her as hastily gan scowre,° — scurry
Bidding the Dwarfe with him to bring away
The Sarazins shield, signe of the conqueroure.
Her soone he° overtooke, and bad to stay, — Redcrosse
180 For present cause was none of dread her to dismay.[6]

21

She turning backe with ruefull[7] countenaunce
Cride, "Mercy mercy Sir vouchsafe to show
On silly° Dame, subject to hard mischaunce, — helpless
And to your mighty will." Her humblesse low
185 In so ritch weedes° and seeming glorious show — clothes
Did much emmove his stout heroike heart,
And said, "Deare dame, your sudden overthrow
Much rueth° me; but now put feare apart, — grieves
And tell, both who ye be, and who that tooke your part."

22

190 Melting in teares, then gan she thus lament;
"The wretched woman, whom unhappy howre
Hath now made thrall° to your commandèment, — slave
Before that angry heavens list to lowre,° — frown
And fortune false betraide me to your powre
195 Was (O what now availeth that I was!)
Borne the sole daughter of an Emperour,
He that the wide West under his rule has,
And high hath set his throne, where Tiberis doth pas.[8]

23

"He in the first flowre of my freshest age,
200 Betrothèd me unto the onely haire° — heir
Of a most mighty king, most rich and sage;

6. There was no present cause for her to flee in fear.
7. Seeking to incite pity.
8. The Tiber River runs through Rome; hence the lady is associated with the Catholic Church.

Was never Prince so faithfull and so faire,
Was never Prince so meeke and debonaire;° gracious
But ere my hopèd day of spousall shone,
205 My dearest Lord fell from high honours staire,
Into the hands of his accursèd fone,° foes
And cruelly was slaine, that shall I ever mone.[9]

24

"His blessed body spoild of lively breath,
Was afterward, I know not how, convaid° carried away
210 And fro me hid: of whose most innocent death
When tidings came to me unhappy maid,
O how great sorrow my sad soule assaid.° afflicted
Then forth I went his woefull corse° to find, corpse
And many yeares throughout the world I straid,° strayed
215 A virgin widow, whose deepe wounded mind
With love, long time did languish as the striken hind.° deer

25

"At last it chauncèd this proud Sarazin
To meete me wandring, who perforce° me led by violence
With him away, but yet could never wih
220 The fort, that Ladies hold in soveraigne dread.
There lies he now with foule dishonour dead,
Who whiles he livde, was callèd proud Sans foy,
The eldest of three brethren, all three bred
Of one bad sire, whose youngest is Sans° joy, without
225 And twixt them both was borne the bloudy bold Sans loy.[1]

26

"In this sad plight, friendless unfortunate,
Now miserable I Fidessa° dwell, Faith
Craving of you in pitty of my state,
To do none° ill, if please ye not do well." no
230 He in great passion all this while did dwell,° continue
More busying his quicke eyes, her face to view,
then his dull eares, to heare what she did tell;
And said, "Faire Lady hart of flint would rew° pity
The undeservèd woes and sorrowes, which ye shew.

27

235 "Henceforth in safe assurance may ye rest,
Having both found a new friend you to aid,
And lost an old foe, that did you molest:
Better new friend than an old foe is° said." it is
With chaunge of cheare the seeming simple maid

9. The lady claims to have been engaged to Christ, bridegroom of the Church, who was cruelly killed—which event the lady will forever lament.

1. Literally, without law. The names of Spenser's three "Sans" brothers hark back to St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians 5.22–23: "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy . . . faith . . . temperance: against such there is no law."

240 Let fall her eyen, as° shamefast° to the earth, as if / modestly
And yeelding soft, in that she nought gain-said,
So forth they rode, he feining° seemely merth, simulating
And she coy lookes: so dainty they say maketh derth.[2]

28

Long time they thus together traveilèd,
245 Till weary of their way, they came at last,
Where grew two goodly trees, that faire did spred
Their armes abroad, with gray mosse overcast,
And their greene leaves trembling with every blast,° breeze
Made a calme shadow far in compasse round:
250 The fearefull Shepheard often there aghast
Under them never sat, ne wont° there sound was accustomed to
His mery oaten pipe, but shund th' unlucky ground.

29

But this good knight soone as he them can° spie, did
For the coole shade him thither hastly got:
255 For golden Phoebus now ymounted hie,
From fiery wheeles of his faire chariot
Hurlèd his beame so scorching cruell hot,
That living creature mote° it not abide; might
And his new Lady it endurèd not.
260 There they alight, in hope themselves to hide
From the fierce heat, and rest their weary limbs a tide.° time

30

Faire seemely pleasaunce° each to other makes, courtesy
With goodly purposes there as they sit:
And in his falsèd° fancy he her takes deceived
265 To be the fairest wight° that livèd yit; creature
Which to expresse, he bends his gentle wit,
And thinking of those braunches greene to frame
A girlond° for her dainty forehead fit, garland
He pluckt a bough; out of whose rift there came 270 Small drops of gory bloud, that trickled downe the same.

31

Therewith a piteous yelling voyce was heard,
Crying, "O spare with guilty hands to teare
My tender sides in this rough rynd embard,° imprisoned
But fly, ah fly far hence away, for feare
275 Least° to you hap, that happened to me heare, lest
And to this wretched Lady, my deare love,
O too deare love, love bought with death too deare."
Astond he stood,[3] and up his haire did hove° heave, raise
And with that sudden horror could no member move.

2. Proverbial: what's dear is rare; here, coyness creates unsatisfied desire.

3. I.e., astonished, Redcrosse Knight stood up.

32

280 At last whenas the dreadful passiön
Was overpast, and manhood well awake,
Yet musing at the straunge occasiön
And doubting much his sense, he thus bespake;
"What voyce of damnèd Ghost from Limbo[4] lake,
285 Or guilefull spright wandring in empty aire,
Both which fraile men do oftentimes mistake,° mislead
Sends to my doubtfull eares these speaches rare,
And ruefull plaints, me bidding guiltless bloud to spare?"

33

Then groning deepe, "Nor damned Ghost," quoth he,
290 "Nor guilefull sprite to thee these wordes doth speake,
But once a man Fradubio,[5] now a tree,
Wretched man, wretched tree; whose nature weake,
A cruell witch her cursèd will to wreake,
Hath thus transformed, and plast° in open plaines, placed
295 Where Boreas° doth blow full bitter bleake, the north wind
And scorching Sunne does dry my secret vaines:
For though a tree I seeme, yet cold and heat me paines."

34

"Say on Fradubio then, or° man, or tree," whether Quoth then the knight, "by whose mischievous arts
300 Art thou misshapèd thus, as now I see?
He oft finds med'cine, who his griefe imparts;
But double griefs afflict concealing harts,° hearts
As raging flames who striveth to suppresse."
"The author then," said he, "of all my smarts,° hurts
305 Is one Duessa[6] a false sorceresse,
That many errant knights hath brought to wretchednesse.[7]

35

"In prime of youthly yeares, when corage hot
The fire of love and joy of chevalree
First kindled in my brest, it was my lot
310 To love this gentle Lady, whom ye see,
Now not a Lady, but a seeming tree;
With whom as once I rode accompanyde,
Me chauncèd of a knight encountred bee,
That had a like faire Lady by his syde,
315 Like a faire Lady, but did fowle Duessa hyde.

36

"Whose forgèd beauty he did take in hand,[8]
All other Dames to have exceeded farre,

4. A region of hell and, traditionally, the place of the unbaptized.
5. Fra (Italian, "in" or "brother") + dubbio ("doubt"). Spenser borrows details from many previous epic depictions of a man imprisoned in a bleeding tree; among his sources are Virgil (Aeneid 3.27–42), Dante (Inferno 13.28–109), Ariosto (Orlando Furioso 6.26–53), and Tasso (Gerusalemma Liberata 13.38–46).
6. Due (Italian, "two," or double) + esse (Latin, "being").
7. I.e., Duessa has brought many wandering (with a pun on erring) knights to wretchedness.
8. He maintained.

I in defence of mine did likewise stand,
Mine, that did then shine as the Morning starre:
320 So both to battell fierce arraungèd arre,
In which his harder fortune was to fall
Under my speare: such is the dye° of warre: hazard
His Lady left as a prise° martiall,° spoil / of battle
Did yield her comely person, to be at my call.

37

325 "So doubly loved of Ladies unlike° faire, differently
Th' one seeming such, the other such indeede,
One day in doubt I cast° for° to compare, decided / to Whether° in beauties glorie did exceede; which one (of two)
A Rosy girlond° was the victors meede:° garland / reward
330 Both seemde to win, and both seemde won to bee,
So hard the discord was to be agreede.
Fraelissa[9] was as faire, as faire mote bee,
And ever false Duessa seemde as faire as shee.

38

"The wicked witch now seeing all this white
335 The doubtfull ballaunce equally to sway,
What not by right, she cast to win by guile,
And by her hellish science° raisd streight way knowledge
A foggy mist, that overcast the day,
And a dull blast, that breathing on her face,
340 Dimmed her former beauties shining ray,
And with foule ugly forme did her disgrace
Then was she faire alone, when none was faire in place.[1]

39

"Then cride she out, 'Fye, fye, deformèd wight,
Whose borrowed beautie now appeareth plaine
345 To have before bewitchèd all mens sight;
O leave her soone, or let her soone be slaine.'
Her lothly visage viewing with disdaine.
Eftsoone° I thought her such, as she me told, before
And would have kild her, but with faignèd paine,
350 The false witch did my wrathfull hand withhold;
So left her, where she now is turnd to treën° mould.° a tree's / form

40

"Thens forth I tooke Duessa for my Dame,
And in the witch unweeting° joyd long time, unknowingly
Ne ever wist,° but that she was the same, knew
355 Till on a day (that day is every Prime,[2]
When Witches wont° do penance for their crime) are accustomed to
I chaunst to see her in her proper° hew,° own / shape
Bathing her selfe in origane and thyme:[3]

9. Frailty (in Italian, Fralezza).
1. When nobody else was fair. She: Duessa.
2. Spring; or the first appearance of the new moon.
3. Oregano and thyme were used to cure scabs and itching.

A filthy foule old woman I did vew,
360 That ever to have toucht her, I did deadly rew.° regret

41

"Her neather partes misshapen, monstruous,
Were hidd in water, that I could not see,
But they did seeme more foule and hideous,
Then womans shape man would beleeve to bee.
365 Thens forth from her most beastly companie
I gan refraine, in minde to slip away,
Soone as appeard safe opportunitie:
For danger great, if not assured decay° destruction
I saw before mine eyes, if I were knowne to stray.

42

370 "The divelish hag by chaunges of my cheare° countenance
Perceived my thought, and drownd in sleepie night,
With wicked herbes and ointments did besmeare
My bodie all, through charmes and magicke might,
That all my senses were bereavèd quight:° quite 375 Then brought she me into this desert waste,
And by my wretched lovers side me pight,° planted
Where now enclosd in wooden wals full faste,[4]
Banisht from living wights,° our wearie dayes we waste." persons

43

"But how long time," said then the Elfin knight,
380 "Are you in this misformèd house to dwell?"
"We may not chaunge," quoth he, "this evil plight,
Till we be bathèd in a living well;[5]
That is the terme prescribèd by the spell."
"O how," said he, "mote° I that well out find, might 385 That may restore you to your wonted well?"° well-being
"Time and suffisèd fates to former kynd
Shall us restore,[6] none else from hence may us unbynd."

44

The false Duessa, now Fidessa hight,° called
Heard how in vaine Fradubio did lament,
390 And knew well all was true. But the good knight
Full of sad feare and ghastly dreriment,° gloom
When all this speech the living tree had spent,
The bleeding bough did thrust into the ground,
That from the bloud he might be innocent,
395 And with fresh clay did close the wooden wound:
Then turning to his Lady, dead with feare her found.

4. I.e., imprisoned within the trees.
5. Allusion to 1 John 4.14: "well of water, springing up into eternal life."
6. I.e., time and the satisfaction of the fates alone can restore us to our former human nature.

45

Her seeming dead he found with feignèd feare,
As all unweeting of that well she knew,[7]
And paynd himselfe with busie care to reare
400 Her out of carelesse° swowne. Her eylids blew — unconscious
And dimmèd sight with pale and deadly° hew° — deathlike / appearance
At last she up gan lift: with trembling cheare° — demeanor
Her up he tooke, too simple and too trew,
And oft her kist. At length all passèd feare,[8]
405 He set her on her steede, and forward forth did beare.

From Amoretti[1]

Sonnet 1

Happy ye leaves[2] when as those lilly hands,
Which hold my life in their dead doing might[3]
Shall handle you and hold in loves soft bands,
Lyke captives trembling at the victors sight.
5 And happy lines, on which with starry light,
Those lamping° eyes will deigne sometimes to look — shining
And reade the sorrowes of my dying spright,° — spirit
Written with teares in harts° close° bleeding book. — heart's / secret
And happy rymes bath'd in the sacred brooke,
10 Of Helicon[4] whence she derived is,
When ye behold that Angels blessed looke,
My soules long lacked foode, my heavens blis.
Leaves, lines, and rymes, seeke her to please alone,
Whom if ye please, I care for other none.

Sonnet 8

More then° most faire, full of the living fire, — than
Kindled above unto the maker neere:
No eies[5] but joyes, in which al powers conspire,
That to the world naught else be counted deare.

7. I.e., pretending ignorance of what she knew well.
8. I.e., having overcome all fear.
1. Little loves (Italian). This sequence of eighty-nine sonnets was published in 1595, together with Epithalamion (p. 195), a kind of poem written to celebrate a marriage. It is generally believed that these poems were written to Spenser's bride-to-be, Elizabeth Boyle. The Petrarchan sonnet cycle was popular at this time, but Spenser's sequence is unusual because the desire expressed is directed not at an unattainable mistress but toward the woman who became the poet's second wife. The rhyme scheme is abab bcbc cdcd ee, a difficult pattern in English because of the frequency of the repeating rhymes.
2. Pages; in line 13, the poet addresses his poems as "leaves, lines, and rymes."
3. Death-dealing power.
4. The Hippocrene Spring, on Mt. Helicon, was the haunt of the Muses, the nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be the source of inspiration for the arts.
5. The lover's eyes are imagined as the source of love, both erotic and spiritual (Platonic).

5 Thrugh your bright beams doth not the blinded guest[6]
Shoot out his darts to base affections wound?
But Angels come to lead fraile mindes to rest
In chast desires on heavenly beauty bound.
You frame my thoughts and fashion me within,
10 You stop my toung, and teach my hart° to speake, heart
You calme the storme that passion did begin,
Strong thrugh your cause, but by your vertue weak.
Dark is the world, where your light shined never;
Well is he borne, that may behold you ever.

Sonnet 15[7]

Ye tradefull[8] Merchants that with weary toyle,
Do seeke most pretious things to make your gain:
And both the Indias[9] of their treasures spoile,° despoil
What needeth you to seeke so farre in vaine?
5 For loe my love doth in her selfe containe
All this worlds riches that may farre be found,
If Saphyres, loe her eies be Saphyres plaine,° perfect
If Rubies, loe hir lips be Rubies sound:° free from defect
If Pearles, hir teeth be pearles both pure and round;
10 If Yvorie, her forhead yvory weene;[1]
If Gold, her locks are finest gold on ground;° Earth
If silver, her faire hands are silver sheene;° bright
But that which fairest is, but few behold,
Her mind adornd with vertues manifold.

Sonnet 23

Penelope for her Ulisses sake,
Deviz'd a Web her wooers to deceave:
In which the worke that she all day did make
The same at night she did again unreave:[2]
5 Such subtile° craft my Damzell doth conceave,° fine, clever / devise
Th' importune° suit of my desire to shonne:[3] importunate
For all that I in many dayes doo weave,
In one short houre I find by her undonne.
So when I thinke to end that° I begonne, that which
10 I must begin and never bring to end:
For with one looke she spils° that long I sponne, destroys
And with one word my whole years work doth rend.

6. I.e., Cupid, Roman god of erotic love.
7. This sonnet is a blazon, a series of comparisons or depictions cataloging the lady's parts.
8. Fully occupied with trading (this is the O.E.D.'s first recorded usage of the word).
9. The East and West Indies.
1. Beautiful; or, possibly, may be read as an imperative, i.e., "think her forehead ivory."
2. During the long absence of her husband, Odysseus, Penelope warded off her suitors by saying she would choose one of them as soon as she finished weaving a shroud. Each night for three years she undid her day's work (Homer, Odyssey 2).
3. I.e., she shuns his desire's pleading.

Such labour like the Spyders web I fynd,
Whose fruitlesse worke is broken with least wynd.

Sonnet 54

Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay,
My love lyke the Spectàtor ydly sits
Beholding me that all the pageants° play, roles
Disguysing diversly my troubled wits.
5 Sometimes I joy when glad occasion fits,
And mask[4] in myrth lyke to a Comedy:
Soone after when my joy to sorrow flits,
I waile and make my woes a Tragedy.
Yet she beholding me with constant eye,
10 Delights not in my merth nor rues° my smart:° pities / hurt
But when I laugh she mocks, and when I cry
She laughes, and hardens evermore her hart.° heart
What then can move her? if nor merth nor mone,° moan
She is no woman, but a sencelesse stone.

Sonnet 67[5]

Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace,
Seeing the game from him escapt away,
Sits downe to rest him in some shady place,
With panting hounds beguilèd of their pray:
5 So after long pursuit and vaine assay,° attempt
When I all weary had the chace forsooke,
The gentle deare[6] returnd the selfe-same way,
Thinking to quench her thirst at the next brooke.
There she beholding me with mylder looke,
10 Sought not to fly, but fearelesse still did bide:
Till I in hand her yet halfe trembling tooke,
And with her owne goodwill hir fyrmely tyde.
Strange thing me seemd[7] to see a beast so wyld,
So goodly wonne with her owne will beguyld.

Sonnet 68

Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day,[8]
Didst make thy triumph over death and sin:

4. Cover (or mask) his emotions; also, act in a masque, a short, allegorical drama.
5. An imitation of Petrarch's Rime 190, although with a dissimilar ending. Cf. Thomas Wyatt, "Whoso List to Hunt" (p. 126).
6. With a pun on deer and dear (beloved).
7. I.e., it seemed to me.
8. Easter.

And having harrowd hell[9] didst bring away
Captivity thence captive us to win:[1]
5 This joyous day, deare Lord, with joy begin,
And grant that we for whom thou diddest dye
Being with thy deare blood clene washt from sin,
May live for ever in felicity.
And that thy love we weighing worthily,
10 May likewise love thee for the same againe:[2]
And for thy sake that all lyke deare[3] didst buy,
With love may one another entertayne.
So let us love, deare love, lyke as we ought,
Love is the lesson which the Lord us taught.[4]

Sonnet 70

Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king,
In whose cote° armour° richly are displayd — coat / of arms
All sorts of flowers the which on earth do spring
In goodly colours gloriously arrayd:
5 Goe to my love, where she is carelesse layd,
Yet in her winters bowre not well awake:
Tell her the joyous time wil not be staid° — detained
Unless she doe him by the forelock take.[5]
Bid her therefore her selfe soone ready make,
10 To wayt on love[6] amongst his lovely crew:
Where every one that misseth then her make,° — mate
Shall be by him amearst° with penance dew. — punished
Make hast therefore sweet love,[7] whilest it is prime,° — spring
For none can call againe the passèd time.

Sonnet 71

I joy to see how in your drawen work,[8]
Your selfe unto the Bee ye doe compare;
And me unto the Spyder that doth lurke,
In close° awayt° to catch her unaware. — secret / ambush
5 Right so your selfe were caught in cunning snare
Of a deare foe, and thralled° to his love: — enslaved
In whose streight° bands ye now captived are — tight
So firmely, that ye never may remove.

9. A reference to the apocryphal account of Christ's descent into hell, after his Crucifixion, to rescue the captive souls of the just.
1. "When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive" (Ephesians 4.8).
2. I.e., grant also that we, weighing thy love rightly, might love thee in the same way.
3. I.e., at the same cost.
4. "This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you" (John 15.12).
5. "To take time by the forelock" is to act promptly.
6. I.e., to attend and serve Cupid.
7. The addressee of the poem changes here from Spring, as the herald of love, to the loved one herself.
8. Ornamental work done in textile fabrics by drawing out some of the threads so as to form patterns.

But as your worke is woven all about,
10 With woodbynd° flowers and fragrant Enlantine:° — honeysuckle / sweetbriar
So sweet your prison you in time shall prove,° — find
With many deare delights bedecked fyne.
And all thensforth eternall peace shall see
Betweene the Spyder and the gentle Bee.

Sonnet 75

One day I wrote her name upon the strand,° — shore
But came the waves and washèd it away:
Agayne I wrote it with° a second hand,° — for / time
But came the tyde, and made my paynes his pray.° — prey
5 Vayne man, sayd she, that doest in vaine assay,° — attempt
A mortall thing so to immortalize,
For I my selve shall lyke to this decay,
And eek° my name bee wypèd out lykewize. — also
Not so, (quod° I) let baser things devize° — quoth / plan
10 To dy in dust, but you shall live by fame:
My verse your vertues rare shall eternize,
And in the hevens wryte your glorious name.
Where whenas death shall all the world subdew,
Our love shall live, and later life renew.

Sonnet 79

Men call you fayre, and you doe credit° it, — believe
For that your selfe ye dayly such doe see:
But the trew fayre,° that is the gentle wit, — beauty
And vertuous mind, is much more praysd of me.
5 For all the rest, how ever fayre it be,
Shall turne to nought and loose that glorious hew:° — form
But onely that is permanent and free
From frayle corruption, that doth flesh ensew.° — attend
That is true beautie: that doth argue you
10 To be divine and borne of heavenly seed:
Deriv'd from that fayre Spirit,[9] from whom al true
And perfect beauty did at first proceed.
He onely fayre, and what he fayre hath made,
All other fayre lyke flowres untymely fade.

Sonnet 81

Fayre is my love, when her fayre golden heares,° — hairs
With the loose wynd ye waving chance to marke:° — notice

9. I.e., God, the "he" of line 13.

Fayre when the rose in her red cheekes appeares,
Or in her eyes the fyre of love does sparke.
5 Fayre when her brest lyke a rich laden barke,
With pretious merchandize she forth doth lay:
Fayre when that cloud of pryde, which oft doth dark
Her goodly light with smiles she drives away.
But fayrest she, when so she doth display
10 The gate with pearles and rubyes richly dight:° adorned
Throgh which her words so wise do make their way
To beare the message of her gentle spright.° spirit
The rest be works of natures wonderment,
But this the worke of harts° astonishment. heart's

Sonnet 89

Lyke as the Culver[1] on the barèd bough,
Sits mourning for the absence of her mate:
And in her songs sends many a wishfull vow,
For his returne that seemes to linger late,
5 So I alone now left disconsolate,
Mourne to my selfe the absence of my love:
And wandring here and there all desolate,
Seek with my playnts° to match that mournful dove: laments, complaints
Ne joy of ought that under heaven doth hove,° abide
10 Can comfort me, but her owne joyous sight:
Whose sweet aspèct both God and man can move,
In her unspotted pleasauns[2] to delight.
Dark is my day, whyles her fayre light I mis,
And dead my life that wants such lively blis.

1595

Epithalamion[1]

Ye learnèd sisters[2] which have oftentimes
Beene to me ayding, others to adorne:
Whom ye thought worthy of your gracefull[3] rymes,

1. Dove; a bird associated with fidelity, peace, and the Holy Spirit.
2. Charm or pleasing manners; also, a garden's pleasure area; cf. Song of Solomon 4.12, in which the bride is compared to an enclosed garden.

1. Meaning a wedding song or poem; its Greek name conveys that it was sung on the threshold of the bridal chamber. The genre, practiced by the Latin poets, characteristically includes the invocation to the Muses (the nine sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts), the bringing home of the bride, the singing and dancing at the wedding party, and the preparations for the wedding night.
Published with the Amoretti, Spenser's Epithalamion has a uniquely complex structure. The central section on the church ceremony (lines 185–222) is flanked by two symmetrical ten-stanza sections, each divided into units of three-four-three. The poem's structure reinforces the theme of time, with exactly 365 long lines, matching the number of days in the year, and twenty-four stanzas (including the envoy), matching the number of hours in one day. The first sixteen stanzas describe the day, making "night . . . come" (line 300) after sixteen and one-quarter stanzas: contemporary almanacs indicate sixteen and one-quarter hours of daylight in southern Ireland on June 11, 1594, the day Spenser was married.
2. The Muses.
3. Graceful; also, conferring grace.

That even the greatest did not greatly scorne
5 To heare theyr names sung in your simple layes,° songs
But joyèd in theyr prayse.
And when ye list° your owne mishaps to mourne, desire
Which death, or love, or fortunes wreck did rayse,
Your string could soone to sadder tenor° turne, mood
10 And teach the woods and waters to lament
Your dolefull dreriment.° sadness
Now lay those sorrowfull complaints aside,
And having all your heads with girland° crownd, garland
Helpe me mine owne loves prayses to resound,
15 Ne let the same of° any be envìde: by
So Orpheus[4] did for his owne bride,
So I unto my selfe alone will sing,
The woods shall to me answer and my Eccho ring.

Early before the worlds light giving lampe,[5]
20 His golden beame upon the hils doth spred,
Having disperst the nights unchearefull dampe,
Doe ye awake, and with fresh lusty hed,° cheerfulness
Go to the bowre° of my belovèd love, bedchamber
My truest turtle dove,
25 Bid her awake; for Hymen[6] is awake,
And long since ready forth his maske to move,
With his bright Tead that flames with many a flake,° spark
And many a bachelor to waite on him,
In theyr fresh garments trim.
30 Bid her awake therefore and soone her dight,° dress
For lo the wishèd day is come at last,
That shall for al the paynes and sorrowes past,
Pay to her usury° of long delight: interest
And whylest she doth her dight,° dress
35 Doe ye to her of joy and solace° sing, pleasure
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Bring with you all the Nymphes that you can heare[7]
Both of the rivers and the forrests greene:
And of the sea that neighbours to her neare,
40 Al with gay girlands° goodly wel beseene.° garlands / beautified
And let them also with them bring in hand
Another gay girland
For my fayre love of lillyes and of roses,
Bound truelove wize[8] with a blew silke riband.
45 And let them make great store of bridale poses,° posies
And let them eeke° bring store of other flowers also
To deck the bridale bowers.

4. Son of the Muse Calliope, he was a figure of the poet in classical antiquity; his music was said to charm wild animals and to make stones and trees move. According to one tradition, he won his wife, Euridyce, with music. However, he failed to free her from the underworld after her death because he looked back at her on the journey out.
5. I.e., the sun.
6. The Greek god of the wedding feast, represented as a young man bearing a torch ("Tead," line 27) and leading a "maske" (line 26), or procession.
7. I.e., that can hear you. Nymphes: nymphs; mythological female spirits inhabiting a particular place, object, or natural phenomenon.
8. I.e., in the manner of true love.

And let the ground whereas° her foot shall tread, whereon
For feare the stones her tender foot should wrong
50 Be strewed with fragrant flowers all along,
And diapred lyke the discolored mead.[9]
Which done, doe at her chamber dore awayt,
For she will waken strayt,° straightway
The whiles doe ye this song unto her sing,
55 The woods shall to you answer and your Eccho ring.

Ye Nymphes of Mulla° which with carefull heed, an Irish river
The silver scaly trouts doe tend full well,
And greedy pikes which use therein to feed,
(Those trouts and pikes all others doo excell)
60 And ye likewise which keepe the rushy lake,
Where none doo fishes take,
Bynd up the locks[1] the which hang scatterd light,
And in his waters which your mirror make,
Behold your faces as the christall bright,
65 That when you come whereas my love doth lie,
No blemish she may spie.
And eke° ye lightfoot mayds which keepe the deere, also
That on the hoary mountayne use to towre,[2]
And the wylde wolves which seeke them to devoure,
70 With your steele darts doo chace from comming neer,
Be also present heere,
To helpe to decke her and to help to sing,
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Wake, now my love, awake; for it is time,
75 The Rosy Morne long since left Tithones bed,[3]
All ready to her silver coche° to clyme, coach
And Phoebus[4] gins to shew his glorious hed.
Hark how the cheerefull birds do chaunt theyr laies° songs
And carroll of loves praise.[5]
80 The merry Larke hir mattins° sings aloft, morning prayers
The thrush replyes, the Mavis descant° playes, melodic counterpart
The Ouzell shrills, the Ruddock warbles soft,
So goodly all agree with sweet consent,
To this dayes merriment.
85 Ah my deere love why doe ye sleepe thus long,
When meeter° were that ye should now awake, more appropriate
T' awayt the comming of your joyous make,° mate
And hearken to the birds lovelearnèd song,
The deawy leaves among.
90 For they of joy and pleasance to you sing,
That all the woods them answer and theyr eccho ring.

9. And variegated like the many-colored meadow.
1. I.e., the rushes.
2. A hawking term meaning "to climb high." Lightfoot mayds: i.e., the nymphs.
3. The dawn, personified in mythology as the goddess Eos, or Aurora, was married to Tithonus, a mortal Trojan prince who aged while his wife stayed young.
4. Phoebus Apollo, the Greek sun god.
5. The birds' concert (following lines) is a convention of love poetry. The lark (a songbird) was associated with dawn. The mavis (song thrush), the ouzell (European blackbird), and the ruddock (robin) are all varieties of thrush.

My love is now awake out of her dreames,
And her fayre eyes like stars that dimmèd were
With darksome cloud, now shew theyr goodly beams
95 More bright then° Hesperus[6] his head doth rere. than
Come now ye damzels, daughters of delight,
Helpe quickly her to dight,
But first come ye fayre houres[7] which were begot
In Joves sweet paradice, of Day and Night,
100 Which doe the seasons of the yeare allot,
And al that ever in this world is fayre
Doe make and still° repayre. continually
And ye three handmayds of the Cyprian Queene,[8]
The which doe still adorne her beauties pride,
105 Helpe to addorne my beautifullest bride:
And as ye her array,° still throw betweene° dress / at intervals
Some graces to be seene,
And as ye use to Venus, to her sing,[9]
The whiles the woods shal answer and your eccho ring.

110 Now is my love all ready forth to come,
Let all the virgins therefore well awayt,
And ye fresh boyes that tend upon her groome[1]
Prepare your selves; for he is comming strayt.° straightaway
Set all your things in seemely good aray° order
115 Fit for so joyfull day,
The joyfulst day that ever sunne did see.
Faire Sun, shew forth thy favourable ray,
And let thy lifull° heat not fervent be life-giving
For feare of burning her sunshyny face,
120 Her beauty to disgrace.° spoil
O fayrest Phoebus, father of the Muse,[2]
If ever I did honour thee aright,
Or sing the thing, that mote° thy mind delight, might
Doe not thy servants simple boone° refuse, request
125 But let this day let this one day be myne,
Let all the rest be thine.
Then I thy soverayne prayses loud wil sing,
That all the woods shal answer and theyr eccho ring.

Harke how the Minstrels gin to shrill aloud
130 Their merry Musick that resounds from far,
The pipe,° the tabor,° and the trembling Croud,[3] bagpipe / drum
That well agree withouten breach or jar.° discord
But most of all the Damzels doe delite,
When they their tymbrels° smyte,° tambourines / hit
135 And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet,

6. The evening or morning star, sacred to Venus, Roman goddess of love and beauty.
7. The Horae, or Hours, were three daughters of Jove (ruler of the gods), commonly associated with the seasons and the principle of order.
8. Venus, whose handmaids were the three Graces: Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne. Their names mean "the brilliant one," "she who brings flowers," and "she who rejoices the heart."
9. I.e., as you are accustomed to sing to Venus, so sing to my bride.
1. Her bridegroom, i.e., the speaker of the poem.
2. Usually, Zeus (Jove) was considered father of the Muses; in contrast, Spenser names Phoebus as their father.
3. Primitive fiddle.

That all the sences they doe ravish quite,
The whyles the boyes run up and downe the street,
Crying aloud with strong confusèd noyce,
As if it were one voyce.
140 Hymen iô Hymen, Hymen[4] they do shout,
That even to the heavens theyr shouting shrill
Doth reach, and all the firmament doth fill,
To which the people standing all about,
As in approvance doe thereto applaud
145 And loud advaunce her laud,° praise
And evermore they Hymen Hymen sing,
That al the woods them answer and theyr eccho ring.

Loe where she comes along with portly° pace, stately
Lyke Phoebe[5] from her chamber of the East,
150 Arysing forth to run her mighty race,
Clad all in white, that seemes° a virgin best. befits
So well it her beseemes that ye would weene° think
Some angell she had beene.
Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre,
155 Sprinckled with perle, and perling° flowres a tweene, winding
Doe lyke a golden mantle her attyre,
And being crownèd with a girland° greene, garland
Seeme lyke some mayden Queene.
Her modest eyes abashèd to behold
160 So many gazers, as on her do stare,
Upon the lowly ground affixèd are.
Ne dare lift up her countenance too bold,
But blush to heare her prayses sung so loud,
So farre from being proud.
165 Nathlesse° doe ye still loud her prayses sing, nevertheless
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Tell me ye merchants daughters did ye see
So fayre a creature in your towne before?
So sweet, so lovely, and so mild as she,
170 Adornd with beautyes grace and vertues store,° wealth
Her goodly eyes lyke Saphyres shining bright,
Her forehead yvory white,
Her cheekes lyke apples which the sun hath rudded,
Her lips lyke cherryes charming men to byte,
175 Her brest like to a bowle of creame uncrudded,° uncurdled
Her paps lyke lyllies budded,
Her snowie necke lyke to a marble towre,
And all her body lyke a pallace fayre,
Ascending uppe with many a stately stayre,
180 To honors seat and chastities sweet bowre.[6]

4. Ritual exclamation at weddings in antiquity (see note 6, p. 196).
5. Another name for the virgin moon goddess, Diana, and thus an anticipation of night's coming. Phoebe was associated with chastity, a concept that Protestants defined as belonging not only to virgins but also to faithful wives.
6. The head, seat of reason. The catalog, or blazon, of the beloved's beauties harks back to the biblical Song of Solomon (4–8) and was a convention of love poetry.

Why stand ye still ye virgins in amaze,
Upon her so to gaze,
Whiles ye forget your former lay to sing,
To which the woods did answer and your eccho ring?

185 But if ye saw that which no eyes can see,
The inward beauty of her lively spright,° spirit
Garnisht with heavenly guifts° of high degree, gifts
Much more then would ye wonder at that sight,
And stand astonisht lyke to those which red° saw
190 Medusaes mazeful hed.[7]
There dwels sweet love and constant chastity,
Unspotted fayth and comely womanhed,
Regard of honour and mild modesty,
There Vertue raynes as Queene in royal throne,
195 And giveth lawes alone.
The which the base° affections° doe obay, lowly / emotions
And yeeld theyr services unto her will,
Ne thought of thing uncomely ever may
Thereto approch to tempt her mind to ill.
200 Had ye once seene these her celestial threasures,
And unrevealèd pleasures,
Then would ye wonder and her prayses sing,
That al the woods should answer and your echo ring.

Open the temple gates unto my love,
205 Open them wide that she may enter in,
And all the postes adorne as doth behove,[8]
And all the pillours deck with girlands° trim, garlands
For to recyve this Saynt with honour dew,
That commeth in to you.
210 With trembling steps and humble reverence,
She commeth in, before th' almighties vew:
Of her ye virgins learne obedience,
When so ye come into those holy places,
To humble your proud faces;
215 Bring her up to th' high altar that she may,
The sacred ceremonies there partake,
The which do endlesse matrimony make,
And let the roring Organs loudly play
The praises of the Lord in lively notes,
220 The whiles with hollow throates
The Choristers the joyous Antheme sing,
That al the woods may answere and their eccho ring.

Behold whiles she before the altar stands
Hearing the holy priest that to her speakes
225 And blesseth her with his two happy hands,
How the red roses flush up in her cheekes,

7. In Greek mythology, the Gorgon Medusa had serpents for hair; whoever looked upon her was turned to stone. She was sometimes associated with chastity.
8. I.e., as is fitting.

And the pure snow with goodly vermill° stayne, scarlet
Like crimsin dyde in grayne,[9]
That even th' Angels which continually,
230 About the sacred Altare doe remaine,
Forget their service and about her fly,
Ofte peeping in her face that seemes more fayre,
The more they on it stare.
But her sad° eyes still fastened on the ground, sober
235 Are governèd with goodly modesty,
That suffers not one looke to glaunce awry,
Which may let in a little thought unsownd.° unsound
Why blush ye love to give to me your hand,
The pledge of all our band?° bond
240 Sing ye sweet Angels, Alleluya sing,
That all the woods may answere and your eccho ring.

Now al is done; bring home the bride againe,
Bring home the triumph of our victory,
Bring home with you the glory of her gaine,[1]
245 With joyance bring her and with jollity.
Never had man more joyfull day then this,
Whom heaven would heape with blis.
Make feast therefore now all this live long day,
This day for ever to me holy is,
250 Poure out the wine without restraint or stay,
Poure not by cups, but by the belly full,
Poure out to all that wull,° will
And sprinkle all the postes and wals with wine,
That they may sweat, and drunken be withall.
255 Crowne ye God Bacchus[2] with a coronall,° garland
And Hymen also crowne with wreathes of vine,
And let the Graces daunce unto the rest;
For they can doo it best:
The whiles the maydens doe theyr carroll sing,
260 To which the woods shal answer and theyr eccho ring.

Ring ye the bels, ye yong men of the towne,
And leave your wonted° labors for this day: usual
This day is holy; doe ye write it downe,
That ye for ever it remember may.
265 This day the sunne is in his chiefest hight,
With Barnaby the bright,[3]
From whence declining daily by degrees,
He somewhat loseth of his heat and light,
When once the Crab[4] behind his back he sees.
270 But for this time it ill ordainèd was,
To chose the longest day in all the yeare,
And shortest night, when longest fitter weare:

9. I.e., dyed with colorfast dye.
1. I.e., of gaining her.
2. Roman god of wine and ecstasy.
3. St. Barnabas's Day (June 11) was also the day of the summer solstice (the longest day of the year) in the calendar used during Spenser's time.
4. Cancer the Crab, the fourth constellation in the zodiac, through which the sun passes in July.

Yet never day so long, but late° would passe. finally
Ring ye the bels, to make it weare away,
275 And bonefiers° make all day, bonfires
And daunce about them, and about them sing:
That all the woods may answer, and your eccho ring.

Ah when will this long weary day have end,
And lende me leave to come unto my love?
280 How slowly do the houres theyr numbers spend?
How slowly does sad Time his feathers move?
Hast° thee O fayrest Planet to thy home[5] haste
Within the Westerne fome:
Thy tyred steedes long since have need of rest.
285 Long though it be, at last I see it gloome,
And the bright evening star with golden creast° crest
Appeare out of the East.
Fayre childe of beauty, glorious lampe of love
That all the host of heaven in rankes doost lead,
290 And guydest lovers through the nights dread,
How chearefully thou lookest from above,
And seemst to laugh atweene thy twinkling light
As joying in the sight
Of these glad many which for joy doe sing,
295 That all the woods them answer and their echo ring.

Now ceasse ye damsels[6] your delights forepast;
Enough is it, that all the day was youres:
Now day is doen, and night is nighing fast:
Now bring the Bryde into the brydall boures.° bowers, chambers
300 Now night is come,[7] now soone her disaray,° undress
And in her bed her lay;
Lay her in lillies and in violets,
And silken courteins° over her display, curtains
And odourd° sheetes, and Arras[8] coverlets. perfumed
305 Behold how goodly my faire love does ly
In proud humility;
Like unto Maia,[9] when as Jove her tooke,
In Tempe, lying on the flowry gras,
Twixt sleepe and wake, after she weary was,
310 With bathing in the Acidalian brooke.
Now it is night, ye damsels may be gon,
And leave my love alone,
And leave likewise your former lay to sing:
The woods no more shal answere, nor your echo ring.

5. The sun, drawn in its chariot (by "tyred steedes," line 284); in Ptolemaic astronomy, still often accepted in Spenser's time, the sun was one of the planets, which revolved about Earth.
6. I.e., all the aforementioned nymphs and spirits.
7. On the placement of this phrase, see the end of note 1, p. 195.
8. A northeastern French city famous for its tapestries.
9. Said to be the most beautiful and modest of the Pleiades, who were, in Greek mythology, the seven daughters of Atlas and the Oceanid Pleione; Maia was the mother of the god Hermes (and Jove was his father, though Jove's encounter with Maia did not traditionally take place in the Vale of Tempe, in Thessaly). The "Acidalian brooke" (line 310) is associated with Venus.

315 Now welcome night, thou night so long expected,° awaited
That long daies labour doest at last defray,° pay for
And all my cares, which cruell love collected,
Hast sumd in one, and cancellèd for aye:
Spread thy broad wing over my love and me,
320 That no man may us see,
And in thy sable mantle us enwrap,
From feare of perrill and foule horror free.
Let no false treason seeke us to entrap,
Nor any dread disquiet once annoy
325 The safety of our joy:
But let the night be calme and quietsome,
Without tempestuous storms or sad° afray:° dark / terror
Lyke as when Jove with fayre Alcmena[1] lay,
When he begot the great Tirynthian groome:
330 Or lyke as when he with thy selfe did lie,
And begot Majesty.[2]
And let the mayds and yongmen cease to sing:
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr eccho ring.

Let no lamenting cryes, nor dolefull teares,
335 Be heard all night within nor yet without:
Ne let false whispers breeding hidden feares,
Breake gentle sleepe with misconceivèd dout.° fear
Let no deluding dreames, nor dreadful sights
Make sudden sad affrights;
340 Ne let housefyres, nor lightnings helpelesse harmes,
Ne let the Pouke,[3] nor other evill sprights,
Ne let mischìvous witches with theyr charmes,
Ne let hob Goblins, names whose sence we see not,
Fray° us with things that be not. frighten
345 Let not the shriech Oule, nor the Storke be heard:
Nor the night Raven[4] that still° deadly yels, continually
Nor damnèd ghosts cald up with mighty spels,
Nor griesly vultures make us once affeard:
Ne let th' unpleasant Quyre of Frogs still croking
350 Make us to wish theyr choking.
Let none of these theyr drery accents sing;
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr eccho ring.

But let stil Silence trew night watches keepe,
That sacred peace may in assurance rayne,
355 And tymely sleep, when it is tyme to sleepe,
May poure his limbs forth on your pleasant playne,° plain
The whiles an hundred little wingèd loves,° cupids (or amoretti)

1. According to several versions of the story, Jove ordered the sun not to shine to make the night longer; the "Tirynthian groome" conceived by Alcmena was Heracles.
2. Spenser invents this myth of Night's creation. Ovid identifies Night's parents as Honor and Reverence (Fasti 5.23).
3. Puck, also called Hobgoblin; a small supernatural creature popular in English folklore and a character in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream.
4. The night raven and the owl were birds of ill omen; the stork was sometimes figured as an avenger of adultery.

Like divers fethered doves,
Shall fly and flutter round about your bed,
360 And in the secret darke, that none reproves,
Their prety stealthes shal worke, and snares shal spread
To filch away sweet snatches of delight,
Conceald through covert night.
Ye sonnes of Venus, play your sports at will,
365 For greedy pleasure, carelesse of your toyes,° amorous sports
Thinks more upon her paradise of joyes,
Then° what ye do, albe it good or ill. than
All night therefore attend your merry play,
For it will soone be day:
370 Now none doth hinder you, that say or sing,
Ne will the woods now answer, nor your Eccho ring.

Who is the same, which at my window peepes?
Or whose is that faire face, that shines so bright,
Is it not Cinthia,[5] she that never sleepes,
375 But walkes about high heaven al the night?
O fayrest goddesse, do thou not envy̑
My love with me to spy:
For thou likewise didst love, though now unthought,[6]
And for a fleece of woll,° which privily, wool
380 The Latmian shephard once unto thee brought,
His pleasures with thee wrought.
Therefore to us be favorable now;
And sith° of wemens labours thou hast charge, since
And generation goodly dost enlarge,
385 Encline thy will t' effect our wishfull vow,
And the chast wombe informe with timely seed,
That may our comfort breed:
Till which we cease our hopefull° hap° to sing, hoped for / fate
Ne let the woods us answere, nor our Eccho ring.

390 And thou great Juno,[7] which with awful° might awe-inspiring
The lawes of wedlock still dost patronize,
And the religion° of the faith first plight sanctity
With sacred rites hast taught to solemnize:[8]
And eeke for comfort often callèd art
395 Of women in their smart,° pains of childbirth
Eternally bind thou this lovely° band,° loving / bond
And all thy blessings unto us impart.
And thou glad Genius,[9] in whose gentle hand,
The bridale bowre and geniall° bed remaine, marriage

5. Another name for Diana, the moon goddess, who was associated with chastity and also with Queen Elizabeth; see also "Phoebe," line 149 and note 5 there.
6. Not thought of. According to some versions of the story, Cynthia and Endymion, the "Latmian shephard" (line 380), made love on Mt. Latmos, after he brought her a fleece. In revenge, Zeus made Endymion sleep eternally.
7. Roman goddess of marriage and childbirth.
8. I.e., with the marriage vows.
9. A spirit presiding over generation. By invoking both Juno and Genius as patrons of the marriage bed, Spenser draws also on the belief that each individual is watched over from birth by a tutelary spirit called a "Juno" (for girls) or a "Genius" (for boys).

400 Without blemish or staine,
And the sweet pleasures of theyr loves delight
With secret ayde doest succour and supply,
Till they bring forth the fruitfull progeny,
Send us the timely fruit of this same night.
405 And thou fayre Hebe,[1] and thou Hymen free,
Grant that it may so be.
Til which we cease your further prayse to sing,
Ne any woods shal answer, nor your Eccho ring.

And ye high heavens, the temple of the gods,
410 In which a thousand torches flaming bright
Doe burne, that to us wretched earthly clods,
In dreadful darknesse lend desirèd light;
And all ye powers which in the same remayne,
More then we men can fayne,° imagine
415 Poure out your blessing on us plentiously,
And happy influence upon us raine,
That we may raise a large posterity,
Which from the earth, which they may long possesse,
With lasting happinesse,
420 Up to your haughty pallaces may mount,
And for the guerdon° of theyr glorious merit reward
May heavenly tabernacles there inherit,
Of blessed Saints for to increase the count.
So let us rest, sweet love, in hope of this,
425 And cease till then our tymely joyes to sing,
The woods no more us answer, nor our eccho ring.

Song made in lieu of many ornaments,[2]
With which my love should duly have bene dect,° adorned
Which cutting off through hasty accidents,
430 Ye would not stay your dew time to expect,[3]
But promist both to recompens,[4]
Be unto her a goodly ornament,
And for short time an endlesse moniment.

1595

1. Daughter of Juno and goddess of youth.
2. These last seven lines are the poem's envoy, a traditional concluding verse paragraph in which the poet addresses and bids farewell to the work of art ("song") just completed. Spenser's envoy is full of puns and syntactical complexities expressing the poet's mingled attitudes of humility, impatience, and pride in his achievement of creating an "ornament" that is also a permanent monument for swiftly passing time.
3. Two possible readings: the thing being prematurely ended ("cut off") through sudden or rushed ("hasty") events or contingencies ("accidents") may be the poem itself, ended before it was really ready to be born ("Ye would not stay" [remain] to "expect" [await] your due time); or these lines may describe the other ornaments or wedding gifts for which this poem is modestly said to substitute, i.e., those other gifts didn't arrive in time for the bride to deck herself out in them appropriately ("duly," line 428—but that adverb, like the adjective "dew," has multiple meanings).
4. For the fault of a premature "cutting off," the poet offers the "recompense" of the song; the referents of "both" are open to interpretation; possibly, the poet is seeking to fulfill a promise or repay a debt both to his bride and to time.

FULKE GREVILLE, LORD BROOKE
1554–1628

From Caelica[1]

You little stars that live in skies
And glory in Apollo's[2] glory,
In whose aspècts conjoinèd lies
The heaven's will and nature's story,[3]
5 Joy to be likened to those eyes,[4]
Which eyes make all eyes glad or sorry;
For when you force thoughts from above,
These overrule your force by love.

And thou, O Love, which in these eyes
10 Hast married Reason with Affection,
And made them saints of Beauty's skies,
Where joys are shadows of perfection,
Lend me thy wings that I may rise
Up, not by worth, but thy election;[5]
15 For I have vowed in strangest fashion
To love and never seek compassion.

ca. 1580 1633

The nurse-life° wheat within his green husk growing, life-fostering
Flatters our hope, and tickles our desire,
Nature's true riches in sweet beauties showing,
Which set all hearts, with labor's love, on fire.

5 No less fair is the wheat when golden ear
Shows unto hope the joys of near enjoying;
Fair and sweet is the bud, more sweet and fair
The rose, which proves that time is not destroying.

Caelica, your youth, the morning of delight,
10 Enamel'd o'er with beauties white and red,
All sense and thoughts did to belief invite,

1. Heavenly (Latin). The title of Greville's poetic sequence refers to one of three ladies he addresses in the poems; the others are Cynthia and Myra. Heavily influenced by Sidney's Astrophil and Stella (see p. 213), the 110 poems in the first edition of Caelica treat religious and political themes as well as erotic ones.
2. Greek and Roman god of the sun; here, the sun itself.
3. As in astrology. The "aspect" of a star or planet was its position in the sky from an observation point on Earth. When two heavenly bodies occupied approximately the same position, their aspects were said to be "conjoined" or "in conjunction," a circumstance thought to exert a powerful influence ("the heaven's will") on mundane affairs ("nature's story").
4. I.e., the stars.
5. Calvinist theology held that salvation depended not on human merit but on "election" by God.

That love and glory there are brought to bed;
And your ripe year's love-noon; he goes no higher,[6]
Turns all the spirits of man into desire.

JOHN LYLY
1554–1606

Cupid and My Campaspe[1]

Cupid and my Campaspe played
At cards for kisses; Cupid paid.
He stakes his quiver, bow, and arrows,
His mother's doves and team of sparrows,
5 Loses them too; then down he throws
The coral of his lip, the rose
Growing on 's cheek (but none knows how),
With these the crystal of his brow,
And then the dimple of his chin:
10 All these did my Campaspe win.
At last he set her both his eyes;
She won, and Cupid blind did rise.
Oh Love! has she done this to thee?
What shall (alas) become of me?

1632

Oh, For a Bowl of Fat Canary[2]

Oh, for a bowl of fat Canary,
Rich Palermo, sparkling Sherry,
Some nectar else, from Juno's dairy;[3]
Oh, these draughts would make us merry!

5 Oh, for a wench (I deal in faces,
And in other daintier things);
Tickled am I with her embraces,
Fine dancing in such fairy rings.[4]

6. I.e., your year or present age is love's noon; he (the morning sun) goes no higher.
1. This song appears in act 3, scene 5 of Lyly's play Campaspe (published in 1584), which tells the story of Alexander the Great's love for his Theban captive, Campaspe. Sung by Apelles, the painter who falls in love with Campaspe while painting her portrait, the song expresses his erotic frustration. Cupid: Roman god of erotic love; son of Venus, goddess of love and beauty.
2. Also from Campaspe (see note 1 above). In act 1, scene 2, three servant boys (Granichus, Psyllus, and Manes) sing this song as they prepare to feast at someone else's expense. Each boy sings one stanza, and all three sing the final verse. Fat Canary: well-bodied, light, sweet wine.
3. Nectar: the drink of the gods, hence coming from the "dairy" of Juno, queen of the gods in Roman mythology. Palermo: a wine from Palermo, in Sicily.
4. Circles of grass, differing in color from the surrounding grass; a phenomenon commonly supposed to be caused by dancing fairies.

Oh, for a plump fat leg of mutton,
10 Veal, lamb, capon, pig, and coney;[5]
None is happy but a glutton,
None an ass but who wants money.

Wines indeed and girls are good,
But brave victuals° feast the blood; provisions, food
15 For wenches, wine, and lusty cheer,
Jove[6] would leap down to surfeit here.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY
1554–1586

Ye Goatherd Gods[1]

STREPHON.[2] Ye goatherd gods, that love the grassy mountains,
Ye nymphs which haunt the springs in pleasant valleys,
Ye satyrs[3] joyed with free and quiet forests,
Vouchsafe your silent ears to plaining music,
5 Which to my woes gives still an early morning,
And draws the dolor on till weary evening.

KLAIUS. O Mercury, foregoer to the evening,
O heavenly huntress[4] of the savage mountains,
O lovely star, entitled of the morning,
10 While that my voice doth fill these woeful valleys,
Vouchsafe your silent ears to plaining music,
Which oft hath Echo[5] tired in secret forests.

STREPHON. I, that was once free burgess° of the forests, citizen
Where shade from sun, and sport I sought in evening,
15 I, that was once esteemed for pleasant music,
Am banished now among the monstrous mountains
Of huge despair, and foul affliction's valleys,
Am grown a screech owl[6] to myself each morning.

5. Rabbit. Capon: a castrated rooster, especially one fattened for eating.
6. Or Jupiter, chief Roman god.
1. This poem is in the form of a double sestina, two sets of six six-line stanzas, with a triplet concluding the whole. The same six key words end the lines of each stanza; their order is always a permutation of the order in the stanza just preceding: the pattern is 6 1 5 2 4 3, i.e., the last word of line 1 of any stanza is always the same as the last word of line 6 in the preceding stanza. Line 2 ends like line 1 of the preceding stanza; line 3 like line 5; line 4 like line 2; line 5 like line 4; and line 6 like line 3. All six key words appear in the triplet in the same order as that of the first and seventh stanzas.
2. Strephon and Klaius are shepherds, both in love with the absent Urania, in Sidney's heroic romance Arcadia, in which this poem appears.
3. In Greek mythology, woodland gods, usually having the head and torso of a man and the lower body of a goat; commonly associated with merriment and lust. Nymphs: minor nature goddesses.
4. The goddess Diana, the moon. Mercury: the evening star.
5. A nymph who was punished for her excessive talking by being deprived of her power of independent speech; when she fell in love with the youth Narcissus, she could express her (unrequited) feelings only by echoing his words.
6. Named for the sound of its voice and considered a bird of ill omen.

KLAIUS. I, that was once delighted every morning,
20 Hunting the wild inhabiters of forests,
I, that was once the music of these valleys,
So darkened am that all my day is evening,
Heartbroken so, that molehills seem high mountains
And fill the vales with cries instead of music.

25 STREPHON. Long since, alas, my deadly swannish[7] music
Hath made itself a crier of the morning,
And hath with wailing strength climbed highest mountains;
Long since my thoughts more desert be than forests,
Long since I see my joys come to their evening,
30 And state thrown down to overtrodden valleys.

KLAIUS. Long since the happy dwellers of these valleys
Have prayed me leave my strange exclaiming music,
Which troubles their day's work and joys of evening;
Long since I hate the night, more hate the morning;
35 Long since my thoughts chase me like beasts in forests,
And make me wish myself laid under mountains.

STREPHON. Meseems° I see the high and stately mountains it seems to me
Transform themselves to low dejected valleys;
Meseems I hear in these ill-changèd forests
40 The nightingales do learn of owls their music;
Meseems I feel the comfort of the morning
Turned to the mortal serene[8] of an evening.

KLAIUS. Meseems I see a filthy cloudy evening
As soon as sun begins to climb the mountains;
45 Meseems I feel a noisome° scent, the morning offensive
When I do smell the flowers of these valleys;
Meseems I hear, when I do hear sweet music,
The dreadful cries of murdered men in forests.

STREPHON. I wish to fire the trees of all these forests;
50 I give the sun a last farewell each evening;
I curse the fiddling finders-out of music;
With envy I do hate the lofty mountains,
And with despite despise the humble valleys;
I do detest night, evening, day, and morning.

55 KLAIUS. Curse to myself my prayer is, the morning;
My fire is more than can be made with forests,
My state more base than are the basest valleys.
I wish no evenings more to see, each evening;
Shamèd, I hate myself in sight of mountains
60 And stop mine ears, lest I grow mad with music.

7. The swan was supposed to sing only just before it died.

8. Damp evening air, thought to produce sickness (mortal: deadly). The stress is on the first syllable.

STREPHON. For she whose parts maintained a perfect music,
Whose beauties shined more than the blushing
morning,
Who much did pass[9] in state the stately mountains,
In straightness passed the cedars of the forests,
65 Hath cast me, wretch, into eternal evening
By taking her two suns[1] from these dark valleys.

KLAIUS. For she, with whom compared, the Alps are valleys,
She, whose least word brings from the spheres their music,[2]
At whose approach the sun rose in the evening,
70 Who where she went bare° in her forehead morning, bore
Is gone, is gone, from these our spoilèd forests,
Turning to deserts our best pastured mountains.

STREPHON. These mountains witness shall, so shall these valleys,

KLAIUS. These forests eke,° made wretched by our music, also 75 Our morning hymn this is, and song at evening.

What Length of Verse?[3]

What length of verse can serve brave° Mopsa's good to show, splendid Whose virtues strange, and beauties such, as no man them may know?
Thus shrewdly° burden, then, how can my Muse[4] escape? severally
The gods must help, and precious things must serve to show her shape.

5 Like great god Saturn, fair, and like fair Venus, chaste;[5]
As smooth as Pan, as Juno mild, like goddess Iris fast.[6]

9. Surpass.
1. I.e., her eyes.
2. Music of the spheres: a popular theory during the period, based on the Pythagorean idea that the movement of the celestial bodies produced a musical harmony, inaudible to human ears.
3. This fourteen-line poem parodies the sonnet form and a number of conventions of pastoral love poetry. Written in poulter's measure (see "Versification," p. 2047), the poem occurs early in the first version of Sidney's pastoral romance, a version known now as the Old Arcadia. The poem is attributed to Alethes, whose name plays on a Greek word meaning "truth" or "sincerity"; in his verses, Alethes ironically praises "Mistress Mopsa," ugly daughter of boorish rural parents. Mopsa's qualities are associated with those of the verse itself. Although popular for much of the sixteenth century, poulter's measure is here defined as antiquated and "vulgar." For a different perspective on the meter, see Queen Elizabeth I, "The Doubt of Future Foes Exiles My Present Joy" (p. 142).
4. Source of poetic inspiration.
5. This line initiates an inversion of classical gods' and goddesses' qualities: Saturn is ugly; Venus, unchaste; Cupid, blind; Vulcan, lame; and Momus, god of laughter and rebuke, censorious.
6. Iris is goddess of the rainbow, the ephemeral quality of which leads us to interpret the adjective spelled "faste" in several manuscripts as "fast"—meaning "steadfast"—rather than as "faced." William Ringler and several other modern editors choose "faced," and Ringler attempts to make this choice work by emending "Iris" (the reading of all manuscripts) to "Isis," an Egyptian goddess sometimes depicted as "cow-faced." But Ringler's reason for rejecting "Iris"—that she was "fast" in the sense of speedy, and hence the line so read would lose its irony—disappears if one reads "fast" as "steadfast."

With Cupid she foresees, and goes° god Vulcan's pace; walks with
And for a taste of all these gifts, she borrows Momus' grace.

Her forehead jacinth-like, her cheeks of opal[7] hue,
10 Her twinkling eyes bedecked with pearl, her lips of sapphire blue,
Her hair pure crapall stone,[8] her mouth, O heavenly wide,
Her skin like burnished gold, her hands like silver ore untried.

As for those parts unknown, which hidden sure are best,
Happy be they which will believe, and never seek the rest.

ca. 1580 1593

The Nightingale[9]

The nightingale, as soon as April bringeth
Unto her rested sense a perfect waking,
While late° bare earth, proud of new clothing, springeth, recently
Sings out her woes, a thorn her song-book making,
5 And mournfully bewailing,
Her throat in tunes expresseth
What grief her breast oppresseth
For Tereus' force on her chaste will prevailing.
O Philomela fair, O take some gladness,
10 That here is juster cause of plaintful sadness:
Thine earth now springs, mine fadeth;
Thy thorn without, my thorn my heart invadeth.

Alas, she hath no other cause of anguish
But Tereus' love, on her by strong hand wroken,[1]
15 Wherein she suffering, all her spirits languish;
Full womanlike complains her will was broken.
But I, who daily craving,
Cannot have to content me,
Have more cause to lament me,
20 Since wanting is more woe than too much having.
O Philomela fair, O take some gladness,
That here is juster cause of plaintful sadness:
Thine earth now springs, mine fadeth;
Thy thorn without, my thorn my heart invadeth.

ca. 1581 1598

7. Many-colored. Jacinth-like: yellow, reddish orange, or blue.
8. With a pun on crap, the line refers to chelonitis—according to bestiaries, a stone in the head of a frog. The stone was described as green or tortoise-shell colored.
9. Philomela, the nightingale, who sings a mournful song in the springtime. According to classical mythology, Philomela was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not reveal his crime. She wove the story in a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. She was later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus. Sidney follows the version in Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.424 ff.
1. Old past participle of wreak, "to urge or force upon."

Ring Out Your Bells

Ring out your bells, let mourning shows be spread,
For Love is dead.
All Love is dead, infected
With plague of deep disdain;
5 Worth as naught worth rejected,
And Faith fair scorn[2] doth gain.
From so ungrateful fancy,
From such a female franzy,° — frenzy
From them that use men thus,
10 Good Lord, deliver us!

Weep, neighbors, weep; do you not hear it said
That Love is dead?
His deathbed peacock's folly,[3]
His winding sheet[4] is shame,
15 His will false-seeming holy,
His sole exec'tor blame.
From so ungrateful fancy, . . .

Let dirge be sung and trentals[5] rightly read,
For Love is dead.
20 Sir Wrong his tomb ordaineth
My mistress, marble heart,
Which epitaph containeth,
"Her eyes were once his dart."
From so ungrateful fancy, . . .

25 Alas, I lie, rage hath this error bred;
Love is not dead.
Love is not dead, but sleepeth
In her unmatchèd mind,
Where she his counsel keepeth,
30 Till due desert° she find. — reward
Therefore from so vile fancy,
To call such wit a franzy,
Who Love can temper thus,
Good Lord, deliver us!

ca. 1581 — 1598

2. I.e., scorn from a fair lady.
3. I.e., ostentatious pride, as peacocks were a symbol of pride.
4. His shroud.
5. A series of thirty Masses for the dead, designed to mitigate the pains of purgatory; in Sidney's day, no longer accepted as a service by the Church of England.

FROM ASTROPHIL AND STELLA[6]

Loving in truth, and fain° in verse my love to show, — eager
That she dear she might take some pleasure of my pain,
Pleasure might cause her read, reading might make her know,
Knowledge might pity win, and pity grace obtain,
5 I sought fit words to paint the blackest face of woe:
Studying inventions[7] fine, her wits to entertain,
Oft turning others' leaves, to see if thence would flow
Some fresh and fruitful showers upon my sunburned brain.
But words came halting forth, wanting Invention's stay;° — support
10 Invention, Nature's child, fled stepdame Study's blows;
And others' feet[8] still seemed but strangers in my way.
Thus, great with child to speak, and helpless in my throes,[9]
Biting my truant pen, beating myself for spite:
"Fool," said my Muse[1] to me, "look in thy heart, and write."

14

Alas, have I not pain enough, my friend,
Upon whose breast a fiercer gripe° doth tire° — vulture / tear
Than did on him who first stale° down the fire, — stole
While Love[2] on me doth all his quiver spend,
5 But with your rhubarb° words you must contend — cynical
To grieve me worse, in saying that Desire
Doth plunge my well-formed soul even in the mire
Of sinful thoughts, which do in ruin end?
If that be sin which doth the manners frame,[3]
10 Well stayed° with truth in word and faith of deed, — supported
Ready of wit, and fearing naught but shame;
If that be sin which in fixed hearts doth breed
A loathing of all loose unchastity,
Then love is sin, and let me sinful be.

6. Starlover and Star (Latin). The first of the great Elizabethan sonnet cycles that relied heavily on the conventions developed by the Italian poet Petrarch (1304–1374), Astrophil and Stella has 108 sonnets and eleven songs. The sequence alludes to Sidney's ambiguous relationship with Penelope Devereux, who married Lord Robert Rich in 1581. It was circulated in manuscript form during Sidney's lifetime.
7. In art and literary composition, the devising of a subject or idea by the exercise of the intellect or imagination.
8. With a pun on the units of poetic measure (called feet).
9. I.e., birth-throes.
1. Source of poetic inspiration.
2. Cupid, Roman god of erotic love. Him . . . fire: In Greek mythology, Prometheus, for having stolen fire for man's benefit, was chained to a rock and preyed upon daily by a vulture that tore at his vitals.
3. Which builds character (manners: morals).

21[4]

Your words my friend (right healthful caustics[5]) blame
My young mind marred, whom Love doth windlass° so, ensnare
That mine own writings like bad servants show
My wits, quick in vain thoughts, in virtue lame,
5 That Plato I read for nought, but if° he tame unless
Such coltish gyres,[6] that to my birth I owe
Nobler desires, least° else that friendly foe, lest
Great expectation,[7] wear a train of shame.
For since mad March great promise made of me,
10 If now the May of my years much decline,
What can be hoped my harvest time will be?
Sure you say well, your wisdom's golden mine
Dig deep with learning's spade, now tell me this,
Hath this world ought° so fair as Stella is? anything

25

The wisest scholar of the wight° most wise creature
By Phoebus' doom,[8] with sugared sentence says
That Virtue, if it once met with our eyes,
Strange flames of love it in our souls would raise;
5 But, for that man with pain this truth descries,[9]
While he each thing in sense's balance weighs,
And so nor will nor can behold those skies
Which inward sun to heroic mind displays,
Virtue of late, with virtuous care to stir
10 Love of herself, takes Stella's shape, that she[1]
To mortal eyes might sweetly shine in her.[2]
It is most true, for since I her did see,
Virtue's great beauty in that face I prove,° experience
And find th'effect, for I do burn in love.

31

With how sad steps, Oh Moon, thou climb'st the skies,
How silently, and with how wan° a face! pale
What may it be, that even in heav'nly place

4. One of several sonnets addressed to a friend—perhaps the English poet Fulke Greville (1554–1628; see pp. 206–07)—who takes a skeptical view of the poet's love.
5. Medicines used for burning away diseased tissue.
6. Youthful gyrations; cf. Plato, Phaedrus 254, where the charioteer Reason reins in the horses of Passion.
7. Hope of prestigious public employment and/or recognition. Birth: position in society; Sidney was the eldest son in a rich and powerful aristocratic family.
8. Judgment. The "wight most wise" was Socrates, so called by the oracle of Apollo (Phoebus) at Delphi. His "wisest scholar," or pupil, was Plato, who (in Phaedrus 250D) provides the basis for lines 3–8.
9. Discovers or perceives. For that: because.
1. I.e., Virtue.
2. I.e., Stella.

That busy archer[3] his sharp arrows tries?
5 Sure, if that long-with-love-acquainted eyes
Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case;
I read it in thy looks: thy languished grace,
To me that feel the like, thy state descries.° reveals
Then even of fellowship, Oh Moon, tell me,
10 Is constant love deemed there but want of wit?
Are beauties there as proud as here they be?
Do they above love to be loved, and yet
Those lovers scorn whom that love doth possess?
Do they call virtue there ungratefulness?[4]

39

Come sleep, Oh sleep, the certain knot of peace,
The baiting place[5] of wit, the balm of woe,
The poor man's wealth, the prisoner's release,
Th'indifferent° judge between the high and low; impartial
5 With shield of proof[6] shield me from out the prease° press, multitude
Of those fierce darts Despair at me doth throw;
Oh make in me[7] those civil wars to cease;
I will good tribute pay, if thou do so.
Take thou of me smooth pillows, sweetest bed,
10 A chamber deaf to noise and blind to light,
A rosy garland and a weary head;
And if these things, as being thine by right,
Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me,
Livelier° than elsewhere, Stella's image see. more lifelike

47

What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?
Can those black beams such burning marks[8] engrave
In my free side? or am I born a slave,
Whose neck becomes° such yoke of tyranny? befits
5 Or want I sense to feel my misery?
Or sprite,° disdain of such disdain to have? spirit
Who for long faith, though daily help I crave,
May get no alms but scorn of beggary.
Virtue, awake! Beauty but beauty is;
10 I may, I must, I can, I will, I do
Leave following that which it is gain to miss.
Let her go. Soft, but here she comes. Go to,
Unkind, I love you not! O me, that eye
Doth make my heart give to my tongue the lie!

3. I.e., Cupid.
4. I.e., do they give the name of virtue to ungratefulness?
5. Resting place on a journey.
6. Of proven strength.
7. The speaker is offering these things to Sleep as a tribute.
8. Brands; i.e., disdainful looks from his lover.

48

Soul's joy, bend not those morning stars° from me, Stella's eyes
Where virtue is made strong by beauty's might,
Where love is chasteness, pain doth learn delight,
And humbleness grows one with majesty.
5 Whatever may ensue, O let me be
Co-partner of the riches of that sight;
Let not mine eyes be hell-driv'n° from that light; driven to hell
O look, O shine, O let me die and see.
For though I oft my self of them bemoan,
10 That through my heart their beamy darts be gone,
Whose cureless wounds even now most freshly bleed,
Yet since my death wound is already got,
Dear[9] killer, spare not thy sweet cruel shot;
A kind of grace it is to slay with speed.

49

I on my horse, and Love on me, doth try
Our horsemanships, while by strange work I prove
A horseman to my horse, a horse to Love,
And now man's wrongs in me, poor beast, descry.° discern
5 The reins wherewith my rider doth me tie
Are humbled thoughts, which bit of reverence move,
Curbed[1] in with fear, but with gilt boss above
Of hope, which makes it seem fair to the eye.
The wand° is will; thou, fancy, saddle art, whip
10 Girt fast by memory; and while I spur
My horse, he spurs with sharp desire my heart;
He sits me fast, however I do stir;
And now hath made me to his hand so right
That in the manage[2] myself takes delight.

52

A strife is grown between Virtue and Love,
While each pretends° that Stella must be his: claims
Her eyes, her lips, her all, saith Love, do this,
Since they do wear his badge,[3] most firmly prove.
5 But Virtue thus that title doth disprove,
That Stella (O dear name) that Stella is
That virtuous soul, sure heir of heav'nly bliss;

9. With a pun on dear and deer.
1. The curb is a short chain or strap connecting the upper branches of the bit and ornamented, in this case, with a metal "boss" or decorative stud.
2. The schooling or handling of a horse.
3. Clothing or device worn to identify someone's (here, Cupid's) servants.

Not this fair outside, which our hearts doth move.
And therefore, though her beauty and her grace
10 Be Love's indeed, in Stella's self he may
By no pretense claim any manner° place. kind of
Well, Love, since this demur° our suit doth stay,° objection / detain
Let Virtue have that Stella's self; yet thus,
That Virtue but that body grant to us.

63

O Grammar rules, ô now your virtues show;
So children still read you with awful° eyes, awed
As my young Dove may in your precepts wise
Her grant to me, by her own virtue know.
5 For late with heart most high, with eyes most low,
I crav'd the thing which ever she denies:
She lightning Love, displaying Venus' skies,[4]
Least once should not be heard, twice said, No, No.
Sing then my Muse, now Io Pean[5] sing,
10 Heav'ns envy not at my high triumphing:
But Grammar's force with sweet success confirme,
For Grammar sayes (ô this deare Stella weigh,)
For Grammar sayes (to Grammar who says nay)
That in one speech two Negatives affirm.[6]

71

Who will in fairest book of Nature know
How virtue may best lodged in beauty be,
Let him but learn of love to read in thee,
Stella, those fair lines which true goodness show.
5 There shall he find all vices' overthrow,
Not by rude force, but sweetest sovereignty
Of reason, from whose light those night birds fly,
That inward sun in thine eyes shineth so.
And, not content to be perfection's heir
10 Thyself, dost strive all minds that way to move,
Who mark in thee what is in thee most fair.
So while thy beauty draws the heart to love,
As fast thy virtue bends that love to good.
"But ah," Desire still cries, "give me some food."

4. Venus is the Roman goddess of love and beauty. Some editors modernize "lightning" as "lightening," a present participle parallel to "displaying," but one can also read the word as a noun comparing Stella to lightning that "displays" the night sky.
5. A hymn of thanksgiving for victory. Ovid uses this phrase in the opening of the second book of the Ars Amatoria to celebrate success with a long-pursued love. Muse: source of poetic inspiration.
6. In several of the preceding sonnets, Stella has engaged in scholastic disputation; the poet's reasoning here is sophistic, since the lady's double "no" is emphatic rather than a grammatical double negative signifying "yes"—as it did in Latin, but not in Elizabethan English.

72

Desire, though thou my old companion art,
And oft so clings to my pure Love that I
One from the other scarcely can descry,° distinguish
While each doth blow the fire of my heart,
5 Now from thy fellowship I needs must part;
Venus is taught with Dian's[7] wings to fly;
I must no more in thy sweet passions lie;
Virtue's gold now must head my Cupid's dart.
Service and honor, wonder with delight,
10 Fear to offend, will worthy to appear,[8]
Care shining in mine eyes, faith in my sprite:° spirit
These things are let me by my only dear;
But thou, Desire, because thou wouldst have all,
Now banished art. But yet alas how shall?

Fourth Song

Only joy, now here you are,
Fit to hear and ease my care;
Let my whispering voice obtain,
Sweet reward for sharpest pain;
5 Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.[9]

Night hath closed all in her cloak,
Twinkling stars love-thoughts provoke:
Danger hence good care doth keep,
10 Jealousy itself doth sleep;
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

Better place no wit can find,
Cupid's[1] yoke to loose or bind:
15 These sweet flowers on fine bed too,
Us in their best language woo;
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

This small light the moon bestows,
20 Serves thy beams but to disclose,
So to raise my hap° more high; chances
Fear not else, none can us spy:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

7. Diana, Roman goddess of the moon and patron of chastity. Venus, goddess of love and beauty; mother of Cupid, god of erotic love.
8. The phrase can mean alternately "the desire to appear worthy" or "desire that is worthy to appear (i.e., not shameful)."
9. Stella's "reply" to Astrophil occurs after each stanza and becomes the refrain.
1. Roman god of erotic love.

25 That° you heard was but a mouse, what
Dumb sleep holdeth all the house;
Yet asleep, methinks they say,
Young folks, take time while you may:[2]
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
30 No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

Niggard° Time threats, if we miss miserly
This large offer of our bliss,
Long stay° ere he grant the same; wait
Sweet then, while each thing doth frame,° serve
35 Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

Your fair mother is abed,
Candles out, and curtains spread:
She thinks you do letters write.
40 Write, but first let me indite:° dictate
Take me to thee and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

Sweet, alas, why strive you thus?
Concord better fitteth us:
45 Leave to Mars[3] the force of hands,
Your power in your beauty stands;
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

Woe to me, and do you swear
50 Me to hate, but I forbear,
Cursèd be my destines all
That brought me so high to fall:
Soon with my death I will please thee.
No, no, no, no, my dear, let be.

Seventh Song

Whose senses in so evil consort,[4] their stepdame Nature lays,
That ravishing delight in them most sweet tunes do not raise;
Or if they do delight therein, yet are so cloyed° with wit, sated, burdened
As with sententious° lips to set a title vain on it: full of maxims
5 O let them hear these sacred tunes, and learn in wonder's schools,
To be (in things past bounds of wit) fools, if they be not fools.[5]

Who have so leaden eyes, as not to see sweet beauty's show,
Or seeing, have so wooden° wits, as not that worth to know; dull
Or knowing, have so muddy minds, as not to be in love;

2. An allusion to the traditional carpe diem (Latin, "seize the day") motif of seduction lyrics.
3. Roman god of war.
4. Company; accord, agreement.
5. I.e., the music will teach them (if they are not fools) that, in things that are beyond the limitations of reason and intellect ("wit"), they are deficient in understanding ("fools").

10 Or loving, have so frothy° thoughts, as eas'ly thence to move: shallow, trifling
Or let them see these heavenly beams, and in fair letters read
A lesson fit, both sight and skill, love and firm love to breed.

Hear then, but then with wonder hear; see but adoring see,
No mortal gifts, no earthly fruits, now here descended be;
15 See, do you see this face? a face? nay, image of the skies,
Of which the two life-giving lights[6] are figured in her eyes:
Hear you this soul-invading voice, and count it but a voice?
The very essence of their tunes, when Angels do rejoice.

90

Stella, think not that I by verse seek fame,
Who seek, who hope, who love, who live but thee;
Thine eyes my pride, thy lips my history;
If thou praise not, all other praise is shame.
5 Nor so ambitious am I, as to frame
A nest for my young praise in laurel tree:[7]
In truth I sweare, I wish not there should be
Graved in mine epitaph a Poet's name:
Nay if I would, could I just title make,
10 That any laud° to me thereof should grow, praise
Without° my plumes from others' wings I take. unless
For nothing from my wit or will doth flow,
Since all my words thy beauty doth endite,[8]
And love doth hold my hand, and makes me write.

107

Stella, since thou so right a princess art
Of all the powers which life bestows on me,
That ere by them aught° undertaken be anything
They first resort unto that sovereign part;
5 Sweet, for a while give respite to my heart,
Which pants as though it still should leap to thee,
And on my thoughts give thy lieutenancy
To[9] this great cause, which needs both use° and art, experience
And as a queen, who from her presence sends
10 Whom she employs, dismiss from thee my wit,
Till it have wrought what thy own will attends.[1]
On servants' shame oft master's blame doth sit.
Oh let not fools in me thy works reprove,
And scorning say, "See what it is to love."

ca. 1582 1591

6. I.e., the sun and the moon.
7. The laurel symbolized poetic achievement.
8. A variation of both indict (to proclaim) and indite (to inscribe or give literary form to).
9. I.e., delegate your authority to my thoughts so that they may pursue.
1. Is concerned about.

GEORGE PEELE
1557–1596

His Golden Locks Time Hath to Silver Turned[1]

His golden locks time hath to silver turned;
  Oh, time too swift, oh, swiftness never ceasing!
His youth 'gainst time and age hath ever spurned.° kicked
  But spurned in vain; youth waneth by increasing.
5 Beauty, strength, youth, are flowers but fading seen;
Duty, faith, love, are roots, and ever green.

His helmet now shall make a hive for bees,
  And lover's sonnets turned to holy psalms,
A man-at-arms must now serve on his knees,
10 And feed on prayers, which are age his[2] alms;
But though from court to cottage he depart,
His saint[3] is sure of his unspotted heart.

And when he saddest sits in homely cell,
  He'll teach his swains° this carol for a song: followers
15 Blest be the hearts that wish my sovereign well,
  Cursed be the souls that think her any wrong!
Goddess, allow this aged man his right,
To be your beadsman[4] now, that was your knight.

Hot Sun, Cool Fire

Hot sun, cool fire, tempered with sweet air,
Black shade, fair nurse, shadow my white hair.
Shine, sun; burn, fire; breathe, air, and ease me;
Black shade, fair nurse, shroud me and please me.
5 Shadow, my sweet nurse, keep me from burning;
Make not my glad cause cause of mourning.
  Let not my beauty's fire
  Inflame unstaid desire,
  Nor pierce any bright eye
10 That wandereth lightly.

1599

1. This poem refers to Sir Henry Lee, for years Queen Elizabeth I's champion in courtly jousts or contests of arms. At sixty, too old to take part in the queen's birthday tournament of 1590, he retired in favor of a younger man.

2. Age his: age's.

3. Seems to refer to Queen Elizabeth, as does "Goddess" in line 17.

4. One who offers prayers for the soul of another.

THOMAS LODGE
1558–1625

Rosalind's Madrigal[1]

Love in my bosom like a bee
  Doth suck his sweet;
Now with his wings he plays with me,
  Now with his feet.
5 Within mine eyes he makes his nest,
His bed amidst my tender breast;
My kisses are his daily feast,
And yet he robs me of my rest.
  Ah, wanton, will ye?

10 And if I sleep, then percheth he
  With pretty flight,
And makes his pillow of my knee
  The livelong night.
Strike I my lute, he tunes the string;
15 He music plays if so I sing;
He lends me every lovely thing;
Yet cruel he my heart doth sting.
  Whist,° wanton, still ye! be silent

Else I with roses every day
20   Will whip you hence,
And bind you, when you long to play,
  For your offense.
I'll shut mine eyes to keep you in,
I'll make you fast it for your sin,
25 I'll count your power not worth a pin.
Alas! what hereby shall I win
  If he gainsay me?

What if I beat the wanton boy
  With many a rod?
30 He will repay me with annoy,
  Because a god.
Then sit thou safely on my knee,
And let thy bower° my bosom be; shelter
Lurk in mine eyes, I like of thee.
35 O Cupid, so thou pity me,[2]
  Spare not, but play thee!

1590

1. Madrigal: a short lyrical poem, usually about love, suitable for a musical setting; a song.

2. I.e., as long as you show me some pity. Cupid: Roman god of erotic love.

ROBERT SOUTHWELL
ca. 1561–1595

The Burning Babe

As I in hoary winter's night stood shivering in the snow,
Surprised I was with sudden heat which made my heart to glow;
And lifting up a fearful eye to view what fire was near,
A pretty babe all burning bright did in the air appear;
5 Who, scorchèd with excessive heat, such floods of tears did shed
As though his floods should quench his flames which with his tears were fed.
"Alas," quoth he, "but newly born in fiery heats I fry,
Yet none approach to warm their hearts or feel my fire but I!
My faultless breast the furnace is, the fuel wounding thorns,
10 Love is the fire, and sighs the smoke, the ashes shame and scorns;
The fuel justice layeth on, and mercy blows the coals,
The metal in this furnace wrought are men's defilèd souls,
For which, as now on fire I am to work them to their good,
So will I melt into a bath to wash them in my blood."
15 With this he vanished out of sight and swiftly shrunk away,
And straight° I callèd unto mind that it was Christmas day. straightaway

New Heaven, New War

Come to your heaven, you heavenly choirs,
Earth hath the heaven of your desires.
Remove your dwelling to your God;
A stall° is now his best abode. stable
5 Sith° men their homage do deny, since
Come, angels, all their fault supply.

His chilling cold doth heat require;
Come, seraphins,[1] in lieu of fire.
This little ark no cover hath;
10 Let cherubs' wings his body swathe.° enwrap
Come, Raphael,[2] this babe must eat;
Provide our little Toby meat.

1. Seraphs and cherubs (line 10) were generally understood to be orders among the angels, derived in Christian theology from Hebrew Scripture.
2. One of the seven archangels, the companion and protector of Tobias in the book of Tobit (one of the apocryphal books of the Hebrew Scriptures). Gabriel (line 13) and Michael (line 15) are also archangels.

Let Gabriel be now his groom,
That first took up his earthly room.
15 Let Michael stand in his defense,
Whom love hath linked to feeble sense.
Let graces rock when he doth cry,
And angels sing his lullaby.

The same you saw in heavenly seat
20 Is he that now sucks Mary's teat;
Agnize° your king a mortal wight,° acknowledge / person
His borrowed weed° lets° not your sight. clothing / hinders
Come, kiss the manger where he lies,
That is your bliss above the skies.

25 This little babe, so few days old,
Is come to rifle Satan's fold;
All hell doth at his presence quake,
Though he himself for cold do shake,
For in this weak unarmèd wise° manner
30 The gates of hell he will surprise.

With tears he fights and wins the field;
His naked breast stands for a shield;
His battering shot are babish cries,
His arrows looks of weeping eyes,
35 His martial ensigns cold and need,
And feeble flesh his warrior's steed.

His camp is pitchèd in a stall,
His bulwark but a broken wall,
The crib his trench, hay stalks his stakes,
40 Of shepherds he his muster[3] makes;
And thus, as sure his foe to wound,
The angels' trumps° alarum sound. trumpets

My soul, with Christ join thou in fight;
Stick to the tents that he hath pight;° pitched
45 Within his crib is surest ward,° protection
This little babe will be thy guard.
If thou wilt foil thy foes with joy,
Then flit not from this heavenly boy.

MARY SIDNEY
1561–1621

Psalm 58: Si Vere Utique[1]

And call ye this to utter what is just,
  You that of justice hold the sov'reign throne?
And call ye this to yield, O sons of dust,
  To wronged brethren ev'ry man his own?
5 O no: it is your long malicious will
  Now to the world to make by practice known,
With whose oppression you the balance fill,
  Just to your selves, indiff'rent° else to none.[2] impartial

But what could they, who ev'n in birth declined,[3]
10 From truth and right to lies and injuries?
To show the venom of their cankred° mind corrupt, malignant
  The adder's image scarcely can suffice;
Nay scarce the aspic° may with them contend, asp
  On whom the charmer all in vain applies
15 His skillfull'st spells: ay° missing of his end, always
  While she self-deaf, and unaffected lies.[4]

Lord crack their teeth, Lord crush these lion's jaws,
  So let them sink as water in the sand:
When deadly bow their aiming fury draws,
20 Shiver° the shaft ere past the shooter's hand. shatter
So make them melt as the dishoused snail
  Or as the embryo, whose vital band
Breaks ere it holds,[5] and formless eyes do fail
  To see the sun, though brought to lightful land.

25 O let their brood, a brood of springing thorns,
  Be by untimely rooting overthrown[6]
Ere bushes waxt,° they push with pricking horns, grew
  As fruits yet green are oft by tempest blown.[7]
The good with gladness this revenge shall see,

1. If, indeed, it is true (Latin). Frequently the Latin titles for Psalms were taken from the Psalm's first line in the Vulgate version of the Bible. However, in this case the first line in the Vulgate is Numquid vere ("Is it true?"). Mary Sidney probably derived her title from one of the French or English Psalters she imitated. Cf. the versions of this Psalm and the next one from The Massachusetts Bay Psalm Book (pp. 391–93), by Isaac Watts (pp. 592–94), and by Christopher Smart (pp. 684–86).
2. I.e., now to make known to the world, through continual repetition, with whose oppression you fill the balance, being just to yourselves, but impartial to no one else.
3. I.e., but what else could they do, those who from birth turned aside?
4. The snake is "unaffected" by the snake charmer's music because she is "self-deaf," i.e., she stops her ears.
5. A reference to premature birth.
6. The Hebrew original here is problematic and hinges on the translation of an ambiguous word, sir, which can mean "pot" or "thorns." The verse has thus been rendered in a variety of ways, including: "Sooner than your poets can feel the heat of thorns, whether green or ablaze, may he sweep them away" (Revised Standard Version) and, "Before your thorns have ripened on the thornbush, a wrath will tear them out while they are still green" (Luther). Luther interpreted the "thorns" as the Jews.
7. I.e., before the bushes have fully grown, they [already] begin to grow thorns, and, as still unripe fruits, are often blown by the tempest. A further elaboration of the images of the thorns in the lines above.

30 And bathe his feet in blood of wicked one
While all shall say: the just rewarded be,
There is a God that carves to each his own.[8]

ca. 1588–99 1823

Psalm 114: In Exitu Israel[9]

At what time Jacob's race did leave of Egypt take,
And Egypt's barbarous folk forsake:
Then, then our God, our king, elected Jacob's race
His temple there and throne to place.
5 The sea beheld and fled: Jordan[1] with swift return
To twinnèd spring his[2] streams did turn.
The mountains bounded so, as, fed in fruitful ground,
The fleecèd rams do frisking bound.
The hillocks capreold[3] so, as wanton by their dams
10 We capreol see° the lusty lambs. to see
O sea, why didst thou fly? Jordan, with swift return
To twinnèd spring, what made thee turn?
Mountains, why bounded ye, as, fed in fruitful
The fleecèd rams do frisking bound?
15 Hillocks why capreold ye, as wanton by their dams
We capreol see the lusty lambs?
Nay you, and Earth with you, quake ever at the sight
Of God Jehovah, Jacob's might,
Who in the hardest rocks makes standing waters grow
20 And purling° springs from flints to flow. rippling

ca. 1588–99 1823

To the Thrice-Sacred Queen Elizabeth[4]

I

Even now that care,° which on thy crown attends burden
And with thy happy° greatness daily grows, fortunate
Tells me, thrice-sacred Queen, my muse[5] offends,
And of respect to thee the line out goes.[6]

8. I.e., the good person is glad to see the wicked overthrown in this manner, and bathes his feet in the blood of the wicked one, who has been destroyed before he has come to fruition. Seeing this, everyone will recognize that the just are rewarded and that God gives each person what he deserves.
9. A famous Psalm about the Israelites' departure from Egypt.
1. River in Palestine that empties into the Dead Sea.
2. I.e., the river Jordan's.
3. Capered, i.e., leaped or skipped.
4. This is a dedicatory poem originally prefixed to a translation of the Psalms of David, begun by Mary Sidney's brother Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586; see pp. 208–20) and completed by Mary after Philip's death. The poem, preserved in a unique manuscript copy, was probably prepared for a presentation volume to be given to the queen (1553–1603; see pp. 142–43) when she visited the Sidney home in 1599. The expected visit did not occur. Sir Philip Sidney had been exiled from court after incurring Elizabeth's disfavor by counseling against a marriage with the duke of Anjou; furthermore, the Sidneys, devoted to the cause of Protestantism, felt that the queen should adopt a more aggressive policy in support of Protestant factions on the continent (especially the Netherlands). Thrice: to a high degree.
5. Source of poetic inspiration.
6. Ambiguous syntax; possibly: from respect to you (and the demands that your royal duties place on your time), my poetry ("the line") should be thrown out (as unworthy of your attention).

5 One instant will or willing can she lose[7]
I say not reading, but receiving rhymes,
On whom in chief dependeth to dispose° — settle
What Europe acts in these most active times?

Yet dare I so, as humbleness may dare,
10 Cherish some hope they° shall acceptance find; — the poems
Not weighing less thy state, lighter thy care,
But knowing more thy grace, abler thy mind.[8]
What heavenly powers thee highest throne assigned,
Assigned thee goodness suiting that degree,° — position or rank
15 And by thy strength thy burthen so defined,
To others toil, is exercise to thee.[9]

Cares, though still° great, cannot be greatest still, — always
Business must ebb, though leisure never flow;
Then these the posts[1] of duty and goodwill
20 Shall press° to offer what their senders owe, — hurry
Which once in two, now in one subject go,[2]
The poorer left, the richer reft° away, — stolen
Who better might (O might, ah word of woe)
Have given for me what I for him defray.° — pay

25 How can I name whom sighing signs extend,[3]
And not unstop my tears' eternal spring?
But he did warp, I weaved this web to end;[4]
The stuff[5] not ours, our work no curious° thing, — novel or ingenious
Wherein yet well we thought the Psalmist King[6]
30 Now English denizened, though Hebrew born,[7]
Would to thy music undispleasèd sing,
Oft having worse, without repining, worn;[8]

And I the cloth° in both our names present, — poems
A livery robe[9] to be bestowed by thee;

7. I.e., will she, or can she willingly, lose one instant?
8. I.e., not because I judge your status or responsibilities to be less than they are, but because I know how great is your grace and how able your mind.
9. I.e., your "burthen" is defined according to your strength, such that what would be burdensome labor to others is mere "exercise," i.e., customary practice, to you.
1. Postmen or letter carriers, here referring to the poems that convey the poet's "duty" and "goodwill" to the queen.
2. Sir Philip Sidney wrote the first forty-three translations (of 150 Psalms); the rest are Mary's. Philip died in 1586 fighting for the Protestant cause in the Netherlands.
3. I.e., how can I name him (Philip Sidney) whose memory is extended by "sighing signs" (i.e., the signs of grief)?
4. To completion. In clothmaking, the warp threads on a loom run lengthwise and are set first; the woof threads are then woven crosswise through them.
5. Raw material (i.e., the Hebrew Scriptures).
6. King David, the second king of Israel, believed to have written many of the Psalms of the Bible.
7. I.e., admitted to English citizenship, though born a Hebrew.
8. I.e., often having worn worse (than "thy music," i.e., the English language) without complaining ("repining"); "worse" probably refers to translations of the Psalms in other languages; these two lines might also refer to David's service, as a youth, to the tyrant Saul, whom David often soothed with his singing.
9. A suit of clothes bestowed by a noble upon his male retainers by which they may be recognized as his servants. Sidney seems to be saying that she presents the poems to Elizabeth, who will then give them a "livery robe" as a sign that they are her servants.

35 Small parcel of that undischargèd° rent, unpaid
From which nor° pains nor payments can us free. neither
And yet enough to cause our neighbors see
We will° our best, though scanted° in our will; attempt / limited
And those nigh° fields where sown thy favors be nearby
40 Unwealthy do, not else unworthy, till.[1]

For in our work what bring we but thine own?
What English is, by many names is thine,
There humble laurels[2] in thy shadows grown
To garland others would themselves repine.[3]
45 Thy breast the cabinet,° thy seat[4] the shrine, small room
Where muses hang their vowèd° memories; consecrated
Where wit, where art, where all that is divine
Conceivèd best, and best defended lies.

Which if men did not (as they do) confess,[5]
50 And wronging worlds would otherwise consent,
Yet here who minds so meet a patroness[6]
For authors' state° or writings' argument?° financial condition / subject
A King should only to a Queen be sent;
God's lovèd choice unto his chosen love;
55 Devotion to devotion's president;[7]
What all applaud, to her whom none reprove.

And who sees ought,° but sees how justly square° anything / correspond
His haughty° ditties° to thy glorious days? lofty / songs
How well beseeming° thee his triumphs[8] are? resembling or matching
60 His hope, his zeal, his prayer, plaint,° and praise, lamentation
Needless thy person to their height to raise;
Less need to bend them down to thy degree;
These holy garments[9] each good soul assays,° tries on
Some sorting all, all sort to none but thee.[1]

65 For even thy rule is painted in his reign;[2]
Both clear in right; both nigh by wrong oppressed;[3]

1. I.e., we till those nearby fields where your favors are sown without a show of wealth but not otherwise unworthily.
2. Leaves used to crown the heads of great poets; hence, the symbol of poetic achievement.
3. I.e., the laurels grown in your shadow would complain at being worn by others besides you.
4. Place of abode as well as Elizabeth's throne.
5. I.e., if people did not (as they do) agree that Elizabeth is the source of all English works.
6. I.e., who in England can remember so suitable ("meet") a supporter (as Elizabeth)?
7. One who presides over, perhaps referring to the fact that, as queen, Elizabeth was head of the Church of England. The first element in each of lines 53 through 56 refers to King David, the second to Queen Elizabeth.
8. Both victories and triumphal songs.
9. I.e., the Psalms.
1. I.e., some fitting everyone, but all fitting no one but you.
2. I.e., is represented in David's reign.
3. Defeated (rather than its modern meaning); nigh: almost. David's succession to the throne of Israel was opposed by Saul, the first king of Israel, who tried to kill David. Elizabeth's succession to the crown of England was disputed (especially by Catholics who championed her cousin, Mary, queen of Scots) because of the questionable legality of Henry VIII's second marriage to Anne Bol-

And each at length (man crossing God in vain)
Possessed of place, and each in peace possessed.
Proud Philistines did interrupt his rest,
70 The foes of heaven no less have been thy foes;[4]
He with great conquest, thou with greater blessed;
Thou sure to win, and he secure to lose.[5]

10

Thus hand in hand with him thy glories walk;
But who can trace them[6] where alone they go?
75 Of thee two hemispheres on honor talk,[7]
And lands and seas thy trophies jointly show.
The very winds did on thy party blow,
And rocks in arms thy foemen eft[8] defy.
But soft, my muse, thy pitch[9] is earthly low;
80 Forbear° this heaven where only eagles fly. avoid

11

Kings on a Queen enforced their states to lay;[1]
Mainlands for empire waiting on an isle;[2]
Men drawn by worth a woman to obey;
One moving all, herself unmoved[3] the while;
85 Truth's restitution, vanity exile,[4]
Wealth sprung of want, war held without annoy,° vexation
Let subject be of some inspired style,
Till then the object of her subjects' joy.

12

Thy utmost can but offer to her sight
90 Her handmaid's task, which most her will endears,[5]
And pray unto thy pains life from that light
Which lively lightsome, court and kingdom cheers,[6]
What° wish she may (far past her living peers who
And rival still to Judah's faithful king)

eyn, Elizabeth's mother. Despite opposition, both David and Elizabeth came to possess their respective thrones, although "each in peace possessed" (line 68) is a questionable claim. David continued to put down rebellions, including one by his own son, until late in his life. In 1587, Elizabeth had her cousin, Mary, beheaded, ending that particular claim to her throne.

4. Elizabeth and David both reigned in times of war; their enemies, the Spanish (who were Catholic) and the Philistines respectively, were perceived as enemies of the true religion.

5. Enigmatic phrasing; probably: secure (sure) against losing (so as not to contradict line 71).

6. I.e., who can follow or put down in writing thy glories.

7. I.e., about you, the whole world talks on the topic of honor.

8. Afterwards. The British defeated the Spanish Armada in 1588, aided by favorable winds; the remnant of the defeated Spanish fleet lost more ships when storms drove them onto the western coast of Ireland.

9. The height to which a falcon or other bird of prey soars before swooping down on its prey, but also height in a figurative sense: degree, rank, status.

1. I.e., kings compelled to humble their greatness, splendor, power (all meanings of "state") to Elizabeth.

2. Continental countries, because of the greatness of Elizabeth's empire, serving England.

3. Perhaps a reference to Aristotle's idea of God as an "Unmoved Mover" (in Nichomachean Ethics 10 and Metaphysics 12).

4. Perhaps a reference to Elizabeth's restoration of the Protestant faith ("truth") in England after the reign of her half-sister, the Catholic Mary Tudor. The banishment of "vanity" would then refer to the banishment of the ornate rituals of the Catholic religion.

5. I.e., the most you can do is offer her the work of a handmaid, which most endears itself to her will. "Thy" seems to refer to Sidney's muse.

6. I.e., and pray to get life (a favorable response?) from that light, which, lively lightsome (luminous or bright), cheers the kingdom and court.

95 In more than he and more triumphant years,
Sing what God doth, and do what men may sing.[7]

SAMUEL DANIEL
1563–1619

FROM DELIA[1]

Unto the boundless Ocean of thy beauty
Runs this poor river, charged with streams of zeal:
Returning thee the tribute of my duty,
Which here my love, my youth, my plaints reveal.
5 Here I unclasp the book of my charged soul,
Where I have cast th'accounts of all my care:
Here have I summed my sighs, here I enroll° — register
How they were spent for thee; look what they are.
Look on the dear expenses of my youth,
10 And see how just I reckon with thine eyes:
Examine well thy beauty with my truth,
And cross my cares ere greater sum arise.
Read it sweet maid, though it be done but slightly;
Who can show all his love, doth love but lightly.

Go wailing verse, the infants of my love,
Minerva[2]-like, brought forth without a Mother:
Present the image of the cares I prove,
Witness your Father's grief exceeds all other.
5 Sigh out a story of her cruel deeds,
With interrupted accents of despair:
A monument that whosoever reads,
May justly praise, and blame my loveless Fair.
Say her disdain hath dried up my blood,
10 And starved you, in succours° still denying: — aid

7. I.e., who (members of her court and kingdom) wish that she (the queen) may sing what God does, and do (i.e., great things) that men may praise, (in a way that will be) far better than what other (contemporary) monarchs do, and equal, still, to (what was done by) Judah's king, David.

1. A sequence of fifty sonnets. The title, which recalls Délie, a collection by the French poet Maurice Scève (ca. 1500–ca. 1564), plays anagrammatically on the lady's status as the poet's "Ideal." A dedicatory sonnet addressed to Mary Sidney (1561–1621; see pp. 225–30) appears in early editions of the sequence. The numbering of the sonnets varies by edition; we have followed the numbering and the text of the first edition.

2. In Roman mythology, the goddess of war, wisdom, arts, and justice; she sprang fully formed from the head of her father, Jove.

Press to her eyes, importune me some good;
Waken her sleeping pity with your crying.
Knock at that hard heart, beg till you have moved her;
And tell th'unkind, how dearly I have loved her.

Fair is my love, and cruel as she's fair:
Her brow shades frowns, although her eyes are sunny,
Her smiles are lightning, though her pride despair,
And her disdains are gall,° her favors honey. bitterness
5 A modest maid, decked with a blush of honor,
Whose feet do tread green paths of youth and love;
The wonder of all eyes that look upon her,
Sacred on earth, designed a Saint above.
Chastity and Beauty, which were deadly foes,
10 Live reconcilèd friends within her brow;
And had she pity to conjoin with those,
Then who had heard the plaints I utter now?
Oh had she not been fair and thus unkind,
My Muse[3] had slept, and none had known my mind.

36

But love whilst that thou mayst be loved again,
Now whilst thy May hath filled thy lap with flowers,
Now whilst thy beauty bears without a stain,
Now use the summer smiles, ere winter lowers.
5 And whilst thou spread'st unto the rising sun
The fairest flower that ever saw the light,
Now joy thy time before thy sweet be done,
And, Delia, think thy morning must have night,
And that thy brightness sets at length to west,
10 When thou wilt close up that which now thou shew'st;
And think the same becomes thy fading best
Which then shall most inveil° and shadow most. cover
Men do not weigh the stalk for what it was,
When once they find her flower, her glory, pass.

37

When men shall find thy flower, thy glory pass,
And thou, with careful brow sitting alone,
Receivèd hast this message from thy glass,° looking glass

3. Source of poetic inspiration.

That tells thee truth, and says that all is gone,
5 Fresh shalt thou see in me the wounds thou madest,
Though spent thy flame, in me the heat remaining,
I that have loved thee thus before thou fadest,
My faith shall wax, when thou art in thy waning.
The world shall find this miracle in me,
10 That fire can burn when all the matter's spent;
Then what my faith hath been thyself shall see,
And that thou wast unkind thou mayst repent.
Thou mayst repent that thou hast scorned my tears,
When Winter snows upon thy golden hairs.

49

Care-charmer Sleep, son of the sable° Night, black
Brother to Death, in silent darkness born.
Relieve my languish and restore the light;
With dark forgetting of my cares, return.
5 And let the day be time enough to mourn
The shipwreck of my ill-adventured youth;
Let waking eyes suffice to wail their scorn
Without the torment of the night's untruth.
Cease, dreams, th' imagery of our day desires,
10 To model forth[4] the passions of the morrow;
Never let rising sun approve° you liars, prove
To add more grief to aggravate my sorrow.
Still let me sleep, embracing clouds in vain,
And never wake to feel the day's disdain.

50

Let others sing of knights and paladins° chivalric heroes
In agèd accents, and untimely° words; outdated
Paint shadows in imaginary lines
Which well the reach of their high wits records;
5 But I must sing of thee, and those fair eyes
Authentic° shall my verse in time to come, authenticate
When yet th' unborn shall say, "Lo where she lies,
Whose beauty made him speak that else was dumb."
These are the arks, the trophies I erect,
10 That fortify thy name against old age;
And these thy sacred virtues must protect
Against the dark and time's consuming rage.
Though th' error of my youth they shall discover,
Suffice, they show I lived and was thy lover.

4. To portray.

53

Unhappy pen and ill accepted papers,
That intimate in vain my chaste desires,
My chaste desires, the ever burning tapers,
Enkindled by her eyes' celestial fires.
5 Celestial fires and unrespecting powers,
That deign not view the glory of your might,[5]
In humble lines the work of careful hours,
The sacrifice I offer to her sight.
But since she scorns her own, this rests° for me, remains
10 I'll moan my self, and hide the wrong I have:
And so content me that her frowns should be
To my infant style the cradle, and the grave.
What though my self no honor get thereby,[6]
Each bird sings t'herself, and so will I.

Ulysses and the Siren[7]

SIREN. Come, worthy Greek, Ulysses, come,
Possess these shores with me;
The winds and seas are troublesome,
And here we may be free.
5 Here may we sit and view their toil
That travail in the deep,
And joy the day in mirth the while,
And spend the night in sleep.

ULYSSES. Fair nymph, if fame or honor were 10 To be attained with ease,
Then would I come and rest me there,
And leave such toils as these.
But here it dwells, and here must I
With danger seek it forth;
15 To spend the time luxuriously
Becomes not men of worth.

SIREN. Ulysses, Oh be not deceived
With that unreal name;
This honor is a thing conceived,
20 And rests on others' fame.

5. Now addressing the lady's eyes as "celestial fires" and as "powers" that refuse to "respect" his poem, the speaker defines his poem as that which glorifies the power of the lady's eyes.
6. I.e., although I'll get no respect for my attempt to be satisfied by her frowns alone.
7. In Greek mythology, the Sirens were beautiful but only partly human creatures who sang so sweetly that passing sailors would forget their work and homes and be lured to their destruction. When Ulysses (Odysseus), the hero of Homer's Odyssey, passed by, he had his sailors' ears filled with beeswax and had himself tied to the ship's mast so that he could listen without succumbing to their song.

Begotten only to molest
Our peace, and to beguile
The best thing of our life, our rest,
And give us up to toil.

25 ULYSSES. Delicious nymph, suppose there were
Nor honor nor report,
Yet manliness would scorn to wear
The time in idle sport.
For toil doth give a better touch,
30 To make us feel our joy;
And ease finds tediousness, as much
As labor yields annoy.

SIREN. Then pleasure likewise seems the shore
Whereto tends all your toil,
35 Which you forgo to make it more,
And perish oft the while.
Who may disport them diversly,
Find never tedious day,
And ease may have variety
40 As well as action may.

ULYSSES. But natures of the noblest frame
These toils and dangers please,
And they take comfort in the same
As much as you in ease,
45 And with the thoughts of actions past
Are recreated still;
When pleasure leaves a touch at last
To show that it was ill.

SIREN. That doth opinion only cause
50 That's out of custom bred,
Which makes us many other laws
Than ever nature did.
No widows wail for our delights,
Our sports are without blood;
55 The world, we see, by warlike wights° persons
Receives more hurt than good.

ULYSSES. But yet the state of things require
These motions of unrest,
And these great spirits of high desire
60 Seem born to turn them best,
To purge the mischiefs that increase
And all good order mar;
For oft we see a wicked peace
To be well changed for war.

65 SIREN. Well, well, Ulysses, then I see
I shall not have thee here,

And therefore I will come to thee,
And take my fortunes there.
I must be won that cannot win,
70 Yet lost were I not won;
For beauty hath created been
T' undo, or be undone.

1605

Are They Shadows

Are they shadows that we see?
And can shadows pleasure give?
Pleasures only shadows be
Cast by bodies we conceive
5 And are made the things we deem
In those figures which they seem.

But these pleasures vanish fast
Which by shadows are expressed;
Pleasures are not, if they last;
10 In their passing is their best.
Glory is most bright and gay
In a flash, and so away.

Feed apace° then, greedy eyes, quickly
On the wonder you behold;
15 Take it sudden as it flies,
Though you take it not to hold.
When your eyes have done their part,
Thought must length° it in the heart. lengthen

MICHAEL DRAYTON
1563–1631

A Roundelay between Two Shepherds[1]

1 Shep. Tell me, thou gentle shepherd swain,
Who's yonder in the vale is set?

1. This roundelay, or simple song, was included in the anthology England's Helicon (1600); it also appeared (in a slightly different form) in the Ninth Eclogue of Drayton's "Pastorals," published in his collected Poems (1619). Pastoral poems, or eclogues, a classical form practiced by the Roman poet Virgil and others, are populated by shepherds and nymphs, and usually portray a simple, happy life of singing and dancing, rather than a life of farm labor. The Ninth Eclogue describes a "Shepherd's Board," or feast, and contains several songs by shepherds, or "swains," in praise of their lovers.

2 Shep. Oh, it is she, whose sweets do stain
The lily, rose, the violet!

5 1 Shep. Why doth the sun against his kind,° — nature
Fix° his bright chariot in the skies?[2] — make motionless
2 Shep. Because the sun is stricken blind
With looking on her heavenly eyes.

1 Shep. Why do thy flocks forbear their food,
10 Which sometime° were thy chief delight? — formerly
2 Shep. Because they need no other good
That live in presence of her sight.

1 Shep. Why look these flowers so pale and ill,
That once attired this goodly heath?
15 2 Shep. She hath robb'd Nature of her skill,
And sweetens all things with her breath.

1 Shep. Why slide these brooks so slow away,
Whose bubbling murmur pleased thine ear?
2 Shep. Oh, marvel not although they stay,° — stand still
20 When they her heavenly voice do hear!

1 Shep. From whence come all these shepherd swains,
And lovely nymphs attired in green?
2 Shep. From gathering garlands on the plains,
To crown our fair the shepherds' queen.

25 Both. The sun that lights this world below,
Flocks, flowers, and brooks will witness bear:
These nymphs and shepherds all do know,
That it is she is only fair.

From IDEA[3]

To the Reader of these Sonnets

Into these loves who but for passion looks,
At this first sight here let him lay them by
And seek elsewhere, in turning other books,
Which better may his labor satisfy.
5 No far-fetched sigh shall ever wound my breast,
Love from mine eye a tear shall never wring,
Nor in Ah me's my whining sonnets dressed,
A libertine,[4] fantastically° I sing. — capriciously

2. In Greek mythology, the sun was a chariot driven daily across the sky by the god Apollo.
3. Drayton's fifty-nine sonnets addressed to "Idea" are concerned with the embodiment of the Platonic ideas of virtue and beauty: the sequence represents his lifelong devotion (in the manner of a courtly lover) to Anne Goodyere, Lady Rainsford. His sequence first appeared as Idea's Mirror in 1594, and after revisions as Idea in 1619.
4. One not bound by conventional morality.

My verse is the true image of my mind,
10 Ever in motion, still° desiring change; ever
And as thus to variety inclined,
So in all humors° sportively I range: moods
My muse[5] is rightly of the English strain,
That cannot long one fashion entertain.

How many paltry, foolish, painted things,
That now in coaches trouble every street,
Shall be forgotten, whom no poet sings,
Ere they be well wrapped in their winding-sheet?° shroud
5 Where° I to thee eternity shall give, whereas
When nothing else remaineth of these days,
And queens hereafter shall be glad to live
Upon the alms of thy superfluous praise.
Virgins and matrons reading these my rhymes
10 Shall be so much delighted with thy story
That they shall grieve they lived not in these times,
To have seen thee, their sex's only glory.
So shalt thou fly above the vulgar throng,
Still to survive in my immortal song.

14

If he from heaven that filched that living fire[6]
Condemned by Jove to endless torment be,
I greatly marvel how you still go free,
That far beyond Prometheus did aspire.
5 The fire he stole, although of heavenly kind,
Which from above he craftily did take,
Of liveless clods,° us living men to make, lumps of earth or clay
He did bestow in temper of the mind.
But you broke into heaven's immortal store,
10 Where virtue, honor, wit, and beauty lay;
Which taking thence you have escaped away,
Yet stand as free as ere° you did before; ever
Yet old Prometheus punished for his rape.[7]
Thus poor thieves suffer when the greater 'scape.° escape

5. Source of poetic inspiration.
6. Prometheus, a Greek mythological hero who stole fire from heaven and gave it to humans. He was chained to a rock by Jove (Zeus), the chief god, and preyed upon daily by a vulture that tore at his vitals. In some versions of the myth, Prometheus created humankind out of clay.
7. "Rape" referred not only to sexual assault but also to other acts of forceful appropriation such as Prometheus's theft of heavenly fire.

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part;
Nay, I have done, you get no more of me,
And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart
That thus so cleanly I myself can free;
5 Shake hands forever, cancel all our vows,
And when we meet at any time again,
Be it not seen in either of our brows
That we one jot of former love retain.
Now at the last gasp of love's latest breath,
10 When, his pulse failing, Passion speechless lies,
When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
And Innocence is closing up his eyes,
Now if thou wouldst, when all have given him over,
From death to life thou mightst him yet recover.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE
1564–1593

Hero and Leander

First Sestiad[1]

On Hellespont,[2] guilty of true love's blood,
In view and opposite, two cities stood
Sea-borderers, disjoined by Neptune's° might; god of the sea
The one Abydos, the other Sestos hight.° called
5 At Sestos Hero dwelt; Hero the fair,
Whom young Apollo° courted for her hair, god of the sun
And offered as a dower° his burning throne, wedding gift
Where she should sit for men to gaze upon.
The outside of her garments were of lawn,[3]
10 The lining purple silk, with gilt stars drawn;
Her wide sleeves green, and bordered with a grove
Where Venus in her naked glory strove
To please the careless and disdainful eyes
Of proud Adonis,[4] that before her lies;

1. A term for a book or canto (from Hero's city, Sestos). When the English playwright and translator George Chapman (1559?–1634) wrote a four-part continuation of Marlowe's work, he divided the entire poem into sestiads. The poem belongs to the genre of the minor epic, or epyllion, which flourished in the 1590s and showed the strong influence of the ancient Roman poet Ovid. Ovid told the story of Hero and Leander in two of his Heroides (fictional love letters) and in one of the Elegies Marlowe had translated.
2. The modern Dardanelles, a strait between the Aegean Sea and the Sea of Marmora, one mile wide at its narrowest point.
3. A sheer cotton or linen fabric.
4. Venus, goddess of love and beauty, passionately loved the young hunter Adonis, who was killed by a boar; in lines 91–93, Marlowe claims that the men of Sestos hold a festival in honor of Adonis every year.

15 Her kirtle° blue, whereon was many a stain, gown
Made with the blood of wretched lovers slain.
Upon her head she ware a myrtle wreath,
From whence her veil reached to the ground beneath.
Her veil was artificial flowers and leaves,
20 Whose workmanship both man and beast deceives;
Many would praise the sweet smell as she passed,
When 'twas the odor which her breath forth cast;
And there for honey, bees have sought in vain,
And, beat from thence, have lighted there again.
25 About her neck hung chains of pebble-stone,
Which, lightened° by her neck, like diamonds shone. illuminated
She ware no gloves, for neither sun nor wind
Would burn or parch her hands, but to her mind[5]
Or° warm or cool them, for they took delight either
30 To play upon those hands, they were so white.
Buskins° of shells all silvered, usèd she, high shoes, boots
And branched° with blushing coral to the knee, decorated
Where sparrows perched, of hollow pearl and gold,
Such as the world would wonder to behold;
35 Those with sweet water oft her handmaid fills,
Which, as she went, would chirrup through the° bills. their
Some say, for her the fairest Cupid[6] pined,
And looking in her face, was strooken° blind. struck
But this is true: so like was one the other,
40 As he imagined Hero was his mother;
And oftentimes into her bosom flew,
About her naked neck his bare arms threw,
And laid his childish head upon her breast,
And with still panting rocked, there took his rest.
45 So lovely fair was Hero, Venus' nun,
As Nature wept, thinking she was undone,
Because she took more from her than she left
And of such wondrous beauty her bereft;
Therefore, in sign her treasure suffered wrack,
50 Since Hero's time hath half the world been black.[7]
Amorous Leander, beautiful and young,
(Whose tragedy divine Musaeus[8] sung)
Dwelt at Abydos; since him dwelt there none
For whom succeeding times make greater moan.
55 His dangling tresses that were never shorn,
Had they been cut and unto Colchos[9] borne,
Would have allured the vent'rous youth of Greece
To hazard more than for the Golden Fleece.
Fair Cynthia[1] wished his arms might be her sphere;° orbit
60 Grief makes her pale, because she moves not there.

5. As she wished.
6. Venus's son, god of erotic love.
7. I.e., therefore, as a sign that her (Nature's) wealth had suffered a shipwreck (i.e., been harmed by Hero's beauty), Nature made half the world dark-haired or -complexioned.
8. A fifth-century Alexandrian whose poem on Hero and Leander served Marlowe as a source. Marlowe's term "divine" suggests that he may have identified him with an earlier, legendary Musaeus.
9. The country in Asia where Jason and his Argonauts found the Golden Fleece.
1. The moon. Leander is being compared to the moon's lover, Endymion.

His body was as straight as Circe's wand;[2]
Jove might have sipped out nectar from his hand.[3]
Even as delicious meat is to the taste,
So was his neck in touching, and surpassed
65 The white of Pelops' shoulder.[4] I could tell ye
How smooth his breast was, and how white his belly,
And whose immortal fingers did imprint
That heavenly path, with many a curious° dint, exquisite
That runs along his back; but my rude pen
70 Can hardly blazon° forth the loves of men, show
Much less of powerful gods; let it suffice
That my slack muse[5] sings of Leander's eyes,
Those orient cheeks and lips, exceeding his[6]
That leapt into the water for a kiss
75 Of his own shadow, and despising many,
Died ere he could enjoy the love of any.
Had wild Hippolytus[7] Leander seen,
Enamored of his beauty had he been;
His presence made the rudest peasant melt,
80 That in the vast uplandish° country dwelt; wild
The barbarous Thracian soldier, moved with naught,
Was moved with him, and for his favor sought.
Some swore he was a maid in man's attire,
For in his looks were all that men desire:
85 A pleasant smiling cheek, a speaking° eye, expressive
A brow for love to banquet royally;
And such as knew he was a man, would say,
"Leander, thou art made for amorous play;
Why art thou not in love, and loved of all?
90 Though thou be fair, yet be not thine own thrall."° captive
The men of wealthy Sestos every year,
For his sake whom their goddess held so dear,
Rose-cheeked Adonis, kept a solemn feast.
Thither resorted many a wandering guest
95 To meet their loves; such as had none at all
Came lovers home from this great festival;
For every street, like to a firmament,° sky
Glistered with breathing stars, who, where they went,
Frighted the melancholy earth, which deemed 100 Eternal heaven to burn, for so it seemed
As if another Phaeton[8] had got
The guidance of the sun's rich chariot.
But, far above the loveliest, Hero shined,
And stole away the enchanted gazer's mind;
105 For like sea nymphs' inveigling° harmony, beguiling

2. The enchantress Circe, in the Odyssey, possessed a magical wand capable of turning men into beasts.
3. Leander is being compared to Ganymede, the shepherd boy whom Jove "ravished" and made into his cupbearer.
4. Pelops's father, Tantalus, killed, cut up, cooked, and served his son at a dinner of the gods. The goddess Demeter ate his shoulder. Hermes later reconstituted Pelops, giving him a shoulder of ivory.
5. Source of poetic inspiration.
6. I.e., Narcissus's. Orient: glowing like eastern skies or gems.
7. A great hunter, contemptuous of love.
8. Son of the sun god, Apollo; Phaeton drove his father's chariot for one day, went too close to Earth, and was destroyed by Jove's thunderbolt.

So was her beauty to the standers by.
Nor that night-wandering pale and watery star[9]
(When yawning dragons draw her thirling[1] car
From Latmus' mount up to the gloomy sky,
110 Where, crowned with blazing light and majesty,
She proudly sits) more over-rules° the flood, rules over
Than she the hearts of those that near her stood.
Even as when gaudy nymphs pursue the chase,
Wretched Ixion's shaggy-footed race,[2]
115 Incensed with savage heat, gallop amain
From steep pine-bearing mountains to the plain,
So ran the people forth to gaze upon her,
And all that viewed her were enamored on her.
And as in fury of a dreadful fight,
120 Their fellows being slain or put to flight,
Poor soldiers stand with fear of death dead-strooken,
So at her presence all, surprised and tooken,° taken
Await the sentence of her scornful eyes;
He whom she favors lives, the other dies.
125 There might you see one sigh, another rage,
And some, their violent passions to assuage,° ease
Compile sharp satires; but alas, too late,
For faithful love will never turn to hate.
And many, seeing great princes were denied,
130 Pined as they went, and thinking on her, died.
On this feast day, oh, cursed day and hour!
Went Hero thorough° Sestos, from her tower through
To Venus' temple, where unhappily,
As after chanced, they did each other spy.
135 So fair a church as this had Venus none;
The walls were of discolored° jasper stone, varicolored
Wherein was Proteus° carvèd, and o'erhead a sea god
A lively° vine of green sea-agate spread, lifelike
Where, by one hand, light-headed Bacchus° hung, god of wine
140 And with the other, wine from grapes out-wrung.
Of crystal shining fair the pavement was;
The town of Sestos called it Venus' glass;
There might you see the gods in sundry shapes,
Committing heady° riots, incest, rapes; violent; impetuous
145 For know that underneath this radiant floor
Was Danae's statue in a brazen tower;[3]
Jove slyly stealing from his sister's bed
To dally with Idalian Ganymed,

9. The moon.
1. Piercing, like a flying arrow; also, whirling. Latmus was the home of the shepherd Endymion, loved by Diana, the moon goddess.
2. The centaurs, half man and half horse, were the offspring of Ixion and a cloud. For loving Juno, Ixion was made "wretched" by being chained to a ceaselessly rolling wheel.
3. The next lines give specific examples of the "riots, incest, rapes." Jove frequently left Juno, his sister and wife, to pursue other women; whether his actions constituted seduction or rape often depends on the particular account of a given myth, as well as on interpretation. Danaë was the daughter of the king of Argos, who imprisoned her because of a prophecy that a son born to her would kill him; Jove came to her in the form of a shower of gold, and as a result she gave birth to Perseus. Jove took the form of an eagle to abduct Ganymede (see note to line 62); the sexual nature of their relationship was a topic of great interest during the Renaissance. Jove took the form of a bull to rape Europa. The goddess of the rainbow (line 150) was Iris, a messenger of the gods.

And for his love Europa bellowing loud,
150 And tumbling with the rainbow in a cloud;
Blood-quaffing Mars heaving the iron net
Which limping Vulcan and his Cyclops set;[4]
Love kindling fire to burn such towns as Troy;
Silvanus weeping for the lovely boy
155 That now is turned into a cypress tree,[5]
Under whose shade the wood gods love to be.
And in the midst a silver altar stood;
There Hero sacrificing turtles'[6] blood,
Veiled° to the ground, veiling her eyelids close, bowed, bent
160 And modestly they opened as she rose;
Thence flew love's arrow with the golden head,[7]
And thus Leander was enamorèd.
Stone still he stood, and evermore he gazed,
Till with the fire that from his countenance blazed,
165 Relenting Hero's gentle heart was strook;
Such force and virtue° hath an amorous look. power, efficacy
It lies not in our power to love or hate,
For will in us is over-ruled by fate.
When two are stripped,[8] long ere the course begin
170 We wish that one should lose, the other win;
And one especially do we affect° prefer
Of two gold ingots, like in each respect.
The reason no man knows, let it suffice,
What we behold is censured° by our eyes. judged
175 Where both deliberate, the love is slight;
Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?
He kneeled, but unto her devoutly prayed;
Chaste Hero to herself thus softly said:
"Were I the saint he worships, I would hear him";
180 And as she spake these words, came somewhat near him.
He started up; she blushed as one ashamed;
Wherewith Leander much more was inflamed.
He touched her hand; in touching it she trembled;
Love deeply grounded hardly° is dissembled. with difficulty
185 These lovers parled° by the touch of hands; spoke
True love is mute, and oft amazed stands.
Thus while dumb signs their yielding hearts entangled,
The air with sparks of living fire was spangled,° speckled
And night, deep drenched in misty Acheron,[9]
190 Heaved up her head, and half the world upon
Breathed darkness forth (dark night is Cupid's day).
And now begins Leander to display
Love's holy fire with words, with sighs, and tears,
Which like sweet music entered Hero's ears;
195 And yet at every word she turned aside,

4. Vulcan and his helpers, the Cyclopes, trapped his wife, Venus, in bed with Mars, the god of war, and exposed them to the laughter of the other gods.
5. Cyparissus, changed by Apollo into a cypress tree, was mourned by the forest god, Sylvanus.
6. Turtledoves, which symbolized constancy in love.
7. According to Ovid, Cupid's arrows were tipped with gold or lead, the one producing love and the other loathing.
8. I.e., for a race.
9. The river of woe in the underworld.

And always cut him off as he replied.
At last, like to a bold sharp sophister,[1]
With cheerful hope thus he accosted her:
"Fair creature, let me speak without offense;
200 I would my rude words had the influence
To lead thy thoughts as thy fair looks do mine!
Then shouldst thou be his prisoner who is thine.
Be not unkind and fair; misshapen stuff° persons
Are of behavior boisterous and rough.
205 Oh, shun me not, but hear me ere you go,
God knows I cannot force love, as you do.
My words shall be as spotless as my youth,
Full of simplicity and naked truth.
This sacrifice, whose sweet perfume descending
210 From Venus' altar to your footsteps bending,
Doth testify that you exceed her far,
To whom you offer, and whose nun you are.
Why should you worship her? her you surpass
As much as sparkling diamonds flaring° glass. glaring, gaudy
215 A diamond set in lead his worth retains;
A heavenly nymph,[2] beloved of human swains,° rustics
Receives no blemish, but ofttimes more grace;
Which makes me hope, although I am but base,
Base in respect° of° thee, divine and pure, comparison / with 220 Dutiful service may thy love procure,
And I in duty will excel all other,
As thou in beauty dost exceed Love's° mother. Cupid's
Nor heaven, nor thou, were made to gaze upon;
As heaven preserves all things, so save thou one.
225 A stately builded ship, well rigged and tall,
The ocean maketh more majestical;
Why vowest thou then to live in Sestos here,
Who on love's seas more glorious wouldst appear?
Like untuned golden strings all women are,
230 Which long time lie untouched, will harshly jar.[3]
Vessels of brass, oft handled, brightly shine;
What difference betwixt the richest mine° ore
And basest mold,° but use? for both, not used, earth
Are of like worth. Then treasure is abused,
235 When misers keep it; being put to loan,
In time it will return us two for one.
Rich robes themselves and others do adorn;
Neither themselves nor others, if not worn.
Who builds a palace, and rams up the gate,
240 Shall see it ruinous and desolate.
Ah, simple Hero, learn thyself to cherish!
Lone women, like to empty houses, perish.
Less sins the poor rich man that starves himself
In heaping up a mass of drossy° pelf,° worthless / riches

1. One who reasons adroitly rather than soundly; also, a university student in his junior or senior year.

2. Minor nature goddess.

3. I.e., unplayed musical instruments go out of tune.

245 Than such as you; his golden earth remains,
Which, after his decease, some other gains;
But this fair gem, sweet in the loss alone,
When you fleet° hence, can be bequeathed to none. fly
Or if it could, down from th' enameled° sky varicolored
250 All heaven would come to claim this legacy,
And with intestine° broils° the world destroy, internal, civil / wars
And quite confound nature's sweet harmony.
Well therefore by the gods decreed it is
We human creatures should enjoy that bliss.
255 One is no number;[4] maids are nothing, then,
Without the sweet society of men.
Wilt thou live single still? one shalt thou be
Though never-singling Hymen° couple thee. god of marriage
Wild savages, that drink of running springs,
260 Think water far excels all earthly things,
But they that daily taste neat° wine, despise it; undiluted
Virginity, albeit some highly prize it,
Compared with marriage, had you tried them both,
Differs as much as wine and water doth.
265 Base bullion for the stamp's[5] sake we allow;
Even so for men's impression do we you,
By which alone, our reverend fathers say,
Women receive perfection every way.
This idol which you term virginity
270 Is neither essence° subject to the eye, an existing thing
No, nor to any one exterior sense,
Nor hath it any place of residence,
Nor is 't of earth or mold° celestial, form
Or capable of any form at all.
275 Of that which hath no being, do not boast;
Things that are not at all, are never lost.
Men foolishly do call it virtuous;
What virtue is it, that is born with us?
Much less can honor be ascribed thereto;
280 Honor is purchased by the deeds we do.
Believe me, Hero, honor is not won
Until some honorable deed be done.
Seek you, for chastity, immortal fame,
And know that some have wronged Diana's name?[6]
285 Whose name is it, if she be false or not,
So she be fair, but some vile tongues will blot?
But you are fair, ay me, so wondrous fair,
So young, so gentle, and so debonair,° affable, courteous
As Greece will think, if thus you live alone,
290 Some one or other keeps you as his own.
Then, Hero, hate me not, nor from me fly
To follow swiftly blasting infamy.

4. The theory that one is not a number appears in Aristotle's Metaphysics and was often discussed by later, Neoplatonic philosophers.
5. I.e., the impression that turns a mere piece of metal ("bullion") into a coin.
6. Diana was the goddess of chastity. Nevertheless, some stories attribute amorous relationships to her.

Perhaps thy sacred priesthood makes thee loath;
Tell me, to whom mad'st thou that heedless oath?"
295 "To Venus," answered she, and as she spake,
Forth from those two tralucent° cisterns brake — translucent
A stream of liquid pearl, which down her face
Made milk-white paths, whereon the gods might trace° — go
To Jove's high court. He thus replied: "The rites
300 In which love's beauteous empress most delights
Are banquets, Doric music,[7] midnight revel,
Plays, masques, and all that stern age counteth evil.
Thee as a holy idiot° doth she scorn, — untutored person
For thou, in vowing chastity, hast sworn 305 To rob her name and honor, and thereby
Commit'st a sin far worse than perjury,
Even sacrilege against her deity,
Through regular and formal purity.
To expiate which sin, kiss and shake hands;
310 Such sacrifice as this Venus demands."
Thereat she smiled, and did deny him so
As, put° thereby, yet might he hope for mo.° — put off / more
Which makes him quickly reinforce his speech,
And her in humble manner thus beseech:
315 "Though neither gods nor men may thee deserve,
Yet for her sake whom you have vowed to serve,
Abandon fruitless cold virginity,
The gentle queen of love's sole enemy.
Then shall you most resemble Venus' nun,
320 When Venus' sweet rites are performed and done.
Flint-breasted Pallas[8] joys in single life,
But Pallas and your mistress are at strife.
Love, Hero, then, and be not tyrannous,
But heal the heart that thou hast wounded thus;
325 Nor stain thy youthful years with avarice;
Fair fools delight to be accounted nice.° — coy
The richest corn dies if it be not reaped;
Beauty alone° is lost, too warily kept." — on its own
These arguments he used, and many more,
330 Wherewith she yielded, that was won before.
Hero's looks yielded, but her words made war;
Women are won when they begin to jar.° — argue
Thus having swallowed Cupid's golden hook,
The more she strived, the deeper was she strook;° — love-struck
335 Yet, evilly feigning anger, strove she still,
And would be thought to grant against her will.
So having paused awhile, at last she said:
"Who taught thee rhetoric to deceive a maid?
Ay me! such words as these should I abhor,
340 And yet I like them for the orator."
With that Leander stooped to have embraced her,

7. Leander apparently confuses Doric music, which was stirring and martial, with Lydian music, which was soft and voluptuous.

8. Pallas Athena, the virgin goddess of wisdom, usually portrayed in armor.

But from his spreading arms away she cast her,
And thus bespake him: "Gentle youth, forbear
To touch the sacred garments which I wear.
345 Upon a rock, and underneath a hill,
Far from the town, where all is whist° and still — silent
Save that the sea playing on yellow sand
Sends forth a rattling murmur to the land,
Whose sound allures the golden Morpheus° — god of sleep
350 In silence of the night to visit us,
My turret stands; and there, God knows, I play
With Venus' swans and sparrows all the day.
A dwarfish beldame° bears me company, — old woman
That hops about the chamber where I lie,
355 And spends the night, that might be better spent,
In vain discourse and apish° merriment. — silly
Come thither." As she spake this, her tongue tripped,
For unawares, "Come thither," from her slipped;
And suddenly her former color changed,
360 And here and there her eyes, through anger, ranged.
And like a planet moving several ways[9]
At one self° instant, she, poor soul, assays,° — and the same / tries
Loving, not to love at all, and every part
Strove to resist the motions of her heart;
365 And hands so pure, so innocent, nay such
As might have made heaven stoop to have a touch,
Did she uphold to Venus, and again
Vowed spotless chastity, but all in vain.
Cupid beats down her prayers with his wings;
370 Her vows above the empty air he flings;
All deep enraged, his sinewy° bow he bent, — strong
And shot a shaft that burning from him went;
Wherewith she, strooken,° looked so dolefully, — struck
As made Love sigh to see his tyranny.
375 And as she wept, her tears to pearl he turned,
And wound them on his arm, and for her mourned.
Then towards the palace of the Destinies,[1]
Laden with languishment and grief, he flies,
And to those stern nymphs° humbly made request, — girls
380 Both might enjoy each other, and be blest.
But with a ghastly dreadful countenance,
Threatening a thousand deaths at every glance,
They answered Love, nor would vouchsafe so much
As one poor word, their hate to him was such.
385 Hearken awhile, and I will tell you why:
Heaven's winged herald, Jove-born Mercury,° — messenger god
The selfsame day that he asleep had laid
Enchanted Argus,[2] spied a country maid,

9. As in Ptolemaic astronomy, where planets moved both in their own orbits and through the influence of other planets' motion. Several: differently.
1. The Fates, three sister goddesses who determined the course of human life by spinning and cutting threads.
2. The watchman with a hundred eyes set by Juno to guard Io, beloved of Jupiter. Mercury (also called Hermes) lulled Argus asleep with his music, then killed him, at Jove's command.

Whose careless hair, instead of pearl t' adorn it,
390 Glistered° with dew, as one that seemed to scorn it;[3] glistened
Her breath as fragrant as the morning rose,
Her mind pure, and her tongue untaught to gloze;° flatter
Yet proud she was, for lofty pride that dwells
In towered courts is oft in shepherds' cells,° huts
395 And too too well the fair vermilion° knew, scarlet
And silver tincture of her cheeks, that drew
The love of every swain.° On her this god rustic
Enamored was, and with his snaky rod[4]
Did charm her nimble feet, and made her stay,
400 The while upon a hillock down he lay,
And sweetly on his pipe began to play,
And with smooth speech her fancy to assay;° try
Till in his twining arms he locked her fast,
And then he wooed with kisses, and at last,
405 As shepherds do, her on the ground he laid,
And tumbling in the grass, he often strayed
Beyond the bounds of shame, in being bold
To eye those parts which no eye should behold.
And like an insolent commanding lover,
410 Boasting his parentage, would needs discover
The way to new Elysium;[5] but she,
Whose only dower° was her chastity, dowry
Having striv'n in vain, was now about to cry,
And crave the help of shepherds that were nigh.
415 Herewith he stayed his fury,° and began passion
To give her leave to rise; away she ran;
After went Mercury, who used such cunning,
As she, to hear his tale, left off her running;
Maids are not won by brutish force and might,
420 But speeches full of pleasure and delight;
And knowing Hermes courted her, was glad
That she such loveliness and beauty had
As could provoke his liking, yet was mute,
And neither would deny nor grant his suit.
425 Still vowed he love, she wanting no excuse
To feed him with delays, as women use,° usually do
Or thirsting after immortality—
All women are ambitious naturally—
Imposed upon her lover such a task
430 As he ought not perform, nor yet she ask.
A draught of flowing nectar she requested,
Wherewith the king of gods and men is feasted.
He, ready to accomplish what she willed,
Stole some from Hebe[6] (Hebe Jove's cup filled)
435 And gave it to his simple rustic love;
Which being known (as° what is hid from Jove?) for
He inly° stormed, and waxed more furious inwardly

3. I.e., pearl or other jewelry.
4. The caduceus, Mercury's magic staff.
5. In Greek mythology, a place of ideal happiness inhabited by the blessed dead.
6. Jove's cupbearer before Jove ravished Ganymede (see note to line 62).

Than for the fire filched by Prometheus,[7]
And thrusts him down from heaven; he wandering here
440 In mournful terms,° with sad and heavy cheer,° state / look
Complained to Cupid. Cupid, for his° sake, Prometheus's
To be revenged on Jove did undertake;
And those on whom heaven, earth, and hell relies,
I mean the adamantine° Destinies, unyielding
445 He wounds with love, and forced them equally
To dote upon deceitful Mercury.
They offered him the deadly fatal knife
That shears the slender threads of human life;
At his fair-feathered feet the engines laid
450 Which th' earth from ugly Chaos' den upweighed;[8]
These he regarded not, but did entreat
That Jove, usurper of his father's seat,[9]
Might presently be banished into hell,
And aged Saturn in Olympus dwell.
455 They granted what he craved, and once again
Saturn and Ops° began their golden reign. Saturn's wife
Murder, rape, war, lust, and treachery
Were with Jove closed in Stygian empery.[1]
But long this blessed time continued not;
460 As soon as he his wishèd purpose got,
He, reckless of his promise, did despise
The love of th' everlasting Destinies.
They seeing it, both Love and him abhorred,
And Jupiter unto his place restored.
465 And but that Learning,[2] in despite of Fate,
Will mount aloft, and enter heaven gate,
And to the seat of Jove itself advance,
Hermes had slept in hell with Ignorance;
Yet as a punishment they added this,
470 That he and Poverty should always kiss.
And to this day is every scholar poor;
Gross gold from them runs headlong to the boor.[3]
Likewise, the angry sisters thus deluded,
To venge themselves on Hermes, have concluded
475 That Midas'[4] brood shall sit in Honor's chair,
To which the Muses' sons[5] are only heir;
And fruitful wits that inaspiring° are not greedy
Shall, discontent, run into regions far;
And few great lords in virtuous deeds shall joy,
480 But be surprised with every garish toy;[6]

7. Prometheus angered Jove by stealing fire from the gods for the benefit of humans.
8. The Fates also controlled the "beams" that "upweighed," or supported, Earth, since it was formed out of Chaos, the undifferentiated mass from which all things came.
9. I.e., that of Jove's father, Saturn, whose peaceful reign in heaven, before Jove dethroned him, was known as the Golden Age.
1. Dominion. Stygian: pertaining to the river Styx, in Hades.
2. Mercury, the god of learning. In the following lines, Marlowe claims that Learning, because it is divine, naturally rises, but that the Fates, to punish Mercury for neglecting them, decreed that Learning went together with Poverty.
3. I.e., large amounts (a "gross") of gold go swiftly to the "boor," one who lacks refinement, rather than to the "scholar."
4. The king whose touch turned objects to gold.
5. I.e., people involved in music, poetry, and the arts and sciences, all of which were presided over by nine sister goddesses called the Muses.
6. I.e., be delighted with trivial things.

And still enrich the lofty° servile clown, proud
Who with encroaching guile keeps learning down.
Then muse° not Cupid's suit no better sped,° marvel / succeeded
Seeing in their loves the Fates were injurèd.

Second Sestiad

By° this, sad Hero, with love unacquainted, at
Viewing Leander's face, fell down and fainted.
He kissed her and breathed life into her lips,
Wherewith, as one displeased, away she trips.
5 Yet as she went, full often looked behind,
And many poor excuses did she find
To linger by the way, and once she stayed
And would have turned again, but was afraid,
In offering parley,° to be counted light.° talk / wanton
10 So on she goes, and in her idle flight,
Her painted fan of curlèd plumes let fall,
Thinking to train° Leander therewithal. entice
He, being a novice, knew not what she meant,
But stayed, and after her a letter sent,
15 Which joyful Hero answered in such sort
As he had hoped to scale the beauteous fort
Wherein the liberal graces[7] locked their wealth,
And therefore to her tower he got by stealth.
Wide open stood the door, he need not climb;
20 And she herself, before the 'pointed time,
Had spread the board, with roses strewed the room,
And oft looked out, and mused° he did not come. wondered why
At last he came; Oh, who can tell the greeting
These greedy lovers had at their first meeting?
25 He asked, she gave, and nothing was denied;
Both to each other quickly were affied.° affianced
Look how their hands, so were their hearts united,
And what he did she willingly requited.
(Sweet are the kisses, the embracements sweet,
30 When like desires and affections meet;
For from the earth to heaven is Cupid raised,
Where fancy is in equal balance peised.°) weighed
Yet she this rashness suddenly repented,
And turned aside, and to herself lamented,
35 As if her name and honor had been wronged
By being possessed of him for whom she longed;
Aye, and she wished, albeit not from her heart,
That he would leave her turret and depart.
The mirthful god of amorous pleasure smiled
40 To see how he this captive nymph° beguiled; girl
For hitherto he did but fan the fire,
And kept it down that it might mount the higher.
Now waxed she jealous° lest his love abated, fearful

7. Charm and beauty (given by three sister goddesses called the Graces).

Fearing her own thoughts made her to be hated.
45 Therefore unto him hastily she goes,
And like light Salmacis,[8] her body throws
Upon his bosom, where with yielding eyes
She offers up herself, a sacrifice
To slake° his anger if he were displeased. decrease
50 Oh, what god would not therewith be appeased?
Like Aesop's cock,[9] this jewel he enjoyed,
And as a brother with his sister toyed,
Supposing nothing else was to be done,
Now he her favor and good will had won.
55 But know you not that creatures wanting sense[1]
By nature have a mutual appetence,° affinity
And wanting organs to advance a step,
Moved by love's force, unto each other leap?
Much more in subjects having intellect,
60 Some hidden influence breeds like effect.
Albeit Leander, rude° in love and raw, untutored
Long dallying with Hero, nothing saw
That might delight him more, yet he suspected
Some amorous rites or other were neglected.
65 Therefore unto his body hers he clung;° clasped
She, fearing on the rushes[2] to be flung,
Strived with redoubled strength; the more she strived,
The more a gentle pleasing heat revived,
Which taught him all that elder lovers know;
70 And now the same gan so to scorch and glow,
As in plain terms, yet cunningly,° he craved it; skillfully
Love always makes those eloquent that have it.
She, with a kind of granting, put him by it,[3]
And ever as he thought himself most nigh it,
75 Like to the tree of Tantalus[4] she fled,
And, seeming lavish,° saved her maidenhead. immodest
Ne'er king more sought to keep his diadem,° crown
Than Hero this inestimable gem.
Above our life we love a steadfast friend,
80 Yet when a token of great worth we send,
We often kiss it, often look thereon,
And stay the messenger that would be gone;
No marvel then though Hero would not yield
So soon to part from that she dearly held;
85 Jewels being lost are found again, this never;
'Tis lost but once, and once lost, lost forever.
Now had the morn espied her lover's steeds,[5]

8. A nymph (minor nature goddess) who became enamored of Hermaphroditus when she saw him bathing in her lake. Throwing herself upon him in spite of his resistance, she called on the gods to keep them together forever. In answer to her prayer, their two bodies united and became one, both male and female.
9. In one of Aesop's fables, a cock found a jewel in a dung heap, but had no notion of its value and traded it for a grain of corn.
1. I.e., that inanimate objects.
2. Reeds, used as floor mats in Elizabethan homes.
3. Deflected him.
4. For stealing nectar from the gods to give to humans, Jove punished Tantalus by placing him in a pool in Hades. Whenever Tantalus bent to drink, the water receded from his lips; when he reached for the fruit that dangled above his head, it rose out of his grasp.
5. The horses that pull the sun's chariot.

Whereat she starts, puts on her purple weeds,
And, red for anger that he stayed so long,
90 All headlong throws herself the clouds among.
And now Leander, fearing to be missed,
Embraced her suddenly, took leave, and kissed.
Long was he taking leave, and loath to go,
And kissed again, as lovers use to do.
95 Sad Hero wrung him by the hand and wept,
Saying, "Let your vows and promises be kept."
Then, standing at the door, she turned about,
As loath to see Leander going out.
And now the sun that through th' horizon peeps,
100 As pitying these lovers, downward creeps,
So that in silence of the cloudy night,
Though it was morning, did he take his flight.
But what the secret trusty night concealed,
Leander's amorous habit° soon revealed; clothing
105 With Cupid's myrtle[6] was his bonnet crowned,
About his arms the purple riband° wound ribbon
Wherewith she wreathed her largely spreading hair;
Nor could the youth abstain, but he must wear
The sacred ring wherewith she was endowed,
110 When first religious chastity she vowed;
Which made his love through Sestos to be known,
And thence unto Abydos sooner blown
Than he could sail; for incorporeal Fame,
Whose weight consists in nothing but her name,
115 Is swifter than the wind, whose tardy plumes
Are reeking water and dull earthly fumes.[7]
Home, when he came, he seemed not to be there,
But like exilèd air thrust from his sphere,
Set in a foreign place;[8] and straight from thence,
120 Alcides° like, by mighty violence Hercules
He would have chased away the swelling main° ocean
That him from her unjustly did detain.
Like as the sun in a diameter[9]
Fires and inflames objects removèd far,
125 And heateth kindly, shining laterally,
So beauty sweetly quickens when 'tis nigh,
But being separated and removed,
Burns where it cherished, murders where it loved.
Therefore even as an index to a book,
130 So to his mind was young Leander's look.
Oh, none but gods have power their love to hide;
Affection by the countenance is descried.° made known
The light of hidden fire itself discovers,
And love that is concealed betrays poor lovers.
135 His secret flame apparently° was seen; openly
Leander's father knew where he had been,

6. Plant sacred to Cupid and Venus, symbolic of love.
7. I.e., are producing fog and mist.
8. I.e., air rushes to fill a vacuum.
9. Directly overhead, where it appears to be farther off than when low in the sky.

And for the same mildly rebuked his son,
Thinking to quench the sparkles new begun.
But love, resisted once, grows passionate,
140 And nothing more than counsel lovers hate;
For as a hot proud horse highly disdains
To have his head controlled, but breaks the reins,
Spits forth the ringled° bit, and with his hooves — ringed
Checks° the submissive ground, so he that loves, — stamps
145 The more he is restrained, the worse he fares.
What is it now but mad Leander dares?[1]
"Oh Hero, Hero!" thus he cried full oft,
And then he got him to a rock aloft,
Where having spied her tower, long stared he on 't,
150 And prayed the narrow toiling Hellespont
To part in twain, that he might come and go;
But still the rising billows answered "No."
With that he stripped him to the ivory skin,
And crying, "Love, I come!" leaped lively in.
155 Whereat the sapphire-visaged god grew proud,
And made his capering Triton[2] sound aloud,
Imagining that Ganymede,[3] displeased,
Had left the heavens; therefore on him he seized.
Leander strived; the waves about him wound,
160 And pulled him to the bottom, where the ground
Was strewed with pearl, and in low coral groves
Sweet singing mermaids sported with their loves
On heaps of heavy gold, and took great pleasure
To spurn in careless sort the shipwreck treasure.
165 For here the stately azure palace stood,
Where kingly Neptune and his train abode.
The lusty god embraced him, called him love,
And swore he never should return to Jove.
But when he knew it was not Ganymede,
170 For under water he was almost dead,
He heaved him up, and looking on his face,
Beat down the bold waves with his triple mace,[4]
Which mounted up, intending to have kissed him,
And fell in drops like tears, because they missed him.
175 Leander, being up, began to swim,
And looking back, saw Neptune follow him;
Whereat aghast, the poor soul gan to cry:
"Oh, let me visit Hero ere I die!"
The god put Helle's[5] bracelet on his arm,
180 And swore the sea should never do him harm.
He clapped his plump cheeks, with his tresses played,
And smiling wantonly, his love bewrayed.° — revealed
He watched his arms, and as they opened wide,

1. I.e., there is nothing now that mad Leander wouldn't dare do.
2. The son and trumpeter of the "sapphire-visaged" sea god, Neptune.
3. Jove's cupbearer (see note 3, p. 240).
4. The three-pronged fork carried by Neptune.
5. A Theban princess who, while fleeing from her stepmother on the back of a winged, golden-fleeced ram, fell into the strait that separates Europe and Asia, named the Hellespont for her. Marlowe seems to have invented the detail of the bracelet.

At every stroke betwixt them would he slide,
185 And steal a kiss, and then run out and dance,
And as he turned, cast many a lustful glance,
And threw him gaudy toys to please his eye,
And dive into the water, and there pry
Upon his breast, his thighs, and every limb,
190 And up again, and close beside him swim,
And talk of love. Leander made reply:
"You are deceived, I am no woman, I."
Thereat smiled Neptune, and then told a tale
How that a shepherd, sitting in a vale,
195 Played with a boy so lovely, fair, and kind,
As for his love both earth and heaven pined;
That of the cooling river durst not drink
Lest water nymphs should pull him from the brink;
And when he sported in the fragrant lawns,
200 Goat-footed satyrs and up-staring fauns[6]
Would steal him thence. Ere half this tale was done,
"Ay me," Leander cried, "th' enamored sun,
That now should shine on Thetis' glassy bower,[7]
Descends upon my radiant Hero's tower.
205 Oh, that these tardy arms of mine were wings!"
And as he spake, upon the waves he springs.
Neptune was angry that he gave no ear,
And in his heart revenging malice bare;
He flung at him his mace, but as it went
210 He called it in, for love made him repent.
The mace returning back, his own hand hit,
As meaning to be venged for darting it.
When this fresh bleeding wound Leander viewed,
His color went and came, as if he rued
215 The grief which Neptune felt. In gentle breasts
Relenting thoughts, remorse, and pity rests;
And who have hard hearts and obdurate minds
But vicious, harebrained, and illiterate hinds?° rustics
The god, seeing him with pity to be moved,
220 Thereon concluded that he was beloved.
(Love is too full of faith, too credulous,
With folly and false hope deluding us.)
Wherefore, Leander's fancy° to surprise,° love / capture
To the rich ocean for gifts he flies.
225 'Tis wisdom to give much; a gift prevails
When deep persuading oratory fails.
By this,° Leander, being near the land, this time
Cast down his weary feet and felt the sand.
Breathless albeit he were, he rested not 230 Till to the solitary tower he got,
And knocked and called, at which celestial noise
The longing heart of Hero much more joys

6. Like satyrs, woodland deities; fauns prophesied by looking to the heavens. Nymphs: minor nature goddesses.

7. I.e., the sea. Thetis was a daughter of the sea god Nereus.

Than nymphs or shepherds when the timbrel° rings, tambourine
Or crooked° dolphin when the sailor sings; curving
235 She stayed not for her robes, but straight arose,
And drunk with gladness, to the door she goes;
Where seeing a naked man, she screeched for fear,
(Such sights as this to tender maids are rare)
And ran into the dark herself to hide.
240 Rich jewels in the dark are soonest spied;
Unto her was he led, or rather drawn,
By those white limbs which sparkled through the lawn.[8]
The nearer that he came, the more she fled,
And seeking refuge, slipped into her bed.
245 Whereon Leander sitting, thus began,
Through numbing cold all feeble, faint, and wan:° pale
"If not for love, yet, love, for pity sake,
Me in thy bed and maiden bosom take;
At least vouchsafe these arms some little room,
250 Who, hoping to embrace thee, cheerly° swum; gladly
This head was beat with many a churlish billow,
And therefore let it rest upon thy pillow."
Herewith affrighted Hero shrunk away,
And in her lukewarm place Leander lay,
255 Whose lively heat like fire from heaven fet,° fetched
Would animate gross clay, and higher set
The drooping thoughts of base declining souls,
Than dreary° Mars° carousing nectar bowls. bloody / god of war
His hands he cast upon her like a snare;
260 She, overcome with shame and sallow° fear, pale, yellowish
Like chaste Diana, when Actaeon spied her,[9]
Being suddenly betrayed, dived down to hide her;
And as her silver body downward went,
With both her hands she made the bed a tent,
265 And in her own mind thought herself secure,
O'ercast with dim and darksome coverture.
And now she lets him whisper in her ear,
Flatter, entreat, promise, protest, and swear;
Yet ever as he greedily assayed° tried
270 To touch those dainties, she the harpy[1] played,
And every limb did, as a soldier stout,
Defend the fort and keep the foeman out;
For though the rising ivory mount he scaled,
Which is with azure circling lines empaled,
275 Much like a globe (a globe may I term this,
By which love sails to regions full of bliss)
Yet there with Sisyphus[2] he toiled in vain,
Till gentle parley° did the truce obtain. conference
Wherein Leander on her quivering breast,
280 Breathless spoke something, and sighed out the rest;

8. A sheer cotton or linen fabric.
9. Actaeon, a hunter who saw the naked Diana about to bathe in her favorite pool; as punishment, he was turned into a stag and killed by hounds.
1. Harpies were often pictured as hideous creatures, half woman and half bird; in Virgil's Aeneid, several harpies seize the meal of an old prophet.
2. Who was condemned to Hades and made to roll a stone uphill forever.

Which so prevailed, as he with small ado
Enclosed her in his arms and kissed her too.
And every kiss to her was as a charm,
And to Leander as a fresh alarm,° call to battle
285 So that the truce was broke, and she, alas,
Poor silly° maiden, at his mercy was. innocent
Love is not full of pity, as men say,
But deaf and cruel where he means to prey.
Even as a bird, which in our hands we wring,
290 Forth plungeth and oft flutters with her wing,
She trembling strove; this strife of hers, like that
Which made the world,[3] another world begat
Of unknown joy. Treason was in her thought,
And cunningly to yield herself she sought.
295 Seeming not won, yet won she was at length;
In such wars women use but half their strength.
Leander now, like Theban Hercules,
Entered the orchard of th' Hesperides,[4]
Whose fruit none rightly can describe but he 300 That pulls or shakes it from the golden tree.
And now she wished this night were never done,
And sighed to think upon th' approaching sun;
For much it grieved her that the bright daylight
Should know the pleasure of this blessed night,
305 And them like Mars and Erycine[5] display,
Both in each other's arms chained as they lay.
Again she knew not how to frame her look,
Or speak to him who in a moment took
That which so long, so charily she kept;
310 And fain by stealth away she would have crept,
And to some corner secretly have gone,
Leaving Leander in the bed alone.
But as her naked feet were whipping out,
He on the sudden clinged her so about,
315 That mermaid-like unto the floor she slid,
One half appeared, the other half was hid.
Thus near the bed she blushing stood upright,
And from her countenance behold ye might
A kind of twilight break, which through the hair,
320 As from an orient° cloud, glimpse here and there; bright
And round about the chamber this false morn
Brought forth the day before the day was born.
So Hero's ruddy cheek Hero betrayed,
And her all naked to his sight displayed;
325 Whence his admiring eyes more pleasure took
Than Dis[6] on heaps of gold fixing his look.
By this, Apollo's golden harp began

3. According to the ancient Greek philosopher Empedocles, love and strife opposed each other and thus brought about creation.
4. Daughters of the Titan Atlas and custodians of a tree that bore golden apples. One of Hercules' superhuman labors was to steal the apples.
5. Venus; see note 4, p. 242.
6. Pluto, god of the underworld and god of wealth.

To sound forth music to the ocean;[7]
Which watchful Hesperus no sooner heard,
330 But he the day-bright-bearing car prepared,
And ran before, as harbinger of light,
And with his flaring beams mocked ugly night
Till she, o'ercome with anguish, shame, and rage,
Danged° down to hell her loathsome carriage. drove violently

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love[8]

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove° try
That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
Woods, or steepy mountain yields.

5 And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses
10 And a thousand fragrant posies,
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle° gown
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
15 Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:° buttons
And if these pleasures may thee move,
20 Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherds' swains° shall dance and sing followers
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my love.

1599, 1600

7. Presaging the rising of the sun. Hesperus is normally the evening star, but in the next line Marlowe applies the name to the morning star, usually called Phosphorus or Lucifer.

8. Cf. the response by Sir Walter Ralegh, "The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd" (p. 152); cf. also C. Day Lewis's version of this poem (p. 1449).

From fairest creatures we desire increase,
That thereby beauty's rose might never die,
But as the riper should by time decease,
His tender° heir might bear his memory; young
5 But thou, contracted[2] to thine own bright eyes,
Feed'st thy light's flame with self-substantial[3] fuel,
Making a famine where abundance lies,
Thyself thy foe, to thy sweet self too cruel.
Thou that art now the world's fresh ornament
10 And only° herald to the gaudy spring, principal; solitary
Within thine own bud buriest thy content,[4]
And, tender churl,[5] mak'st waste in niggarding.° hoarding
Pity the world, or else this glutton be,
To eat the world's due, by the grave and thee.

1. Much critical debate focuses on this dedication and its first set of initials (the second set refers to the publisher, Thomas Thorpe). "Mr. W. H." may be William Herbert, earl of Pembroke, or Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton; the former is a dedicatee of the volume of Shakespeare's plays known as the First Folio, while the latter is the dedicatee of Shakespeare's narrative poems Venus and Adonis and Lucrece. Patrons were often flatteringly depicted as "begetters" of poems, and it is therefore tempting to see an association between "Mr. W. H." and the beloved young man addressed in many of Shakespeare's sonnets, especially because the first seventeen poems in the sequence stress the young man's need to marry and beget heirs. No clear evidence, however, identifies a specific historical person either with the young man addressed in the sonnets or with the "Dark Lady" evoked as the third member of the erotic triangle Shakespeare dramatizes in these poems.
The sonnets evidently circulated in manuscript for some years before they were first published as a group in 1609 (a few appeared separately in anthologies). The ordering of the 154 poems in the 1609 Quarto may or may not reflect authorial design.
2. Betrothed; also implying withdrawn into, shrunken (not increased).
3. Of your own (unique) substance.
4. What contents you (marriage and fatherhood) and also what you contain (potential for fatherhood).
5. Gentle boor.

When forty winters shall besiege thy brow
And dig deep trenches in thy beauty's field,
Thy youth's proud° livery,° so gazed on now, — splendid / clothing
Will be a tottered° weed° of small worth held. — tattered / garment
5 Then being asked where all thy beauty lies—
Where all the treasure of thy lusty days—
To say within thine own deep-sunken eyes
Were an all-eating shame[6] and thriftless praise.
How much more praise deserved thy beauty's use,[7]
10 If thou couldst answer, "This fair child of mine
Shall sum my count and make my old excuse"[8]—
Proving his beauty by succession thine.
This were to be new made when thou art old,
And see thy blood warm when thou feel'st it cold.

Look in thy glass° and tell the face thou viewest, — mirror
Now is the time that face should form another,
Whose fresh repair° if now thou not renewest, — condition
Thou dost beguile the world, unbless some mother.
5 For where is she so fair whose uneared[9] womb
Disdains the tillage of thy husbandry?
Or who is he so fond° will be the tomb — foolish
Of his self-love, to stop posterity?
Thou art thy mother's glass, and she in thee
10 Calls back the lovely April of her prime;
So thou through windows of thine age shalt see,
Despite of wrinkles, this thy golden time.
But if thou live rememb'red not to be,
Die single, and thine image dies with thee.

12

When I do count the clock that tells the time,
And see the brave° day sunk in hideous night; — resplendent
When I behold the violet past prime,
And sable curls all silvered o'er with white;
5 When lofty trees I see barren of leaves,
Which erst° from heat did canopy the herd, — formerly
And summer's green all girded up in sheaves,
Borne on the bier[1] with white and bristly beard,

6. A total disgrace; also, an offense in which the beauty of youth has been devoured.
7. Investment for profit; also, sexual use.
8. Shall complete my account and justify me in my old age.
9. Immature; also, unplowed.
1. A frame for carrying harvested grain; also, a stand on which a corpse is carried to the grave.

Then of thy beauty do I question make,
10 That thou among the wastes of time must go,
Since sweets and beauties do themselves forsake
And die as fast as they see others grow;
  And nothing 'gainst Time's scythe can make defense
  Save breed,° to brave° him when he takes thee hence. progeny / defy

15

When I consider everything that grows
Holds° in perfection but a little moment, remains
That this huge stage presenteth nought but shows[2]
Whereon the stars in secret influence comment;[3]
5 When I perceive that men as plants increase,
Cheerèd and checked° ev'n by the selfsame sky, repressed
Vaunt in their youthful sap,[4] at height decrease,
And wear their brave state out of memory,[5]
Then the conceit° of this inconstant stay conception, idea
10 Sets you most rich in youth before my sight,
Where wasteful time debateth with[6] decay
To change your day of youth to sullied° night; soiled; darkened
  And all in war with time for love of you,
  As he takes from you, I engraft you new.[7]

18

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease° hath all too short a date; alloted time
5 Sometimes too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimmed;
And every fair° from fair sometimes declines, beauty
By chance or nature's changing course untrimmed;[8]
But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
10 Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st;[9]
Nor shall death brag thou wand'rest in his shade,
When in eternal lines to Time thou grow'st:[1]
  So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see,
  So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

2. This can be read as "presents only appearances of performances" with "shows" functioning as a noun, but "shows" also can operate as a verb and mean "reveals."
3. The stars secretly affect humankind's explanation of the world.
4. Exult in their youthful vigor; also, display themselves.
5. Wear out their splendid finery and are forgotten.
6. Fights with, fights against.
7. As time withers you, I renew you (with my poetry).
8. Divested of its beauty.
9. Own, with a play on owe.
1. I.e., when you are grafted to Time in this immortal poetry.

20

A woman's face, with nature's own hand painted,[2]
Hast thou, the master mistress of my passion—
A woman's gentle heart, but not acquainted
With shifting change, as is false° women's fashion; deceitful; artificial
5 An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling,° roving
Gilding the object whereupon it gazeth;
A man in hue all hues in his controlling,[3]
Which steals men's eyes and women's souls amazeth.
And for a woman wert thou first created,
10 Till nature as she wrought thee fell a-doting,° crazy; infatuated
And by addition me of thee defeated,
By adding one thing to my purpose nothing.
But since she pricked thee out for women's pleasure,
Mine be thy love and thy love's use their treasure.[4]

29

When, in disgrace° with fortune and men's eyes, disfavor
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless° cries, futile
And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
5 Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featured° like him, like him[5] with friends possessed, formed; handsome
Desiring this man's art° and that man's scope,[6] skill
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
10 Haply I think on thee—and then my state,[7]
Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate;
For thy sweet love remember'd such wealth brings
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

2. I.e., not made up with cosmetics.
3. "Controlling" works as a noun and as an adjective, depending on how one interprets "hue" (form, complexion, color, and apparition are the main possibilities). The line has been paraphrased in many ways, among them: "a man in form, all forms, i.e., all people, are subject to his power"; "a man in complexion, he has control over all other complexions, i.e., he causes people to grow pale or blush"; "a man in appearance, he can present any appearance he chooses."
4. Interest (as in usury), sexual enjoyment. Modern editors usually punctuate this line with a comma after "love," but some recent critics argue instead for a comma after "use"; we follow the 1609 Quarto in not punctuating the line internally, thereby allowing for more than one interpretation of the final couplet.
5. The "him"s here refer to two different men.
6. Freedom, range of ability.
7. Condition, state of mind (setting up the pun in line 14, where it also means chair of state, throne).

30

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up[8] remembrance of things past,
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste:
5 Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow,
For precious friends hid in death's dateless° night, endless
And weep afresh love's long since canceled woe,
And moan the expense° of many a vanished sight: loss
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,° past
10 And heavily from woe to woe tell° o'er count
The sad account° of fore-bemoanèd moan, report; financial record
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restored and sorrows end.

33

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain-tops with sovereign eye,° sunlight
Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy,
5 Anon° permit the basest clouds to ride soon
With ugly rack[9] on his celestial face,
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace:
Even so my sun one early morn did shine
10 With all-triumphant splendor on my brow;
But, out, alack!° he was but one hour mine, also
The region cloud[1] hath masked him from me now.
Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth;
Suns of the world may stain[2] when heaven's sun staineth.

35

No more be grieved at that which thou hast done:
Roses have thorns, and silver fountains mud,
Clouds and eclipses stain° both moon and sun, dim; defile
And loathsome canker° lives in sweetest bud. rose worm
5 All men make faults, and even I in this,
Authórizing° thy trespass with compare, justifying
Myself corrupting salving thy amiss,[3]
Excusing thy sins more than thy sins are:

8. One may be "summoned" to the "sessions" (sittings) of a court.
9. A wind-driven mass of high, broken clouds.
1. I.e., the clouds in the vicinity.
2. I.e., be stained.
3. Explaining, making acceptable or palliating

For to thy sensual fault I bring in sense°— reason
10 Thy adverse party is thy advocate—
And 'gainst myself a lawful plea commence.
Such civil war is in my love and hate,
That I an áccessary needs must be
To that sweet thief which sourly robs from me.

55

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme;
But you shall shine more bright in these contènts
Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish time.
5 When wasteful war shall statues overturn,
And broils° root out the work of masonry,[4] disturbances
Nor Mars his[5] sword nor war's quick fire shall burn
The living record of your memory.
'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity[6]
10 Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room
Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.° Judgment Day
So, till the judgment that yourself arise,[7]
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

60

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
So do our minutes hasten to their end,
Each changing place with that which goes before,
In sequent toil[8] all forwards do contend.
5 Nativity, once in the main° of light, sea
Crawls to maturity, wherewith being crowned,
Crookèd[9] eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
And time that gave doth now his gift confound.
Time doth transfix the flourish set on youth,
10 And delves the parallels[1] in beauty's brow,
Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
And nothing stands but for[2] his scythe to mow.
And yet to times in hope[3] my verse shall stand,
Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

---

your offense; also, smoothing and healing, as with an ointment, your misdeed.
4. Products of the stonemason's work; work made of stone.
5. I.e., neither Mars's.
6. The enmity of being forgotten.
7. I.e., until the Judgment Day when ("that") you rise from the dead.
8. I.e., our minutes (like the waves) toil in continuous succession, in unbroken series.
9. Malignant (in an astrological sense), but also suggesting the crookedness of an old man bent by age.
1. Digs the wrinkles ("parallels" are military trenches). Transfix the flourish: destroy the beauty; to "flourish" is also to blossom.
2. I.e., and stands for nothing except.
3. Future times.

65

Since brass, nor[4] stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea
But sad mortality o'er-sways their power,
How with this rage° shall beauty hold a plea, destructive power
Whose action is no stronger than a flower?
5 O, how shall summer's honey breath hold out
Against the wrackful° siege of batt'ring days, destructive
When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
Nor gates of steel so strong, but time decays?
O fearful meditation! where, alack,° alas
10 Shall time's best jewel from time's chest lie hid?
Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back?
Or who his spoil of beauty[5] can forbid?
O, none, unless this miracle have might,
That in black ink my love may still shine bright.

71

No longer mourn for me when I am dead
Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell[6]
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell:
5 Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it; for I love you so,
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.
Oh, if, I say, you look upon this verse
10 When I (perhaps) compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,
But let your love even with my life decay;
Lest the wise world should look into your moan,
And mock you with me after I am gone.

73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang
Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs,[7] where late the sweet birds sang.
5 In me thou see'st the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west;
Which by and by black night doth take away,

4. I.e., since there is neither brass nor.
5. Ravaging of beauty; the Quarto has "or" for "of," and some modern editors follow that reading.
6. The bell rang to announce the death of a parish member, one stroke for each year he or she had lived.
7. Parts of churches occupied by singers or clergy.

Death's second self, that seals up all in rest.
In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire,
10 That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

76

Why is my verse so barren of new pride,° adornment
So far from variation or quick change?[8]
Why with the time do I not glance aside
To new-found methods, and to compounds[9] strange?
5 Why write I still all one, ever the same,
And keep invention in a noted° weed,° familiar / clothing
That every word doth almost tell my name,
Showing their,° birth, and where they did proceed? the words'
O know, sweet love, I always write of you,
10 And you and love are still my argument.° theme
So all my best is dressing old words new,
Spending again what is already spent:
For as the sun is daily new and old,
So is my love still telling what is told.

87

Farewell, thou art too dear[1] for my possessing,
And like enough thou know'st thy estimate.° value
The charter° of thy worth gives thee releasing; privilege; deed
My bonds in thee are all determinate.° expired
5 For how do I hold thee but by thy granting,
And for that riches where is my deserving?
The cause of this fair gift in me is wanting,
And so my patent° back again is swerving. title
Thyself thou gav'st, thy own worth then not knowing,
10 Or me, to whom thou gav'st it, else mistaking;
So thy great gift, upon misprision° growing, error, oversight
Comes home again, on better judgement making.[2]
Thus have I had thee as a dream doth flatter:[3]
In sleep a king, but waking no such matter.

8. Facile innovation; modishness.
9. Mixture, compound words, literary compositions.
1. Precious (i.e., beloved), costly, grievous.
2. I.e., on your making a better judgment.
3. As in a flattering dream.

94

They that have power to hurt and will do none,
That do not do the thing they most do show,[4]
Who, moving others, are themselves as stone,
Unmovèd, cold, and to temptation slow;
5 They rightly do inherit heaven's graces,
And husband nature's riches from expense;[5]
They are the lords and owners of their faces,
Others but stewards° of their excellence. hired managers
The summer's flower is to the summer sweet,
10 Though to itself it only live and die,
But if that flower with base infection meet,
The basest weed outbraves° his dignity: surpasses
For sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds;
Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds.

97

How like a winter hath my absence been
From thee, the pleasure of the fleeting year!
What freezings have I felt, what dark days seen!
What old December's bareness everywhere!
5 And yet this time removed° was summer's time, of separation
The teeming autumn big with rich increase,
Bearing the wanton burthen of the prime,[6]
Like widowed wombs after their lords' decease.
Yet this abundant issue seemed to me
10 But hope of orphans, and unfathered fruit;
For summer and his° pleasures wait on thee, its
And thou away, the very birds are mute;
Or if they sing, 'tis with so dull a cheer,[7]
That leaves look pale, dreading the winter's near.

106

When in the chronicle of wasted° time past; destroyed
I see descriptions of the fairest wights,° persons
And beauty making beautiful old rhyme
In praise of ladies dead and lovely knights,
5 Then, in the blazon[8] of sweet beauty's best,
Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,

4. I.e., what their appearance indicates they will do.
5. I.e., guard against squandering nature's riches.
6. The children of wanton springtime, i.e., the crops planted at that time; also, the fruits of the wantonness of one's sexual prime.
7. So gloomily; so downcast.
8. A catalog of attributes; a literary form characterized by a standardized description of the woman's body parts.

I see their antique pen would have expressed
Even such a beauty as you master now.
So all their praises are but prophecies
10 Of this our time, all you prefiguring;
And, for° they looked but° with divining eyes, because / only
They had not skill enough your worth to sing:
For we, which now behold these present days,
Have eyes to wonder, but lack tongues to praise.

107

Not mine own fears, nor the prophetic soul
Of the wide world dreaming on things to come,
Can yet the lease of my true love control,
Supposed as forfeit to a cònfined doom.[9]
5 The mortal moon[1] hath her eclipse endured,
And the sad augurs mock their own presage;° prediction
Incertainties now crown themselves assured,
And peace proclaims olives of endless age.
Now with the drops of this most balmy time
10 My love looks fresh, and death to me subscribes,° submits
Since, spite of him, I'll live in this poor rhyme,
While he insults o'er dull and speechless tribes:
And thou in this shalt find thy monument,
When tyrants' crests and tombs of brass are spent.° destroyed

116

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments. Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove:
5 Oh, no! it is an ever-fixèd mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star to every wandering bark,° ship
Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.[2]
Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
10 Within his bending sickle's compass come;
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge° of doom.° brink / Judgment Day
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

9. Playing on metaphors of real estate, the lines suggest that despite his fears, the poet's love has not yet suffered the fate of being limited ("confined") by death.
1. Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603; see pp. 142–43), whose sixty-third year had been erroneously anticipated by astrologers ("augurs," line 6) as a time of disaster.
2. I.e., although the star's altitude may be measured.

126[3]

O thou, my lovely boy, who in thy pow'r
Dost hold time's fickle glass his sickle hour,[4]
Who hast by waning grown,[5] and therein° show'st — in contrast
Thy lovers withering, as thy sweet self grow'st—
5 If nature, sovereign mistress over wrack,° — destruction, ruin
As thou goest onwards still will pluck thee back,
She keeps thee to this purpose, that her skill
May time disgrace, and wretched minute kill.
Yet fear her, O thou minion[6] of her pleasure;
10 She may detain but not still° keep her treasure. — always, forever
Her audit,° though delayed, answered must be, — final accounting
And her quietus° is to render° thee. — settlement / surrender

129

Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame
Is lust in action;[7] and till action, lust
Is perjured, murderous, bloody, full of blame,
Savage, extreme, rude,° cruel, not to trust; — brutal
5 Enjoyed no sooner but despisèd straight:
Past reason hunted; and no sooner had,
Past reason hated, as a swallowed bait,
On purpose laid to make the taker mad:
Mad in pursuit, and in possession so;
10 Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;
A bliss in proof,° and proved, a very woe; — the experience
Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.
  All this the world well knows; yet none knows well
  To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

130

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;
Coral is far more red than her lips' red;
If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;° — dull grayish brown
If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head.
5 I have seen roses damasked,° red and white, — variegated
But no such roses see I in her cheeks;
And in some perfumes is there more delight

3. An envoy of six couplets, this "sonnet" ends the part of Shakespeare's sequence that seems addressed to a young man.
4. Hourglass. Glass: mirror, presumably in which the viewer can see time's ravaging of beauty. Sickle: scythe, here in adjectival sense, cutting.
5. Grown more beautiful over time.
6. Darling, favorite, plaything, servile follower.
7. I.e., lust, when put into action, is an expenditure of "spirit" (life, vigor, also semen) in a waste (desert, with a play on the crotch, or "waist," of shame).

Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.
I love to hear her speak, yet well I know
10 That music hath a far more pleasing sound;
I grant I never saw a goddess go;° — walk
My mistress, when she walks, treads on the ground.
And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
As any she° belied with false compare. — woman

135

Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will,[8]
And Will to boot, and Will in overplus;
More than enough am I that vex thee still,° — always
To thy sweet will making addition thus.
5 Wilt thou, whose will is large and spacious,
Not once vouchsafe° to hide my will in thine? — consent
Shall will in others seem right gracious,
And in° my will no fair acceptance shine? — in the case of
The sea, all water, yet receives rain still,
10 And in abundance addeth to his° store;° — its / reserves
So thou being rich in Will add to thy Will
One will of mine, to make thy large Will more.
Let no unkind, no fair beseechers kill;[9]
Think all but one, and me in that one Will.

138

When my love swears that she is made of truth,
I do believe her, though I know she lies,[1]
That° she might think me some untutored youth, — so that
Unlearnèd in the world's false subtleties.
5 Thus vainly thinking that she thinks me young,
Although she knows my days are past the best,[2]
Simply° I credit her false-speaking tongue: — like a simpleton
On both sides thus is simple truth suppressed.
But wherefore says she not she is unjust?[3]
10 And wherefore say not I that I am old?
Oh, love's best habit° is in seeming trust, — clothes; custom
And age in love loves not to have years told.° — counted
Therefore I lie with her and she with me,
And in our faults by lies we flattered be.

8. Here, the word can refer to wishes, carnal desire, male and female sexual organs, and a lover named Will (Shakespeare?). Three, possibly four, sonnets pun on "will"; we follow the 1609 Quarto's way of printing the word.
9. Do not kill any of your suitors with unkindness.

1. Does not tell the truth, with a pun on "lies" with men.
2. When this sonnet was first published, in the anthology The Passionate Pilgrim (1599), Shakespeare was thirty-five.
3. I.e., why does she not say that she is unfaithful?

144

Two loves I have of comfort and despair,[4]
Which like two spirits do suggest° me still° tempt / always
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman coloured ill.° dark
5 To win me soon to hell, my female evil
Tempteth my better angel from my side,
And would corrupt my saint to be a devil,
Wooing his purity with her foul pride.° vanity; sexual wantonness
And, whether that my angel be turn'd fiend,
10 Suspect I may, yet not directly tell,
But being both from° me both to each° friend, away from / each other
I guess one angel in another's hell.[5]
Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
Till my bad angel fire my good one out.[6]

146

Poor soul, the center of my sinful earth,
Lord of[7] these rebel powers that thee array,° dress, deck out
Why dost thou pine within and suffer dearth,
Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
5 Why so large cost, having so short a lease,
Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
Eat up thy charge?[8] Is this thy body's end?
Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
10 And let that pine to aggravate thy store;[9]
Buy terms divine in selling hours of dross;[1]
Within be fed, without be rich no more.
So shalt thou feed on death, that feeds on men,
And death once dead, there's no more dying then.

1609

4. I have two beloveds; one brings me comfort, and the other despair.
5. Each is a punishment for the other; also, a double entendre.
6. The metaphor is from hunting: using fire and smoke to drive a fox from its hole. The line also alludes to the onset of venereal disease, to the Renaissance coin called an angel, and to various proverbial sayings including One fire drives out another and Bad money drives out good.
7. The 1609 Quarto repeats "My sinful earth," apparently a mistake, in place of "Lord of" (an editorial conjecture) at the beginning of this line. Other possibilities have been suggested, e.g., "Rebuke," "Thrall to," "Pressed by."
8. Your expenditure; your trust, i.e., your body; your burden.
9. I.e., let the body suffer ("pine") to increase your riches.
1. I.e., purchase ages of immortality through selling hours of mortal time. Dross: rubbish.

The Phoenix and the Turtle[2]

Let the bird of loudest lay,° — song
On the sole° Arabian tree, — unique
Herald sad° and trumpet be, — solemn
To whose sound chaste wings obey.

5 But thou shrieking harbinger,[3]
Foul precurrer of the fiend,[4]
Augur of the fever's end,[5]
To this troop come thou not near!

From this session interdict° — forbid
10 Every fowl of tyrant wing,[6]
Save the eagle, feathered king:
Keep the obsequy° so strict. — funeral rites

Let the priest in surplice° white, — vestment
That defunctive° music can,° — funeral / knows
15 Be the death-divining swan,[7]
Lest the requiem lack his° right.° — its / due ceremony

And thou treble-dated crow,[8]
That thy sable° gender mak'st — black
With the breath thou giv'st and tak'st,
20 'Mongst our mourners shalt thou go.

Here the anthem doth commence:
Love and constancy is dead,
Phoenix and the turtle fled
In a mutual flame from hence.

25 So they loved as° love in twain — as if
Had the essence but in one;
Two distincts, division none:
Number there in love was slain.[9]

Hearts remote, yet not asunder;
30 Distance, and no space was seen
'Twixt this turtle and his queen;
But in them it were a wonder.[1]

2. Turtledove, famous for steadfastness in love. The phoenix is a legendary bird, the only one of its kind. It is represented as living five hundred years in the Arabian desert before setting itself on fire, then rising anew from its own ashes. The identy of the bird in line 1 has been much debated; most critics agree that it is not the phoenix, which left "no posterity" (line 59).
3. I.e., the screech owl, harbinger of death.
4. I.e., forerunner of Satan.
5. I.e., presager of death.
6. I.e., every predatory bird.
7. Since the swan was said to sing only as its death drew near, it "divined" (knew) the time of its death.
8. The crow was supposed to live three times longer than humans and to conceive its young ("sable gender," line 18) through its beak.
9. Refers to the Aristotelian theory that "one is no number," as Marlowe puts it in Hero and Leander, line 255 (p. 244). The stanza depicts the lovers as paradoxically united but separate. Because they are neither one nor two, their "love" has "slain" the idea of "number."
1. I.e., in anyone except ("but") them, it would have been a wonder.

So° between them love did shine — so much
That the turtle saw his right° — due; possession; nature
35 Flaming in the phoenix' sight:° — eyes
Either was the other's mine.[2]

Property was thus appalled,
That the self was not the same;
Single nature's double name
40 Neither two nor one was called.

Reason, in itself confounded,° — destroyed
Saw division grow together,
To themselves yet either neither,
Simple were so well compounded;

45 That it cried, "How true° a twain — faithful; truly
Seemeth this concordant one!
Love hath reason, reason none,
If what parts can so remain."[3]

Whereupon it made this threne[4]
50 To the phoenix and the dove,
Co-supremes° and stars of love, — joint rulers
As chorus to their tragic scene.

Threnos

Beauty, truth,° and rarity, — fidelity
Grace in all simplicity,
55 Here enclosed in cinders lie.

Death is now the phoenix' nest;
And the turtle's loyal breast
To eternity doth rest,[5]

Leaving no posterity:
60 'Twas not their infirmity,° — sterility
It was married chastity.

Truth may seem, but cannot be;
Beauty brag, but 'tis not she:
Truth and Beauty buried be.

65 To this urn let those repair
That are either true or fair;
For these dead birds sigh a prayer.

1601

2. I.e., self; with a pun on source of (mineral) wealth.
3. I.e., if what is separate can remain joined, then reason yields to love as more reasonable.
4. Threnos or threnody (Greek), a lyrical lament over the dead.
5. Rests eternally; endures forever.

SONGS FROM THE PLAYS

When Daisies Pied[6]

Spring

When daisies pied° and violets blue — variegated
  And lady-smocks all silver-white
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue[7]
  Do paint the meadows with delight,
5 The cuckoo then, on every tree,
Mocks married men;[8] for thus sings he,
    Cuckoo;
Cuckoo, cuckoo: Oh word of fear,
Unpleasing to a married ear!

10 When shepherds pipe on oaten° straws,° — reed / pipes
  And merry larks are plowmen's clocks,[9]
When turtles tread, and rooks, and daws,[1]
  And maidens bleach their summer smocks,
The cuckoo then, on every tree,
15 Mocks married men; for thus sings he,
    Cuckoo;
Cuckoo, cuckoo: Oh word of fear,
Unpleasing to a married ear!

Winter

When icicles hang by the wall
20 And Dick the shepherd blows his nail[2]
And Tom bears logs into the hall,
  And milk comes frozen home in pail.
When blood is nipped° and ways° be foul, — chilled / paths
Then nightly sings the staring owl,
25   Tu-who;
Tu-whit,[3] tu-who: a merry note,
While greasy Joan doth keel° the pot. — stir to cool

When all aloud the wind doth blow,
  And coughing drowns the parson's saw,° — wise saying
30 And birds sit brooding in the snow,
  And Marian's nose looks red and raw,
When roasted crabs° hiss in the bowl,° — crab apples / (of ale)
Then nightly sings the staring owl,
    Tu-who;
35 Tu-whit, tu-who: a merry note
While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

1595? — 1598

6. This song concludes Love's Labour's Lost. Announced as a "Dialogue . . . in praise of the Owl and the Cuckoo," it provides a lyric commentary on the bittersweet mood that pervades the play's final scene.
7. Modern commentators differ in identifying these flowers.
8. The cuckoo's song was often translated as cuckold, meaning a husband whose wife is unfaithful.
9. Larks sing at sunrise.
1. Two kinds of crows. When turtles tread: i.e., when turtledoves mate.
2. I.e., breathes on his fingers to warm them; also, waits patiently while he has nothing to do.
3. Possibly "to woo; to it" (the latter a hunter's cry, here with sexual overtones).

Under the Greenwood Tree[4]

Under the greenwood tree
Who loves to lie with me,
And turn° his merry note — attune
Unto the sweet bird's throat,
5 Come hither, come hither, come hither:
Here shall he see
No enemy
But winter and rough weather.

Who doth ambition shun
10 And loves to live i' the sun,
Seeking the food he eats,
And pleased with what he gets,
Come hither, come hither, come hither:
Here shall he see
15 No enemy
But winter and rough weather.

1599? — 1623

Blow, Blow, Thou Winter Wind[5]

Blow, blow, thou winter wind,
Thou art not so unkind
As man's ingratitude;
Thy tooth is not so keen,
5 Because thou art not seen,
Although thy breath be rude.° — rough
Heigh-ho! sing, heigh-ho! unto the green holly:[6]
Most friendship is feigning, most loving mere folly:
Then, heigh-ho, the holly!
10 This life is most jolly.

Freeze, freeze, thou bitter sky,
That dost not bite so nigh
As benefits forgot:
Though thou the waters warp,[7]
15 Thy sting is not so sharp
As friend remembered not.
Heigh-ho! sing, heigh-ho! unto the green holly . . .

1599? — 1623

4. From As You Like It (2.5). Sung by Amiens, a lord attending the banished duke in the Forest of Arden, the song addresses the play's concern with the traditional opposition between pastoral and courtly modes of life.
5. From As You Like It (2.7). Sung by Amiens, a lord attending the banished duke in the Forest of Arden, this lyric elaborates on the play's thematic contrast between nature and human behavior.
6. An emblem of mirth.
7. I.e., freeze.

It Was a Lover and His Lass[8]

It was a lover and his lass,
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
That o'er the green corn° field did pass — wheat
In springtime, the only pretty ring time,[9]
5 When birds do sing, hey ding a ding, ding:
Sweet lovers love the spring.

Between the acres of the rye,[1]
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
These pretty country folks would lie,
10 In springtime, the only pretty ring time . . .

This carol° they began that hour, — song
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
How that a life was but a flower
In springtime, the only pretty ring time . . .

15 And therefore take° the present time, — seize
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino;
For love is crownèd with the prime° — springtime
In springtime, the only pretty ring time . . .

1599? 1623

Sigh No More[2]

Sigh no more, ladies, sigh no more.
Men were deceivers ever,
One foot in sea, and one on shore,
To one thing constant never.
5 Then sigh not so, but let them go,
And be you blithe° and bonny,° — cheerful / joyful
Converting all your sounds of woe
Into hey nonny, nonny.[3]

Sign no more ditties, sing no more
10 Of dumps° so dull and heavy. — mournful songs or moods
The fraud of men was ever so
Since summer first was leafy.
Then sigh not so, but let them go,
And be you blithe and bonny,

8. From As You Like It (5.3). Sung by two pages to the clown, Touchstone, and the "country wench," Audrey; in the next (and final) scene, this couple and three other couples will marry.
9. I.e., marriage season.
1. On unplowed ground between the planted fields.
2. Sung by Balthasar, attendant to the villainous Don Pedro, in Much Ado About Nothing (2.3).
3. (A nonsense refrain.)

15 Converting all your sounds of woe
Into hey nonny, nonny.

1600 1623

Oh Mistress Mine[4]

Oh mistress mine! where are you roaming?
Oh! stay and hear; your true love's coming,
That can sing both high and low.
Trip° no further, pretty sweeting; go
5 Journeys end in lovers meeting,
Every wise man's son[5] doth know.

What is love? 'tis not hereafter;
Present mirth hath present laughter;
What's to come is still° unsure: always
10 In delay there lies no plenty;
Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty,
Youth's a stuff will not endure.

1602 1623

Come Away, Come Away, Death[6]

Come away, come away, death,
And in sad cypress[7] let me be laid.
Fly away, fly away, breath;
I am slain by a fair cruel maid.
5 My shroud of white, stuck all with yew,[8]
O, prepare it!
My part of death, no one so true
Did share it.

Not a flower, not a flower sweet,
10 On my black coffin let there be strown.
Not a friend, not a friend greet
My poor corpse, where my bones shall be thrown.
A thousand thousand sighs to save,
Lay me, O, where
15 Sad true lover never find my grave,
To weep there!

1602 1623

4. From Twelfth Night (2.3). Sung by the clown, Feste, in response to a request by Sir Toby and Sir Andrew for a "love-song."
5. I.e., proverbially: every fool.
6. From Twelfth Night (2.4). Sung by the clown, Feste, in response to the lovesick duke's melancholy request for a song.
7. A coffin of cypress or a bier covered with cypress boughs. The tree symbolized mourning.
8. A tree symbolizing sadness, often planted in churchyards.

When That I Was and a Little Tiny Boy[9]

When that I was and a little tiny boy,
  With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
A foolish thing was but a toy,[1]
  For the rain it raineth every day.

5 But when I came to man's estate,° state, condition
  With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
'Gainst knaves and thieves men shut their gate,
  For the rain it raineth every day.

But when I came, alas! to wive,
10 With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
By swaggering° could I never thrive, blustering
  For the rain it raineth every day.

But when I came unto my beds,
  With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
15 With toss-pots° still had drunken heads, drunkards
  For the rain it raineth every day.

A great while ago the world begun,
  With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
But that's all one, our play is done,
20 And we'll strive to please you every day.

1602 1623

Fear No More the Heat o' the Sun[2]

Fear no more the heat o' the sun,
  Nor the furious winter's rages;
Thou thy worldly task hast done,
  Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages:
5 Golden lads and girls all must,
As° chimney-sweepers, come to dust. like

Fear no more the frown o' the great;
  Thou art past the tyrant's stroke;
Care no more to clothe and eat;
10 To thee the reed is as the oak:[3]
The scepter,° learning, physic,° must royal power / medicine
All follow this, and come to dust.

9. Sung by the clown, Feste, to conclude Twelfth Night.
1. Trifle. I.e., my mischief was not taken seriously.
2. From Cymbeline (4.2). A lament by two singers for Fidele, a "young boy" who is actually Imogen in disguise and is not actually dead.
3. I.e., to you, what is fragile ("the reed") is the same as what is enduring ("the oak").

Fear no more the lightning flash,
  Nor the all-dreaded thunder stone;[4]
15 Fear not slander, censure rash;
  Thou hast finished joy and moan:
All lovers young, all lovers must
Consign to thee,[5] and come to dust.

No exorciser harm thee!
20 Nor no witchcraft charm thee!
Ghost unlaid forbear thee!
Nothing ill come near thee!
Quiet consummation have;
And renownèd be thy grave!

1610? 1623

Full Fathom Five[6]

Full fathom five thy father lies;
  Of his bones are coral made;
Those are pearls that were his eyes:
  Nothing of him that doth fade,
5 But doth suffer a sea change
Into something rich and strange.
Sea nymphs[7] hourly ring his knell:
  Ding-dong.
Hark! now I hear them—Ding-dong, bell.

1611 1623

Where the Bee Sucks, There Suck I[8]

Where the bee sucks, there suck I:
In a cowslip's° bell I lie; a wildflower's
There I couch when owls do cry.
On the bat's back I do fly
5 After summer merrily.
Merrily, merrily shall I live now
Under the blossom that hangs on the bough.

1611 1623

4. Thunder was thought to be caused by meteorites falling from the sky.
5. I.e., accept the same terms that governed you.
6. From The Tempest (1.2). Ariel, the airy spirit of the enchanted isle, sings this song to lead the shipwrecked Ferdinand, prince of Naples, to Prospero.
7. In Greek mythology, minor goddesses who lived in water.
8. From The Tempest (5.1). Ariel, the airy spirit of the enchanted isle, sings this song in anticipation of his approaching freedom from servitude.

THOMAS CAMPION
1567–1620

My Sweetest Lesbia[1]

My sweetest Lesbia, let us live and love,
And though the sager sort our deeds reprove,
Let us not weigh° them. Heaven's great lamps do dive heed
Into their west, and straight again revive,
5 But soon as once set is our little light,
Then must we sleep one ever-during night.

If all would lead their lives in love like me,
Then bloody swords and armor should not be;
No drum nor trumpet peaceful sleeps should move,
10 Unless alarm came from the camp of love.
But fools do live, and waste their little light,
And seek with pain their ever-during night.

When timely death my life and fortune ends,
Let not my hearse be vexed with mourning friends,
15 But let all lovers, rich in triumph, come
And with sweet pastimes grace my happy tomb;
And Lesbia, close up thou my little light,
And crown with love my ever-during night.

1601

I Care Not for These Ladies

I care not for these ladies,
That must be wooed and prayed:
Give me kind Amaryllis,
The wanton country[2] maid.
5 Nature art disdaineth,
Her beauty is her own.
Her when we court and kiss,
She cries, "Forsooth, let go!"
But when we come where comfort is,
10 She never will say no.

If I love Amaryllis,
She gives me fruit and flowers:
But if we love these ladies,
We must give golden showers.[3]
15 Give them gold, that sell love,

1. The Roman poet Catullus (ca. 84–ca. 54 B.C.E.) sang the praises of his beloved Lesbia in a poem here imitated and partly translated by Campion.

2. With an obscene pun, as in line 9.

3. An allusion to the Greek myth in which Jove takes the form of a shower of gold to ravish Danaë.

Give me the nut-brown lass,
Who, when we court and kiss,
She cries, "Forsooth, let go!"
But when we come where comfort is,
20 She never will say no.

These ladies must have pillows,
And beds by strangers wrought;
Give me a bower of willows,
Of moss and leaves unbought,
25 And fresh Amaryllis,
With milk and honey fed;
Who, when we court and kiss,
She cries, "Forsooth, let go!"
But when we come where comfort is,
30 She never will say no.

1601

Follow Thy Fair Sun

Follow thy fair sun, unhappy shadow;[4]
Though thou be black as night,
And she made all of light,
Yet follow thy fair sun, unhappy shadow.

5 Follow her whose light thy light depriveth;
Though here thou liv'st disgraced,
And she in heaven is placed,
Yet follow her whose light the world reviveth!

Follow those pure beams whose beauty burneth,
10 That so have scorchèd thee,
As thou still black must be,[5]
Till her kind beams thy black to brightness turneth.

Follow her while yet her glory shineth;
There comes a luckless night,
15 That will dim all her light;
And this the black unhappy shade divineth.

Follow still since so thy fates ordained;
The sun must have his shade,
Till both at once do fade;
20 The sun still proved,° the shadow still disdained. approved

4. Soul; also, a person imagined as dead (a shade, and lost to heaven's light).
5. In Renaissance England, dark skins were often held to be caused by the sun's burning; the line also plays on the idea of black as the color of sin (pointing toward an afterlife in hell) and as the sign of mourning.

When to Her Lute Corinna Sings

When to her lute Corinna sings,
Her voice revives the leaden strings,
And doth in highest notes appear
As any challenged° echo clear; aroused
5 But when she doth of mourning speak,
Ev'n with her sighs the strings do break.

And as her lute doth live or die,
Led by her passion, so must I:
For when of pleasure she doth sing,
10 My thoughts enjoy a sudden spring,
But if she doth of sorrow speak,
Ev'n from my heart the strings do break.

1601

When Thou Must Home[6]

When thou must home to shades of underground,
And there arrived, a new admirèd guest,
The beauteous spirits do engirt° thee round, encircle
White Iope, blithe Helen,[7] and the rest,
5 To hear the stories of thy finished love
From that smooth tongue whose music hell can move,[8]

Then wilt thou speak of banqueting delights,
Of masques[9] and revels which sweet youth did make,
Of tourneys and great challenges of knights,
10 And all these triumphs for thy beauty's sake;
When thou hast told these honors done to thee,
Then tell, Oh tell, how thou didst murther° me. murder

1601

Rose-cheeked Laura[1]

Rose-cheeked Laura, come,
Sing thou smoothly with thy beauty's

6. This poem addresses a woman the speaker imagines as already dead, "home" in hell.
7. The Greek mythological figures Iope, or Cassiopeia, and Helen of Troy, the first renowned for beauty and vanity, the second for beauty and fickleness. Blithe: happy.
8. I.e., whose music can move hell. In Greek mythology, when Orpheus went to the underworld to reclaim his wife, Eurydice, his music moved, i.e., touched, the spirits of Hades.
9. Elaborate court entertainments in which aristocrats performed a dignified play, usually allegorical and mythological, that ended in a formal dance.
1. This poem exemplifies Campion's interest in quantitative verse (see "Versification," p. 2036).

Silent music, either° other — each the
Sweetly gracing.

5 Lovely forms do flow
From concent° divinely framed; — sounds in harmony
Heav'n is music, and thy beauty's
Birth is heavenly.

These dull notes we sing
10 Discords need for helps to grace them;
Only beauty purely loving
Knows no discord,

But still moves delight,
Like clear springs renewed by flowing,
15 Ever perfect, ever in them-
Selves eternal.

1602

Now Winter Nights Enlarge

Now winter nights enlarge
The number of their hours;
And clouds their storms discharge
Upon the airy towers.
5 Let now the chimneys blaze
And cups o'erflow with wine,
Let well-tuned words amaze
With harmony divine.
Now yellow waxen lights
10 Shall wait on honey love
While youthful revels, masques,[2] and courtly sights
Sleep's leaden spells remove.

This time doth well dispense[3]
With lovers' long discourse;
15 Much speech hath some defense,
Though beauty no remorse.
All do not all things well;
Some measures comely tread,[4]
Some knotted riddles tell,
20 Some poems smoothly read.
The summer hath his joys,
And winter his delights;
Though love and all his pleasures are but toys,
They shorten tedious nights.

1617

2. See note 9 above.
3. I.e., this time deals indulgently.
4. I.e., some dance (tread measures) in a beautiful way.

There Is a Garden in Her Face

There is a garden in her face,
Where roses and white lilies grow,
A heavenly paradise is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits do flow.
5 There cherries grow, which none may buy
Till "Cherry ripe!"[5] themselves do cry.

Those cherries fairly do enclose
Of orient pearl a double row,
Which when her lovely laughter shows,
10 They look like rosebuds filled with snow.
Yet them nor° peer nor prince can buy, neither
Till "Cherry ripe!" themselves do cry.

Her eyes like angels watch them still;
Her brows like bended bows do stand,
15 Threatening with piercing frowns to kill
All that attempt with eye or hand
Those sacred cherries to come nigh,
Till "Cherry ripe!" themselves do cry.

THOMAS NASHE
1567–1601

FROM SUMMER'S LAST WILL

[Spring, the Sweet Spring][1]

Spring, the sweet spring, is the year's pleasant king,
Then blooms each thing, then maids dance in a ring,
Cold doth not sting, the pretty birds do sing:
  Cuckoo, jug-jug, pu-we, to-witta-woo![2]

5 The palm and may[3] make country houses gay,
Lambs frisk and play, the shepherds pipe all day,

5. A London street vendor's cry.

1. Sung by Ver (Latin for "spring") in Nashe's allegorical drama Summer's Last Will and Testament, first performed in 1592 in the palace of the archbishop of Canterbury.

2. Birdsongs of the cuckoo, nightingale, lapwing, owl.

3. Hawthorn blossoms. The palms may be left over from the religious celebration known as Palm Sunday, which occurs a week before Easter and commemorates Christ's entry into Jerusalem.

And we hear aye birds tune this merry lay:° song
Cuckoo, jug-jug, pu-we, to-witta-woo!

The fields breathe sweet, the daisies kiss our feet,
10 Young lovers meet, old wives a-sunning sit,
In every street these tunes our ears do greet:
Cuckoo, jug-jug, pu-we, to-witta-woo!
Spring, the sweet spring!

[Adieu, Farewell, Earth's Bliss][4]

Adieu, farewell, earth's bliss;
This world uncertain is;
Fond° are life's lustful joys; foolish
Death proves them all but toys;° trifles
5 None from his darts can fly;
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us![5]

Rich men, trust not in wealth,
Gold cannot buy you health;
10 Physic° himself° must fade. medicine / itself
All things to end are made,
The plague full swift goes by;
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

15 Beauty is but a flower
Which wrinkles will devour;
Brightness falls from the air;
Queens have died young and fair;
Dust hath closed Helen's[6] eye.
20 I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

Strength stoops unto the grave,
Worms feed on Hector[7] brave;

4. Often titled by editors "A Litany in Time of Plague," this lyric comes from Nashe's allegorical drama Summer's Last Will and Testament. First performed during the summer of 1592 in the palace of the archbishop of Canterbury, the play repeatedly alludes to the epidemic of plague that had driven the archbishop and his aristocratic guests from London. Summer, who enters the play already sick, requests a "doleful ditty" that will lament his "near-approaching death."

5. These recurring words—from the Litany, a standard prayer in Church of England services—were inscribed in red letters on plague-stricken houses.

6. Helen of Troy, who was renowned for her beauty, and whose abduction was said to be the cause of the Trojan War.

7. Renowned for his bravery, he was the son of Priam and leader of the Trojans against the Greeks.

Swords may not fight with fate,
25 Earth still holds ope her gate.
"Come, come!" the bells do cry.
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us.

Wit with his wantonness
30 Tasteth death's bitterness;
Hell's executioner
Hath no ears for to hear
What vain art can reply.
I am sick, I must die.
35 Lord, have mercy on us.

Haste, therefore, each degree,° rank; social station
To welcome destiny;
Heaven is our heritage,
Earth but a player's stage;
40 Mount we unto the sky.
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us.

AEMILIA LANYER
1569–1645

From Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum[1]

Sith° Cynthia[2] is ascended to that rest since
Of endless joy and true eternity,
That glorious place that cannot be expressed
By any wight° clad in mortality, person
5 In her almighty love so highly blessed,
And crowned with everlasting sov'reignty;
Where saints and angels do attend her throne,
And she gives glory unto God alone.

1. Hail God, King of the Jews (Latin); a variant of the inscription on Christ's cross. Lanyer claimed that the title came to her in a dream. This long text is prefaced by a prose address ("To the Virtuous Reader") and by eight dedicatory poems to women patrons including Mary Sidney, countess of Pembroke (1561–1621; see pp. 225–30). The main part of Lanyer's poem begins and ends with praise of the poet Margaret Clifford, countess of Cumberland (1560–1616), Lanyer's friend and primary patron. The poem itself is divided into four parts: "The Passion of Christ," "Eve's Apology in Defense of Women," "The Tears of the Daughters of Jerusalem," and "The Salutation and Sorrow of the Virgin Mary." The stanzas reprinted here are from the opening of the poem and from its second section.
2. A mythological name for the virgin goddess of the moon, frequently applied to Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603; see pp. 142–43). As a powerful and much-revered queen, she is an appropriate "first muse," or source of inspiration, for Lanyer to invoke.

To thee great Countess[3] now I will apply
10 My pen, to write thy never dying fame;
That when to heaven thy blessed soul shall fly,
These lines on earth record thy reverend name:
And to this task I mean my Muse to tie,
Though wanting skill I shall but purchase blame:
15 Pardon (dear Lady) want of woman's wit
To pen thy praise, when few can equal it.

745 Now Pontius Pilate is to judge the cause[4]
Of faultless Jesus, who before him stands;
Who neither hath offended prince, nor laws,
Although he now be brought in woeful bands:
O noble governor, make thou yet a pause,
750 Do not in innocent blood imbrue° thy hands; stain
But hear the words of thy most worthy wife,
Who sends to thee, to beg her Savior's life.[5]

Let barb'rous cruelty far depart from thee,
And in true justice take affliction's part;
755 Open thine eyes, that thou the truth may'st see,
Do not the thing that goes against thy heart,
Condemn not him that must thy Savior be;
But view his holy life, his good desert.
Let not us women glory in men's fall,
760 Who had power given to over-rule us all.[6]

Eve's Apology

Till now your indiscretion sets us free,
And makes our former fault much less appear;[7]
Our Mother Eve, who tasted of the Tree,
Giving to Adam what she held most dear,
765 Was simply° good, and had no power to see, ignorantly
The after-coming harm did not appear;
The subtle° serpent that our sex betrayed, crafty
Before our fall so sure a plot had laid.

That undiscerning Ignorance[8] perceived
770 No guile, or craft that was by him° intended: the serpent

3. Margaret Clifford, countess of Cumberland (see note 1 above).
4. Case. Pilate was the Roman governor of Jerusalem from 26 to 36 C.E. For his condemnation of Christ, see Matthew 27.11–24.
5. In Matthew 27.19, Pontius Pilate's wife sends a message saying "Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him." Lanyer gives this minor biblical character a major narrative role, making her the dramatic advocate both of Christ and of Eve and hence a fulcrum linking the first and second parts of the poem; the "Apology" flows directly from Pontius Pilate's (unwise) refusal to heed his wife's words about her prophetic dream. Lanyer's speaker addresses Pilate, in an apostrophe, beginning in line 761.
6. According to Genesis 3.16, Eve was punished for the Fall by being made subject to her husband.
7. I.e., men "over-ruled" women until this (imagined) moment of Christ's judgment, when your error in condemning Christ (Pilate's error and by extension that of men in general) frees women by making Eve's sin seem much less by comparison.
8. I.e., Eve.

For, had she known of what we were bereaved,[9]
To his request she had not condescended.
But she (poor soul) by cunning was deceived[1]
No hurt therein her harmless heart intended:
775 For she alleged° God's word, which he° denies, asserted / the serpent
That they should die, but even as gods, be wise.[2]

But surely Adam cannot be excused,
Her fault, though great, yet he was most to blame;
What weakness offered, strength might have refused,
780 Being lord of all, the greater was his shame:
Although the serpent's craft had her abused,
God's holy word ought all his actions frame:° shape
For he was lord and king of all the earth,
Before poor Eve had either life or breath.

785 Who being framed by God's eternal hand,
The perfect'st man that ever breathed on earth,
And from God's mouth received that strait° strict, narrow
command,
The breach whereof he knew was present death:
Yea having power to rule both sea and land,
790 Yet with one apple won to lose that breath,
Which God hath breathèd in his beauteous face,
Bringing us all in danger and disgrace.

And then to lay the fault on Patience back,[3]
That we (poor women) must endure it all;
795 We know right well he did discretion lack,
Being not persuaded thereunto at all;
If Eve did err, it was for knowledge sake,
The fruit being fair persuaded him° to fall: Adam
No subtle serpent's falsehood did betray him,
800 If he would eat it, who had power to stay him?

Not Eve, whose fault was only too much love,
Which made her give this present to her dear,
That what she tasted, he likewise might prove,° experience
Whereby his knowledge might become more clear;
805 He never sought her weakness to reprove,
With those sharp words, which he of God did hear;
Yet men will boast of knowledge, which he took
From Eve's fair hand, as from a learnèd book.

9. I.e., of eternal life. In Genesis 3, Eve is enticed by the serpent to eat the forbidden fruit, and Adam then eats when she offers it to him. God expels them from Eden, condemning Adam to hard work, Eve to pain in childbirth, and both to suffering and death.
1. Cf. 1 Timothy 2.14: "And Adam was not deceived but the woman being deceived was in the transgression."
2. Eve put forward God's "word" (that humans would die if they disobeyed), and the serpent denied that idea, arguing instead that humans would become "wise" as gods.
3. Eve is allegorized as Patience, with a glance at the literary tradition of the wronged but patient wife (e.g. the "patient Griselda" in Chaucer's "Clerk's Tale").

If any evil did in her remain,
810 Being made of him, he was the ground of all;[4]
If one of many worlds[5] could lay a stain
Upon our sex, and work so great a fall
To wretched man, by Satan's subtle train;[6]
What will so foul a fault amongst you all?
815 Her weakness did the serpent's words obey,
But you in malice God's dear Son betray.[7]

Whom, if unjustly you condemn to die,
Her° sin was small, to what you do commit; Eve's
All mortal° sins that do for vengeance cry, punishable by damnation
820 Are not to be comparèd unto it:
If many worlds would altogether try,
By all their sins the wrath of God to get;
This sin of yours, surmounts them all as far
As doth the sun, another little star.[8]

825 Then let us have our liberty again,
And challenge° to your selves no Sov'reignty; claim
You came not in the world without our pain,° of childbirth
Make that a bar against[9] your cruelty;
Your fault being greater, why should you disdain
830 Our being your equals, free from tyranny?
If one weak woman simply did offend,
This sin of yours hath no excuse, nor end.

To which (poor souls) we never gave consent,
Witness thy wife (O Pilate) speaks for all;
835 Who did but dream, and yet a message sent,
That thou should'st have nothing to do at all
With that just man; which, if thy heart relent,
Why wilt thou be a reprobate with Saul?[1]
To seek the death of him that is so good,
840 For thy soul's health to shed his dearest blood.

4. With a pun on, in Hebrew, Adam's name (hā'ādam) and the word for ground (hā'ădamâ). Eve was created from Adam's rib: "And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man" (Genesis 2.22).
5. Perhaps an allusion to the popular seventeenth-century belief in a plurality of inhabited globes in the universe, or at least in the solar system. Cf. Milton, Paradise Lost 3.565 ff. One: Adam.
6. Trickery. The identification of Satan with the serpent is traditional but not made in Genesis.
7. Here and in the preceding question, Pilate's wife addresses both men in general ("you all") and her husband, recalling the specific dramatic situation of Christ's trial.
8. In Ptolemaic astronomy, the sun was larger than the planets and fixed stars.
9. I.e., let that prevent.
1. I.e., morally unprincipled like Saul, the first king of Israel, who was rejected by God for disobedience, and who plotted to kill David, his successor (1 Samuel 22–23). (Or perhaps another Saul, who persecuted the first Christians, and who later converted to Christianity, changing his name to Paul [Acts 9.1–31].)

The Description of Cooke-ham[2]

Farewell (sweet Cooke-ham) where I first obtained
Grace from that grace where perfect grace[3] remained;
And where the muses[4] gave their full consent,
I should have power the virtuous to content;
5 Where princely palace willed me to indite,° compose, write
The sacred story[5] of the soul's delight.
Farewell (sweet place) where virtue then did rest,
And all delights did harbor in her breast;
Never shall my sad eyes again behold
10 Those pleasures which my thoughts did then unfold.
Yet you (great Lady) Mistress of that place,
From whose desires did spring this work of grace;
Vouchsafe to think upon those pleasures past,
As fleeting worldly joys that could not last,
15 Or, as dim shadows of celestial[6] pleasures,
Which are desired above all earthly treasures.
Oh how (methought) against you thither came,[7]
Each part did seem some new delight to frame!
The house received all ornaments to grace it,
20 And would endure no foulness to deface it.
And walks put on their summer liveries,° uniforms
And all things else did hold like similes.[8]
The trees with leaves, with fruits, with flowers clad,
Embraced each other, seeming to be glad,
25 Turning themselves to beauteous Canopies,
To shade the bright sun from your brighter eyes;
The crystal streams with silver spangles graced,
While by the glorious sun they were embraced;
The little birds in chirping notes did sing,
30 To entertain both you and that sweet spring.
And Philomela[9] with her sundry lays,
Both you and that delightful place did praise.
Oh how me thought each plant, each flower, each tree

2. The crown manor leased to William Russell, whose sister, Margaret Clifford, the countess of Cumberland (see note 1, p. 284), resided there periodically until 1605. The unhappiness alluded to in this poem refers to the countess's alienation from her husband, George Clifford, third earl of Cumberland, and her legal battles with his relatives after his death in 1605. The countess fought for the claims of her daughter, Cumberland's only heir, Anne Clifford, to his estates. King James and the court bureaucracy offered only a cash settlement—far less than the value of Cumberland's lands and titles—which the countess and her daughter refused to accept. This poem, which probably dates from 1609–10 and which followed the title poem in the first edition of Lanyer's Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, is an early example of what would become the popular genre of the "country house" poem; cf. Ben Jonson's "To Penshurst" (p. 328).

3. Respectively (line 2): favor, noble person (i.e., Margaret Clifford, countess of Cumberland); God-given virtues.

4. The nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts.

5. I.e., Christ's passion in Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum.

6. As reflections or images of heavenly.

7. I.e., when you went there.

8. Similarities; i.e., did the same.

9. The nightingale, whose various songs ("sundry lays") were said to express lovesickness and/or mourning; here, associated with the female poetic voice. In classical mythology, Philomela was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not speak. She wove the story in a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. She was later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus.

Set forth their beauties then to welcome thee!
35 The very hills right humbly did descend,
When you to tread on them did intend.
And as you set your feet, they still did rise,
Glad that they could receive so rich a prize.
The gentle winds did take delight to be 40 Among those woods that were so graced by thee,
And in sad murmur uttered pleasing sound,
That pleasure in that place might more abound.
The swelling banks delivered all their pride
When such a Phoenix[1] once they had espied.
45 Each arbor, bank, each seat, each stately tree,
Thought themselves honored in supporting thee.
The pretty birds would oft come to attend thee,
Yet fly away for fear they should offend thee;
The little creatures in the burrough° by — burrow
50 Would come abroad to sport them in your eye,
Yet fearful of the bow in your fair hand.[2]
Would run away when you did make a stand.
Now let me come unto that stately tree,
Wherein such goodly prospects you did see;
55 That oak that did in height his fellows pass,
As much as lofty trees, low growing grass,
Much like a comely cedar straight and tall,
Whose beauteous stature far exceeded all.
How often did you visit this fair tree,
60 Which seeming joyful in receiving thee,
Would like a palm tree spread his arms abroad,
Desirous that you there should make abode;
Whose fair green leaves much like a comely° veil, — attractive
Defended Phoebus[3] when he would assail;
65 Whose pleasing boughs did yield a cool fresh air,
Joying° his happiness when you were there. — enjoying
Where being seated, you might plainly see
Hills, vales, and woods, as if on bended knee
They had appeared, your honor to salute,
70 Or to prefer° some strange unlooked-for suit;° — offer / request
All interlaced with brooks and crystal springs,
A prospect fit to please the eyes of kings.
And° thirteen shires appeared all in your sight, — if
Europe could not afford much more delight.
75 What was there then but gave you all content,
While you the time in meditation spent
Of their Creator's power, which there you saw,
In all his creatures held a perfect law;° — order
And in their beauties did you plain descry° — perceive
80 His beauty, wisdom, grace, love, majesty.

1. A legendary bird, the only one of its kind, represented as living five hundred years in the Arabian desert before setting itself on fire, then rising anew from its own ashes; here, also a reference to the countess.

2. I.e., the countess is figured as Diana, the classical goddess of hunting, the moon, and chastity.

3. I.e., protected you from the sun; Phoebus Apollo was the mythological god of the sun.

In these sweet woods how often did you walk,
With Christ and his Apostles there to talk;
Placing his holy Writ in some fair tree
To meditate what you therein did see.
85 With Moses[4] you did mount his holy hill
To know his pleasure, and perform his will.
With lowly David[5] you did often sing
His holy hymns to Heaven's eternal King.
And in sweet music did your soul delight
90 To sound his praises, morning, noon, and night.
With blessed Joseph[6] you did often feed
Your pined° brethren, when they stood in need. tired from hunger
And that sweet Lady sprung from Clifford's race,[7]
Of noble Bedford's blood, fair stem of grace,
95 To honorable Dorset now espoused,
In whose fair breast true virtue then was housed,
Oh what delight did my weak spirits find
In those pure parts of her well framèd mind.
And yet it grieves me that I cannot be 100 Near unto her, whose virtues did agree
With those fair ornaments of outward beauty,
Which did enforce from all both love and duty.
Unconstant Fortune, thou art most to blame,
Who casts us down into so low a frame
105 Where our great friends we cannot daily see,
So great a difference is there in degree.
Many are placed in those orbs of state,[8]
Parters° in honor, so ordained by Fate, participants
Nearer in show, yet farther off in love,
110 In which, the lowest always are above.[9]
But whither am I carried in conceit,° thought; pride
My wit too weak to conster° of the great. consider, understand
Why not? although we are but born of earth.
We may behold the heavens, despising death;
115 And loving heaven that is so far above,
May in the end vouchsafe us entire love.[1]
Therefore sweet memory do thou retain
Those pleasures past, which will not turn again:
Remember beauteous Dorset's° former sports, Anne Clifford's
120 So far from being touched by ill reports,
Wherein myself did always bear a part,
While reverend love presented my true heart.
Those recreations let me bear in mind,

4. Who spoke with God on a mountaintop (Exodus 24.13–18).
5. The psalmist of the Bible; the second king of Judah and Israel.
6. Who was sold by his brothers into Egypt; after he became powerful, he fed his brothers during the great famine (Genesis 47.12).
7. Anne Clifford, countess of Dorset, the countess of Cumberland's daughter. Her father came from the Cliffords, earls of Cumberland; her mother came from the Russells, earls of Bedford. She married into the Sackville family, earls of Dorset.
8. I.e., exalted social spheres.
9. I.e., while circumstance may place the high and the low near to each other, the lower-born are more devoted to the higher-born. In Nichomachean Ethics, Aristotle says that in friendship between unequals, "the better and more useful partner should receive more affection than he gives" (7.1158).
1. I.e., may bestow all love on us.

Which her sweet youth and noble thoughts did find,
125 Whereof deprived, I evermore must grieve,
Hating blind Fortune, careless to relieve.
And you sweet Cooke-ham, whom these ladies leave,
I now must tell the grief you did conceive
At their departure, when they went away,
130 How everything retained a sad dismay.
Nay long before, when once an inkling came,
Methought each thing did unto sorrow frame:
The trees that were so glorious in our view,
Forsook both flowers and fruit, when once they knew
135 Of your depart, their very leaves did wither,
Changing their colors as they grew together.
But when they saw this had no power to stay you,
They often wept, though, speechless, could not pray you,[2]
Letting their tears in your fair bosoms fall,
140 As if they said, Why will ye leave us all?
This being vain, they cast their leaves away
Hoping that pity would have made you stay:
Their frozen tops, like age's hoary° hairs, grayish white
Shows their disasters, languishing in fears.
145 A swarthy° riveled° rind° all over spread, dark / rough / bark
Their dying bodies half alive, half dead.
But your occasions called you so away
That nothing there had power to make you stay.
Yet did I see a noble grateful mind
150 Requiting° each according to their kind, rewarding
Forgetting not to turn and take your leave
Of these sad creatures, powerless to receive
Your favor, when with grief you did depart,
Placing their former pleasures in your heart,
155 Giving great charge to noble memory
There to preserve their love continually.
But specially the love of that fair tree,
That first and last you did vouchsafe to see,
In which it pleased you oft to take the air
160 With noble Dorset, then a virgin fair,[3]
Where many a learned book was read and scanned,
To this fair tree, taking me by the hand,
You did repeat the pleasures which had passed,
Seeming to grieve they could no longer last.
165 And with a chaste, yet loving kiss took leave,
Of which sweet kiss I did it soon bereave,[4]
Scorning a senseless creature should possess
So rare a favor, so great happiness.
No other kiss it could receive from me,
170 For fear to give back what it took of thee,
So I ungrateful creature did deceive° it deprive

2. I.e., beg you (to stay).
3. I.e., before marriage.
4. I.e., Lanyer claims to have kissed the tree after the countess did, and so deprived the tree of the countess's kiss.

Of that which you in love vouchsafed° to leave it. granted
And though it oft had given me much content,
Yet this great wrong I never could repent;
175 But of the happiest made it most forlorn,
To show that nothing's free from Fortune's scorne,
While all the rest with this most beauteous tree
Made their sad consort[5] sorrow's harmony.
The flowers that on the banks and walks did grow,
180 Crept in the ground, the grass did weep for woe.
The winds and waters seemed to chide together
Because you went away they knew not whither;
And those sweet brooks that ran so fair and clear,
With grief and trouble wrinkled did appear.
185 Those pretty birds that wonted° were to sing, accustomed
Now neither sing, nor chirp, nor use their wing,
But with their tender feet on some bare spray,
Warble forth sorrow, and their own dismay.
Fair Philomela leaves her mournful ditty,° song
190 Drowned in deep sleep, yet can procure no pity.
Each arbor, bank, each seat, each stately tree
Looks bare and desolate now for want° of thee, lack
Turning green tresses[6] into frosty gray,
While in cold grief they wither all away.
195 The sun grew weak, his beams no comfort gave,
While all green things did make the earth their grave.
Each brier, each bramble, when you went away
Caught fast your clothes, thinking to make you stay;
Delightful Echo wonted[7] to reply
200 To our last words, did now for sorrow die;
The house cast off each garment that might grace it,
Putting on dust and cobwebs to deface it.
All desolation then there did appear,
When you were going whom they held so dear.
205 This last farewell to Cooke-ham here I give,
When I am dead thy name in this may live,
Wherein I have performed her noble hest° bidding
Whose virtues lodge in my unworthy breast,
And ever shall, so long as life remains,
210 Tying my life to her by those rich chains.

1611

5. Company, with a pun on "consort" as a musical "accord."
6. I.e., leaves.
7. Was accustomed to; with a pun on wanted, desired. In classical mythology, the nymph (minor nature goddess) Echo was punished for excessive speech by being allowed only to repeat the last words of others; scorned by her beloved, the youth Narcissus, she eventually lost her body and lived on as a sad voice. Lanyer revises this myth in line 200.

JOHN DONNE*
1572–1631

The Good-Morrow

I wonder, by my troth, what thou and I
Did, till we loved? were we not weaned till then?
But sucked on country[1] pleasures, childishly?
Or snorted° we in the Seven Sleepers' den?[2] snored
5 'Twas so; but° this, all pleasures fancies be. except for
If ever any beauty I did see,
Which I desired, and got, 'twas but a dream of thee.

And now good-morrow to our waking souls,
Which watch not one another out of fear;
10 For love, all love of other sights controls,
And makes one little room an everywhere.[3]
Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone,
Let maps[4] to others, worlds on worlds have shown,
Let us possess one[5] world, each hath one, and is one.

15 My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,
And true plain hearts do in the faces rest;
Where can we find two better hemispheres,
Without sharp North, without declining West?
Whatever dies was not mixed equally;[6]
20 If our two loves be one, or, thou and I
Love so alike that none do slacken, none can die.

1633

*The Donne poems in this anthology up through "The Relic" are usually called Songs and Sonnets, a rubric applied to Donne's love poems in the second edition of his Poems (1635). There is no authorial warrant for that rubric, however, since even the first edition (1633) appeared after his death, and no copies of his poems in his own handwriting survive. Instead, the poems exist in posthumous printed editions as well as in a large number of manuscript copies, many of which circulated during Donne's lifetime; some manuscripts include musical settings for the poems. We cannot date most of Donne's love poems with any certainty, and the multiple copies, printed and in manuscript, show many variations in stanza forms, punctuation, spelling, and even diction and grammar. Like most modern editors, we base our texts on the 1633 Poems; significant variations are mentioned in the notes.

Donne's poems frequently have an apostrophe between words to indicate that the neighboring syllables are fused in pronunciation and counted as one metrically. Such contractions occur only under certain phonetic conditions (e.g., when one word ends, and the next begins, with a vowel).

1. Also with a sexual connotation.
2. Seven Christian youths, under the persecutions of the Roman Emperor Decius (who ruled 249–51), were said to have been sealed in a cave, where they slept for nearly two centuries. On awakening, they found Christianity established as a world religion.
3. The common Renaissance trope of the individual as a microcosm of the universe.
4. Terrestrial maps or sky charts.
5. In some manuscripts, "our."
6. In medieval and Renaissance medical theory, death was often considered the result of an imbalance in the body's elements. When elements were "not mixed equally," matter was mutable and mortal, but when they were mixed perfectly, it was changing and immortal.

Song

Go and catch a falling star,
Get with child a mandrake root,[7]
Tell me where all past years are,
Or who cleft the Devil's foot,
5 Teach me to hear mermaids[8] singing,
Or to keep off envy's stinging,
And find
What wind
Serves to advance an honest mind.

10 If thou beest born to strange sights,[9]
Things invisible to see,
Ride ten thousand days and nights,
Till age snow white hairs on thee,
Thou, when thou return'st, wilt tell me
15 All strange wonders that befell thee,
And swear
Nowhere
Lives a woman true, and fair.

If thou find'st one, let me know,
20 Such a pilgrimage were sweet;
Yet do not, I would not go,
Though at next door we might meet;
Though she were true when you met her,
And last till you write your letter,
25 Yet she
Will be
False, ere I come, to two, or three.

1633

Woman's Constancy

Now thou hast loved me one whole day,
Tomorrow when thou leav'st, what wilt thou say?
Wilt thou then antedate some new-made vow?[1]
Or say that now
5 We are not just those persons which we were?
Or, that oaths made in reverential fear
Of Love, and his wrath, any may forswear?

7. The large, forked root of the mandrake roughly resembles a human body and was thought to be an aphrodisiac.
8. I.e., the Sirens (in Homer's Odyssey), whose seductive song only the cunning Odysseus successfully resisted.
9. I.e., if your nature inclines you to seek strange sights; alternatively, if you are carried ("borne," as the word is spelled in the 1633 text and most manuscript versions) to strange sights (cf. "return'st," line 14).
1. I.e., will you pretend that a new vow of love is older than that you have made to me? Antedate: affix an earlier date than the true date.

Or, as true° deaths, true marriages untie, real
So lovers' contracts, images of those,[2]
10 Bind but till sleep, death's image, them unloose?
Or, your own end to justify,
For having purposed change, and falsehood, you
Can have no way but falsehood to be true?
Vain lunatic,[3] against these 'scapes° I could escapes, deceptions
15 Dispute, and conquer, if I would,
Which I abstain to do,
For by tomorrow, I may think so too.

The Apparition

When by thy scorn, O murd'ress, I am dead,
And that thou thinkst thee free
From all solicitation from me,
Then shall my ghost come to thy bed,
5 And thee, fained vestal,[4] in worse arms shall see;
Then thy sick taper° will begin to wink,° candle / flicker
And he, whose thou art then, being tired before,
Will, if thou stir, or pinch to wake him, think
Thou call'st for more,
10 And in false sleep will from thee shrink,
And then, poor aspen wretch,[5] neglected thou
Bathed in a cold quicksilver sweat[6] wilt lie,
A verier° ghost than I; truer
What I will say, I will not tell thee now,
15 Lest that preserve thee; and since my love is spent,
I had rather thou shouldst painfully repent,
Than by my threatnings rest still innocent.

1633

The Sun Rising

Busy old fool, unruly sun,
Why dost thou thus,
Through windows, and through curtains call on us?
Must to thy motions lovers' seasons run?
5 Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
Late school boys and sour prentices,° apprentices
Go tell court huntsmen[7] that the king will ride,

2. I.e., of true marriages.
3. The word has for Donne the additional meaning of "inconstant" or "fickle," since lunacy (from luna, moon) was supposed to be affected by the changing phases of the moon.
4. One of the virgins consecrated to the Roman goddess Vesta. Fained: counterfeit.
5. Aspen leaves flutter in the slightest breeze.
6. Sweating in terror; quicksilver (mercury) was a stock prescription for venereal disease, and sweating was part of the cure.
7. I.e., courtiers who hunt office by emulating King James's passion for hunting.

Call country ants to harvest offices;[8]
Love, all alike,[9] no season knows nor clime,
10 Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags° of time. fragments

Thy beams, so reverend and strong
Why shouldst thou think?[1]
I could eclipse and cloud them with a wink,
But that I would not lose her sight so long;
15 If her eyes have not blinded thine,
Look, and tomorrow late, tell me,
Whether both th' Indias of spice and mine[2]
Be where thou leftst them, or lie here with me.
Ask for those kings whom thou saw'st yesterday,
20 And thou shalt hear, All here in one bed lay.

She's all states, and all princes, I,[3]
Nothing else is.
Princes do but play us; compared to this,
All honor's mimic, all wealth alchemy.[4]
25 Thou, sun, art half as happy as we,[5]
In that the world's contracted thus.
Thine age asks ease, and since thy duties be
To warm the world, that's done in warming us.
Shine here to us, and thou art everywhere;
30 This bed thy center is, these walls, thy sphere.[6]

1633

The Canonization[7]

For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love,
Or chide my palsy, or my gout,
My five gray hairs, or ruined fortune, flout,
With wealth your state, your mind with arts improve,
5 Take you a course, get you a place,[8]
Observe his honor, or his grace,[9]
Or the King's real, or his stampéd face[1]

8. "Harvest" may be read both as part of a noun phrase ("duties of the harvest," in which case "country ants" would refer to farm workers) and as a verb, in which case the "ants" would be provincial courtiers seeking to collect ("harvest") paid positions.
9. The same at all times.
1. I.e., what makes you think your light is so awesome?
2. India and the West Indies, whence came spices and gold (from mines) respectively.
3. One manuscript has "She is all princes, and all states, I, . . ."
4. A metallic composition imitating gold; i.e., a fraud.
5. The sun, being one thing, is half as happy as two lovers.
6. I.e., the bedroom and the lovers are a microcosm of the solar system, with the bed (like Earth, in Ptolemaic astronomy) as the point around which the sun revolves.
7. The title refers to admission into the canon of Church saints, often attested by martyrdom. As part of the canonization process, a "devil's advocate" sought to ensure that the whole truth, including faults, emerged about a candidate.
8. An appointment, at court or elsewhere. Take you a course: begin a career.
9. Pay court to a lord or bishop.
1. I.e., on coins. The contrast is complicated by the fact that "real," spelled "royall" in several manuscripts, is also a term for a Spanish coin.

Contémplate; what you will, approve,° try
So you will let me love.

10 Alas, alas, who's injured by my love?
What merchant's ships have my sighs drowned?
Who says my tears have overflowed his ground?
When did my colds a forward spring remove?[2]
When did the heats which my veins fill
15 Add one more to the plaguy bill?[3]
Soldiers find wars, and lawyers find out still Litigious° men, which quarrels move, contentious
Though she and I do love.

Call us what you will, we're made such by love;
20 Call her one, me another fly,
We're tapers too, and at our own cost die,[4]
And we in us find th' eagle and the dove.[5]
The phoenix riddle hath more wit° sense
By us: we two being one, are it.
25 So, to one neutral thing both sexes fit.
We die and rise the same, and prove
Mysterious by this love.

We can die by it, if not live by love,
And if unfit for tombs and hearse
30 Our legend be, it will be fit for verse;
And if no piece of chronicle° we prove,[6] history
We'll build in sonnets pretty rooms;[7]
As well a well-wrought urn becomes° befits
The greatest ashes, as half-acre tombs;
35 And by these hymns,[8] all shall approve
Us canonized for love.

And thus invoke us: You whom reverend love
Made one another's hermitage;
You, to whom love was peace, that now is rage,° lust
40 Who did the whole world's soul contract, and drove[9]
Into the glasses of your eyes
So made such mirrors, and such spies,

2. A common poetic conceit figured lovers as frozen by their mistresses' neglect; i.e., the speaker protests that his "colds" have not removed the warmth of an early ("forward") spring.
3. Weekly list of plague victims; many manuscripts have "man" instead of "more."
4. I.e., we're both "fly" (a moth or any winged insect) and "tapers," the self-consuming candles that attract winged insects. "Dying" was a popular metaphor for sexual climax in seventeenth-century English. "At our own cost" reflects the common supersitition that each orgasm shortened the man's life by a day.
5. A common symbol of peace and meekness; the "eagle" signifies strength. "Eagle" and "dove" are also alchemical terms for processes leading to the rise of "phoenix" (line 23), a stage in the transmutation of metals. The phoenix is a legendary bird; it was thought to be the only one of its kind, to contain both sexes, and to live five hundred years in the Arabian desert before setting itself on fire. Because a new phoenix supposedly arose from fire's ashes, the bird was often a symbol of the resurrected Christ.
6. One manuscript has "Chronicles." The biblical book of 1 Chronicles (1–9) lists the genealogies of the tribes of Israel. The speaker may be implying that if the "timeless" lovers leave no "progeny," they will leave poetry.
7. The "rooms" (punning on stanza, Italian for room) will hold the ashes, i.e., record their deeds.
8. I.e., the lover's poems.
9. Some manuscripts have "extract" for "contract" and "draw" for "drove."

That they did all to you epitomize,
Countries, towns, courts:[1] Beg from above
45 A pattern of your love![2]

1633

Song

Sweetest love, I do not go
For weariness of thee,
Nor in hope the world can show
A fitter love for me;
5 But since that I
Must die at last,'tis best
To use myself in jest,
Thus by feigned deaths to die.[3]

Yesternight the sun went hence,
10 And yet is here today;
He hath no desire nor sense,
Nor half so short a way:
Then fear not me,
But believe that I shall make
15 Speedier journeys, since I take
More wings and spurs than he.

O how feeble is man's power,
That if good fortune fall,
Cannot add another hour,
20 Nor a lost hour recall!
But come bad chance,
And we join to'it our strength,
And we teach it art and length,
Itself o'er us to'advance.

25 When thou sigh'st, thou sigh'st not wind,
But sigh'st my soul away;
When thou weep'st, unkindly[4] kind,
My life's blood doth decay.
It cannot be
30 That thou lov'st me, as thou say'st,
If in thine my life thou waste;
Thou art the best of me.

1. I.e., you who contracted or distilled the whole world's soul and drove countries, towns, courts into the glasses of your eyes, which were thus made into such mirrors and "spies" (spyglasses, telescopes) that they epitomized (rendered in small but intense form) everything to you. Note that the direct object of "drove" comes in line 44.
2. Interpretations of this syntactically complex stanza turn, in part, on where one thinks that the direct address ends. Some editors put quotation markes before "You" (line 37) and after "love," and some manuscripts have "our" for "your."
3. Partings, and perhaps orgasms, as rehearsals for the final death of life. "Dying" was a popular metaphor for sexual climax in seventeenth-century English.
4. Can also mean "unnatural."

Let not thy divining° heart foreseeing
Forethink me any ill;
35 Destiny may take thy part,
And may thy fears fulfill;
But think that we
Are but turned aside to sleep;
They who one another keep
40 Alive, ne'er parted be.

1633

The Anniversary

All kings, and all their favorites,
All glory'of honors, beauties, wits,
The sun itself, which makes times, as they pass,
Is elder by a year, now, than it was 5 When thou and I first one another saw:
All other things to their destruction draw,
Only our love hath no decay;
This, no tomorrow hath, nor yesterday;
Running it never runs from us away,
10 But truly keeps his first, last, everlasting day.

Two graves must hide thine and my corse;° corpse
If one might, death were no divorce.
Alas, as well as other princes, we (Who prince enough in one another be)
15 Must leave at last in death, these eyes, and ears,
Oft fed with true oaths, and with sweet salt tears;
But souls where nothing dwells but love
(All other thoughts being inmates°) then shall lodgers prove° experience
This, or a love increasèd there above,
20 When bodies to their graves, souls from their graves remove.

And then we shall be throughly° blest, thoroughly
But we no more than all the rest;[5]
Here upon earth, we're kings, and none but we
Can be such kings, nor of such subjects be;[6]
25 Who is so safe as we, where none can do
Treason to us, except one of us two?
True and false fears let us refrain,
Let us love nobly,'and live, and add again
Years and years unto years, till we attain
30 To write threescore, this is the second of our reign.

1633

5. Scholastic philosophers maintained that all souls are equally content in heaven but not equally blessed.

6. The conceit is that each lover is the other's king, and therefore each is also the other's only subject.

Love's Growth[7]

I scarce believe my love to be so pure
As I had thought it was,
Because it doth endure
Vicissitude,° and season, as the grass; change
5 Methinks I lied all winter, when I swore
My love was infinite, if spring make'it more.

But if this medicine, love, which cures all sorrow
With more, not only be no quìntessence,[8]
But mixed of all stuffs paining soul or sense,
10 And of the sun his working vigor borrow,
Love's not so pure, and abstract, as they use
To say, which have no mistress but their muse,
But as all else, being elemented[9] too,
Love sometimes would contèmplate, sometimes do.

15 And yet no greater, but more eminent,° conspicuous, evident
Love by the spring is grown;
As, in the firmament,
Stars by the sun are not enlarged, but shown,
Gentle love deeds, as blossoms on a bough,
20 From love's awakened root do bud out now.

If, as in water stirred more circles be Produced by one, love such additions take,
Those, like so many spheres, but one heaven make,
For they are all concentric unto thee;[1]
25 And though each spring do add to love new heat,
As princes do in times of action get
New taxes, and remit them not in peace,
No winter shall abate the spring's increase.

1633

A Valediction[2] of Weeping

Let me pour forth
My tears before thy face whilst I stay here,

7. In some manuscripts, titled "Spring." If "love's growth" refers to the swelling of pregnancy, then the irregular "growing" shape of the stanzas in the early editions and some manuscripts may be an instance of imitative form. The stanzas play on (by inverting) the Italian sonnet pattern of an octave followed by a sestet (see "Versification," p. 2042).
8. According to many ancient and medieval philosophers, there was a fifth, "quintessential" element, purer than the four elements of ordinary life (earth, air, fire, and water); the quintessence was thought to be a cure for all diseases. This medicine: in the early seventeenth century, cures were often sought according to a principle of likeness between medicine and illness.
9. Made up of a mixture of elements. Muse: source of inspiration.
1. Most astronomers in Donne's time conceived of nine concentric spheres, each of transparent crystal, turning around Earth. The various heavenly bodies were thought to be fixed in the surfaces of these spheres.
2. A departure speech or discourse; a bidding of farewell. Several manuscripts place a colon after "Valediction," but many, along with the 1633 edition, do not.

For thy face coins them, and thy stamp they bear,[3]
And by this mintage° they are something worth, coining a word
5 For thus they be
Pregnant of thee;
Fruits of much grief they are, emblems of more;
When a tear falls, that Thou falls which it bore,[4]
So thou and I are nothing then, when on a diverse° shore. separate

10 On a round ball
A workman that hath copies by, can lay
An Europe, Afric, and an Asïa,
And quickly make that, which was nothing, all,[5]
So doth each tear
15 Which thee doth wear,[6]
A globe, yea world, by that impression grow,
Till thy tears mixed with mine do overflow
This world; by waters sent from thee, my heaven dissolvèd so.

O more than moon,
20 Draw not up seas to drown me in thy sphere;[7]
Weep me not dead,[8] in thine arms, but forbear
To teach the sea what it may do too soon.
Let not the wind
Example find
25 To do me more harm than it purposeth;
Since thou and I sigh one another's breath,
Whoe'er sighs most is cruelest, and hastes the other's death.

1633

A Valediction[9] of the Book

I'll tell thee now (dear Love) what thou shalt do
To anger destiny, as she doth us,
How I shall stay, though she esloygne° me thus remove far off
And how posterity shall know it too;
5 How thine may out-endure
Sybil's[1] glory, and obscure
Her[2] who from Pindar could allure,

3. I.e., they reflect your face (among other meanings).
4. With a play on the image of pregnancy in the preceding lines. "That" is a demonstrative adjective modifying "Thou"; the tear of the speaker bears the impression of the lover.
5. I.e., an artist can paste maps of the continents on a blank globe. The "o" of the globe's shape is echoed in the word "nothing."
6. Can be read as either "which bears your impression" (i.e., the speaker's tears) or "which you weep" (i.e., bearing the speaker's impression).
7. I.e., heavenly body with greater power of attraction than the moon's, (when you affect the tides) don't pull the seas up to yourself.
8. I.e., do not weep me to death.
9. See note 2, p. 300.

1. The best-known "sibyl," or prophetess, was the Cumaean Sibyl, who (according to Virgil's Aeneid) lived for a thousand years. In a trancelike frenzy, she wrote inspired prophecies on leaves, which were scattered abroad by the wind. Her prophecies concerning the destiny of the Roman state were gathered into the Sibylline Books, which were preserved in the Roman temple of Capitoline Jupiter. These books were consulted during national emergencies and required interpretation by male priests.
2. According to tradition, Corinna the Boeotian (fl. ca. 500 B.C.E.?) taught writing to and competed successfully with the Greek lyric poet Pindar (ca. 522–ca. 438 B.C.E.). His poems are extant; Corinna's are not, except in fragments.

And her,[3] through whose help Lucan is not lame,
And her, whose book (they say) Homer did find, and name.[4]

10 Study our manuscripts, those myriads
Of letters, which have past twixt thee and me,
Thence write our annals, and in them will be
To all whom love's subliming fire invades,
Rule and example found;
15 There, the faith of any ground[5]
No schismatic[6] will dare to wound,
That sees, how Love this grace to us affords,
To make, to keep, to use, to be these his records.

This book, as long-lived as the elements,
20 Or as the world's form, this all-graved tome[7]
In cipher writ, or new made idiom;° language, dialect
We for love's clergy only'are instruments,[8]
When this book is made thus,
Should again the ravenous
25 Vandals and the Goths[9] invade us,
Learning were safe; in this our universe
Schools might learn sciences, spheres music, angels verse.[1]

Here Love's divines° (since all divinity prophets, priests
Is love or wonder) may find all they seek,
30 Whether abstract spiritual love they like,
Their souls exhaled° with° what they do not see, drawn out / by
Or loth so to amuse
Faith's[2] infirmity, they choose
Something which they may see and use;
35 For, though mind be the heaven, where love doth sit,
Beauty'a convenient type[3] may be to figure° it. represent

Here more than in their books may lawyers find,
Both by what titles[4] mistresses are ours,
And how prerogative these states[5] devours,

3. Polla Argentaria, who helped her husband, the Roman poet Lucan (39–65 C.E.), write his historical epic, Pharsalia.
4. One tradition holds that Homer, the supposed author of the Iliad (and the Odyssey), took the subject of the siege of Troy from an epic poem on that event by Phantasia of Memphis. In another version of Donne's poem, the last three lines of this stanza read: "Her who from old allure, / And, through whose help Lucan is not lame, / And her, whose look (they say) Homer did find, and name." Note that this variant substitutes "look" for "book" and omits Corinna and Phantasia. The "her" of this last line refers to Helen of Troy, wife of the Greek king Menelaus, whose abduction (or seduction) by Paris, son of the king of Troy, began the Trojan War.
5. I.e., the trustworthiness of any fundamental doctrine.
6. One who promotes schism, or breach of unity in the Church; in this stanza and the next, the poet speaks of love as a sort of religion.
7. This indelibly written heavy book; one manuscript has "tomb" and another has "to me."
8. I.e., we are, in these letters, documents for love's initiates only; one variant has "are only" for "only'are."
9. Vandals and Goths were Germanic tribes that invaded Western Europe during the third, fourth, and fifth centuries; here, those who willfully and ignorantly destroy anything beautiful or worthy of preservation.
1. I.e., angelic hymns. Schools: scholastic philosophers. Spheres music: according to Pythagorean tradition, the motion of the planetary spheres created a music inaudible to human ears.
2. One variant has "doth" for "loth" and "faithless" for "Faith's."
3. A symbol or earthly reflection of the celestial original.
4. I.e., legal rights to the possession of property.
5. I.e., estates, presumably the "titles" mentioned in the above line. Prerogative: official right or privilege. Donne alludes here to the feudal practice by which a lord could demand from his vassals dues over and above those that were customary; also, at issue in the Parliament of 1601 was the prerogative of the monarch to levy special grants

40 Transferred from Love himself, to womankind.[6]
Who though from heart, and eyes,
They exact great subsidies,
Forsake him who on them relies
And for the cause, honor, or conscience give,
45 Chimeras, vain as they, or their prerogative.[7]

Here statesmen (or of them, they which can read)
May of their occupation find the grounds,° basic principles
Love and their art alike it deadly wounds,
If to consider what'tis, one proceed,[8]
50 In both they do excel
Who the present govern well,[9]
Whose weakness none doth, or dares tell;[1]
In this thy book, such° will there nothing see, such people
As in the Bible some can find out alchemy.[2]

55 Thus vent thy thoughts; abroad[3] I'll study thee,
As he removes far off, that° great heights takes;[4] who
How great love is, presence best trial makes,
But absence tries how long this love will be;
To take a latitude
60 Sun, or stars, are fitliest viewed
At their brightest, but to conclude,
Of longitudes, what other way have we,
But to mark when, and where the dark eclipses be?[5]

1633

Love's Alchemy

Some that have deeper digged love's mine than I,
Say where his centric° happiness doth lie; central, essential
I've loved, and got, and told,[6]
But should I love, get, tell, till I were old,
5 I should not find that hidden mystery;

against noblemen's estates at time of need.
6. The "ours" of line 38 seems to refer to men. Thus the first four lines of this stanza might be paraphrased "Here, more than in their books, lawyers may discover both by what titles (legal rights to property, with, perhaps, a pun on names) mistresses belong to us (men), and how women's usurpation of the prerogative (privileges attendant on those legal rights), which rightfully belongs to Love, eats away at those rights ('states')."
7. I.e., and for their reason they plead conscience or honor, both illusions ("chimeras") as empty as themselves or their prerogative.
8. I.e., neither love nor politics can bear close scrutiny.
9. The suggestion of these lines seems to be that opportunists do well in both love and politics.
1. I.e., the weakness of lovers and politicians, about which "none doth, or dares tell" because they have been either deceived or intimidated.
2. The science applied to the pursuit of transmutation of baser metals into gold and also to the search for a panacea or universal remedy. Nothing: worthlessness; one variant (printed in the 1633 edition) has "something" in place of "nothing." Find out: show the falsity of; or possibly, find support for (the Bible could be used to show the falsity of alchemy, but alchemists found support for their theories there).
3. I.e., while I'm away.
4. Measures. One variant has "shadows" for "great heights."
5. The latitude of a place may be measured by calculating its distance from the zenith of a star whose altitude (its distance from the equator) is known; longitude can be measured by noting the time at which an eclipse occurs at different points on Earth's surface. Donne here puns on "longitude," as it suggests (but does not mean) length or duration.
6. Tallied (counted) or estimated the quality of.

O,'tis imposture all:
And as no chemic° yet th' elixir[7] got, alchemist
But glorifies his pregnant pot,[8]
If by the way to him befall
10 Some odoriferous thing, or mèdicinal;
So lovers dream a rich and long delight,
But get a winter-seeming summer's night.

Our ease, our thrift, our honor, and our day,
Shall we for this vain bubble's shadow pay?
15 Ends love in this, that my man° servant
Can be as happy'as I can if he can
Endure the short scorn of a bridegroom's play?
That loving wretch that swears,
'Tis not the bodies marry, but the minds,
20 Which he in her angelic finds,
Would swear as justly that he hears,
In that day's rude hoarse minstrelsy, the spheres.[9]
Hope not for mind in women; at their best
Sweetness and wit they're but mummy[1] possessed.

1633

A Nocturnal upon St. Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day[2]

'Tis the year's midnight, and it is the day's,
Lucy's,[3] who scarce seven hours herself unmasks;
The sun is spent, and now his flasks[4]
Send forth light squibs, no constant rays;
5 The world's whole sap is sunk:[5]
The general balm th' hydroptic[6] earth hath drunk,

7. A hypothetical substance, the goal of the alchemists' endeavors, supposedly capable of transmuting base metals into gold, curing all illnesses, and prolonging life indefinitely.
8. His fertile (also womb-shaped) retort; alchemists' quests to create the elixir of life were often compared to human reproduction.
9. I.e., the music of the spheres, or concentric transparent shells containing the heavenly bodies in Ptolemaic astronomy; they were thought to produce angelic music as they turned. Here, they are contrasted with the charivari, a raucous serenade using pots, pans, and trumpets, traditionally performed on the wedding night.
1. Lifeless flesh; also, a medication prepared from mummified remains. The poem is titled "Mummy" in some manuscripts.
The syntax of the last two lines is obscure; the last line may be read with a comma after "wit," after "they're," after "but," and/or after "mummy." The final word may modify "mummy," to signify "mummy with a demon in it," or "they," to signify "women, once possessed by men" (i.e., married) or "women, after men possess them" (i.e., after marriage). Some manuscripts have a comma after "best."
2. The "nocturns" of the Roman Catholic Church were night offices, or services; the title may also allude to an astronomical instrument used for telling time at night. According to the calendar in use during Donne's time, the winter solstice, or shortest day of the year, fell on December 12, the eve of St. Lucy's Day. St. Lucy was patron saint of the blind. Her festival is celebrated with lights and candles, and her name recalls the Latin word for light (lux, lucis). Lucy was the name of Donne's patron, the countess of Bedford, and some commentators have suggested that the poem was written on her death, in 1627. Others believe that the "she" of the poem is Donne's wife, Anne, who died in 1617. Donne's daughter, named Lucy after the countess of Bedford, also died in 1627.
3. In Latin, lux, lucis also means "day." "Lucy's" here is an appositive to "day's."
4. Powder flasks. I.e., the sun is compared to a gun shooting powder from powder flasks, but in "squibs" like small fireworks that spurt and fizzle as they burn.
5. Like that of trees and vegetation in winter.
6. Implies both saturation and insatiable thirst;

Whither, as to the bed's-feet, life is shrunk,
Dead and interred; yet all these seem to laugh,
Compared with me, who am their epitaph.[7]

10 Study me then, you who shall lovers be
At the next world, that is, at the next spring:
For I am every dead thing,
In whom love wrought new alchemy.
For his art did express° — squeeze out
15 A quintessence[8] even from nothingness,
From dull privations, and lean emptiness:
He ruined me, and I am re-begot
Of absence, darkness, death; things which are not.

All others, from all things, draw all that's good,
20 Life, soul, form, spirit, whence they being have;
I, by love's limbeck,[9] am the grave
Of all that's nothing. Oft a flood
Have we two wept, and so
Drowned the whole world, us two; oft did we grow
25 To be two chaoses,[1] when we did show
Care to aught else;[2] and often absences
Withdrew our souls, and made us carcasses.

But I am by her death (which word wrongs her)
Of the first nothing, the elixir grown;[3]
30 Were I a man, that I were one
I needs must know; I should prefer,
If I were any beast,
Some ends, some means; yea plants, yea stones detest,
And love;[4] all, all some properties invest;° — put on 35 If I an ordinary nothing were,
As shadow,'a light and body must be here.

But I am none; nor will my sun[5] renew.
You lovers, for whose sake the lesser sun
At this time to the Goat is run
40 To fetch new lust, and give it you,
Enjoy your summer all;
Since she enjoys her long night's festival,
Let me prepare towards her, and let me call

i.e., insatiably thirsty. General balm: the balsamum, regarded as the vital, life-giving force in the branch of Renaissance medicine associated with Paracelsus.
7. Inscription on a tombstone.
8. A highly concentrated essence or extract, often identified with the "fifth essence" of ancient and medieval philosophy (see note 8, p. 300 and note 7, p. 304).
9. An alembic, an apparatus used in distillation, here associated with alchemy.
1. Includes a reference to the primordial emptiness out of which all form arises.
2. I.e., when we turned our attention from each other.
3. He is now "grown" (become) the "elixir of the first nothing," i.e., the quintessence of the nothing that preceded creation of the world.
4. I.e., even plants and stones (like lodestones) have attractions and antipathies; even "beasts" have intentions.
5. I.e., the dead woman. The "lesser sun" (line 38) is the real sun, which is in the constellation of Capricorn ("the Goat") during December. Goats were proverbial for their lustfulness.

This hour her vigil,[6] and her eve, since this 45 Both the year's, and the day's deep midnight is.

A Valediction Forbidding Mourning[7]

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their souls to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say
The breath goes now, and some say, no;

5 So let us melt, and make no noise,
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move,
'Twere profanation of our joys
To tell the laity[8] our love.

Moving of th' earth brings harms and fears,
10 Men reckon what it did and meant;
But trepidation of the spheres,[9]
Though greater far, is innocent.

Dull sublunary[1] lovers' love
(Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
15 Absence, because it doth remove
Those things which elemented° it. composed

But we by'a love so much refined
That our selves know not what it is,
Inter-assurèd of the mind,
20 Care less,[2] eyes, lips, and hands to miss.

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, endure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.

25 If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twin compasses[3] are two;
Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if th' other do.

6. The watch kept on the eve of a feast, with prayer.
7. Donne's friend Izaak Walton reported that this poem was written to Donne's wife when Donne went to the Continent in 1611. Valediction: see note 2, p. 300.
8. I.e., those who do not understand such love.
9. A trembling of the celestial spheres, hypothesized by Ptolemaic astronomers to account for unpredicted variations in the paths of the heavenly bodies.
1. Beneath the moon; earthly, hence changeable.
2. At least one manuscript and many editions from 1639 to 1654 give "carelesse" for "care lesse"; we choose the latter form because it allows for two interpretations of the lines.
3. I.e., the two legs of compasses used in drawing circles.

And though it in the center sit,
30 Yet when the other far doth roam,
It leans and hearkens after it,
And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must
Like th' other foot, obliquely° run. diagonally, aslant
35 Thy firmness makes my circle[4] just,
And makes me end where I begun.

1633

The Ecstasy[5]

Where, like a pillow on a bed,
A pregnant bank swelled up to rest
The violet's[6] reclining head,
Sat we two, one another's best.
5 Our hands were firmly cèmented
With a fast balm,[7] which thence did spring.
Our eye-beams twisted, and did thread
Our eyes upon one double string;
So to'intergraft our hands, as yet
10 Was all the means to make us one,[8]
And pictures° in our eyes to get° reflections / beget
Was all our propagation.[9]
As 'twixt two equal armies, Fate
Suspends uncertain victory,
15 Our souls (which to advance their state,
Were gone out) hung 'twixt her and me.
And whilst our souls negotiate there,
We like sepulchral statues lay;
All day the same our postures were,
20 And we said nothing all the day.
If any, so by love refined
That he soul's language understood,
And by good love were grown all mind,
Within convenient distance stood,
25 He (though he knew not which soul spake,
Because both meant, both spake the same)
Might thence a new concoction[1] take,
And part far purer than he came.
This ecstasy doth unperplex,

4. A symbol of perfection; with a dot in the middle, the alchemist's symbol for gold.
5. Literally, "a standing out" (from the Greek ekstasis); a term used by religious mystics to describe the experience in which the soul seemed to leave the body and rise superior to it in a state of heightened awareness.
6. An emblem of faithful love and truth.
7. I.e., perspiration; also, a moisture that preserves them steadfast.
8. The lovers are joined "as yet" only by hands and eyes; "eye-beams" are invisible shafts of light, thought of as going out of the eyes and so enabling one to see.
9. Reflection of each person in the other's eyes; known also as "making babies."
1. Mixture of diverse elements refined (literally, cooked together) by heat; an alchemical term.

30 We said, and tell us what we love;
We see by this it was not sex;
We see we saw not what did move;[2]
But as all several° souls contain separate
Mixture of things, they know not what,
35 Love these mixed souls doth mix again,
And makes both one, each this and that.
A single violet transplant,
The strength, the color, and the size
(All which before was poor, and scant)
40 Redoubles still, and multiplies.
When love, with one another so
Interinanimates two souls,
That abler soul, which thence doth flow,[3]
Defects of loneliness controls.
45 We then, who are this new soul, know,
Of what we are composed, and made,
For, th' atomies° of which we grow, atoms, components
Are souls, whom no change can invade.
But O alas, so long, so far
50 Our bodies why do we forbear?
They're ours, though they're not we; we are
Th' intelligences, they the spheres.[4]
We owe them thanks because they thus
Did us to us at first convey,
55 Yielded their forces, sense, to us,
Nor are dross to us, but allay.[5]
On man heaven's influence works not so,
But that it first imprints the air,[6]
So soul into the soul may flow,
60 Though it to body first repair.° go
As our blood labors to beget
Spirits[7] like souls as it can,
Because such fingers need° to knit are needed
That subtle knot which makes us man:
65 So must pure lovers' souls descend
To'affections,° and to faculties,[8] feelings
Which sense may reach and apprehend;
Else a great Prince in prison lies.
To'our bodies turn we then, that so
70 Weak men on love revealed may look;
Love's mysteries in souls do grow,
But yet the body is his book.
And if some lover, such as we,
Have heard this dialogue of one,

2. I.e., we see that we did not understand before what "did move" (motivated) us.
3. The "abler soul" derives from the union of the two lesser ones. Interinanimates: i.e., mutually breathes life into and mutally removes the consciousness of.
4. The nine orders of angels ("intelligences") were believed to govern the nine spheres of Ptolemaic astronomy.
5. Alloy, an impurity that strengthens metal. Dross: an impurity that weakens metal.
6. Astrological influences were conceived of as being transmitted through the medium of air; also, angels were thought to assume bodies of air in their dealings with humans.
7. Vapors believed to permeate the blood and to mediate between the body and the soul.
8. Dispositions; powers of the body.

75 Let him still mark us; he shall see
Small change when we're to bodies gone.

1633

The Funeral

Whoever comes to shroud me, do not harm
Nor question much
That subtle wreath of hair which crowns my arm;[9]
The mystery, the sign you must not touch,
5 For 'tis my outward soul,
Viceroy to that, which then to heaven being gone,
Will leave this to control,
And keep these limbs, her[1] provinces, from dissolution.

For if the sinewy thread[2] my brain lets fall
10 Through every part
Can tie those parts and make me one of all;
These hairs, which upward grew, and strength and art
Have from a better brain,
Can better do'it; except° she meant that I — unless 15 By this should know my pain,
As prisoners then are manacled, when they're condemned to die.

Whate'er she meant by 'it, bury it with me,
For since I am
Love's martyr, it might breed idolatry,[3]
20 If into other's hands these relics came;
As 'twas humility
To'afford to it all that a soul can do,
So 'tis some bravery,
That since you would save none of me, I bury some of you.

1633

The Flea[4]

Mark but this flea, and mark in this,
How little that which thou deniest me is;
It sucked me first, and now sucks thee,

9. I.e., a lock of hair that he had tied about his arm.
1. The soul's, but also the mistress's (cf. "she," line 14). Viceroy: one who acts in the name and by the authority of the supreme ruler.
2. One theory during the period maintained that the body is held in organic order by sinews or nerves emanating from the brain to every part.
3. A reference to the Roman Catholic practice of idolizing martyrs as saints and venerating objects (relics) associated with them, such as bones or clothing.
4. The flea was a popular subject of Renaissance erotic poems in which, frequently, the narrator envies the flea for the liberties it takes with his lady and for its death at her hands (both die and kill were Renaissance slang terms for orgasm; the act of sexual intercourse was believed to reduce the man's life span). The narrator here addresses a woman who has scorned his advances.

And in this flea, our two bloods mingled be;
5 Thou know'st that this cannot be said
A sin, nor shame nor loss of maidenhead,[5]
Yet this enjoys before it woo,[6]
And pampered swells with one blood made of two,[7]
And this, alas, is more then we would do.

10 Oh stay,[8] three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost, yea more than married are.
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed, and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, w'are met,
15 And cloistered in these living walls of jet.[9]
Though use° make you apt to kill me, custom
Let not to that, self murder added be,
And sacrilege,[1] three sins in killing three.

Cruel and sudden, hast thou since
20 Purpled thy nail, in blood of innocence?
Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
Find'st not thy self, nor me the weaker now;[2]
25 'Tis true, then learn how false, fears be;
Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

1633

The Relic[3]

When my grave is broke up again
Some second guest to entertain[4]
(For graves have learned that woman-head° womanhood
To be to more than one a bed),
5 And he that digs it, spies
A bracelet of bright hair about the bone,[5]
Will he not let'us alone,
And think that there a loving couple lies,
Who thought that this device might be some way
10 To make their souls, at the last busy day,[6]
Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?

5. I.e., loss of virginity; the maidenhead is the hymen.
6. I.e., the flea enjoys this liberty without the effort of wooing the lady.
7. Renaissance medical theory held that blood was mingled during sexual intercourse, leading to conception; thus the image of swelling suggests pregnancy.
8. I.e., refrain from killing the flea.
9. Black marble; the "living walls of jet" here refer to the body of the flea.
1. Since the flea is a "marriage temple," killing it would be sacrilege.
2. I.e., now that she has killed the flea.
3. See note 3, p. 309.
4. Reuse of a grave after an interval of several years was a common seventeenth-century practice (the bones of previous occupants were deposited in charnel houses).
5. See "The Funeral," line 3 and note 9 (p. 309).
6. Judgment Day, when all parts of the body would be reassembled and reunited with the soul in resurrection.

If this fall° in a time, or land, happen
Where mis-devotion[7] doth command,
Then he that digs us up, will bring
15 Us to the Bishop and the King,
To make us relics; then
Thou shalt be'a Mary Magdalen,[8] and I
A something else thereby;
All women shall adore us, and some men;
20 And since at such time, miracles are sought,
I would have that age by this paper taught
What miracles we harmless lovers wrought.

First, we loved well and faithfully,
Yet knew not what we loved, nor why,
25 Difference of sex no more we knew,
Than our guardian angels do;
Coming and going, we
Perchance might kiss, but not between those meals;[9]
Our hands ne'er touched the seals,
30 Which nature, injured by late law,[1] sets free:
These miracles we did; but now, alas,
All measure and all language I should pass,
Should I tell what a miracle she was.

1633

Elegy VII[2]

Nature's lay idiot,[3] I taught thee to love,
And in that sophistry,[4] oh, thou dost prove
Too subtle: Fool, thou didst not understand
The mystic language of the eye nor hand:
5 Nor couldst thou judge the difference of the air
Of sighs, and say, this lies, this sounds° despair: expresses
Nor by the'eye's water call a malady
Desperately hot, or changing feverously.
I had not taught thee then, the alphabet
10 Of flowers, how they devicefully° being set ingeniously
And bound up, might with speechless secrecy

7. False devotion; seems to refer to Catholicism.
8. The woman out of whom Christ had cast seven devils (Luke 8.2), traditionally identified with the repentant prostitute of Luke 7.37–50. Renaissance painters often depicted her with long, golden hair.
9. I.e., customary kisses of greeting and parting; kisses were thought to be food for the soul.
1. I.e., human law puts prohibitions ("seals," which may also here signify sexual organs) on that which nature originally set free.
2. Donne's "Elegies," heavily influenced by Ovid's Amores, are written in heroic couplets (rhyming iambic pentameter lines) that provide an apt English equivalent for the Latin elegiac meter of alternating dactyllic pentameter and hexameter lines. In Donne's time, elegies were reflective poems treating various topics including love and (increasingly often) death. Donne's elegies are thought to be early poems, mostly written in the 1590s. Five of the thirteen elegies designed for printing in the 1633 edition of the Poems were refused a licence by the official censors; the second edition of 1635 printed seventeen elegies, and others were added to later editions, such as the 1669. There is still no scholarly consensus on the canon of Donne's elegies, and the Roman numerals in the titles first appeared in twentieth-century editions.
3. I.e., one who is ignorant of the workings of nature, as a "layperson" is ignorant of religious mysteries.
4. Plausible but fallacious reasoning.

Deliver errands mutely, and mutually.
Remember since° all thy words used to be when
To every suitor, "I,[5] 'if my friends agree";
15 Since, household charms,[6] thy husband's name to teach,
Were all the love-tricks, that thy wit could reach;
And since, an hour's discourse could scarce have made
One answer in thee,[7] and that ill arrayed
In broken proverbs, and torn sentences.
20 Thou art not by so many duties his,
That from the'world's common having severed thee,
Inlaid thee,[8] neither to be seen, nor see,
As mine: who have with amorous delicacies
Refined thee'into a blissful paradise.
25 Thy graces and good words my creatures be;
I planted knowledge and life's tree[9] in thee,
Which oh, shall strangers taste? Must I alas
Frame and enamel plate, and drink in glass?[1]
Chafe° wax for others' seals? break a colt's force heat
30 And leave him then, being made a ready horse?

1633

Elegy XIX. To His Mistress Going to Bed[2]

Come, madam, come, all rest my powers defy,
Until I labor, I in labor[3] lie.
The foe oft-times having the foe in sight,
Is tired with standing though he never fight.
5 Off with that girdle, like heaven's zone[4] glistering,
But a far fairer world encompassing.
Unpin that spangled breastplate[5] which you wear,
That th' eyes of busy fools may be stopped there.
Unlace yourself, for that harmonious chime° chiming watch
10 Tells me from you that now it is bed time.
Off with that happy busk,° which I envy, corset
That still can be, and still can stand so nigh.
Your gown going off, such beauteous state reveals,

5. Some modern editions change "I"—the reading of all early editions and manuscripts—to "Ay."
6. Magic used to learn her future "husband's name."
7. I.e., could hardly have elicited a response from you.
8. I.e., laid thee in, set thee aside for his own use; with an allusion to the contested Renaissance practice of "enclosing" common agricultural lands for private uses.
9. The first paradise, Eden, included the tree of the knowledge of good and evil and the tree of life (Genesis 2.9).
1. I.e., must I fashion and decorate a silver cup but drink from a glass one?
2. This poem was one of the five refused license for the 1633 edition (see note 2, p. 311).
3. Meaning "get to work" (sexually) in the first instance and "distress" (as of a woman in childbirth) in the second.
4. The belt of Orion.
5. Jeweled covering for the chest.

As when from flowry meads° th'hill's shadow steals. meadows
15 Off with that wiry coronet and show
The hairy diadem[6] which on you doth grow:
Now off with those shoes, and then safely[7] tread
In this love's hallowed temple, this soft bed.
In such white robes, heaven's angels used to be 20 Received by men; thou, Angel, bring'st with thee
A heaven like Mahomet's Paradise;[8] and though
Ill spirits walk in white, we easily know
By this these angels from an evil sprite:
Those set our hairs, but these our flesh upright.
25 License my roving hands, and let them go
Before, behind, between, above, below.
O my America! my new-found-land,
My kingdom, safeliest when with one man manned,
My mine of precious stones, my empery,° empire
30 How blest am I in this discovering thee!
To enter in these bonds is to be free;
Then where my hand is set, my seal shall be.
Full nakedness! All joys are due to thee,
As souls unbodied, bodies unclothed must be,
35 To taste whole joys. Gems which you women use
Are like Atlanta's balls,[9] cast in men's views,
That when a fool's eye lighteth on a gem,
His earthly soul may covet theirs, not them:
Like pictures, or like books' gay coverings made
40 For lay-men, are all women thus arrayed.
Themselves are mystic books,[1] which only we (Whom their imputed grace will dignify)
Must see revealed. Then, since that I may know,
As liberally as to a midwife, show
45 Thyself: cast all, yea, this white linen hence,
There is no penance due to innocence:[2]
To teach thee, I am naked first; why than,° then
What needst thou have more covering than a man?

6. A word for "crown," like the preceding line's "coronet"; but Donne leaves ambiguous the relation between figurative and literal crowns, and their bodily location.
7. Here and elsewhere in this poem, we substitute some manuscript variants for phrases in the 1669 edition, which has "softly" for "safely," "revealed to" (for "received by") in line 20, and "court" (for "covet") in line 38.
8. A heaven of sensual pleasures.
9. According to Greek mythology, Atalanta agreed to marry Hippomenes if he could defeat her in a foot race. As she was about to overtake him, he cast in her path three golden apples (or "balls") given to him by Venus, the goddess of love and beauty. Distracted by their beauty, Atalanta stopped to retrieve them, and Hippomenes won the race.
1. A manuscript variant for "books" is "bodies."
2. Some manuscripts have "here is no penance much less innocence." White clothing was often considered penitential vestment; the speaker seems to be arguing that the women should cast off such clothing since innocence does not require penance.

Satire III[3]

Kind pity chokes my spleen;[4] brave scorn forbids
Those tears to issue which swell my eyelids;
I must not laugh,° nor weep° sins, and be wise, mock / lament
Can railing then cure these worn maladies?
5 Is not our mistress fair Religion,
As worthy'of all our souls' devotion,
As virtue was to the first blinded age?[5]
Are not heaven's joys as valiant to assuage
Lusts, as earth's honor was to them?[6] Alas,
10 As we do them in means, shall they surpass
Us in the end, and shall thy father's spirit
Meet blind philosophers in heaven, whose merit
Of strict life may be'imputed faith,[7] and hear
Thee, whom he taught so easy ways and near 15 To follow, damned? O, if thou dar'st, fear this;
This fear great courage and high valor is.
Dar'st thou aid mutinous Dutch,[8] and dar'st thou lay
Thee in ships, wooden sepulchers, a prey
To leaders' rage, to storms, to shot, to dearth?° famine
20 Dar'st thou dive seas and dungeons° of the earth? mines, caves
Hast thou courageous fire to thaw the ice
Of frozen North discoveries? and thrice
Colder than salamanders, like divine
Children in the oven,[9] fires of Spain, and the line,° equator
25 Whose countries limbecks to our bodies be,
Canst thou for gain bear?[1] And must every he
Which cries not, "Goddess!" to thy mistress, draw,[2]
Or eat thy poisonous words? Courage of straw!
O desperate coward, wilt thou seem bold, and

3. In this poem, Donne adapts techniques of classical Roman satirists (e.g., Horace, Juvenal, and Persius) to a contemporary problem: the proliferating divisions of belief among Christians in the period after the Protestant break with the Roman Catholic Church. Donne was raised Catholic and seems to have retained considerable sympathy for Catholic beliefs even after he abandoned them in the 1590s; still dubious about the "official" Church of England's doctrines, he refused to take Anglican orders in 1607 despite King James's wish that Donne pursue a career in the Church. Later, he became an Anglican minister, and in 1621 he was appointed dean of St. Paul's Cathedral. When "Satire III" was written, however—probably in the 1590s—Donne like many other English people was in a state of doubt about religious "truth."

Donne's five satires are among the first formal experiments in the genre in English; they were initially refused a publication license, but the ban was later removed.

4. The seat of laughter and of melancholy (according to Renaissance physiology).

5. I.e., the age of paganism, "blinded" to Christianity but capable of a natural devotion to "virtue."

6. I.e., hope of heaven's "joys" should be as capable of calming our "lusts" as earthly "honor" was able to appease the lusts of the pagans.

7. Donne reverses a reformed Protestant theological concept: instead of achieving Christians' salvation by imputing Christ's merits to them through faith, here virtuous pagans' salvation might be gained by imputing faith to them based on their moral lives.

8. In the last twenty years of the sixteenth century, the English aided the Protestant Dutch in their revolt against Spanish (and Catholic) rule. Donne had sailed in two raiding expeditions against the Spanish.

9. After alluding to expeditions to discover the Northwest Passage, Donne invokes the "divine children" Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who are described in the Book of Daniel (3.20–30) as surviving a fiery furnace unharmed after refusing to worship a golden idol. Salamanders were thought to be so cold-blooded that they could endure fire.

1. The object of "bear" is "fires of Spain, and the line." "Fires of Spain" refers to the Inquisition, in which heretics were burned at the stake. Inquisitorial and equatorial heats burn people as chemists heat materials in "limbecks," apparatuses used for distilling liquids.

2. I.e., fight a duel.

30 To thy foes and his° (who made thee to stand — God's Sentinel in his world's garrison) thus yield,
And for forbidden wars, leave th'appointed field?
Know thy foes: The foul Devil he'is, whom thou
Strivest to please: for hate, not love, would allow 35 Thee fain his whole realm to be quit;[3] and as
The world's all parts wither away and pass,
So the world's self, thy other loved foe, is
In her decrepit wane, and thou, loving this,
Dost love a withered and worn strumpet; last,
40 Flesh (itself's death) and joys which flesh can taste,
Thou lovest; and thy fair goodly soul, which doth
Give this flesh power to taste joy, thou dost loathe;
Seek true religion. O, where? Mirreus,[4]
Thinking her unhoused here, and fled from us,
45 Seeks her at Rome; there, because he doth know
That she was there a thousand years ago.
He loves her rags so, as we here obey
The statecloth[5] where the Prince sat yesterday.
Crantz to such brave loves will not be enthralled,
50 But loves her only, who'at Geneva'[6] is called Religion—plain, simple, sullen, young,
Contemptuous, yet unhandsome; as among
Lecherous humors,° there is one that judges — dispositions
No wenches wholesome but coarse country drudges.
55 Graius[7] stays still at home here, and because
Some preachers, vile ambitious bawds, and laws
Still new, like fashions, bid him think that she
Which dwells with us, is only° perfect, he — solely Embraceth her whom his Godfathers will 60 Tender to him, being tender, as wards still Take such wives as their guardians offer, or Pay values. Careless Phrygius[8] doth abhor
All, because all cannot be good, as one
Knowing some women whores, dares marry none.
65 Graccus[9] loves all as one, and thinks that so
As women do in divers countries go
In divers habits, yet are still one kind,
So doth, so is religion; and this blind-
ness too much light breeds;[1] but unmovèd thou
70 Of force° must one, and forced but one allow; — necessity

3. I.e., the devil would willingly ("fain")—but for hate, not love—give you his whole realm of hell to discharge a debt ("to be quit").
4. The fictional characters that follow represent different creeds. "Mirreus," from myrrh, a gum resin that gives incense its smell, is a Roman Catholic.
5. The royal canopy; a symbol of royal power.
6. The center of Calvinism; "Crantz" is a Geneva Presbyterian.
7. Probably an Erastian, i.e., one who believes that religious belief should be determined by the state; he could also be an Anglican, a follower of England's state religion after the Reformation.
8. Seems to be a skeptic, or one who rejects all creeds. "Values," or fines, had to be paid by young men (of "tender" years) who rejected the marriages arranged by their guardians; Catholics also had to pay fines if they refused to attend Anglican services.
9. A Universalist, or one who considers all creeds basically alike.
1. I.e., "too much light" grows for anyone to see the truth. Unlike Graccus, who finds the "light of truth" in every creed, the reader is advised to find the one "right" religion without being moved by other forces.

And the right; ask thy father which is she,
Let him ask his; though truth and falsehood be Near twins, yet truth a little elder is;
Be busy to seek her, believe me this,
75 He's not of none, nor worst, that seeks the best.[2]
To'adore, or scorn an image, or protest,[3]
May all be bad; doubt wisely; in strange way
To stand inquiring right, is not to stray;
To sleep, or run wrong, is. On a huge hill,
80 Craggèd and steep, Truth stands, and he that will Reach her, about° must, and about must go, around
And what th'hill's suddenness° resists, win so; unexpected abruptness
Yet strive so, that before age, death's twilight,
Thy soul rest, for none can work in that night.[4]
85 To will° implies delay, therefore now do. intend a future act
Hard deeds, the body's pains; hard knowledge too
The mind's endeavors reach,[5] and mysteries
Are like the sun, dazzling, yet plain to'all eyes.
Keep the'truth which thou hast found; men do not stand
90 In so ill case that God hath with his hand
Signed kings' blank charters to kill whom they hate,
Nor are they vicars, but hangmen to fate.[6]
Fool and wretch, wilt thou let thy Soul be tied
To man's laws, by which she shall not be tried
95 At the last day? O, will it then boot° thee profit
To say a Philip, or a Gregory,
A Harry, or a Martin[7] taught thee this?
Is not this excuse for mere° contraries absolute, complete
Equally strong? Cannot both sides say so?
100 That thou mayest rightly'obey power, her° bounds know; power's
Those passed, her nature'and name is changed; to be
Then humble to her is idolatry.
As streams are, power is; those blest flowers that dwell
At the rough stream's calm head, thrive and do well,
105 But having left their roots, and themselves given
To the stream's tyrannous rage, alas, are driven
Through mills, and rocks, and woods, and at last, almost
Consumed in going, in the sea are lost:
So perish souls, which more choose men's unjust
110 Power from God claimed, than God himself to trust.

1633

2. I.e., the person who seeks the true Church is not an unbeliever ("of none") nor the "worst" sort of believer.
3. "To'adore" alludes to Catholic worship, whereas to "scorn an image" and to "protest" are typical Protestant gestures.
4. Cf John 9.4: "I must work the work of him that sent me, while it is day. The night cometh, when no man can work."
5. I.e., just as the body's pains achieve ("reach") hard deeds, the mind's endeavors reach hard knowledge.
6. These syntactically and conceptually difficult lines seem to say that God has not given earthly rulers unconditional authority ("blank charters") to kill whomever they choose; when they do kill, they are serving not as God's "vicars" but rather as hangmen to "fate."
7. Martin Luther (1483–1546), German Reformation leader. Philip: Philip II (1527–1598) of Spain. Gregory: any one of several Pope Gregorys (VII, XIII, XIV). Harry: Henry VIII (1491–1547) of England.

Good Friday,[8] 1613. Riding Westward

Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this,
The'intelligence that moves, devotion is,[9]
And as the other spheres, by being grown
Subject to foreign motions, lose their own,
5 And being by others hurried every day,
Scarce in a year their natural form obey;
Pleasure or business, so, our souls admit
For their first mover, and are whirled by it.[1]
Hence is 't, that I am carried towards the West
10 This day, when my soul's form bends towards the East.
There I should see a Sun,[2] by rising, set,
And by that setting endless day beget;
But that° Christ on this cross did rise and fall, except that
Sin had eternally benighted all.
15 Yet dare I'almost be glad I do not see
That spectacle, of too much weight for me.
Who sees God's face, that is self-life, must die;[3]
What a death were it then to see God die?
It made his own lieutenant, Nature, shrink;
20 It made his footstool crack, and the sun wink.[4]
Could I behold those hands which span the poles,
And tune[5] all spheres at once, pierced with those holes?
Could I behold that endless height which is
Zenith to us, and to'our antipodes,[6]
25 Humbled below us? Or that blood which is
The seat° of all our souls, if not of His, dwelling place
Make dirt of dust, or that flesh which was worn
By God, for his apparel, ragg'd and torn?
If on these things I durst not look, durst I
30 Upon his miserable mother cast mine eye,
Who was God's partner here, and furnished thus
Half of that sacrifice which ransomed us?
Though these things, as I ride, be from° mine eye, away from
They're present yet unto my memory,
35 For that looks towards them; and thou look'st towards me,
O Saviour, as thou hang'st upon the tree.
I turn my back to thee but to receive
Corrections, till thy mercies bid thee leave.° cease

8. The Friday before Easter, observed as the anniversary of Christ's death.
9. I.e., just as an angel was believed to govern the movements of each of the nine concentric celestial spheres, so "devotion" is or should be the guiding principle for the movements of humans.
1. I.e., just as spheres are deflected from their true orbits by outside influences, so our souls are diverted by "pleasure or business." According to Ptolemaic astronomy, each sphere, in addition to its own motion, was influenced by the motions of those outside it ("foreign motions," line 4), the outermost being known as the primum mobile, or "first mover" (line 8).
2. With a pun on Son.
3. God told Moses: "Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me and live" (Exodus 33.20).
4. A quaking of the earth (God's "footstool," according to Isaiah 66.1) and a solar eclipse marked Christ's Crucifixion (Matthew 27.45, 51).
5. The motion of the celestial spheres was believed to produce music; some manuscripts have "turn," which accords with the notion that God was the "first mover."
6. The zenith is that part of the heavens directly above any point on Earth; the antipodes are that part of Earth diametrically opposite such a point.

O think me worth thine anger; punish me;
40 Burn off my rusts and my deformity;
Restore thine image so much, by thy grace,
That thou may'st know me, and I'll turn my face.

From Holy Sonnets[7]

Thou hast made me, and shall thy work decay?
Repair me now, for now mine end doth haste;
I run to death, and death meets me as fast,
And all my pleasures are like yesterday.
5 I dare not move my dim eyes any way,
Despair behind, and death before doth cast
Such terror, and my feeble flesh doth waste
By sin in it, which it towards hell doth weigh.
Only thou art above, and when towards thee
10 By thy leave I can look, I rise again;
But our old subtle foe° so tempteth me — Satan
That not one hour myself I can sustain.
Thy grace may wing° me to prevent° his art, — give wings to / forestall
And thou like adamant[8] draw mine iron° heart. — obdurate

I am a little world[9] made cunningly
Of elements,° and an angelike sprite;° — matter / spirit
But black sin hath betrayed to endless night
My world's both parts, and O, both parts must die.
5 You which beyond that heaven which was most high
Have found new spheres, and of new lands can write,[1]
Pour new seas in mine eyes, that so I might Drown my world with my weeping earnestly,
Or wash it if it must be drowned no more.[2]
10 But O, it must be burnt![3] Alas, the fire
Of lust and envy'have burnt it heretofore,

7. Donne's religious poetry is collectively known as the Divine Poems, of which the nineteen Holy Sonnets form the largest group. Although Donne probably began writing them around 1609, at least a decade after leaving the Catholic Church, the sonnets display an interest in the formal meditative exercise of the Jesuits. Our selections are numbered according to Sir Herbert Grierson's influential edition of 1912, which included several sonnets not published until the the nineteenth century. No one knows what ordering Donne might have intended for the Holy Sonnets.
8. Lodestone, a magnetic stone; or adamantine rock, a proverbially hard stone.
9. The individual as microcosm of the world was a common Renaissance notion.
1. Copernican astronomy (which placed the sun at the center of our system, unlike Ptolemaic astronomy, which placed Earth at the center) had changed people's ideas about the universe just as recent terrestrial exploration had changed people's ideas about the world.
2. God promised Noah that he would never again cover Earth with a flood (Genesis 9.11).
3. At the end of the world, "the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up" (2 Peter 3.10).

And made it fouler; let their flames retire,
And burn me, O Lord, with a fiery zeal
Of thee'and thy house, which doth in eating heal.[4]

1635

At the round earth's imagined corners, blow
Your trumpets, angels;[5] and arise, arise
From death, you numberless infinities
Of souls, and to your scattered bodies go;
5 All whom the flood did, and fire shall,[6] o'erthrow,
All whom war, dearth,° age, agues,° tyrannies, famine / fevers
Despair, law, chance, hath slain, and you whose eyes
Shall behold God, and never taste death's woe.[7]
But let them sleep, Lord, and me mourn a space;
10 For, if above all these, my sins abound,
'Tis late to ask abundance of thy grace
When we are there. Here on this lowly ground,
Teach me how to repent; for that's as good
As if thou'hadst sealed my pardon with thy blood.

1633

If poisonous minerals, and if that tree
Whose fruit threw death on else° immortal us, otherwise
If lecherous goats, if serpents envious
Cannot be damned,[8] alas, why should I be?
5 Why should intent or reason, born in me,
Make sins, else equal, in me more heinous?
And mercy being easy and glorious
To God, in his stern wrath why threatens he?
But who am I, that dare dispute with thee,
10 O God? Oh! of thine only worthy blood,
And my tears, make a heavenly Lethean[9] flood,
And drown in it my sins' black memory.
That thou remember them, some claim as debt;
I think it mercy if thou wilt forget.[1]

4. "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up" (Psalms 59.9); probably also a reference to the Christian rite of Communion, in which Christ's blood and body (his "house") are eaten.
5. The first eight lines of the poem recount the events of the end of the world and the Second Coming of Christ; Donne alludes specifically to Revelation 7.1: "I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth."
6. See note 3, p. 319.
7. "But I tell you of a truth, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God" (Christ's words to his disciples, Luke 9.27). According to 1 Thessalonians 4.17, believers who are alive at the time of Christ's Second Coming will not die but will be taken directly to heaven.
8. I.e., only creatures with the ability to reason can be damned. The tree is the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the fruit of which Adam and Eve were forbidden to eat or touch (Genesis 2).
9. Lethe was a river in the classical underworld; drinking its waters caused one to forget the past.
1. Cf. Jeremiah 31.34: "I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sins no more."

10

Death, be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for thou are not so;
For those whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow
Die not, poor Death, nor yet canst thou kill me.
5 From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures be,
Much pleasure; then from thee much more must flow,
And soonest our best men with thee do go,
Rest of° their bones, and soul's delivery. for
Thou'art slave to fate, chance, kings, and desperate men,
10 And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell,
And poppy'or° charms can make us sleep as well opium or
And better than thy stroke; why swell'st° thou then? puff with pride
One short sleep past, we wake eternally,
And death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.[2]

1633

14

Batter my heart, three-personed God;[3] for You
As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;
That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me,' and bend
Your force to break, blow, burn, and make me new.
5 I, like an usurped town, to'another due,
Labor to'admit You, but O, to no end;
Reason, Your viceroy[4] in me, me should defend,
But is captived, and proves weak or untrue.
Yet dearly'I love you,'and would be loved fain,° gladly
10 But am betrothed unto your enemy.
Divorce me,'untie or break that knot again;
Take me to you, imprison me, for I,
Except you'enthrall[5] me, never shall be free,
Nor ever chaste, except you ravish me.

18

Show me, dear Christ, thy spouse[6] so bright and clear.
What! is it she which on the other shore
Goes richly painted? or which, robbed and tore,
Laments and mourns in Germany and here?

2. Cf. Corinthians 15.26: "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."
3. The Trinity: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.
4. One who acts in the name and by the authority of the supreme ruler.
5. Unless you make a prisoner of.
6. The true Church, "the bride of Christ" (cf. Song of Solomon 5.2: "Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled"). Lines 2–4 ask whether God's spouse is the Roman Catholic Church (in power in Continental countries such as France, Spain, and Italy, i.e., lands on the "other shore") or the Protestant Church "here," i.e., in England.

5 Sleeps she a thousand, then peeps up one year?
Is she self-truth, and errs? now new, now'outwore?
Doth she,'and did she, and shall she evermore
On one, on seven, or on no hill appear?[7]
Dwells she with us, or like adventuring knights
10 First travel[8] we to seek, and then make love?
Betray,° kind husband, thy spouse to our sights, reveal
And let mine amorous soul court thy mild dove,[9]
Who is most true and pleasing to thee then
When she's embraced and open to most men.[1]

1615? 1894

A Hymn to God the Father[2]

Wilt thou forgive that sin where I begun,
Which is my sin, though it were done before?[3]
Wilt thou forgive that sin through which I run,
And do run still, though still I do deplore?
5 When thou hast done,[4] thou hast not done,
For I have more.

Wilt thou forgive that sin by which I have won
Others to sin? and made my sin their door?
Wilt thou forgive that sin which I did shun
10 A year or two, but wallowed in a score?
When thou has done, thou hast not done,
For I have more.

I have a sin of fear, that when I have spun
My last thread, I shall perish on the shore;
15 Swear by thy self, that at my death thy Son
Shall shine as he shines now and heretofore;
And, having done that, thou hast done,
I fear[5] no more.

1623? 1633

7. The church on "no hill" could be either the Presbyterian church of Geneva or the Episcopal Church of England, based in Canterbury. The church of "one" hill is an unclear reference, but perhaps it is Mt. Moriah (site of Solomon's temple). The church of "seven" hills is that of Rome.
8. Formerly, "labor" as well as "journey."
9. The dove was a symbol of the Holy Spirit.
1. I.e., universal, without division. An echo of the Song of Solomon (5.2), which was frequently interpreted as the song of love between Christ and the Church.
2. This hymn was sung by the entire congregation during the Anglican service. Donne wrote it during his illness of 1623, had it set to music, and liked to hear it performed by the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral.
3. I.e., he inherits the original sin of Adam and Eve.
4. Donne puns on his own name and may, in the next line, pun on his wife's maiden name, Ann More.
5. In some manuscripts, "have."

Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness

Since I am coming to that holy room
  Where, with thy choir of saints for evermore,
I shall be made thy music; as I come
  I tune the instrument here at the door,
5 And what I must do then, think here before.

Whilst my physicians by their love are grown
  Cosmographers,[6] and I their map, who lie
Flat on this bed, that by them may be shown
  That this is my southwest discovery
10 Per fretum febris,[7] by these straits to die,

I joy, that in these straits, I see my West;[8]
  For, though their currents yield return to none,
What shall my West hurt me? As West and East
  In all flat maps (and I am one) are one,[9]
15 So death doth touch the resurrection.

Is the Pacific Sea my home? Or are
  The Eastern riches? Is Jerusalem?
Anyan,° and Màgellan, and Gìbraltar,[1] — Bering Straits
  All straits, and none but straits, are ways to them,
20 Whether where Japhet dwelt, or Cham, or Shem.[2]

We think that Paradise and Calvary,
  Christ's cross, and Adam's tree, stood in one place;
Look, Lord, and find both Adams[3] met in me;
  As the first Adam's sweat surrounds my face,
25 May the last Adam's blood my soul embrace.

So, in his purple[4] wrapped, receive me, Lord;
  By these his thorns give me his other crown;
And, as to others' souls I preached Thy word,
  Be this my text, my sermon to mine own:
30 Therefore that he may raise the Lord throws down.[5]

1623? — 1635

6. Ones who map the general features of the celestial and terrestrial worlds.
7. Through the straits of fever (Latin). Donne puns on the word "strait" as both a passageway between two bodies of water and a situation of distress. Cf. Christ's words in Matthew 7.4: "Because strait is the gate and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." Magellan had discovered the straits that bear his name in 1520. They lie at the southern tip of South America and are hence southwest from England.
8. Where the sun sets; hence, where life ends.
9. In one of his sermons (no. 55 in the collection LXXX Sermons), Donne noted that when a flat map is "pasted" on a round body, "then West and East are all one."
1. Behind these locations lie many ancient speculations about the location of paradise, which is analogous to heaven, as the various straits are to death.
2. The three sons of Noah (Genesis 10), who were thought to have settled in Europe, Africa, and Asia, respectively, after the Flood.
3. I.e., Adam and Christ. Adam's tree: the tree of the knowledge of good and evil in the Garden of Eden (Genesis 2). In one place: in the same region.
4. I.e., in the purple of Christ's blood or his purple robe (Mark 15.17).
5. Adapted from Psalms 146.8: "the Lord raiseth them that are bowed down."

BEN JONSON
1572–1637

To the Reader[1]

Pray thee, take care, that tak'st my book in hand,
To read it well: that is, to understand.

1616

On My First Daughter

Here lies, to each her parents' ruth,° sorrow
Mary, the daughter of their youth;
Yet all heaven's gifts being heaven's due,
It makes the father less to rue.
5 At six months' end she parted hence
With safety of her innocence;
Whose soul heaven's queen, whose name she bears,
In comfort of her mother's tears,
Hath placed amongst her virgin-train:[2]
10 Where, while that severed doth remain,[3]
This grave partakes the fleshly birth;
Which cover lightly, gentle earth!

1616

On My First Son

Farewell, thou child of my right hand,[4] and joy;
My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy:
Seven years thou'wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.[5]
5 O could I lose all father now![6] for why
Will man lament the state he should envỳ,
To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
And, if no other misery, yet age?

1. From the book of epigrams that Jonson published along with a collection of poems called The Forrest in his First Folio of 1616. He seems initially to have planned another book of epigrams, but his later examples of the genre—in his collection of poems The Underwood—were not published until after his death, in the Second Folio of 1640. Modeled on poems by the Roman poet Martial (ca. 40–ca. 103), epigrams were terse and pointed, often ending with a witty turn of thought. Jonson's teacher, the historian William Camden, described them as "short and sweet poems, framed to praise or dispraise."
2. I.e., among those attending the Virgin Mary.
3. I.e., while her soul remains separate from her body (the soul and body will reunite at Resurrection).
4. A literal translation of the Hebrew Benjamin, the boy's name.
5. Jonson's son died on his seventh birthday, in 1603.
6. I.e., let go all fatherly thoughts and sorrow.

Rest in soft peace, and asked, say, "Here doth lie
10 Ben Jonson his best piece of poetry."
For whose sake henceforth all his[7] vows be such
As what he loves may never like too much.

1616

On Spies

Spies, you are lights in state,[8] but of base stuff,
Who, when you've burnt yourselves down to the snuff,° candle end
Stink and are thrown away. End fair enough.

1616

To Fool or Knave

Thy praise or dispraise is to me alike:
One doth not stroke me, nor the other strike.

1616

To Sir Henry Cary[9]

That neither fame nor love might wanting be
To greatness, Cary, I sing that and thee;
Whose house,[1] if it no other honor had,
In only thee might be both great and glad;
5 Who, to upbraid° the sloth of this our time, chastise
Durst valor make almost, but not, a crime;[2]
Which deed I know not, whether were more high,
Or thou more happy, it to justify
Against thy fortune: when no foe, that day,
10 Could conquer thee but chance, who did betray.
Love thy great loss, which a renown hath won,
To live when Broick not stands, nor Ruhr doth run.[3]
Love honors, which of best example be
When they cost dearest and are done most free;
15 Though every fortitude deserves applause,

7. I.e., Ben Jonson the father's.
8. Condition or form; with a likely pun on "state" as government.
9. Henry Cary (ca. 1576–1633) became Viscount Falkland in 1620 and was the father of Jonson's friend Lucius Cary (1609 or 1610–1643).
1. Family line, but also household, which in Cary's case was well known to include not "only" a husband but also a wife—Elizabeth Cary (ca. 1587–1639)—who aspired to public "honor" through her writing.
2. In October 1605, Cary was with a group of English and Dutch soldiers who fled from a smaller Italian force—hence Cary, who tried to stop the rout and was captured, almost made "valor" a crime in English eyes.
3. "The castle and river near where he was taken" [Jonson's note]. Cary was captured near the confluence of the Rhur and the Rhine rivers.

It may be much or little in the cause.
He's valiant'st that dares fight, and not for pay;
That virtuous is, when the reward's away.

1616

On Playwright

Playwright, convict° of public wrongs to men, — convicted
Takes private beatings and begins again.
Two kinds of valor he doth show at once:
Active in 's° brain, and passive in his bones. — his

1616

To Elizabeth, Countess of Rutland[4]

That poets are far rarer births than kings
Your noblest father proved; like whom before,
Or then, or since, about our Muses' springs,
Came not that soul exhausted so their store.[5]
5 Hence was it that the destinies decreed
(Save that most masculine issue of his brain)[6]
No male unto him; who could so exceed Nature, they thought, in all that he would fain.° — make
At which she, happily[7] displeased, made you,
10 On whom, if he were living now to look,
He should those rare and absolute numbers[8] view,
As he would burn or better far his book.

1616

On English Monsieur[9]

Would you believe, when you this monsieur see,
That his whole body should speak French, not he?
That so much scarf of France, and hat, and feather,
And shoe, and tie, and garter should come hether,° — hither
5 And land on one whose face durst never be
Toward the sea farther than Half-Way Tree?[1]

4. Daughter (1584–1612) of the poet Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586; see pp. 208–20), she married Roger Manners, fifth earl of Rutland.
5. I.e., no one before or since Sidney has so well used up the supply ("store") of poetic inspiration symbolized by the "springs" of the "Muses" (nine sister goddesses in Greek mythology).
6. I.e., his books.
7. I.e., by good fortune.
8. Metrical feet, hence lines or verses; perhaps also, "proportions."
9. Sir, Mr. (French); pronounced mes'-yer, but often spelled monser in Jonson's time, suggesting an Anglicized pronunciation.
1. Perhaps a landmark between London and Dover, where a traveler would embark for France.

That he, untraveled, should be French so much
As Frenchmen in his company should seem Dutch?
Or had his father, when he did him get,
10 The French disease,[2] with which he labors yet?
Or hung some monsieur's picture on the wall,
By which his dam conceived him, clothes and all?
Or is it some French statue? No: 'T° doth move, it
And stoop, and cringe. O then, it needs must prove 15 The new French tailor's motion,° monthly made, puppet
Daily to turn in Paul's,[3] and help the trade.

1616

To John Donne

Who shall doubt, Donne, where° I a poet be, whether
When I dare send my epigrams[4] to thee?
That so alone canst judge, so'alone dost make;
And, in thy censures, evenly dost take
5 As free simplicity to disavow
As thou hast best authority t' allow.
Read all I send, and if I find but one
Marked by thy hand, and with the better stone,[5]
My title's sealed.[6] Those that for claps° do write, applause
10 Let pui'nies',[7] porters', players'° praise delight, actors
And, till they burst, their backs like asses load:[8]
A man should seek great glory, and not broad.° widespread, unrefined

1616

Inviting a Friend to Supper[9]

Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house, and I
Do equally desire your company;
Not that we think us worthy such a guest,
But that your worth will dignify our feast
5 With those that come, whose grace may make that seem Something, which else could hope for no esteem.
It is the fair acceptance, sir, creates
The entertainment perfect, not the cates.° food

2. I.e., syphilis.
3. St. Paul's Cathedral, in London. In the seventeenth century, St. Paul's was a popular gathering place; merchants hired men to walk up and down in the yard advertising their wares.
4. On epigrams, see note 1, p. 323.
5. The allusion may be to the Thracian custom of recording the good or evil fortunes of each day by placing a stone counter of corresponding color in an urn. Jonson refers elsewhere to the description of this custom in Pliny's Natural History 7.40.
6. I.e., as a poet.
7. Puisnies (pronounced like punies), insignificant persons.
8. I.e., probably: let the praises made by insignificant persons load the backs of those who write for applause until their backs break ("burst"). Asses: beasts of burden, with a probable pun on "ass" as an ignorant person.
9. The versified invitation to share a meal was a popular type of classical and Renaissance verse epistle.

Yet shall you have, to rectify your palate,
10 An olive, capers, or some better salad
Ushering the mutton; with a short-legged hen,
If we can get her, full of eggs, and then
Lemons, and wine for sauce; to these a cony° rabbit
Is not to be despaired of, for our money;
15 And, though fowl now be scarce, yet there are clerks,
The sky not falling, think we may have larks.[1]
I'll tell you of more, and lie, so you will come:
Of partridge, pheasant, woodcock, of which some
May yet be there, and godwit, if we can;
20 Knot, rail, and ruff too.[2] Howsoe'er, my man° servant
Shall read a piece of Virgil, Tacitus,
Livy,[3] or of some better book to us,
Of which we'll speak our minds, amidst our meat;
And I'll profess° no verses to repeat. promise
25 To° this, if aught appear which I not know of, add to
That will the pastry, not my paper, show of.[4]
Digestive° cheese and fruit there sure will be; aiding digestion
But that which most doth take my Muse[5] and me,
Is a pure cup of rich Canary wine,
30 Which is the Mermaid's[6] now, but shall be mine;
Of which had Horace, or Anacreon[7] tasted,
Their lives, as do their lines, till now had lasted.
Tobacco, nectar, or the Thespian spring,[8]
Are all but Luther's beer[9] to this I sing.
35 Of this we will sup free, but moderately,
And we will have no Pooley, or Parrot[1] by,
Nor shall our cups make any guilty men;
But, at our parting we will be as when
We innocently met. No simple word
40 That shall be uttered at our mirthful board,
Shall make us sad next morning or affright
The liberty that we'll enjoy tonight.

1616

1. Cf. the old proverb When the sky falls we shall have larks. Clerks: i.e., scholars (pronounced clarks).
2. The godwit, knot, rail, and ruff are all wading birds related to the curlew or sandpiper. They were formerly regarded as delicacies.
3. Roman historian (59 B.C.E.–17 C.E.). Virgil (70–19 B.C.E.), Roman poet. Cornelius Tacitus (ca. 56–ca. 120), Roman historian.
4. I.e., if papers appear, they will be only under pies ("pastry"; to keep them from sticking to the pans).
5. Source of inspiration. In Greek mythology, the Muses were nine sister goddesses who presided over poetry, song, and the arts and sciences.
6. London's Mermaid Tavern, a favorite haunt of Jonson's. Canary is a light, sweet wine.
7. The Greek poet Anacreon of Teos (ca. 582–ca. 485 B.C.E.) and the Roman poet Horace (65–68 B.C.E.) both wrote many poems praising wine.
8. Associated with the Muses. Smoking was often called "drinking tobacco." Nectar: the drink of the classical gods.
9. German beer, considered inferior.
1. Robert Pooly and (probably) Henry Parrot were government spies; Pooly was present when the poet Christopher Marlowe (1564–1593; see pp. 238–56) was killed, in a tavern brawl. With a pun on the chattering of parrots (Polly, a name for a parrot).

On Gut

Gut eats all day and lechers all the night;
So all his meat he tasteth[2] over twice;
And, striving so to double his delight,
He makes himself a thoroughfare of vice.
5 Thus in his belly can he change a sin:
Lust it comes out, that gluttony went in.

Epitaph on Elizabeth, L. H.[3]

Wouldst thou hear what man can say
In a little? Reader, stay.
Underneath this stone doth lie
As much beauty as could die;
5 Which in life did harbor give
To more virtue than doth live.
If at all she had a fault,
Leave it buried in this vault.
One name was Elizabeth;
10 Th' other, let it sleep with death:
Fitter, where it died, to tell,
Than that it lived at all. Farewell.

To Penshurst[4]

Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show,
Of touch[5] or marble; nor canst boast a row
Of polished pillars, or a roof of gold;
Thou hast no lantern,[6] whereof tales are told,
5 Or stair, or courts; but stand'st an ancient pile,
And, these grudged at, art reverenced the while.[7]
Thou joy'st in better marks, of soil, of air,
Of wood, of water; therein thou art fair.
Thou hast thy walks for health, as well as sport;
10 Thy mount,[8] to which the dryads° do resort, wood nymphs
Where Pan and Bacchus[9] their high feasts have made,

2. Also meaning "to know carnally."
3. The subject of this epitaph (a poem written as if it were inscribed on a tombstone) has not been identified, although it is likely that the "L" stood for "Lady."
4. The country estate of the Sidney family, in Kent. An important early example of the "country house" poem in English, this poem was imitated by Jonson's contemporaries; cf. Aemilia Lanyer's "The Description of Cooke-ham" (p. 288).
5. Touchstone: a fine, black, costly variety of basalt.
6. A glassed or open structure raised above the roof of a house.
7. I.e., while other buildings are envied, Penshurst is admired.
8. Some high ground on the estate.
9. Greek god of wine and revelry. Pan: Greek god of shepherds and hunters; half goat, half man, he was raised by Bacchus and was associated with lust and music.

Beneath the broad beech and the chestnut shade;
That taller tree, which of a nut was set
At his great birth where all the Muses[1] met.
15 There in the writhèd bark are cut the names
Of many a sylvan, taken with his flames;[2]
And thence the ruddy satyrs oft provoke
The lighter fauns to reach thy Lady's Oak.
Thy copse too, named of Gamage,[3] thou hast there,
20 That never fails to serve thee seasoned deer
When thou wouldst feast or exercise thy friends.
The lower land, that to the river bends,
Thy sheep, thy bullocks, kine,° and calves do feed; cows
The middle grounds thy mares and horses breed.
25 Each bank doth yield thee conies;° and the tops,° rabbits / hills
Fertile of wood, Ashore and Sidney's copse,[4]
To crown thy open table, doth provide
The purpled pheasant with the speckled side;
The painted partridge lies in every field,
30 And for thy mess° is willing to be killed. meal
And if the high-swollen Medway° fail thy dish, local river
Thou hast thy ponds, that pay thee tribute fish,
Fat aged carps that run into thy net,
And pikes, now weary their own kind to eat,
35 As loath the second draught[5] or cast to stay,° await
Officiously° at first themselves betray; dutifully
Bright eels that emulate them, and leap on land
Before the fisher, or into his hand.
Then hath thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers,
40 Fresh as the air, and new as are the hours.
The early cherry, with the later plum,
Fig, grape, and quince, each in his time doth come;
The blushing apricot and woolly peach
Hang on thy walls, that every child may reach.
45 And though thy walls be of the country stone,
They're reared with no man's ruin, no man's groan;
There's none that dwell about them wish them down;
But all come in, the farmer and the clown,° countryman
And no one empty-handed, to salute
50 Thy lord and lady, though they have no suit.° request to make
Some bring a capon,[6] some a rural cake,
Some nuts, some apples; some that think they make
The better cheeses bring them, or else send
By their ripe daughters, whom they would commend

1. The nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts. At his great birth: i.e., the poet Sir Philip Sidney's birth (on November 30, 1554; for his poetry, see pp. 208–20), when an oak was planted to commemorate the day.
2. I.e., the fires of love; perhaps the woodsman ("sylvan") is in love because of reading Sidney's poems. In the next lines, the "ruddy satyrs" (woodland gods associated with lust and drinking) challenge the "lighter fauns" (woodland gods described as less wild than the satyrs) to race to the tree named after a Lady Leicester, who is said to have entered into labor under its branches.
3. Barbara Gamage, wife of Sir Robert Sidney (Philip's younger brother and the current owner of Penshurst).
4. Two groves on the estate.
5. The drawing in of a net.
6. A castrated rooster, especially one fattened for eating.

55 This way to husbands, and whose baskets bear
An emblem of themselves in plum or pear.
But what can this (more than express their love)
Add to thy free provisions, far above
The need of such? whose liberal board° doth flow — table
60 With all that hospitality doth know;
Where comes no guest but is allowed to eat,
Without his fear, and of thy lord's own meat;
Where the same beer and bread, and selfsame wine,
That is his lordship's shall be also mine,
65 And I not fain° to sit (as some this day — obliged
At great men's tables), and yet dine away.[7]
Here no man tells° my cups; nor, standing by, — counts
A waiter doth my gluttony envy,
But gives me what I call, and lets me eat;
70 He knows below° he shall find plenty of meat. — in servants' quarters
Thy tables hoard not up for the next day;
Nor, when I take my lodging, need I pray
For fire, or lights, or livery;° all is there, — provisions
As if thou then wert mine, or I reigned here:
75 There's nothing I can wish, for which I stay.° — wait
That found King James when, hunting late this way
With his brave son, the prince,[8] they saw thy fires
Shine bright on every hearth, as the desires
Of thy Penates° had been set on flame — Roman household gods
80 To entertain them; or the country came
With all their zeal to warm their welcome here.
What (great I will not say, but) sudden cheer
Didst thou then make 'em! and what praise was heaped
On thy good lady then, who therein reaped
85 The just reward of her high housewifery;
To have her linen, plate, and all things nigh,
When she was far; and not a room but dressed
As if it had expected such a guest!
These, Penshurst, are thy praise, and yet not all.
90 Thy lady's noble, fruitful, chaste withal.
His children thy great lord may call his own,
A fortune in this age but rarely known.
They are, and have been, taught religion; thence
Their gentler spirits have sucked innocence.
95 Each morn and even they are taught to pray,
With the whole household, and may, every day,
Read in their virtuous parents' noble parts
The mysteries of manners, arms, and arts.
Now, Penshurst, they that will proportion° thee — compare
100 With other edifices, when they see
Those proud, ambitious heaps, and nothing else,
May say their lords have built, but thy lord dwells.

1616

7. I.e., to be insufficiently fed at "great men's tables," because the best food was reserved for the host, and so to dine elsewhere to finish.

8. Prince Henry (d. 1612), the heir apparent.

Song: To Celia (I)[9]

Come, my Celia, let us prove,° experience
While we can, the sports of love;
Time will not be ours forever;
He at length our good will sever.
5 Spend not then his gifts in vain.
Suns that set may rise again;
But if once we lose this light,
'Tis with us perpetual night.
Why should we defer our joys?
10 Fame and rumor are but toys.
Cannot we delude the eyes
Of a few poor household spies,
Or his easier ears beguile,
So removèd by our wile?
15 'Tis no sin love's fruit to steal;
But the sweet thefts to reveal,
To be taken, to be seen,
These have crimes accounted been.

1606 1616

Song: To Celia (II)[1]

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge[2] with mine;
Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
And I'll not look for wine.
5 The thirst that from the soul doth rise,
Doth ask a drink divine:
But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
I would not change for thine.[3]
I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
10 Not so much honoring thee,
As giving it a hope, that there
It could not withered be.
But thou thereon did'st only breathe,
And sent'st it back to me;
15 Since when it grows and smells, I swear,
Not of itself, but thee.

1616

9. From Jonson's play Volpone 3.7 (1606). The lecherous Volpone attempts to seduce Celia, the virtuous wife of Corvino, whom Volpone has gotten out of the way by a stratagem (line 14). The poem draws on Catullus 5, translated by a number of English poets in this period. Cf. Thomas Campion, "My Sweetest Lesbia" (p. 278).
1. Based on five separate passages in the Epistles of the Greek rhetorician Philostratus (ca. 170–ca. 245).
2. Vow, with the added meaning "drink a toast."
3. Although the lines are ambiguous, the speaker seems to be saying that "even if I might taste ("sup") Jove's nectar (i.e., the drink of the gods of classical mythology—hence belonging to Jove, king of the gods), I would not take it in exchange for thine."

A Fit of Rhyme against Rhyme[4]

Rhyme, the rack° of finest wits, instrument of torture
That expresseth but by fits
True conceit,
Spoiling senses of their treasure,
5 Cozening judgment with a measure,
But false weight;[5]
Wresting words from their true calling;
Propping verse for fear of falling
To the ground;
10 Jointing syllabes,[6] drowning letters,
Fastening vowels, as with fetters
They were bound!
Soon as lazy thou wert known,
All good poetry hence was flown,
15 And art banished:
For a thousand years together,[7]
All Parnassus'[8] green did wither,
And wit vanish'd!
Pegasus[9] did fly away,
20 At the wells no Muse did stay,
But bewailed,
So to see the fountain dry,
And Apollo's music die,
All light failed!
25 Starveling rhymes did fill the stage,
Not a poet in an age
Worthy crowning.
Not a work deserving bays,[1]
Nor a line deserving praise,
30 Pallas[2] frowning:
Greek was free from rhyme's infection,
Happy Greek, by this protection,
Was not spoiled.

4. The issue of rhyme was hotly debated by many sixteenth- and seventeenth-century poets, including John Milton and John Dryden; some who denigrated rhyme in theory used it effectively in their poetic practice. In 1587, Christopher Marlowe attacked the "jigging veins of rhyming mother-wits" in the prologue to Tamburlaine the Great, part 1, and in 1602, Thomas Campion published a treatise arguing for the superiority of classical "quantitative meters" to English rhyming verse. In 1603, Samuel Daniel published his Defense of Rhyme; Jonson entered the fray with a witty poem he described to a friend as written "both against Campion and Daniel." "Fit" is an old term for a part of a poem, a canto; Jonson also plays (e.g., in line 2) on the term's meaning of "convulsion."
5. Punning on "measure" as a unit of poetical or musical rhythm and as a standard amount of a commodity, the line suggests that the rhyming poet cheats the buyer-reader by failing to "weigh" sounds properly, i.e., according to the system used in Latin prosody.
6. Syllables; i.e., making a rhyme by breaking a word on a syllabic unit (as Jonson does in some poems).
7. Classical Latin poetry did not use rhyme, but beginning in the third and fourth centuries C.E., Christian poets rhymed in Latin. Jonson's view that true poetry's "banishment" lasted a thousand years implies that the Italian humanists of the fourteenth century rescued poetry from the "wrongs" (line 35) of rhyme. One of those humanist scholars, Petrarch, used rhyme masterfully.
8. Mt. Parnassus, in central Greece, was considered sacred to the Muses, goddesses of the arts and sciences, and to Phoebus (Apollo), god of sunlight, prophecy, music, and poetry.
9. The winged horse Pegasus made the Hippocrene spring ("wells," line 20) for the Muses by striking his hoof on the ground.
1. I.e., the evergreen garland symbolizing a poet's superiority.
2. Pallas Athena, goddess of wisdom.

Whilst the Latin, queen of tongues,
35 Is not yet free from rhyme's wrongs,
But rests foiled.
Scarce the hill again doth flourish,
Scarce the world a wit doth nourish,
To restore
40 Phoebus to his crown again;
And the Muses to their brain;
As before.
Vulgar[3] languages that want
Words, and sweetness, and be scant
45 Of true measure,
Tyrant rhyme hath so abused,
That they long since have refused,
Other cesure.° caesura
He that first invented thee,
50 May his joints tormented be,
Cramp'd for ever;
Still may syllabes jar with time,
Still may reason war with rhyme,
Resting never!
55 May his sense when it would meet
The cold tumor in his feet,
Grow unsounder;
And his title be long fool,[4]
That in rearing such a school
60 Was the founder!

1616? 1640–41

A Hymn to God the Father[5]

Hear me, O God!
A broken heart,
Is my best part;
Use still thy rod,[6]
5 That I may prove° experience
Therein thy love.

If thou hadst not
Been stern to me,
But left me free,
10 I had forgot
Myself and thee.

For sin's so sweet,
As° minds ill bent that

3. Vernacular, as opposed to Latin.
4. A play on the Latin saying ars longa, vita brevis (art is long, life short).
5. Cf. John Donne's poem with the same title (p. 321).
6. I.e., punishment.

Rarely repent,
15 Until they meet
Their punishment.

Who more can crave
Than thou hast done,
That gav'st a Son,[7]
20 To free a slave?
First made of naught,
With all since bought.[8]

Sin, Death, and Hell,
His glorious Name
25 Quite overcame,
Yet I rebel,
And slight the same.

But I'll come in
Before my loss
30 Me farther toss,
As sure to win
Under his Cross.

1640–41

Her Triumph[9]

See the chariot at hand here of Love,
Wherein my lady rideth!
Each that draws is a swan or a dove,[1]
And well the care Love guideth.
5 As she goes, all hearts do duty
Unto her beauty;
And, enamored, do wish, so they might
But enjoy such a sight,
That they still° were to run by her side, always 10 Through[2] swords, through seas, whither° she would ride. wherever

Do but look on her eyes; they do light
All that Love's world compriseth!
Do but look on her hair; it is bright
As Love's star[3] when it riseth!

7. I.e., who could crave more than what God ("thou") has already done, in giving his "Son" (Christ).
8. I.e., redeemed by Christ.
9. Published after Jonson's death, in "A Celebration of Charis in Ten Lyric Pieces"; although Jonson may have arranged these lyrics as they stand, they were (probably) not composed as a unit. The Greek word charis means "grace" or "loveliness"; the three Graces, sister goddesses in Greek mythology who gave charm and beauty, are Charites. "Charis" is also related to the Latin term for love, caritas, and is an obsolete form of "cherish." Triumph: following Petrarch, many Renaissance poets used the image of the triumphal procession to celebrate a person or concept (such as chastity, time, etc.).
1. Venus ("Love"), goddess of love and beauty, drove a chariot drawn by swans or doves.
2. Here pronounced as two syllables (often spelled "thorough").
3. I.e., Venus.

15 Do but mark, her forehead's smoother
Than words that soothe her!
And from her arched brows, such a grace
Sheds itself through the face,
As alone there triumphs to the life
20 All the gain, all the good, of the elements' strife.[4]

Have you seen but a bright lily grow,
Before rude hands have touched it?
Ha' you marked but the fall o' the snow
Before the soil hath smutched° it? smudged
25 Ha' you felt the wool o' the beaver?
Or swan's down ever?
Or have smelt o' the bud o' the brier?
Or the nard[5] in the fire?
Or have tasted the bag° o' the bee? sack of honey
30 O so white, O so soft, O so sweet is she!

1640–41

An Elegy[6]

Though beauty be the mark of praise,
And yours of whom I sing be such
As not the world can praise too much,
Yet is 't your virtue now I raise.

5 A virtue, like allay,° so gone alloy
Throughout your form, as, though that[7] move
And draw and conquer all men's love,
This[8] sùbjects you to love of one.

Wherein you triumph yet; because
10 'Tis of yourself, and that you use
The noblest freedom, not to choose
Against or faith or honor's laws.

But who should less expect from you,
In whom alone Love[9] lives again?
15 By whom he is restored to men,
And kept, and bred,[1] and brought up true.

His falling temples you have reared,
The withered garlands ta'en away;

4. The four elements (earth, water, air, and fire) were thought to be constantly at war; according to Platonic theory, heavenly harmony reconciles the skirmishing elements.
5. Spikenard, an aromatic plant used in preparing incense (as here) and perfumes.
6. Originally, the term meant a poem written in elegiac meter; in English tradition, an elegy dealt either with love or (increasingly from the seventeenth century on) with grief for a dead person.
7. I.e., your beauty.
8. I.e., your virtue.
9. I.e., Cupid, Roman god of erotic love.
1. Educated, or properly trained.

His altars kept from the decay
20 That envy wished, and nature feared;

And on them burn so chaste a flame,
With so much loyalties' expense,
As Love, t' acquit[2] such excellence,
Is gone himself into your name.[3]

25 And you are he; the deity
To whom all lovers are designed
That would their better objects find;
Among which faithful troop am I.

Who, as an offspring[4] at your shrine,
30 Have sung this hymn, and here entreat
One spark of your diviner heat
To light upon a love of mine.

Which, if it kindle not, but scant
Appear, and that to shortest view,
35 Yet give me leave t' adore in you
What I in her am grieved to want.

1640–41

An Ode to Himself[5]

Where dost thou careless lie
Buried in ease and sloth?
Knowledge that sleeps doth die;
And this security,° overconfidence
5 It is the common moth
That eats on wits and arts, and oft destroys them both.

Are all th' Aonian springs
Dried up? Lies Thespia waste?[6]
Doth Clarius' harp[7] want strings,
10 That not a nymph[8] now sings;
Or droop they as disgraced,
To see their seats and bowers by chattering pies[9] defaced?

If hence thy silence be,
As 'tis too just a cause,
15 Let this thought quicken thee:

2. I.e., to reward.
3. I.e., the lady's name includes the letters of "love." Based on this hint, some scholars have suggested Lady Covell as the person addressed.
4. Possibly a misprint for offering.
5. A Horatian ode (see "Versification," p. 2048).
6. Aonia was the region in Greece near Mt. Helicon, home of the nine Muses, Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts. Thespia, a town near Helicon, was the center of the cult of the Muses.
7. The lyre of Apollo, god of music and poetry (from his temple at Clarus, on the Ionian coast.)
8. A minor nature goddess.
9. The Muses changed the nine daughters of King Pierus into magpies for challenging their supremacy in poetry.

Minds that are great and free
Should not on fortune pause;
'Tis crown enough to virtue still, her own applause.

What though the greedy fry[1]
20 Be taken with false baits
Of worded balladry,
And think it poesy?° poetry
They die with their conceits,
And only piteous scorn upon their folly waits.

25 Then take in hand thy lyre,
Strike in thy proper strain,
With Japhet's line,[2] aspire
Sol's chariot[3] for new fire
To give the world again;
30 Who aided him will thee, the issue of Jove's brain.[4]

And since our dainty age
Cannot endure reproof,
Make not thyself a page
To that strumpet the stage,
35 But sing high and aloof,
Safe from the wolve's black jaw, and the dull ass's hoof.

1640

To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of That Noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary and Sir Henry Morison[5]

The Turn[6]

Brave infant of Saguntum,[7] clear° explain or describe
Thy coming forth in that great year,
When the prodigious Hannibal did crown
His rage with razing your immortal town.
5 Thou, looking then about,
Ere thou wert half got out,

1. Youth, with a pun on "fry" as young fishes.
2. Prometheus, the son of Iapetus, stole fire from the gods for the benefit of humankind.
3. I.e., ascend to the sun (Sol being the Roman god of the sun).
4. Minerva (Greek Athena), goddess of wisdom, who was said to have sprung fully grown from the head of her father, Jove.
5. Morison (ca. 1608–1629) was knighted in 1627; he died of smallpox. His and Jonson's good friend Lucius Cary (1609 or 1610–1643), who married Morison's sister in 1630, was killed at the battle of Newbury in September 1643, fighting for the Royalist cause.
6. Unlike other "odes" by Jonson modeled on Horace's Odes (see, e.g., "An Ode to Himself," above), this one is modeled on a poetic structure used by the Greek poet Pindar (ca. 522–ca. 438 B.C.E). Pindar's odes are typically arranged in groups of three stanzas (strophe, antistrophe, and epode) designed to be sung by a chorus; the chorus moved in one direction while chanting the strophe, reversed direction for the antistrophe, and stood still for the epode. Jonson's "turn," "counterturn," and "stand" (more or less translated from the Greek terms) imitate Pindar's pattern. As in Pindar, the metrical pattern of the turn is repeated in the counterturn, then varied in the stand. The pattern of these first three stanzas is then repeated exactly in the remaining sets of stanzas.
7. A town sacked by Hannibal in 219 B.C.E. The Roman naturalist Pliny the Elder (23–79 C.E.) records the story of a "brave infant," who returned to his mother's womb upon witnessing the city's destruction.

Wise child, didst hastily return,
And mad'st thy mother's womb thine urn.[8]
How summed a circle[9] didst thou leave mankind
10 Of deepest lore, could we the center find!

The Counterturn

Did wiser Nature draw thee back
From out the horror of that sack,
Where shame, faith, honor, and regard of right
Lay trampled on; the deeds of death and night
15 Urged, hurried forth, and hurled
Upon th' affrighted world;
Sword, fire, and famine, with fell fury met,
And all on utmost ruin set,
As, could they but life's miseries foresee,
20 No doubt all infants would return like thee?

The Stand

For what is life, if measured by the space,[1]
Not by the act?
Or maskèd man, if valued by his face
Above his fact?° — deed
25 Here's one outlived his peers
And told forth fourscore years;
He vexèd time and busied the whole state,
Troubled both foes and friends;
But ever to no ends:
30 What did this stirrer but die late?
How well at twenty had he fall'n or stood!
For three of his fourscore he did no good.

The Turn

He[2] entered well, by virtuous parts,
Got up and thrived with honest arts;
35 He purchased friends, and fame, and honors then,
And had his noble name advanced with men;
But weary of that flight
He stooped in all men's sight
To sordid flatteries, acts of strife,
40 And sunk in that dead sea of life
So deep, as he did then death's waters sup,° — taste
But that the cork of title buoyed him up.

The Counterturn

Alas, but Morison fell young;
He never fell, thou fall'st,[3] my tongue.

8. I.e., tomb.
9. Emblem of perfection. Summed: complete.
1. I.e., by the length of time.
2. I.e., another man, a separate example.
3. Slip, with a possible pun on the Latin fallere (to make a mistake).

45 He stood, a soldier to the last right end,
A perfect patriot, and a noble friend,
But most a virtuous son.
All offices° were done — duties in life
By him so ample, full, and round,
50 In weight, in measure, number, sound,
As, though his age imperfect° might appear, — incomplete
His life was of humanity the sphere.[4]

The Stand

Go now, and tell out days summed up with fears,
And make them years;
55 Produce thy mass of miseries on the stage
To swell thine age;
Repeat of things a throng,
To show thou hast been long,
Not lived; for life doth her great actions spell° — tell over
60 By what was done and wrought
In season, and so brought
To light: her measures are, how well
Each syllabe° answered, and was formed how fair; — syllable
These make the lines of life, and that's her air.[5]

The Turn

65 It is not growing like a tree
In bulk doth make man better be;
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sere:° — withered
A lily of a day
70 Is fairer far in May;
Although it fall and die that night,
It was the plant and flower of light.
In small proportions we just beauties see,
And in short measures life may perfect be.

The Counterturn

75 Call, noble Lucius, then for wine,
And let thy looks with gladness shine;
Accept this garland, plant it on thy head,
And think, nay know, thy Morison's not dead.
He leaped the present age,
80 Possessed with holy rage
To see that bright eternal day;
Of which we priests and poets say
Such truths as we expect for happy men,
And there he lives with memory, and Ben

4. I.e., the perfect model.
5. I.e., life's "measures" are its metrical patterns and the standards by which it is judged. Air: melody, song.

The Stand

85 Jonson! who sung this of him, ere he went
Himself to rest,
Or taste a part of that full joy he meant
To have expressed
In this bright asterism;° constellation
90 Where it were friendship's schism
(Were not his Lucius long with us to tarry)
To separate these twi-
Lights, the Dioscuri,[6]
And keep the one half from his Harry.
95 But fate doth so altérnate the design,
Whilst that in heaven, this light on earth must shine.

The Turn

And shine as you exalted are,
Two names of friendship, but one star:
Of hearts the union. And those not by chance
100 Made, or indenture,° or leased out t'advance contracted for
The profits for a time.
No pleasures vain did chime
Of rimes, or riots, at your feasts,
Orgies of drink, or feigned protests,° protestations
105 But simple love of greatness and of good;
That knits brave minds and manners more than blood.

The Counterturn

This made you first to know the why
You liked, then after to apply
That liking, and approach so one the tother,° other
110 Till either grew a portion of the other:
Each styled by his end
The copy of his friend.
You lived to be the great surnames
And titles by which all made claims
115 Unto the virtue. Nothing perfect done,
But as a Cary, or a Morison.

The Stand

And such a force the fair example had,
As they that saw
The good, and durst not practice it, were glad 120 That such a law
Was left yet to mankind;

6. Or Castor and Pollux, in Greek mythology the twin sons of Zeus, famous for brotherly devotion. When Castor was killed, Zeus granted Pollux's prayer that he be allowed to share his life with his brother; henceforward each lived half the time on Earth and half in heaven. Their constellation is Gemini, the Twins.

Where they might read and find
Friendship, indeed, was written, not in words;
And with the heart, not pen,
125 Of two so early° men, young
Whose lines her rolls were, and recòrds,
Who, ere the first down bloomèd on the chin,[7]
Had sowed these fruits, and got the harvest in.

Still to Be Neat[8]

Still to be neat, still to be dressed,
As you were going to a feast;
Still to be powdered, still perfumed;
Lady, it is to be presumed,
5 Though art's hid causes are not found,
All is not sweet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free;
10 Such sweet neglect more taketh me
Then all th' adulteries of art.
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.

Though I Am Young and Cannot Tell[9]

Though I am young, and cannot tell
Either what Death or Love is well,
Yet I have heard they both bear darts,
And both do aim at human hearts.
5 And then again, I have been told
Love wounds with heat, as Death with cold;
So that I fear they do but bring
Extremes to touch, and mean one thing.

As in a ruin we it call
10 One thing to be blown up, or fall;
Or to our end like way may have
By a flash of lightning, or a wave;

7. I.e., before they had grown beards.
8. From Jonson's play Epicoene, the Silent Woman 1.1 (1609). Sung by a servant upon Clerimont's request; Clerimont is irritated with the Lady Haughty, who, he says, overdoes the art of makeup. The lyric perhaps derives from an anonymous Latin poem in the Anthologia latina (sixteenth century).
9. From Jonson's play The Sad Shepherd 1.5 (1640). The monosyllables of the poem echo the pastoral simplicity of the character Karalin, who sings it.

So Love's inflamèd shaft or brand
May kill as soon as Death's cold hand;
15 Except Love's fires the virtue have
To fright the frost out of the grave.

To the Memory of My Beloved, the Author Mr. William Shakespeare

And What He Hath Left Us[1]

To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name,
Am I thus ample[2] to thy book and fame,
While I confess thy writings to be such
As neither man nor Muse[3] can praise too much.
5 'Tis true, and all men's suffrage.° But these ways — consent
Were not the paths I meant unto thy praise:
For silliest° ignorance on these may light, — simplest
Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right;
Or blind affection,° which doth ne'er advance — feeling
10 The truth, but gropes, and urgeth all by chance;
Or crafty malice might pretend this praise,
And think to ruin where it seemed to raise.
These are as° some infamous bawd or whore — as if
Should praise a matron.[4] What could hurt her more?
15 But thou art proof against them, and, indeed,
Above th' ill fortune of them, or the need.
I therefore will begin. Soul of the age!
The applause! delight! the wonder of our stage!
My Shakespeare, rise; I will not lodge thee by 20 Chaucer or Spenser, or bid Beaumont lie[5]
A little further to make thee a room:
Thou art a monument without a tomb,
And art alive still while thy book doth live,
And we have wits to read and praise to give.
25 That I not mix thee so, my brain excuses,
I mean with great, but disproportioned Muses;[6]
For, if I thought my judgment were of years,[7]
I should commit° thee surely with thy peers, — unite, connect
And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine,
30 Or sporting Kyd, or Marlowe's mighty line.[8]
And though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek,[9]

1. Prefixed to the first collected edition—the First Folio—of Shakespeare's plays, 1623.
2. Copious, i.e., in this relatively long poem.
3. Source of inspiration.
4. A married woman with moral and social dignity.
5. All three authors—Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1340–1400), Edmund Spenser (ca. 1552–1599), Francis Beaumont (1584–1616)—are buried in Westminster Abbey, London. Shakespeare is buried in the Holy Trinity Church, Stratford-on-Avon (see "Avon," line 71).
6. I.e., that I do not place you with the other authors, whose poetry is "great" but still not comparable ("disproportioned") with your poetry.
7. I.e., over an extended period of time.
8. John Lyly (1554–1606), Thomas Kyd (1558–1594), and Christopher Marlowe (1564–1593), all Elizabethan dramatists; with "sporting" as "playing," activating the pun in Kyd's name (kid, baby goat).
9. By modern standards, Shakespeare had an adequate command of Latin (as well as French and Italian), but he lacked Jonson's knowledge of classical literature.

From thence to honor thee I would not seek° — lack
For names, but call forth thund'ring Aeschylus,
Euripides, and Sophocles to us,
35 Pacuvius, Accius, him of Cordova dead,[1]
To life again, to hear thy buskin[2] tread
And shake a stage; or, when thy socks were on,
Leave thee alone for the comparison
Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
40 Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.
Triumph, my Britain; thou hast one to show
To whom all scenes° of Europe homage owe. — stages
He was not of an age, but for all time!
And all the Muses still were in their prime
45 When like Apollo he came forth to warm
Our ears, or like a Mercury[3] to charm.
Nature herself was proud of his designs,
And joyed to wear the dressing of his lines,
Which were so richly spun, and woven so fit,
50 As, since, she will vouchsafe no other wit:
The merry Greek, tart Aristophanes,
Neat Terence, witty Plautus[4] now not please,
But antiquated and deserted lie,
As they were not of Nature's family.
55 Yet must I not give Nature all; thy Art,
My gentle Shakespeare, must enjoy a part.
For though the poet's matter Nature be,
His Art doth give the fashion;° and that he — form, style
Who casts° to write a living line must sweat — undertakes
60 (Such as thine are) and strike the second heat
Upon the Muses' anvil; turn the same,
And himself with it, that he thinks to frame,
Or for the laurel[5] he may gain a scorn;
For a good poet's made as well as born.
65 And such wert thou! Look how the father's face
Lives in his issue, even so the race
Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines
In his well-turnèd and true-filèd° lines, — well-polished
In each of which he seems to shake a lance,[6]
70 As brandished at the eyes of ignorance.
Sweet swan of Avon, what a sight it were
To see thee in our waters yet appear,
And make those flights upon the banks of Thames
That so did take Eliza and our James![7]
75 But stay; I see thee in the hemisphere
Advanced and made a constellation there!

1. I.e., Seneca, Roman tragedian of the first century C.E.; Marcus Pacuvius and Lucius Accius were Roman tragedians of the second century B.C.E. Aeschylus (525–456 B.C.E.), Euripides (ca. 484–406 B.C.E.), and Sophocles (ca. 496–406 B.C.E.) were all Greek dramatists.
2. The high-heeled boot worn by Greek tragic actors; the "sock" (line 37), or light shoe, was worn in comedies.
3. Roman god associated with good luck and enchantment. Apollo: the classical god of sunlight, prophecy, music, and poetry.
4. Aristophanes (Greek) and Terence and Plautus (Roman) were comic writers of the fourth to second centuries B.C.E.
5. As in the crowns of laurel that honored ancient Greek poets.
6. With a pun on Shake-speare (also see line 37).
7. I.e., to travel on the river banks as did Queen Elizabeth and King James.

Shine forth, thou star of poets, and with rage
Or influence[8] chide or cheer the drooping stage,
Which, since thy flight from hence, hath mourned like night,
80 And despairs day, but for thy volume's light.

A Sonnet to the Noble Lady, the Lady Mary Wroth[9]

I that have been a lover, and could show it,
Though not in these,[1] in rithmes not wholly dumb,
Since I exscribe° your sonnets, am become — copy out
A better lover, and much better poet.
5 Nor is my Muse[2] or I ashamed to owe it
To those true numerous graces, whereof some
But charm the senses, others overcome
Both brains and hearts; and mine now best do know it:
For in your verse all Cupid's[3] armory,
10 His flames, his shafts, his quiver, and his bow,
His very eyes are yours to overthrow.
But then his mother's sweets you so apply,
Her joys, her smiles, her loves, as readers take
For Venus' ceston° every line you make. — girdle

1640–41

Slow, Slow, Fresh Fount[4]

Slow, slow, fresh fount, keep time with my salt tears;
Yet slower, yet, O faintly, gentle springs!
List to the heavy part the music bears,
Woe weeps out her division,[5] when she sings.
5 Droop herbs and flowers;
Fall grief in showers;
Our beauties are not ours.
O, I could still,
Like melting snow upon some craggy hill,
10 Drop, drop, drop, drop,
Since nature's pride is now a withered daffodil.

1600

8. "Rage" and "influence" describe a supposed emanation of power from the stars, affecting Earth's events. "Rage" also implies poetic inspiration.
9. English poet (1587?–1651?; see pp. 347–53), to whom Jonson dedicated his play The Alchemist (1610). As the niece of Sir Philip Sidney and of Mary Sidney, Wroth was a potential patron for Jonson, who also wrote a flattering poem to her husband, Sir Robert Wroth.
1. I.e., the sonnet form, typically used for love poetry but not by Jonson. (This is his only sonnet; by using the form here, he pays homage to Mary Wroth's accomplishments in her sonnet sequence, Pamphilia to Amphilanthus.)
2. Source of poetic inspiration.
3. Roman god of erotic love; son of Venus, goddess of love and beauty.
4. From Jonson's play Cynthia's Revels 5.6 (1600). Inspired by classical mythology, the play deals satirically with the sin of self-love; this song is sung by Echo for Narcissus, who fell in love with his own reflection and was changed into the flower that bears his name. The daffodil (line 11) is a species of narcissus. Fount: spring.
5. Part in a song, as well as grief at parting.

Queen and Huntress[6]

Queen and huntress, chaste and fair,
Now the sun is laid to sleep,
Seated in thy silver chair,
State in wonted manner keep;
5 Hesperus entreats thy light,
Goddess excellently bright.

Earth, let not thy envious shade
Dare itself to interpose;[7]
Cynthia's shining orb was made
10 Heaven to clear, when day did close.
Bless us then with wishéd sight,
Goddess excellently bright.

Lay thy bow of pearl apart,
And thy crystal-shining quiver;
15 Give unto the flying hart[8]
Space to breathe, how short soever.
Thou that mak'st a day of night,
Goddess excellently bright.

JOHN FLETCHER
1579–1625

Take, Oh, Take Those Lips Away[1]

Take, oh, take those lips away
That so sweetly were forsworn
And those eyes, like break of day,
Lights that do mislead the morn;
5 But my kisses bring again,
Seals of love, though sealed in vain.

Hide, oh, hide those hills of snow,
Which thy frozen bosom bears,
On whose tops the pinks that grow
10 Are of those that April wears;
But first set my poor heart free,
Bound in those icy chains by thee.

1639

6. From Cynthia's Revels 5.6 (1600). This lyric is sung by Hesperus, the evening star, to Cynthia (also known as Diana), goddess of the moon and of the hunt. Cynthia was often identified with Queen Elizabeth (1533–1603; see pp. 142–43) by poets of this period.

7. Eclipses were seen as evil portents.

8. A pun on "hart" (as deer) and heart.

1. The first stanza of this song appears as a complete poem in Shakespeare's play Measure for Measure (1604–05), from which Fletcher likely appropriated it.

EDWARD HERBERT
1582–1648

Sonnet of Black Beauty

Black beauty, which above that common light,
  Whose power can no colors here renew
  But those which darkness can again subdue,
Do'st still remain unvary'd to the sight,

5 And like an object equal to the view,
  Art neither chang'd with day, nor hid with night;
  When all these colors which the world call bright,
And which old poetry doth so persue,

Are with the night to perishéd and gone,
10 That of their being there remains no mark,
Thou still abidest so entirely one,
  That we may know thy blackness is a spark
Of light inaccessible, and alone
  Our darkness which can make us think it dark.[1]

1620 1665

Another Sonnet to Black Itself

Thou Black, wherein all colors are compos'd,
  And unto which they all at last return,
  Thou color of the sun where it doth burn,
And shadow, where it cools, in thee is clos'd
5 Whatever nature can, or hath dispos'd
  In any other hue: from thee do rise
Those tempers and complexions, which disclos'd,
  As parts of thee, do work as mysteries,
Of that thy hidden power; when thou dost reign
10 The characters of fate shine in the skies,
And tell us what the heavens do ordain,[2]
  But when earth's common light shines to our eyes,
Thou so retir'st thy self, that thy disdain
  All revelation unto man denies.[3]

1620 1665

1. I.e., it is only our moral blindness that can make us think things are dark.
2. I.e., the stars, "characters of fate," can be read to foretell the future.
3. I.e., in the bright light of day, the stars cannot be read, and the future is not revealed.

MARY WROTH
1587–1651?

From Pamphilia to Amphilanthus[1]

When night's black mantle could most darkness prove,
And sleep death's image did my senses hire° — engage
From knowledge of my self, then thoughts did move
Swifter than those most swiftness need require:

5 In sleep, a chariot drawn by wing'd desire
I saw: where sat bright Venus, queen of love,[2]
And at her feet her son,[3] still adding fire
To burning hearts which she did hold above;

But one heart flaming more than all the rest
10 The goddess held, and put it to my breast;
"Dear son, now shut,"[4] said she: "thus must we win";

He her obeyed, and martyred my poor heart;
I, waking, hoped as dreams it[5] would depart;
Yet since—O me—a lover I have been.

Yet is there hope: then Love° but play thy part; — Cupid
Remember well thy self, and think on me;
Shine in those eyes which conquered have my heart;
And see if mine be slack[6] to answer thee:

5 Lodge in that breast, and pity moving see,
For flames which in mine burn in truest smart,[7]
Exiling thoughts that touch inconstancy,
Or those which waste not in the constant art;[8]

1. Mary Wroth wrote the first work of prose fiction by an Englishwoman, her long but unfinished The Countess of Montgomery's Urania. Including a number of poems and modeled on her uncle Sir Philip Sidney's romance, Arcadia (ca. 1580), Wroth's text covertly alludes to various personages and scandals of the Jacobean court, and was met with a storm of criticism when part 1 was published in 1621. Appended to Urania is Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, a sonnet sequence (the only one by an Englishwoman of her time) consisting of eighty-three sonnets and twenty songs. Pamphilia (Latin, "All-loving") is the protagonist of Urania; Amphilanthus (Latin, "Lover of two") is her unfaithful beloved. Their names reflect the main theme of both the romance and the appended sonnet sequence—constancy in the face of unfaithfulness. Pamphilia to Amphilanthus is divided into several separately numbered series (the first of which includes forty-eight sonnets, with songs inserted after every sixth sonnet). We follow the ordering of the 1621 print version of the Urania, as reproduced and discussed in Josephine A. Roberts's edition of Wroth's poems.

2. Traditionally, Venus, Roman goddess of love and beauty, was represented in a chariot drawn by doves.

3. Cupid, god of erotic love.

4. I.e., enclose the flaming heart in Pamphilia's breast; by implication, her breast is also being cruelly opened, with a love wound like Amoret's in the climactic episode of Spenser's Faerie Queene 3.12.2–21.

5. I.e., the vision of Venus and Cupid.

6. Lacking in energy or diligence.

7. I.e., house yourself in my beloved's breast, and see him moved by pity for the flames that burn in my breast with truest pain.

8. I.e., exile [also] those thoughts that do not waste away in the art (discipline, pursuit) of constancy.

Watch but my sleep, if I take any rest
10 For thoughts of you, my spirit so distressed,
As pale, and famished, I for mercy cry;

Will you your servant leave? Think but on this:
Who wears love's crown,[9] must not do so amiss,
But seek their good, who on thy force do lie.° rely

11

You endless torments that my rest oppress,
How long will you delight in my sad pain?
Will never love your favor more express?[1]
Shall I still live, and ever feel disdain?

5 Alas now stay,° and let my grief obtain refrain from acting
Some end; feed not my heart with sharp distress:
Let me once see my cruel fortune's gain
At least release, and long felt woes redress;

Let not the blame of cruelty disgrace
10 The honored title of your Godhead,° Love:° deity / Cupid
Give not just cause for me to say a place
Is found for rage alone on me to move;[2]

O quickly end, and do not long debate
My needful aid, least° help do come too late. lest

22

Like to the Indians, scorchèd with the sun,[3]
The sun which they do as their God adore,
So am I used by love, for ever more
I worship him, less favors have I won;[4]

5 Better are they who thus to blackness run,
And so can only whiteness' want deplore[5]
Than I who pale, and white am with griefs' store,
Nor can have hope, but to see hopes undone;[6]

9. The "crown" of love, a sign of Cupid's power as an absolute ruler, recurs in many later poems in Wroth's sequence and provides the key formal principle for the set of linked sonnets (the corona) with which Pamphilia to Amphilanthus closes.
1. Ambiguous syntax: "your" could refer to the initial addressee, "torments," i.e., will love not make you (endless torments) show more favor to me; alternatively, "your" could refer to "love," with the implied addressee shifting so that the poet is now asking a personified love to express his "favor" to the speaker more than he has in the past.
2. I.e., do not give me just cause to say either that rage is the only emotion I can feel or that I am the only "place" where rage moves or acts.
3. Some early modern thinkers attributed Native Americans' and Africans' skin colors to the tanning power of the tropical sun.
4. I.e., as I worship love more, I receive less in terms of love's benefits.
5. I.e., can only deplore the lack of whiteness (though there may also be a sense, if "want" is taken to mean "desire" rather than "lack," that the desire for whiteness is being deplored).
6. I.e., I cannot have any hope except the (paradoxical) one of seeing my hopes undone.

Besides their sacrifice received's in sight
10 Of their chose° saint, mine hid as worthless rite;[7] chosen
Grant me to see where I my off'rings give,

Then let me wear the mark of Cupid's might
In heart as they in skin of Phoebus' light,[8]
Not ceasing off'rings to love while I live.

25

Poor eyes be blind, the light behold no more
Since that is gone which is your dear delight,
Ravished from you by greater pow'r, and might,
Making your loss a gain to others' store;

5 O'erflow, and drown, till sight to you restore
That blessed star,[9] and as in hateful spite
Send forth your tears in floods, to kill all sight,
And looks, that lost,[1] wherein you joyed before.

Bury these beams, which in some° kindled fires, some people
10 And conquered have their love-burnt-hearts' desires,
Losing, and yet no gain by you esteemed,

Till that bright star do once again appear
Brighter than Mars when he doth shine most clear;
See not: then by his might, be you redeemed.

37

Night, welcome art thou to my mind distressed
Dark, heavy, sad, yet not more sad than I;
Never could'st thou find fitter company
For thine own humor than I thus oppressed.

5 If thou beest dark, my wrongs still unredressed° unremedied
Saw never light, nor smallest bliss can spy;
If heavy, joy from me too fast doth hie° hurry away
And care outgoes my hope of quiet rest,

Then now in friendship join with hapless me,
10 Who am as sad, and dark as thou canst be
Hating all pleasure, or delight of life;

7. I.e., besides, their sacrifice is received in sight of their chosen saint, whereas my sacrifice is hidden as a ritual (but also a "right") considered worthless.
8. The light of the sun (Phoebus being Apollo, the classical god of sunlight); the speaker prays to be allowed to see the object of her worship (as the Indians do) and to have the mark or sign of Cupid's power in her heart as the Indians have the sign of the sun's power on their skin.
9. Here and in line 12, the speaker refers to her beloved as a star and thus substitutes him for the planet Venus, traditionally linked to the planet Mars because Venus was the lover of the Roman god of war, Mars.
1. I.e., since that is lost (or, that being lost).

Silence, and grief, with thee I best do love
And from you three, I know I can not move,
Then let us live companions without strife.

39

If I were giv'n to mirth, 'twould° be more cross — it would
Thus to be robbed of my chiefest joy;
But silently I bear my greatest loss;
Who's used to sorrow, grief will not destroy;

5 Nor can I as° those pleasant wits enjoy — like
My own framed words, which I account the dross
Of purer thoughts, or reckon them as moss
While they (wit-sick) themselves to breath employ;

Alas, think I, your plenty shows your want,
10 For where most feeling is, words are more scant,
Yet pardon me, live, and your pleasure take,

Grudge not, if I, neglected, envy show;
'T'is not to you[2] that I dislike do owe,
But crossed myself, wish some like me to make.

74

SONG

Love a child is ever crying,[3]
Please him, and he straight is flying,
Give him, he the more is craving[4]
Never satisfied with having;

5 His desires have no measure,
Endless folly is his treasure,
What he promiseth he breaketh
Trust not one word that he speaketh;

He vows nothing but false matter,
10 And to cozen you he'll flatter,[5]
Let him gain the hand° he'll leave you, — upper hand
And still glory to deceive you;

He will triumph in your wailing,
And yet cause be of your failing,
15 These his virtues are, and slighter
Are his gifts, his favors lighter,

2. I.e., the writer's own words (though possibly the person who inspired the poem).
3. Although depicting love as Cupid was a Renaissance commonplace, a "crying" Cupid is unusual; in this section of her sonnet sequence, Wroth uses the image to explore Pamphilia's frustration in love.
4. I.e., the more he is given, the more he craves.
5. I.e., to deceive or cheat ("cozen") you, he'll flatter you.

Feathers are as firm in staying
Wolves no fiercer in their praying.
As a child then leave him crying
20 Nor seek him° so given to flying.° he who is / leaving

From A Crown of Sonnets Dedicated to Love[6]

77

In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?
Ways° are on all sides, while the way I miss: paths
If to the right hand, there in love I burn;
Let me[7] go forward, therein danger is;

5 If to the left, suspicion hinders bliss,
Let me turn back, shame cries I ought return,
Nor faint,[8] though crosses° with my fortunes kiss; troubles, adversity
Stand still is harder, although sure to° mourn. to make me

Thus let me take the right, or left hand way,
10 Go forward, or stand still, or back retire:
I must these doubts endure without allay° alleviation
Or help, but travail find for my best hire.[9]

Yet that which most my troubled sense doth move,
Is to leave all and take the thread of Love.[1]

78

Is to leave all and take the thread of Love,
Which line straight leads unto the soul's content,
Where choice delights with pleasure's wings do move,
And idle fant'sy never room had lent.[2]

6. The "crown" is a complex poetic form, in which the last line of each poem serves as the first line of the next poem, until a circle is completed by the last line of the final poem, which is the same as the first line of the sequence. It was originally an Italian form that could be used to praise or condemn (and is often known by its Italian name, corona); various kinds of poems could be used for the sequence, with the number of poems ranging from seven to fourteen (as in Wroth's crown of fourteen sonnets).
Sir Philip Sidney, Wroth's uncle, included one of the first examples of the crown in English in the first version of his prose romance, known as the Old Arcadia; her father, Sir Robert Sidney, wrote an incomplete crown thought to be in praise of a specific lady. Wroth, however, dedicates her crown more generally to "Love"; in a temporary recantation of the harsh judgment of love depicted in the preceding part of the Pamphilia to Amphilanthus sequence, Love is here portrayed as a monarch whose true service ennobles lovers. The crown includes sonnets 77–90 of the original sequence as numbered in the only manuscript in Wroth's hand, which is now in the Folger Shakespeare Library, Washington, D.C.

7. I.e., if I.

8. Lose heart; Wroth occasionally uses "nor" without including other negatives.

9. I.e., I find hard labor (or suffering) to be the reward for my best efforts. Instead of "traveile" (Folger Library manuscript), the 1621 edition prints "travell."

1. An allusion to the Greek myth in which Ariadne, defying her father, gave Theseus a thread to unwind behind him in the labyrinth at Crete. After killing the Minotaur, he was able to find his way out by following the thread; shortly thereafter, he abandoned Ariadne.

2. I.e., where room or space had never been loaned to idle fantasy.

5 When chaste thoughts guide us, then our minds are bent
To take that good which ills from us remove:
Light of true love brings fruit which none repent;
But constant lovers seek and wish to prove.° try

Love is the shining star of blessing's light,
10 The fervent fire of zeal, the root of peace,
The lasting lamp, fed with the oil of right,
Image of faith, and womb for joy's increase.° children

Love is true virtue, and his end's delight,
His flames are joys, his bands true lover's might.[3]

82

He[4] may our prophet, and our tutor prove,
In whom alone we do this power find,
To join two hearts as in one frame to move;
Two bodies, but one soul to rule the mind.[5]

5 Eyes which must care to one dear object bind,
Ears to each others' speech as if above
All else, they sweet, and learned were; this kind
Content of lovers witnesseth true love.

It doth enrich the wits, and make you see
10 That in your self which you knew not before,
Forcing you to admire such gifts should be
Hid from your knowledge, yet in you the store.

Millions of these adorn the throne of Love,
How blest are they then, who his favors prove.° experience

85

But where they may return with honor's grace
Where° Venus' follies can no harbor win, there
But chasèd are as worthless of the face
Or style of love who hath lascivious been.[6]

5 Our hearts are subject to her son; where sin
Never did dwell, or rest one minute's space;[7]
What faults he hath, in her, did still begin,
And from her breast he sucked his fleeting pace;

3. I.e., Love's bands are the strength of true lovers, and not their shackles.
4. I.e., love personified.
5. Two hearts joined in one body, or two bodies joined in one soul; common Renaissance metaphors for true love.
6. In an extended analogy between sea voyaging and different kinds of love, this stanza contrasts those who love honorably with those who love lasciviously. The latter are "chasèd" from the safe harbor of virtue because they represent Venus's "follies" (lusts); they are unworthy of the true "face" or "style" of love. In describing such lovers as "worthless," Wroth may pun on her name; in her play Love's Victory, an undesirable suitor, who resembles Wroth's historical husband, Robert Wroth, is repeatedly called "worthless."
7. Wroth follows a tradition of distinguishing between Venus as a figure for lust and her son, Cupid, as a figure for chaste love, but the sharp contrast begins to erode in lines 7–8.

If lust be counted love, 'tis falsely named
10 By wickedness, a fairer gloss to set
Upon that vice,[8] which else makes men ashamed,
In the° own phrase to warrant but beget — its

This child for love, who ought like monster born
Be from the court of Love, and reason torn.[9]

From Urania

Song[1]

Love what art thou? A vain thought
In our minds by phant'sie° wrought, — fancy
Idle smiles did thee beget
While fond wishes made the net
5 Which so many fools have caught;

Love what art thou? light, and fair,
Fresh as morning, clear as th'air,
But too soon thy evening change
Makes thy worth with coldness range;
10 Still thy joy is mixed with care.

Love what art thou? A sweet flow'r
Once full blown, dead in an hour,
Dust in wind as staid° remains — steadfast
As thy pleasure, or our gains
15 If thy humor change to lour.° — gloomy

Love what art thou? childish, vain,
Firm as bubbles made by rain;
Wantonness thy greatest pride,
These foul faults thy virtues hide,
20 But babes can no staidness gain.

Love what art thou? causeless curse,
Yet alas these not the worst,
Much more of thee may be said
But thy law I once obeyed
25 Therefore say no more at first.

8. I.e., wickedness falsely renames lust as love to put a "fairer gloss" on the vice.
9. The syntax of lines 11–14 is difficult, and we have not attempted to clarify it by supplying modern punctuation marks; the phrase "the own," often used to denote "its own" in early modern English, seems to refer to "that vice" of lust which attempts to legitimize ("warrant," legally name as its own) an illegitimate son who should rightfully be seen as monstrous and hence banished from the "court" of Love, and from that of reason too, if the latter is separate from love, as the comma between them suggests. (Wroth had two illegitimate sons with her cousin William Herbert, the historical inspiration for the character Amphilanthus in the Urania.)
1. Sung at the end of book 1 by a "delicate Mayd" with a sweet voice who seems to have "falne out with Love"; on Wroth's long prose romance, see note 1, p. 347.

ROBERT HERRICK
1591–1674

The Argument of His Book[1]

I sing of brooks, of blossoms, birds, and bowers,
Of April, May, of June, and July flowers.
I sing of Maypoles, hock carts, wassails, wakes,[2]
Of bridegrooms, brides, and of their bridal cakes.
5 I write of youth, of love, and have access
By these to sing of cleanly wantonness.
I sing of dews, of rains, and, piece by piece,
Of balm, of oil, of spice, and ambergris.[3]
I sing of times trans-shifting, and I write
10 How roses first came red and lilies white.
I write of groves, of twilights, and I sing
The court of Mab[4] and of the fairy king.
I write of hell; I sing (and ever shall)
Of heaven, and hope to have it after all.

The Vine

I dreamed this mortal part of mine
Was metamorphosed to a vine,
Which crawling one and every way
Enthralled° my dainty Lucia.[5] imprisoned
5 Methought her long small° legs and thighs slender
I with my tendrils did surprise;
Her belly, buttocks, and her waist
By my soft nervelets° were embraced. tendrils
About her head I writhing hung,
10 And with rich clusters (hid among
The leaves) her temples I behung,
So that my Lucia seemed to me
Young Bacchus ravished by his tree.[6]
My curls about her neck did crawl,
15 And arms and hands they did enthrall,

1. The "argument" is the subject matter, and the "book" is a thick volume containing all of Herrick's poems—over fourteen hundred—divided into a religious set, titled Noble Numbers, and a secular set, titled Hesperides. In classical mythology, the Hesperides, daughters of Atlas and Hesperis (or, in another tradition, of Night), guarded a tree of golden apples in a far-western garden that Herrick often likens to his home in the western county of Devon.
Since all of Herrick's poems were published in 1648, we do not repeat the date for each poem.

2. Vigils on the eves of festivals or of funerals. Hock carts: vehicles for carrying in the last load of the harvest. Wassails: drinking to the health of others.

3. A waxlike substance used in making perfumes, i.e., something rare and pleasing.

4. In English mythology, queen of the fairies.

5. For the sake of rhyme and meter, the name has three syllables here but two in line 12.

6. Bacchus was the Roman god of wine and revelry; his "tree" is the grapevine.

So that she could not freely stir
(All parts there made one prisoner).
But when I crept with leaves to hide
Those parts which maids keep unespied,
20 Such fleeting pleasures there I took
That with the fancy I awoke;
And found (ah me!) this flesh of mine
More like a stock° than like a vine. hardened stem

To the Sour Reader

If thou dislik'st the piece thou light'st on first,
Think that of all that I have writ the worst;
But if thou read'st my book unto the end,
And still dost this and that verse reprehend,
5 O perverse man! If all disgustful be,
The extreme scab[7] take thee and thine, for me.

Delight in Disorder[8]

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness.
A lawn° about the shoulders thrown fine linen scarf
Into a fine distractiòn;
5 An erring lace, which here and there
Enthralls the crimson stomacher;[9]
A cuff neglectful, and thereby
Ribbons to flow confusedly;
A winning wave, deserving note,
10 In the tempestuous petticoat;
A careless shoestring, in whose tie
I see a wild civility;
Do more bewitch me than when art
Is too precise in every part.

7. The mange. "The extreme scab" is a borrowing from Horace's Art of Poetry (lines 416–18), in which an unpracticed dabbler in poetry is represented as saying, in the translation of Herrick's admired master, Ben Jonson (1572–1637; see pp. 323–44), "I make / An admirable verse: the great scab take / Him that is last, I scorn to come behind / Or, of the things that ne'er came in my mind, / Once say I'm ignorant. . . ."
8. Cf. Ben Jonson, "Still to Be Neat" (p. 341).
9. An ornamental piece worn under the open (and often laced) front of a bodice; the "erring" ("wandering," with an overtone of moral straying) lace thus "enthralls" (literally, makes a slave of) the stomacher.

Corinna's Going A-Maying

Get up! get up for shame! the blooming morn
Upon her wings presents the god unshorn.[1]
See how Aurora[2] throws her fair
Fresh-quilted colors through the air:
5 Get up, sweet slug-a-bed, and see
The dew bespangling herb and tree.
Each flower has wept and bowèd toward the east
Above an hour since, yet you not dressed;
Nay, not so much as out of bed?
10 When all the birds have matins° said, morning prayers
And sung their thankful hymns, 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,
Whenas a thousand virgins on this day
Spring, sooner than the lark, to fetch in May.[3]

15 Rise, and put on your foliage, and be seen
To come forth, like the springtime, fresh and green,
And sweet as Flora.[4] Take no care
For jewels for your gown or hair;
Fear not; the leaves will strew
20 Gems in abundance upon you;
Besides, the childhood of the day has kept,
Against° you come, some orient pearls[5] unwept; until
Come and receive them while the light
Hangs on the dew-locks of the night,
25 And Titan° on the eastern hill the sun
Retires himself, or else stands still
Till you come forth. Wash, dress, be brief in praying:
Few beads[6] are best when once we go a-Maying.

Come, my Corinna, come; and, coming mark
30 How each field turns° a street, each street a park turns into
Made green and trimmed with trees; see how
Devotion gives each house a bough
Or branch: each porch, each door ere this,
An ark, a tabernacle is,[7]
35 Made up of whitethorn neatly interwove,
As if here were those cooler shades of love.
Can such delights be in the street
And open fields, and we not see 't?
Come, we'll abroad; and let's obey

1. Apollo, the Greek and Roman sun god, whose hair (the rays of the sun) is never cut.
2. Roman goddess of the dawn, here tossing her blankets aside and spreading over Earth a newly made coverlet of light.
3. Boughs of white hawthorn, traditionally gathered to decorate streets and houses on May Day. Larks sing at sunrise.
4. Roman goddess of flowers.
5. I.e., lustrous and glowing ones; also, "Eastern," as pearls come from the "Orient."
6. I.e., prayers (with overtones of the rosary of Catholicism).
7. I.e., the doorways are like the Hebrew "ark" of the Covenant, or the sanctuary ("tabernacle") that housed it; i.e., May sprigs are the central mystery of the religion of nature.

40 The proclamation made for May,[8]
And sin no more, as we have done, by staying;
But, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

There's not a budding boy or girl this day
But is got up and gone to bring in May;
45 A deal of youth, ere this, is come
Back, and with whitethorn laden home.
Some have dispatched their cakes and cream
Before that we have left to dream;
And some have wept, and wooed, and plighted troth,
50 And chose their priest, ere we can cast off sloth.
Many a green-gown has been given,[9]
Many a kiss, both odd and even,[1]
Many a glance, too, has been sent
From out the eye, love's firmament;° sky
55 Many a jest told of the keys betraying
This night, and locks picked; yet we're not a-Maying.

Come, let us go while we are in our prime,
And take the harmless folly of the time.
We shall grow old apace,° and die quickly
60 Before we know our liberty.
Our life is short, and our days run
As fast away as does the sun;
And, as a vapor or a drop of rain
Once lost, can ne'er be found again;
65 So when or you or I are made
A fable, song, or fleeting shade,
All love, all liking, all delight
Lies drowned with us in endless night.
Then while time serves, and we are but decaying,
70 Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles today
Tomorrow will be dying.

5 The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun,
The higher he's a-getting,
The sooner will his race be run,
And nearer he's to setting.

8. Probably refers to King James's declaration concerning lawful sports, published in 1618 and reissued by King Charles I in 1633.

9. I.e., by rolling in the grass.

1. Kisses are odd and even in kissing games.

That age is best which is the first,
10 When youth and blood are warmer;
But being spent, the worse, and worst
Times still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time,
And, while ye may, go marry;
15 For, having lost but once your prime,
You may forever tarry.

Upon Julia's Breasts

Display thy breasts, my Julia, there let me
Behold that circummortal[2] purity;
Between whose glories, there my lips I'll lay,
Ravished in that fair Via Lactea.[3]

Upon a Child That Died

Here she lies, a pretty bud,
Lately made of flesh and blood,
Who as soon fell fast asleep
As her little eyes did peep.° open
5 Give her strewings,[4] but not stir
The earth that lightly covers her.

His Prayer to Ben Jonson[5]

When I a verse shall make,
Know I have prayed thee,
For old religion's sake,
Saint Ben, to aid me.[6]

5 Make the way smooth for me,
When I, thy Herrick,
Honoring thee, on my knee
Offer my lyric.

2. A coinage by Herrick, literally "around or encompassing what is mortal"; therefore, perhaps, beyond or more than mortal.
3. Milky Way (Latin); with reference to the color white and to the constellation; also, figuratively, a way brilliant in appearance and leading to heaven.
4. I.e., flowers scattered on her grave.
5. Herrick's admired master (1572–1637; see pp. 323–44).
6. Herrick, who had been ordained in the Church of England, plays on the fact that Jonson was for a while a Catholic (of the "old religion"), as well as a saint in the mock religion of poetry. The Puritans (who came to power in the civil war, which began in 1642) were hostile to the invocation of saints and, especially, of secular "saints" such as Jonson; Herrick was dispossessed by the Puritans in 1647, shortly before his poems were published. "Religion" may also mean the sacredness of an oath, i.e., the vows of friendship.

Candles I'll give to thee,
10 And a new altar;
And thou, Saint Ben, shalt be
Writ in my psalter.[7]

The Night Piece, to Julia

Her eyes the glowworm lend thee;[8]
The shooting stars attend thee;
And the elves also,
Whose little eyes glow
5 Like the sparks of fire, befriend thee.

No will-o'-the-wisp[9] mislight thee;
Nor snake or slowworm° bite thee; adder
But on, on thy way,
Not making a stay,
10 Since ghost there's none to affright thee.

Let not the dark thee cumber;° trouble
What though the moon does slumber?
The stars of the night
Will lend thee their light,
15 Like tapers clear without number.

Then, Julia, let me woo thee,
Thus, thus to come unto me;
And when I shall meet
Thy silvery feet,
20 My soul I'll pour into thee.

Upon Julia's Clothes

Whenas in silks my Julia goes,
Then, then, methinks, how sweetly flows
That liquefaction° of her clothes. liquefying

Next, when I cast mine eyes, and see
5 That brave° vibration, each way free, glorious, splendid
O, how that glittering taketh me!

7. A collection of sacred poems called Psalms; also, the Book of Psalms, one of the books of the Hebrew Scriptures, composed of such poems.
8. I.e., may the glowworm (an insect, the female of which emits a shining green light from the abdomen) lend her eyes to thee.
9. The will-o'-the-wisp was said to draw travelers astray by holding a false light before them; the phenomenon of nocturnal light is caused by the combustion of marsh gas.

Upon Prue, His Maid

In this little urn is laid
Prudence Baldwin, once my maid,
From whose happy spark here let
Spring the purple violet.

Upon Ben Jonson[1]

Here lies Jonson with the rest
Of the poets; but the best.
Reader, would'st thou more have known?
Ask his story, not this stone.
5 That will speak what this can't tell
Of his glory. So farewell.

An Ode for Him

Ah, Ben!
Say how or when
Shall we, thy guests,
Meet at those lyric feasts
5 Made at the Sun,
The Dog, the Triple Tun,[2]
Where we such clusters° had — wine
As made us nobly wild, not mad;
And yet each verse of thine
10 Outdid the meat, outdid the frolic wine.

My Ben!
Or come again,
Or send to us
Thy wit's great overplus;
15 But teach us yet
Wisely to husband° it, — manage thriftily, prudently
Lest we that talent spend,
And having once brought to an end
That precious stock, the store
20 Of such a wit the world should have no more.

1. See note 5, p. 358.

2. The names of taverns.

The Pillar of Fame[3]

Fame's pillar here at last we set,
Out-during° marble, brass or jet;[4] outlasting
Charmed and enchanted so
As to withstand the blow
5 Of overthrow;
Nor shall the seas,
Or outrages
Of storms, o'erbear
What we uprear;
10 Tho' kingdoms fall,
This pillar never shall
Decline or waste at all;
But stand for ever by his own
Firm and well-fixed foundation.

Neutrality Loathsome[5]

God will have all or none; serve Him, or fall
Down before Baal, Bel, or Belial.[6]
Either be hot or cold: God doth despise,
Abhor, and spew out all neutralities.[7]

To His Conscience

Can I not sin, but thou wilt be
My private protonotary?° law court's chief recorder
Can I not woo thee to pass by
A short and sweet iniquity?
5 I'll cast a mist and cloud upon
My delicate transgression,
So utter dark, as that no eye
Shall see the hugged° impiety. cherished
Gifts blind the wise,[8] and bribes do please,
10 And wind° all other witnesses; pervert
And wilt not thou, with gold, be tied
To lay thy pen and ink aside?

3. This poem is "shaped" to resemble a pillar; cf. George Herbert, "The Altar" (p. 367).
4. Black marble or a hard form of lignite.
5. This and the following poems are from Noble Numbers, the collection of religious poems in Herrick's 1648 volume.
6. Baal (or Bel) and Belial were pagan divinities; hence false gods in general.
7. Cf. Revelation 3.16: ". . . because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth."
8. Cf. Deuteronomy 16.19: ". . . a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous."

That in the murk° and tongueless night, murky
Wanton I may, and thou not write?
15 It will not be; and therefore now,
For times to come, I'll make this vow:
From aberrations to live free;
So I'll not fear the judge[9] or thee.

To Find God[1]

Weigh me the fire; or canst thou find
A way to measure out the wind?
Distinguish° all those floods that are separate
Mixed in that wat'ry theater,[2]
5 And taste thou them as saltless there,
As in their channel first they were.
Tell° me the people that do keep count
Within the kingdoms of the deep;
Or fetch me back that cloud again,
10 Beshivered° into seeds of rain. shattered
Tell me the motes, dust, sands, and spears
Of corn, when summer shakes his ears;
Show me that world of stars, and whence
They noiseless spill their influence.
15 This if thou canst;[3] then show me Him
That rides the glorious cherubim.[4]

The White Island, or Place of the Blest

In this world, the isle of dreams,
While we sit by sorrow's streams,
Tears and terrors are our themes
Reciting:

5 But when once from hence we fly,
More and more approaching nigh
Unto young eternity,
Uniting:

9. I.e., God on Judgment Day.
1. The "impossibility" theme was much used by seventeenth-century poets such as John Donne (see "Go and Catch a Falling Star," p. 294) and Andrew Marvell (see "To His Coy Mistress," p. 478); Herrick emphasizes the challenge issued by the concluding line: if you can do these things, then show me the supreme sight, a vision of God. This poem alludes to an Apocryphal book of the Bible, 2 Esdras: "Weigh me the weight of fire, or measure me the day that is past. . . . How many dwellings are there in the heart of the sea, or how many streams at the source of the deep, or how many ways above the firmament . . ." (4.5–7).
2. I.e., the ocean.
3. Perhaps an echo of Ecclesiasticus 1.2–3: "The sand of the seas, and the drops of rain, and the days of eternity—who can count them? The height of the heavens, and the breadth of the earth, and the deep, and wisdom—who can track them out?"
4. One of the nine orders of angels; cf. Psalms 18.10: "he [the Lord] rode upon a cherub."

In that whiter island, where 10 Things are evermore sincere;
Candor° here and luster there whiteness, truthfulness
Delighting:

There no monstrous fancies shall
Out of hell an horror call,
15 To create, or cause at all,
Affrighting.

There, in calm and cooling sleep
We our eyes shall never steep,
But eternal watch shall keep,
20 Attending

Pleasures, such as shall pursue
Me immortalized, and you;
And fresh joys, as never too
Have ending.

1648

HENRY KING
1592–1669

An Exequy to His Matchless, Never-to-Be-Forgotten Friend[1]

Accept, thou shrine of my dead saint,
Instead of dirges, this complaint;[2]
And for sweet flowers to crown thy hearse,
Receive a strew° of weeping verse scattering
5 From thy grieved friend, whom thou might'st see
Quite melted into tears for thee,

Dear loss! since thy untimely fate
My task hath been to meditate
On thee, on thee; thou art the book,
10 The library whereon I look,
Though almost blind. For thee, loved clay,° mortal
I languish out, not live, the day,
Using no other exercise
But what I practice with mine eyes;
15 By which wet glasses I find out
How lazily time creeps about

1. Written for his wife, Anne King, who died in 1623 (after eight years of marriage). Exequy: a funeral ceremony.
2. Instead of mourning songs, this plaintive poem.

To one that mourns: this, only this,
My exercise and business is.
So I compute the weary hours
20 With sighs dissolvèd into showers.

Nor wonder if my time go thus
Backward and most preposterous;[3]
Thou hast benighted me, thy set[4]
This eve of blackness did beget,
25 Who wast my day, though overcast
Before thou hadst thy noontide passed;
And I remember must in tears,
Thou scarce hadst seen so many years
As day tells° hours. By thy clear sun — counts
30 My love and fortune first did run;
But thou wilt never more appear
Folded within my hemisphere,
Since both thy light and motiòn
Like a fled star is fallen and gone;
35 And 'twixt me and my soul's dear wish
An earth now interposèd is,
Which such a strange eclipse doth make
As ne'er was read in almanac.

I could allow thee for a time
40 To darken me and my sad clime;° — climate, part of Earth
Were it a month, a year, or ten,
I would thy exile live till then,
And all that space my mirth adjourn,
So thou wouldst promise to return;
45 And putting off thy ashy shroud,
At length disperse this sorrow's cloud.

But woe is me! the longest° date — most distant
Too narrow° is to calculate — short
These empty hopes; never shall I
50 Be so much blest as to descry° — discern
A glimpse of thee, till that day come
Which shall the earth to cinders doom,
And a fierce fever must calcine° — reduce to dust by heat
The body of this world—like thine,
55 My little world! That fit of fire
Once off, our bodies shall aspire
To our souls' bliss; then we shall rise
And view ourselves with clearer eyes
In that calm region where no night
60 Can hide us from each other's sight.

3. In reverse order, monstrous, foolish.

4. I.e., placed me in darkness, thy setting (death).

Meantime, thou hast her, earth: much good
May my harm[5] do thee. Since it stood° agreed
With heaven's will I might not call
Her longer mine, I give thee all
65 My short-lived right and interest
In her whom living I loved best;
With a most free and bounteous grief
I give thee what I could not keep.
Be kind to her, and prithee look
70 Thou write into thy doomsday° book Judgment Day
Each parcel of this rarity
Which in thy casket shrined doth lie.
See that thou make thy reckoning straight,
And yield her back again by weight;
75 For thou must audit on thy trust
Each grain and atom of this dust,
As thou wilt answer him that lent,
Not gave thee, my dear monument.

So close the ground, and 'bout her shade
80 Black curtains draw; my bride is laid.

Sleep on, my love, in thy cold bed,
Never to be disquieted!
My last good-night! Thou wilt not wake
Till I thy fate shall overtake;
85 Till age, or grief, or sickness must
Marry my body to that dust
It so much loves; and fill the room
My heart keeps empty in thy tomb.
Stay for me there; I will not fail
90 To meet thee in that hollow vale.
And think not much of my delay;
I am already on the way,
And follow thee with all the speed
Desire can make, or sorrows breed.
95 Each minute is a short degree,
And every hour a step towards thee.
At night when I betake° to rest, go
Next morn I rise nearer my west
Of life, almost by eight hours' sail,
100 Than when sleep breathed his drowsy gale.

Thus from the sun my bottom° steers, vessel
And my day's compass° downward bears; limit
Nor labor I to stem the tide
Through which to thee I swiftly glide.

5. I.e., her death that harms me so much.

105 'Tis true, with shame and grief I yield,
Thou like the van° first took'st the field, vanguard
And gotten hast the victory
In thus adventuring to die
Before me, whose more years might crave
110 A just precèdence in the grave.
But hark! my pulse like a soft drum
Beats my approach, tells thee I come;
And slow howe'er my marches be,
I shall at last sit down by thee.

115 The thought of this bids me go on,
And wait my dissolutiòn.
With hope and comfort. Dear (forgive
The crime), I am content to live
Divided, with but half a heart,
120 Till we shall meet, and never part.

1657

The Boy's Answer to the Blackmoor[6]

Black maid, complain not that I fly,
When Fate commands antipathy:
Prodigious[7] might that union prove,
Where Night and Day together move,
5 And the conjunction of our lips
Not kisses make, but an eclipse,
In which the mixed black and white
Portends more terror than delight.
Yet if my shadow thou wilt be,
10 Enjoy thy dearest wish. But see
Thou take my shadow's property,
That hastes away when I come nigh.[8]
Else stay till death hath blinded me,
And then I will bequeath myself to thee.

ca. 1612–24 1657

6. This poem replies to "A Blackmore Maid Wooing a Fair Boy," which King's friend Henry Rainolds had translated from a Latin poem by George Herbert (1593–1633; for Herbert's English poems, see pp. 367–85). That poem's speaker, modeled in part on the "black but comely" female speaker in the biblical Song of Solomon (1.5), argues that "Love does in dark shades delight." King's "boy," unlike the biblical lover, scorns the wooing maiden. The poem participates in a Renaissance tradition of debating the cause and value of blackness; cf. Thomas Campion, "Follow Thy Fair Sun" (p. 279); Mary Wroth's Pamphilia to Amphilanthus 22 (p. 348); Edward Herbert's sonnets about blackness (p. 346); and John Milton's "Il Penseroso," lines 17–20 (p. 406).
7. Causing wonder or amazement; but also, ominous or unnatural.
8. See [that] you adopt my shadow's characteristic of hastening away when I come near.

GEORGE HERBERT
1593–1633

FROM THE TEMPLE: SACRED POEMS AND PRIVATE EJACULATIONS[1]

The Altar[2]

A broken ALTAR, Lord, thy servant rears,
Made of a heart, and cemented with tears:
Whose parts are as thy hand did frame;
No workman's tool hath touched the same.[3]
5 A HEART alone
Is such a stone,
As nothing but
Thy power doth cut.
Wherefore each part
10 Of my hard heart
Meets in this frame,
To praise thy Name:
That, if I chance to hold my peace,
These stones to praise thee may not cease.[4]
15 Oh let thy blessed SACRIFICE be mine,
And sanctify this ALTAR to be thine.

Redemption[5]

Having been tenant long to a rich lord,
Not thriving, I resolvèd to be bold,
And make a suit unto him, to afford° grant
A new small-rented lease, and cancel th' old.[6]

1. Posthumously published in 1633, The Temple includes 160 poems, which Herbert carefully arranged to dramatize the central Christian concept of the believer's body as the "temple of the Holy Ghost" (Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, 6.19). Designed to illustrate the myriad links between the human "temple" and the Church of England that Herbert served—its doctrines, its rituals, even the physical construction of its churches—Herbert's book begins with the poem "The Church Porch" and proceeds to a long section called "The Church," from which the following poems are taken.
Since all of Herbert's poems were published in 1633, we do not print the date for each one.
2. The first poem in the section of The Temple called "The Church," this poem, like "Easter Wings" below, is shaped to resemble the object evoked by its title. Its placement suggests that all of the following poems are offered as "sacrifices" on the symbolic altar constituted here.
3. A reference to the altar of uncut stone described in Exodus 20.25 and in Deuteronomy 27.5–8.
4. I.e., whether the poem is read or spoken, and whether its author is living or dead, he wants the words to praise God. Here, as so often in Herbert's poems, the "praise" involves echoing words of the Scriptures; see Luke 19.40: "I tell you that, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out."
5. Literally, "buying back"; in Christian doctrine, Christ's death redeemed human beings from the consequences of their sin.
6. I.e., to ask for a new lease, with a smaller rent, and to cancel the old lease.

5 In heaven at his manor I him sought;
They told me there that he was lately gone
About some land, which he had dearly bought
Long since on earth, to take possessiòn.

I straight° returned, and knowing his great birth, straightaway
10 Sought him accordingly in great resorts;° gatherings, crowds
In cities, theaters, gardens, parks, and courts;
At length I heard a ragged noise and mirth

Of thieves and murderers; there I him espied,
Who straight, Your suit is granted, said, and died.

Easter Wings[7]

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store,° abundance
Though foolishly he lost the same,[8]
Decaying more and more
Till he became
5 Most poor:
With thee
O let me rise
As larks,[9] harmoniously,
And sing this day thy victories:
10 Then shall the fall further the flight in me.[1]

My tender age in sorrow did begin;
And still with sicknesses and shame
Thou didst so punish sin,
That I became
15 Most thin.
With thee
Let me combine,
And feel this day thy victory;
For, if I imp[2] my wing on thine,
20 Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

7. The shape of this "pattern poem" represents some part of the subject. Following this version, we reproduce the poem almost as it was first published. The stanzas were printed on two pages and arranged to suggest two birds flying upward, wings outspread.
8. I.e., in the Fall from Eden.
9. Larks sing at sunrise.
1. I.e., paradoxically, the joy of Easter and redemption from sin (the "flight" to heaven) is greater because the Fall from Eden occurred.
The words "this day," which are superfluous in the metrical scheme of the poem, were perhaps included in the early editions to emphasize the occasion, Easter. They are omitted, however, in the only surviving manuscript book of Herbert's poems.
2. A term from falconry: additional feathers were "imped," or grafted, onto the wing of a hawk to improve its power of flight.

Easter Wings

Lord, who createdſt man in wealth and ſtore,
Though fooliſhly he loſt the ſame,
Decaying more and more,
Till he became
Moſt poore:
With thee
O let me riſe
As larks, harmoniouſly,
And ſing this day thy victories:
Then ſhall the fall further the flight in me.

My tender age in ſorrow did beginne:
And ſtill with ſickneſſes and ſhame
Thou didſt ſo puniſh ſinne,
That I became
Moſt thinne.
With thee
Let me combine,
And feel this day thy victorie:
For, if I imp my wing on thine,
Affliction ſhall advance the flight in me.

Sin (I)[3]

Lord, with what care hast thou begirt° us round! girdled
Parents first season us: then schoolmasters
Deliver us to laws; they send us bound
To rules of reason, holy messengers,
5 Pulpits and Sundays, sorrow dogging sin,
Afflictions sorted, anguish of all sizes,
Fine nets and stratagems to catch us in,
Bibles laid open, millions of surprises,
Blessings beforehand, ties of gratefulness,
10 The sound of glory ringing in our ears:
Without, our shame; within, our consciences;
Angels and grace, eternal hopes and fears.
Yet all these fences and their whole array
One cunning bosom-sin[4] blows quite away.

Affliction (I)

When first thou didst entice to thee my heart,
I thought the service brave:° splendid
So many joys I writ down for my part,

3. Herbert frequently used the same title for several different poems; editors differentiate between them by adding numbers.
4. I.e., a sin within the heart.

Besides what I might have
5 Out of my stock of natural delights,
Augmented with thy gracious benefits.

I lookèd on thy furniture so fine,
And made it fine to me;
Thy glorious household stuff did me entwine,
10 And 'tice° me unto thee. entice
Such stars I counted mine: both heaven and earth
Paid me my wages in a world of mirth.

What pleasures could I want,° whose king I served, lack
Where joys my fellows were?
15 Thus argued into hopes, my thoughts reserved
No place for grief or fear;
Therefore my sudden soul caught at the place,
And made her youth and fierceness seek thy face:

At first thou gav'st me milk and sweetnesses;
20 I had my wish and way:
My days were strawed° with flowers and happiness; strewed
There was no month but May.
But with my years sorrow did twist and grow.
And made a party unawares for woe.

25 My flesh began unto my soul in pain,
"Sicknesses cleave my bones;
Consuming agues° dwell in every vein, fevers
And tune my breath to groans."
Sorrow was all my soul; I scarce believed,
30 Till grief did tell me roundly,° that I lived. bluntly

When I got health, thou took'st away my life,
And more; for my friends die:
My mirth and edge was lost: a blunted knife
Was of more use than I.
35 Thus thin and lean without a fence or friend,
I was blown through with ev'ry storm and wind.

Whereas my birth and spirit rather took
The way that takes the town,[5]
Thou didst betray me to a lingering book,
40 And wrap me in a gown.° theology's garb
I was entangled in the world of strife,
Before I had the power to change my life.

5. An allusion to the career at court that Herbert had sought until 1625; his hopes for advancement disappointed, he "betook himself to a Retreat from London" and resolved to "enter into Sacred Orders." Many poems of The Temple were composed after Herbert was ordained a deacon in 1626—a period during which he suffered from ill-health.

Yet, for I threatened oft the siege to raise,
Not simpering all mine age,
45 Thou often didst with academic praise
Melt and dissolve my rage.
I took thy sweetened pill, till I came where
I could not go away, nor persevere.

Yet lest perchance I should too happy be
50 In my unhappiness,
Turning my purge° to food, thou throwest me — purgation
Into more sicknesses.
Thus doth thy power cross-bias[6] me, not making
Thine own gift good, yet me from my ways taking.

55 Now I am here, what thou wilt do with me
None of my books will show:
I read, and sigh, and wish I were a tree,
For sure then I should grow
To fruit or shade; at least, some bird would trust
60 Her household to me, and I should be just.

Yet, though thou troublest me, I must be meek;
In weakness must be stout:[7]
Well, I will change the service, and go seek
Some other master out.
65 Ah, my dear God! though I am clean forgot,
Let me not love thee, if I love thee not.

Prayer (I)

Prayer, the church's banquet, angels' age,[8]
God's breath in man returning to his birth,
The soul in paraphrase, heart in pilgrimage,
The Christian plummet[9] sounding heav'n and earth;

5 Engine against th' Almighty, sinner's tower,
Reversèd thunder, Christ-side-piercing spear,
The six-days' world transposing[1] in an hour,
A kind of tune, which all things hear and fear;

Softness, and peace, and joy, and love, and bliss,
10 Exalted manna,[2] gladness of the best,

6. A term from the game of bowls: to alter the natural path of the ball. I.e., thy power frustrates.
7. Cf. Malachi 3.13: "Your words have been stout against me, saith the Lord."
8. Prayer acquaints humans with the timeless existence of the "angels' age" (in contrast to finite human life).
9. A plummet is a piece of metal attached to a line, used for sounding or measuring a vertical distance. Paraphrase: usually a fuller, simpler version of a text.
1. A musical term: shifting pitch or key. The "six day's world" alludes to God's creation of the world in six days (Genesis 1).
2. Spiritual nourishment, or food divinely supplied. Manna was the substance miraculously supplied as food to the Israelites during their time in the wilderness (Exodus 16).

Heaven in ordinary,[3] man well dressed,
The Milky Way, the bird of Paradise,[4]

Church bells beyond the stars heard, the soul's blood,
The land of spices; something understood.

The Temper (I)

How should I praise thee, Lord! how should my rhymes
Gladly engrave thy love in steel,
If what my soul doth feel sometimes,
My soul might ever° feel! always

5 Although there were some forty heavens, or more,
Sometimes I peer above them all;
Sometimes I hardly reach a score;
Sometimes to hell I fall.

O rack me not to such a vast extent;
10 Those distances belong to thee:
The world's too little for thy tent,
A grave too big for me.

Wilt thou meet arms with man, that thou dost stretch
A crumb of dust from heaven to hell?
15 Will great God measure with a wretch?
Shall he thy stature spell?

O let me, when thy roof my soul hath hid,
O let me roost and nestle there;
Then of a sinner thou art rid,
20 And I of hope and fear.

Yet take thy way; for, sure, thy way is best:
Stretch or contract me, thy poor debtor:
This is but tuning of my breast,
To make the music better.

25 Whether I fly with angels, fall with dust,
Thy hands made both, and I am there.
Thy power and love, my love and trust,
Make one place everywhere.

3. In the everyday course of things. More specifically, "ordinary" also meant a daily allowance of food or an established order or form, as of the divine service.
4. Perhaps chosen for its name, or for its brilliant coloring.

Jordan (I)[5]

Who says that fictions only and false hair
Become a verse? Is there in truth no beauty?
Is all good structure in a winding stair?
May no lines pass, except they do their duty
5 Not to a true, but painted chair?[6]

Is it no verse, except enchanted groves
And sudden arbors shadow coarse-spun lines?[7]
Must purling° streams refresh a lover's loves? swirling
Must all be veiled while he that reads, divines,
10 Catching the sense at two removes?

Shepherds are honest people; let them sing:
Riddle who list,° for me, and pull for prime:[8] likes
I envy no man's nightingale or spring;
Nor let them punish me with loss of rhyme,
15 Who plainly say, My God, My King.

The Windows

Lord, how can man preach thy eternal word?
He is a brittle crazy° glass; flawed, distorting
Yet in thy temple thou dost him afford
This glorious and transcendent place,
5 To be a window, through thy grace.

But when thou dost anneal in glass[9] thy story,
Making thy life to shine within
The holy preachers, then the light and glory
More reverend grows, and more doth win;
10 Which else shows waterish, bleak, and thin.

Doctrine and life, colors and light, in one
When they combine and mingle, bring
A strong regard and awe; but speech alone
Doth vanish like a flaring thing,
15 And in the ear, not conscience, ring.[1]

5. The only river of ancient Palestine; the Israelites crossed it to enter the Promised Land, and Christ was baptized in it. The title may also allude to the many windings of the Jordan.
6. It was customary to bow or "do one's duty" to the king's chair of state even when unoccupied; also, alludes to the false imitation critiqued by Plato in The Republic, book 10.
7. I.e., is it not true poetry unless enchanted groves and suddenly appearing trees (effects sought by landscape architects) shade (but also overshadow) humble lines?
8. To draw a lucky card in the game of primero. Lines 11–12 have been variously interpreted; their ambiguity and syntactical density work to complicate the contrast Herbert seems to be drawing between a "plain" style (exemplified by the shepherds) and the artificial, worldly style described in line 12. For me: as far as I'm concerned.
9. Fix the colors in stained glass, after painting, by heating.
1. The last stanza seems to challenge the Puritan belief in the efficacy of the spoken word.

Denial

When my devotions could not pierce
Thy silent ears,
Then was my heart broken, as was my verse;
My breast was full of fears
5 And disorder.

My bent thoughts, like a brittle bow,
Did fly asunder:
Each took his way; some would to pleasures go,
Some to the wars and thunder
10 Of alarms.

"As good go anywhere," they say,
"As to benumb
Both knees and heart, in crying night and day,
Come, come, my God, O come!
15 But no hearing."

O that thou shouldst give dust a tongue
To cry to thee,
And then not hear it crying! All day long
My heart was in my knee,[2]
20 But no hearing.

Therefore my soul lay out of sight,
Untuned, unstrung:
My feeble spirit, unable to look right,
Like a nipped blossom, hung
25 Discontented.

O cheer and tune my heartless breast,
Defer no time;
That so thy favors granting my request,
They and my mind may chime,° ring together, agree
30 And mend my rhyme.

Vanity (I)

The fleet astronomer can bore° pierce
And thread the spheres[3] with his quick-piercing mind:
He views their stations, walks from door to door,
Surveys, as if he had designed

2. I.e., my heart was bowed and bent in reverence, like my knee.
3. Concentric transparent shells containing the heavenly bodies, according to Ptolemaic astronomy; they were thought to produce angelic music as they turned.

5 To make a purchase there; he sees their dances,
And knoweth long before
Both their full-eyed aspècts,[4] and secret glances.

The nimble diver with his side[5]
Cuts through the working waves, that he may fetch
10 His dearly-earnèd pearl, which God did hide
On purpose from the venturous wretch;
That he might save his life, and also hers
Who with excessive pride
Her own destruction and his danger wears.

15 The subtle chymic° can divest — chemist
And strip the creature naked, till he find
The callow° principles within their nest: — bald, immature
There he imparts to them his mind,
Admitted to their bed-chamber,[6] before
20 They appear trim and dressed
To ordinary suitors at the door.

What hath not man sought out and found,
But his dear God? who yet his glorious law
Embosoms in us, mellowing the ground
25 With showers and frosts, with love and awe,
So that we need not say, "Where's this command?"
Poor man, thou searchest round
To find out death, but missest life at hand.

Virtue

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky:
The dew shall weep thy fall tonight;
For thou must die.

5 Sweet rose, whose hue, angry and brave,[7]
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye:
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.

Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses,
10 A box where sweets° compacted lie; — perfumes
My music shows ye have your closes,[8]
And all must die.

4. The relative positions of the heavenly bodies as they appear to an observer on Earth at a given time, and their supposed influence on earthly matters.
5. I.e., swimming on his side.
6. Herbert implies that the chemist examining creatures' inner natures in an overly intimate way is forming them according to his own intellect ("imparts to them his mind") rather than discovering their God-given reality.
7. Splendid. Angry: i.e., red, the color of anger.
8. A close is a cadence, the conclusion of a musical strain.

Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives;
15 But though the whole world turn to coal,[9]
Then chiefly lives.

Man

My God, I heard this day
That none doth build a stately habitation,
But he that means to dwell therein.
What house more stately hath there been,
5 Or can be, than is Man? to° whose creation — compared to
All things are in decay.

For Man is every thing,
And more: he is a tree, yet bears more fruit;[1]
A beast, yet is or should be more:
10 Reason and speech we only bring.
Parrots may thank us, if they are not mute,
They go upon the score.[2]

Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one limb to another,
15 And all to all the world besides:[3]
Each part may call the furthest, brother;
For head with foot hath private amity,° — friendship
And both with moons and tides.[4]

Nothing hath got so far,
20 But man hath caught and kept it, as his prey.
His eyes dismount° the highest star: — bring down to Earth
He is in little all the sphere.° — universe
Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they Find their acquaintance there.

25 For us the winds do blow,
The earth doth rest, heaven move, and fountains flow.
Nothing we see but means our good,
As our delight or as our treasure:
The whole is either our cupboard of food,
30 Or cabinet of pleasure.

9. An allusion to Judgment Day, when the world will end in a great fire (2 Peter 3.10).
1. This line presents a serious textual problem, since all early printed versions of the poem have "no" instead of "more" "fruit." We follow the reading of the one surviving manuscript, which Herbert saw, but the alternate reading has strong claims. See, for instance, "Affliction (I)," lines 57–60 (p. 371), where Herbert contrasts the uncertainty of human "fruitfulness"—dependent partly on God's hidden will—with the tree's natural cycle of growth.
2. "Man" is the only creature with "reason and speech"; the parrot may seem to be an exception, but it talks on credit ("upon the score"), i.e., because humans taught it how.
3. I.e., humanity is also symmetrical to—a microcosm of—the world.
4. Refers to the notion that parts of the body are affected by the motions of the moon and stars.

The stars have us to bed;
Night draws the curtain, which the sun withdraws;
Music and light attend our head.
All things unto our flesh are kind° kin
35 In their descent and being; to our mind
In their ascent and cause.

Each thing is full of duty:[5]
Waters united are our navigation;
Distinguishèd, our habitation;
40 Below, our drink; above, our meat;
Both are our cleanliness. Hath one such beauty?
Then how are all things neat?[6]

More servants wait on Man
Than he'll take notice of: in every path
45 He treads down that which doth befriend him[7]
When sickness makes him pale and wan.
O mighty love! Man is one world, and hath
Another to attend him.

Since then, my God, thou hast
50 So brave a palace built, O dwell in it,
That it may dwell with thee at last!
Till then, afford us so much wit,
That, as the world serves us, we may serve thee,
And both thy servants be.

Life

I made a posy,° while the day ran by: bouquet; poem
"Here will I smell my remnant° out, and tie remaining time
My life within this band."
But Time did beckon to the flowers, and they
5 By noon most cunningly did steal away,
And withered in my hand.

My hand was next to them, and then my heart;
I took, without more thinking, in good part
Time's gentle admonition;
10 Who did so sweetly death's sad taste convey,
Making my mind to smell my fatal day,
Yet sug'ring the suspicion.

5. I.e., all the elements serve God and humans. Lines 38–40: oceans ("waters united") are valuable for navigation; the dividing of the waters ("distinguished") during the Creation allowed humans to live on Earth (Genesis 1.6). Water on Earth provides drink, while water from "above" (i.e., manna or dew) is food.
6. I.e., if one element can serve so abundantly, how wonderful ("neat") is the sum of all things.
7. I.e., he treads down the herb that cures illnesses.

Farewell dear flowers, sweetly your time ye spent,
Fit, while ye lived, for smell or ornament,
15 And after death for cures.[8]
I follow straight without complaints or grief,
Since, if my scent be good, I care not if
It be as short as yours.

Artillery

As I one evening sat before my cell,
Methought° a star did shoot into my lap. it seemed to me
I rose and shook my clothes, as knowing well
That from small fires comes oft no small mishap;
5 When suddenly I heard one say,
"Do as thou usest, disobey,
Expel good motions from thy breast,
Which have the face of fire, but end in rest."[9]

I, who had heard of music in the spheres,[1]
10 But not of speech in stars, began to muse;
But turning to my God, whose ministers
The stars and all things are: "If I refuse,
Dread Lord," said I, "so oft my good,
Then I refuse not ev'n with blood
15 To wash away my stubborn thought;
For I will do or suffer what I ought.

"But I have also stars and shooters too,
Born where thy servants both artilleries use.
My tears and prayers night and day do woo
20 And work up to thee; yet thou dost refuse.
Not but I am (I must say still)
Much more obliged to do thy will
Than thou to grant mine; but because
Thy promise now hath ev'n set thee thy laws.

25 "Then we are shooters both, and thou dost deign° condescend
To enter combat with us, and contest
With thine own clay. But I would parley fain:[2]
Shun not my arrows, and behold my breast.
Yet if thou shunnest, I am thine:
30 I must be so, if I am mine.
There is no articling° with thee: negotiating
I am but finite, yet thine infinitely."

8. Flowers were sometimes used as an ingredient in medicines.
9. I.e., divine impulses, like falling stars, may have the appearance of dangerous fires, but ultimately end quietly.
1. The spheres of Ptolemaic astronomy, concentric transparent shells containing the heavenly bodies, were thought to produce angelic music as they turned.
2. Gladly speak. Clay: i.e., flesh.

The Collar[3]

I struck the board° and cried, "No more; table
I will abroad!
What? shall I ever sigh and pine?
My lines and life are free, free as the road,
5 Loose as the wind, as large as store.° abundance
Shall I be still in suit?[4]
Have I no harvest but a thorn
To let me blood, and not restore
What I have lost with cordial° fruit? life-giving
10 Sure there was wine
Before my sighs did dry it; there was corn
Before my tears did drown it.
Is the year only lost to me?
Have I no bays[5] to crown it,
15 No flowers, no garlands gay? All blasted?
All wasted?
Not so, my heart; but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands.
Recover all thy sigh-blown age
20 On double pleasures: leave thy cold dispute
Of what is fit and not. Forsake thy cage,
Thy rope of sands,[6]
Which petty thoughts have made, and made to thee
Good cable, to enforce and draw,
25 And be thy law,
While thou didst wink° and wouldst not see. shut your eyes
Away! take heed;
I will abroad.
Call in thy death's-head[7] there; tie up thy fears.
30 He that forbears
To suit and serve his need,
Deserves his load."
But as I raved and grew more fierce and wild
At every word,
35 Methought I heard one calling, Child!
And I replied, My Lord.

The Pulley[8]

When God at first made man,
Having a glass of blessings standing by,

3. A band of metal fixed round a prisoner's neck; also, something worn about the neck as a badge of servitude, as a priest wears a collar to show his service to God. Also, perhaps, a pun on choler, anger.
4. I.e., in attendance upon someone for a favor.
5. A laurel garland symbolizing poetic fame.
6. I.e., the restrictions on behavior, which the "petty thoughts" have made into "good" (or strong) cable.
7. A memento mori, or representation of a human skull intended to serve as a reminder that all humans must die.
8. A simple mechanical device, made of a rope, a wheel, and sometimes a block, used for changing the direction of a pulling force to lift weights.

"Let us," said he, "pour on him all we can.
Let the world's riches, which dispersèd lie,
5 Contract into a span."[9]

So strength first made a way;
Then beauty flowed, then wisdom, honor, pleasure.
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that, alone of all his treasure,
10 Rest° in the bottom lay. remainder; repose

"For if I should," said he,
"Bestow this jewel also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature;
15 So both should losers be.

"Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining restlessness.
Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet weariness
20 May toss him to my breast."

The Flower

How fresh, oh Lord, how sweet and clean
Are thy returns! even as the flowers in spring;
To which, besides their own demean,[1]
The late-past frosts tributes of pleasure bring.
5 Grief melts away
Like snow in May,
As if there were no such cold thing.

Who would have thought my shriveled heart
Could have recovered greenness? It was gone
10 Quite underground; as flowers depart
To see their mother-root, when they have blown,° bloomed
Where they together
All the hard weather,
Dead to the world, keep house unknown.

15 These are thy wonders, Lord of power,
Killing and quickening,° bringing down to hell reviving
And up to heaven in an hour;
Making a chiming of a passing-bell.[2]
We say amiss
20 This or that is:
Thy word is all, if we could spell.

9. A small space; the distance from the end of the thumb to the end of the little finger of a spread hand.
1. Demeanor or bearing; also demesne, estate, i.e., the estate of one's own beauty or pleasure.
2. A monotone bell tolled to announce a death; a chiming offers a pleasing variety.

Oh that I once past changing were,
Fast in thy Paradise, where no flower can wither!
Many a spring I shoot up fair,
25 Offering° at heaven, growing and groaning thither; aiming
Nor doth my flower
Want° a spring shower, lack; desire
My sins and I joining together.[3]

But while I grow in a straight line,
30 Still upwards bent, as if heaven were mine own,
Thy anger comes, and I decline:
What frost to that? what pole is not the zone
Where all things burn,
When thou dost turn,
35 And the least frown of thine is shown?[4]

And now in age I bud again,
After so many deaths I live and write;
I once more smell the dew and rain,
And relish versing. Oh, my only light,
40 It cannot be
That I am he
On whom thy tempests fell all night.

These are thy wonders, Lord of love,
To make us see we are but flowers that glide;° pass away silently
45 Which when we once can find and prove,° experience
Thou hast a garden for us where to bide;
Who would be more,
Swelling through store,° possessions
Forfeit their Paradise by their pride.

The Forerunners

The harbingers[5] are come. See, see their mark:
White is their color, and behold my head.[6]
But must they have my brain? Must they dispark[7]
Those sparkling notions, which therein were bred?
5 Must dullness turn me to a clod?
Yet have they left me, Thou art still my God.[8]

Good men ye be, to leave me my best room,
Ev'n all my heart, and what is lodgèd there:

3. I.e., the tears of contrition caused by the "joining" together of the poet's sins and his conscience.
4. I.e., what cold compares to God's anger? What chill would not seem like the heat of the equator, compared to God's wrath?
5. The advance agents of the king and his party on a royal progress, or tour. They marked with chalk the doors of those dwellings where the court would be accommodated.
6. I.e., the poet has been marked by the appearance of white hairs, a sign that all of his "sparkling notions" (line 4) must be dispossessed, to make room for his coming Lord.
7. I.e., dis-park, to turn out, as deer from a park; there may also be a play on dis-spark.
8. Echoes Psalm 31.14: "But I trusted in thee, O Lord: I said, Thou art my God." See also Christ's lament to God in Matthew 27.46 and Mark 15.34.

I pass not,[9] I, what of the rest become,
10 So Thou art still my God be out of fear.
He will be pleasèd with that ditty;
And if I please him, I write fine and witty.

Farewell sweet phrases, lovely metaphors.
But will ye leave me thus? When ye before
15 Of stews and brothels only knew the doors,
Then did I wash you with my tears, and more,
Brought you to church well dressed and clad:
My God must have my best, ev'n all I had.

Lovely enchanting language, sugar-cane,
20 Honey of roses, wither wilt thou fly?
Hath some fond lover 'ticed thee to thy bane?[1]
And wilt thou leave the church and love a sty?[2]
Fie, thou wilt soil thy broidered coat,
And hurt thyself, and him that sings the note.

25 Let foolish lovers, if they will love dung,
With canvas, not with arras,[3] clothe their shame:
Let folly speak in her own native tongue.
True beauty dwells on high: ours is a flame
But borrowed thence to light us thither.
30 Beauty and beauteous words should go together.

Yet if you go, I pass not; take your way:
For Thou art still my God is all that ye
Perhaps with more embellishment can say.
Go, birds of spring: let winter have his fee;
35 Let a bleak paleness chalk the door,
So all within be livelier than before.

Discipline

Throw away thy rod,° punishment
Throw away thy wrath:
O my God,
Take the gentle path.

5 For my heart's desire
Unto thine is bent:
I aspire
To a full consent.

Not a word or look
10 I affect to own,

9. I care not. I.e., all the other thoughts in the house (my mind, my soul) can be turned out of doors, as long as you leave my heart ("my best room") and its one inhabitant, the thought "Thou art still my God."
1. Destruction. 'Ticed: enticed.
2. Pigsty; also, a place of moral contamination.
3. I.e., with coarse cloth, not with tapestry.

But by book,
And thy book[4] alone.

Though I fail, I weep:
Though I halt in pace,
15 Yet I creep
To the throne of grace.

Then let wrath remove;
Love will do the deed:
For with love
20 Stony hearts will bleed.

Love is swift of foot;
Love's a man of war,[5]
And can shoot,
And can hit from far.

25 Who can 'scape his bow?
That which wrought on thee,
Brought thee low,
Needs must work on me.

Throw away thy rod;
30 Though man frailties hath,
Thou art God:
Throw away thy wrath.

The Elixir[6]

Teach me, my God and King,
In all things thee to see,
And what I do in anything,
To do it as for thee.

5 Not rudely, as a beast,
To run into an action;
But still to make thee prepossest,[7]
And give it his° perfection. its

A man that looks on glass,
10 On it may stay his eye,
Or, if he pleaseth, through it pass,
And then the heaven espy.

4. I.e., the Bible. By book: i.e., as an actor follows a playbook.
5. A song by Moses in Exodus 15 calls the Lord a "man of war"; also, a possible reference to the classical image of the god Cupid and his arrow.
6. An elixir is a drug or essence supposed to prolong life indefinitely; here, it is identified with the "famous stone" (line 21) believed by the alchemists to turn other metals to gold. Figuratively, the quintessence or soul of a thing.
7. I.e., always to give thee a prior claim.

All may of thee partake:
Nothing can be so mean
15 Which with his tincture (for thy sake)
Will not grow bright and clean.[8]

A servant with this clause
Makes drudgery divine:
Who sweeps a room as for thy laws,
20 Makes that and th' action fine.

This is the famous stone
That turneth all to gold;
For that which God doth touch[9] and own
Cannot for less be told.° measured

Death

Death, thou wast once an uncouth hideous thing,
Nothing but bones,
The sad effect of sadder groans:
Thy mouth was open, but thou couldst not sing.

5 For we considered thee as at some six
Or ten years hence,
After the loss of life and sense,
Flesh being turned to dust, and bones to sticks.

We looked on this side of thee, shooting short;
10 Where we did find
The shells of fledge souls left behind,
Dry dust, which sheds no tears, but may extort.[1]

But since our Savior's death did put some blood
Into thy face,
15 Thou art grown fair and full of grace,
Much in request, much sought for as a good.

For we do now behold thee gay and glad,
As at Doomsday;° Judgment Day
When souls shall wear their new array,
20 And all thy bones with beauty shall be clad.

8. I.e., nothing is so insignificant ("mean") that it can't grow bright and clean for thy sake by means of its tincture (an immaterial principle that transformed substances, according to alchemical theory).
9. To test (gold) for purity by rubbing it with a touchstone.
1. "Fledge souls" that have left the body and gone to heaven are like fledgling chicks that have left the shell behind. The shell (i.e., the corpse) can draw ("extort") tears from survivors, although it cannot shed them itself.

Therefore we can go die as sleep, and trust
Half that we have
Unto an honest faithful grave;
Making our pillows either down, or dust.

Love (III)[2]

Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back,
Guilty of dust and sin.
But quick-eyed Love, observing me grow slack[3]
From my first entrance in,
5 Drew nearer to me, sweetly questioning
If I lacked any thing.

"A guest," I answered, "worthy to be here":
Love said, "You shall be he."
"I, the unkind, ungrateful? Ah, my dear,
10 I cannot look on thee."
Love took my hand, and smiling did reply,
"Who made the eyes but I?"

"Truth, Lord; but I have marred them; let my shame
Go where it doth deserve."
15 "And know you not," says Love, "who bore the blame?"[4]
"My dear, then I will serve."
"You must sit down," says Love, "and taste my meat."[5]
So I did sit and eat.

THOMAS CAREW
ca. 1595–1640

A Song

Ask me no more where Jove[1] bestows,
When June is past, the fading rose;
For in your beauty's orient deep,
These flowers, as in their causes,[2] sleep.

2. This is the last lyric in "The Church" both in the early Williams manuscript and in the 1633 edition of The Temple; some critics have therefore interpreted the poem as describing the soul's reception into heaven.
3. I.e., become hesitant because of misgivings.
4. I.e., Christ, who took on the "blame" for human beings' original sin.
5. A reference to the sacrament of Communion (according to Anglicans, the ritual taking of bread and wine in remembrance of Christ's body); also, a reference to the final Communion in heaven, when God "shall gird himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them" (Luke 12.37).
1. The ruling god of Roman mythology.
2. Aristotelian philosophy regarded that from which a thing is made or comes into being as the "material cause" of the thing. The lady here is a summation of the previous summer and a cause of the next one. Orient: lustrous, but also "from the East."

5 Ask me no more whither doth stray
The golden atoms of the day;
For in pure love heaven did prepare
Those powders to enrich your hair.

Ask me no more whither doth haste
10 The nightingale when May is past;
For in your sweet dividing[3] throat
She winters, and keeps warm her note.

Ask me no more where those stars light,
That downwards fall in dead of night;
15 For in your eyes they sit, and there
Fixèd become, as in their sphere.

Ask me no more if east or west
The phoenix[4] builds her spicy nest;
For unto you at last she flies,
20 And in your fragrant bosom dies.

The Spring

Now that the winter's gone, the earth hath lost
Her snow-white robes, and now no more the frost
Candies° the grass, or casts an icy cream — ices
Upon the silver lake or crystal stream;
5 But the warm sun thaws the benumbèd earth
And makes it tender, gives a sacred birth
To the dead swallow,[5] wakes in hollow tree
The drowsy cuckoo and the humble bee.
Now do a choir of chirping minstrels bring
10 In triumph to the world the youthful spring.
The valleys, hills, and woods in rich array
Welcome the coming of the longed-for May.
Now all things smile: only my love doth lour,° — frown
Nor hath the scalding noonday sun the power
15 To melt that marble ice which still doth hold
Her heart congealed, and makes her pity cold.
The ox, which lately did for shelter fly
Into the stall, doth now securely lie
In open fields; and love no more is made
20 By the fireside, but in the cooler shade:
Amyntas now doth with his Chloris[6] sleep

3. Harmonious (from division, an embellished musical phrase).
4. A legendary bird, the only one of its kind, represented as living five hundred years in the Arabian desert, being consumed in fire, then rising anew from its own ashes. Also said to build its nest from spicy shrubs.
5. Swallows were sacred to the Roman household gods.
6. Conventional names for a shepherd and shepherdess.

Under a sycamore, and all things keep
Time with the season. Only she doth carry
June in her eyes, in her heart January.

Mediocrity[7] in Love Rejected

Give me more love, or more disdain;
The torrid or the frozen zone
Bring equal ease unto my pain;
The temperate affords me none:
5 Either extreme, of love or hate,
Is sweeter than a calm estate.° condition

Give me a storm; if it be love,
Like Danaë in that golden shower,[8]
I swim in pleasure; if it prove
10 Disdain, that torrent will devour
My vulture hopes; and he's possessed
Of heaven that's but from hell released.
Then crown my joys, or cure my pain;
Give me more love, or more disdain.

1640

Song. To My Inconstant Mistress

When thou, poor excommunicate
From all the joys of love, shalt see
The full reward and glorious fate
Which my strong faith shall purchase me,
5 Then curse thine own inconstancy.

A fairer hand than thine shall cure
That heart which thy false oaths did wound,
And to my soul a soul more pure
Than thine shall by Love's hand be bound,
10 And both with equal glory crowned.

Then shalt thou weep, entreat, complain
To Love, as I did once to thee;
When all thy tears shall be as vain

7. Temperance, moderation.
8. Jove, the ruling god in Roman mythology, frequently left Juno, his sister and wife, to pursue other women; whether his actions constituted seduction or rape often depends on the particular account of a common myth, as well as on interpretation. Danaë was the daughter of the king of Argos, who imprisoned her because of a prophecy that a son born to her would kill him; Jove came to her in the form of a shower of gold, and as a result gave birth to Perseus.

As mine were then, for thou shalt be
15 Damned for thy false apostasy.[9]

An Elegy upon the Death of the Dean of Paul's, Dr. John Donne[1]

Can we not force from widowed poetry,
Now thou art dead, great Donne, one elegy
To crown thy hearse? Why yet did we not trust,
Though with unkneaded dough-baked[2] prose, thy dust,
5 Such as the unscissored lect'rer[3] from the flower
Of fading rhetoric, short-lived as his hour,
Dry as the sand that measures it,[4] should lay
Upon the ashes on the funeral day?
Have we nor tune, nor voice? Didst thou dispense[5]
10 Through all our language both the words and sense?
'Tis a sad truth. The pulpit may her plain
And sober Christian precepts still retain;
Doctrines it may, and wholesome uses, frame,
Grave homilies° and lectures; but the flame sermons
15 Of thy brave soul, that shot such heat and light
As burnt our earth and made our darkness bright,
Committed holy rapes[6] upon our will,
Did through the eye the melting heart distill,
And the deep knowledge of dark truths so teach
20 As sense might judge what fancy could not reach,[7]
Must be desired forever. So the fire
That fills with spirit and heat the Delphic choir,[8]
Which, kindled first by thy Promethean[9] breath,
Glowed here a while, lies quenched now in thy death.
25 The Muses'[1] garden, with pedantic weeds
O'erspread, was purged by thee; the lazy seeds
Of servile imitation thrown away,
And fresh invention planted; thou didst pay
The debts of our penurious° bankrupt age; poverty-stricken
30 Licentious thefts, that make poetic rage
A mimic fury, when our souls must be

9. Abandonment of one's allegiance, often to a religious faith or god.
1. English poet (1572–1631; see pp. 293–322).
2. I.e., badly finished, flat.
3. I.e., lecturer with uncut hair; in the first edition, Carew wrote "church-man" instead of "lect'rer," and thus signalled an aim to distinguish this figure from Roman Catholic priests, whose hair was cut (tonsured) when they entered the Church. The line seems to have been altered to soften the critique of Protestant clergymen—implicit in the evocation of a "dry," inadequate elegy—on the occasion of Donne's official funeral. Although Donne was born a Catholic, he later became a famous Anglican preacher; he expressed doubts about various religious claims to truth in "Satire III" (p. 314) and other writings.
4. I.e., the sand in an hourglass.
5. Use up or lay out.
6. Forcible seizures. For Donne's use of the metaphor of a religious "rape," see Holy Sonnet 14 (p. 320).
7. I.e., so that things too intangible and elevated even to be imagined might be made plain to sense.
8. I.e., the choir of poets. Delphi was the site of an oracle of Apollo, the classical god of poetry.
9. In Greek mythology, Prometheus stole fire from the gods for the benefit of mortals.
1. In Greek mythology, nine sister goddesses who were sources of inspiration.

Possessed, or with Anacreon's ecstasy,
Or Pindar's,[2] not their own; the subtle cheat
Of sly exchanges, and the juggling feat
35 Of two-edged words, or whatsoever wrong
By ours was done the Greek or Latin tongue,
Thou hast redeemed, and opened us a mine
Of rich and pregnant fancy, drawn a line
Of masculine expression, which had good
40 Old Orpheus[3] seen, or all the ancient brood
Our superstitious fools admire, and hold
Their lead more precious than thy burnished gold,
Thou hadst been their exchequer,° and no more — treasury
They in each other's dung had searched for ore.
45 Thou shalt yield no precèdence, but of time
And the blind fate of language, whose tuned chime
More charms the outward sense; yet thou mayest claim
From so great disadvantage greater fame,
Since to the awe of thy imperious wit
50 Our troublesome language bends, made only fit
With her tough thick-ribbed hoops, to gird about
Thy giant fancy, which had proved too stout
For their soft melting phrases.[4] As in time
They had the start, so did they cull the prime 55 Buds of invention many a hundred year,
And left the rifled fields, besides the fear
To touch their harvest; yet from those bare lands
Of what is only thine, thy only hands
(And that their smallest work) have gleanèd more
60 Than all those times and tongues could reap before.
But thou art gone, and thy strict laws will be
Too hard for libertines in poetry.
They will recall the goodly exiled train
Of gods and goddesses, which in thy just reign
65 Were banished° nobler poems; now with these — banished from
The silenced tales i' th' Metamorphoses[5]
Shall stuff their lines and swell the windy page,
Till verse, refined by thee in this last age,
Turn ballad-rhyme, or those old idols be
70 Adored again with new apostasy.[6]
O pardon me, that break with untuned verse
The reverend silence that attends thy hearse,
Whose solemn awful° murmurs were to thee, — awestruck
More than these faint lines, a loud elegy,
75 That did proclaim in a dumb eloquence
The death of all the arts, whose influence,
Grown feeble, in these panting numbers lies
Gasping short-winded accents, and so dies:

2. Anacreon (ca. 582–ca. 485 B.C.E.) and Pindar (ca. 522–ca. 438 B.C.E.) were famous Greek poets.
3. In Greek mythology, the son of one of the Muses and the greatest of poets and musicians.
4. I.e., a metaphor describing Donne's wit as a barrel maker bending hoops of metal around the "wine" of his genius.
5. Earlier poets had drawn heavily on the stories in Ovid's Metamorphoses for the materials of their poetry.
6. Abandonment of one's allegiance, especially to a religious faith or a god.

So doth the swiftly turning wheel not stand
80 In th' instant we withdraw the moving hand,
But some small time retain a faint weak course
By virtue of the first impulsive force;
And so whilst I cast on thy funeral pile
Thy crown of bays,[7] oh, let it crack awhile
85 And spit disdain, till the devouring flashes
Suck all the moisture up; then turn to ashes.
I will not draw thee envy to engross[8]
All thy perfections, or weep all the loss;
Those are too numerous for one elegy,
90 And this too great to be expressed by me.
Let others carve the rest; it shall suffice
I on thy grave this epitaph incise:

Here lies a king, that ruled as he thought fit
The universal monarchy of wit;
95 Here lie two flamens,° and both those the best: — priests
Apollo's[9] first, at last the true God's priest.

JAMES SHIRLEY
1596–1666

From Ajax

Dirge[1]

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armor against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings.
5 Scepter and crown
Must tumble down
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field
10 And plant fresh laurels[2] where they kill,
But their strong nerves at last must yield;
They tame but one another still.
Early or late

7. A crown of bays, or laurel, was the traditional reward of the victor in a poetic competition.
8. Write, copy out, with a pun on the word's economic meanings: to buy up, monopolize.
9. I.e., the god of poetry's.
1. This poem concludes Shirley's play The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses for the Armor of Achilles, which retells a story from Ovid's Metamorphoses.
2. The laurel's evergreen leaves, and also its flowers (cf. "garlands," line 17), symbolized military victory or success in poetic competitions.

They stoop to fate
15 And must give up their murmuring breath,
When they, pale captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds;
Upon death's purple altar now
20 See where the victor-victim bleeds.
Your heads must come
To the cold tomb;
Only the actions of the just
Smell sweet and blossom in their dust.

THE MASSACHUSETTS BAY PSALM BOOK*

Psalm 58[1]

Do ye, o congregation,
indeed speak righteousness?
and o ye sons of earthly men,
do ye judge unrightness?

5 Yea you in heart will working be injurious-wickedness;
and in the land you will weigh out
your hands' violence.

The wicked are estranged from 10 the womb, they go astray
as soon as ever they are borne;
uttering lies are they.

Their poison's like serpent's poison;
they like deaf asp,° her ear — small poisonous snake
15 that stops. Though charmer wisely charm, his voice she will not hear.

*The first book published in the new colony of Massachusetts, compiled by twelve Puritan clergymen who sought (as John Cotton explained in his preface) a plainer, more literal rendering of the Hebrew than occurs in other Protestant translations of the Psalms. Often reprinted, in England and Scotland as well as in North America, this Psalter was one of the two most commonly owned books in New England (the other being The New England Primer).

1. Cf. the translations of this Psalm and the next one by Mary Sidney (pp. 225–26), Isaac Watts (pp. 592–94), and Christopher Smart (pp. 684–86).

Within their mouth do thou their teeth
break out, O God most strong,
do thou Jehovah, the great teeth
20 break of the lion's young.

As waters let them melt away,
that run continually:
and when he bends his shafts, let them
as cut asunder be.

25 Like to a snail that melts, so let
each of them pass away;
like to a woman's untimely birth
see sun that never they may.

8

Before your pots can feel the thorns,
30 take them away shall he,
as with a whirlwind both living,
and in his jealousy.

The righteous will rejoice when as the vengeance he doth see;
35 his feet wash shall he in the blood of them that wicked be.

10

So that a man shall say, surely for righteous, there is fruit:
sure there's a God that in the earth
40 judgement doth execute.

Psalm 114

When Israel did depart th'Egyptians from among,
and Jacob's house from a people that were of a strange tongue,
Judah his holy place, Israel's dominion was.
The sea it saw and fled; Jordan[2] was forced back to pass.
5 The mountains they did leap upwards like unto rams;
the little hills also they did leap up like unto lambs.
Thou sea what made thee fly? thou Jordan, back to go?
Ye mountains that ye skipped like rams, like lambs ye hills also?

2. River in Palestine that empties into the Dead Sea.

Earth at God's presence dread; at Jacob's God's presence;[3]
10 The rock who turns to waters lake, springs he from flint sends thence.[4]

EDMUND WALLER
1606–1687

Song

Go, lovely rose!
Tell her that wastes her time and me
That now she knows,
When I resemble° her to thee, — liken
5 How sweet and fair she seems to be.

Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts, where no men abide,
10 Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
15 And not blush so to be admired.

Then die! that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee;
How small a part of time they share
20 That are so wondrous sweet and fair!

1645

Of the Last Verses in the Book[1]

When we for age could neither read nor write,
The subject made us able to indite;° — utter; dictate
The soul, with nobler resolutions decked,
The body stooping, does herself erect.
5 No mortal parts are requisite to raise
Her that, unbodied, can her Maker praise.

3. I.e., Earth, dread God's presence, dread the presence of Jacob's God.
4. I.e., he who turns the rock to standing water and who sends springs from flint.
1. I.e., his book Divine Poems, first published in 1686.

The seas are quiet when the winds give o'er;
So calm are we when passions are no more!
For then we know how vain it was to boast
10 Of fleeting things, so certain to be lost.
Clouds of affection° from our younger eyes — emotion
Conceal that emptiness which age descries.° — discerns
The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed,
Lets in new light through chinks that time has made;
15 Stronger by weakness, wiser men become,
As they draw near to their eternal home.
Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view,
That stand upon the threshold of the new.

—Miratur Limen Olympi
Vergil[2]

JOHN MILTON*
1608–1674

On the Morning of Christ's Nativity[1]

This is the month, and this the happy morn,
Wherein the Son of Heaven's Eternal King,
Of wedded maid and virgin mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring;
5 For so the holy sages[2] once did sing,
That he our deadly forfeit[3] should release,
And with his Father work us a perpetual peace.

That glorious form, that light unsufferable,
And that far-beaming blaze of majesty,
10 Wherewith he wont° at Heaven's high council-table — was accustomed
To sit the midst of Trinal Unity,[4]
He laid aside, and, here with us to be,
Forsook the courts of everlasting day,
And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay.[5]

2. From a sentence in Virgil's Fifth Eclogue that reads, in translation, "Arrayed in dazzling white, he stands enraptured at heaven's unfamiliar threshold." Through this Latin quotation, Waller gives the last words in his poem about his "divine poems" to a pagan author. Many Christian writers, most notably Dante, viewed Virgil as a precursor of Christianity, one who stood on its threshold without being able to enter.

*We have placed Milton's early works in the order of his Poems (1645), a carefully arranged collection that included poetry in English, Latin, and Italian and represented a key statement about his "career" to that point. For his later works, we follow the order of Milton's 1673 volume.

1. This poem celebrates Christ's birth and Milton's symbolic birth as a Christian poet bending classical forms such as the ode to new religious purposes. Milton portrays the triumph of the infant Christ over pagan gods, a theme of interest to both Catholics and Protestants of the early seventeenth century.

2. I.e., the Hebrew prophets.

3. The penalty of death, occasioned by the sin of Adam.

4. The Trinity: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

5. I.e., a human body.

15 Say, Heavenly Muse,[6] shall not thy sacred vein
Afford a present to the Infant God?
Hast thou no verse, no hymn, or solemn strain,
To welcome him to this his new abode,
Now while the heaven, by the Sun's team untrod,[7]
20 Hath took no print of the approaching light,
And all the spangled host[8] keep watch in squadrons bright?

See how from far upon the eastern road
The star-led wizards[9] haste with odors sweet!
Oh run, prevent° them with thy humble ode,[1] go before
25 And lay it lowly at his blessèd feet;
Have thou the honor first thy Lord to greet,
And join thy voice unto the angel choir
From out his secret altar touched with hallowed fire.[2]

The Hymn

It was the winter wild,
30 While the heaven-born child
All meanly wrapt in the rude manger lies;
Nature, in awe to him,
Had doffed° her gaudy trim, taken off
With her great Master so to sympathize:
35 It was no season then for her
To wanton with the Sun, her lusty paramour.° beloved, lover

Only with speeches fair
She woos the gentle air
To hide her guilty front with innocent snow,
40 And on her naked shame,
Pollute with sinful blame,
The saintly veil of maiden white to throw;
Confounded, that her Maker's eyes
Should look so near upon her foul deformities.[3]

6. Perhaps a reference to Urania, the Muse of astronomy, later identified in Milton's epic poem Paradise Lost (line 6; see p. 421) with divine wisdom and treated by Milton as the source of creative inspiration. In Greek mythology, the Muses were nine sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts.
7. A reference to Apollo, Greek god of the sun, who drove the chariot of the sun behind mighty steeds (the "Sun's team").
8. An armed multitude (i.e., the angels).
9. The "wise men from the east" (Matthew 2.1), who brought gifts of gold, myrrh, and frankincense ("odors sweet").
1. A rhymed lyric, generally dignified or lofty in subject and style.
2. Cf. Isaiah 6.6–7, in which a seraph touches a prophet's lips with a burning coal from the altar.
3. Personifying Nature as a woman "polluted" by the Fall, Milton also portrays her as a hypocrite covering her foulness with a "saintly" white veil; he draws on Spenser's depiction of the witch Duessa stripped "naked" in "shame" (Faerie Queene 1.8.46–48) and on the Bible's whore of Babylon (Revelation 17.6). See also the portrait of "foul" sin in Paradise Lost 2.650–51.

45 But he, her fears to cease,
Sent down the meek-eyed Peace:
She, crowned with olive green, came softly sliding
Down through the turning sphere,[4]
His ready harbinger,
50 With turtle[5] wing the amorous clouds dividing;
And, waving wide her myrtle wand,
She strikes a universal peace through sea and land.

No war, or battle's sound,
Was heard the world around;
55 The idle spear and shield were high uphung;
The hookèd chariot[6] stood,
Unstained with hostile blood;
The trumpet spake not to the armèd throng;
And kings sat still with awful eye,[7]
60 As if they surely knew their sovran Lord was by.

But peaceful was the night
Wherein the Prince of Light
His reign of peace upon the earth began.
The winds, with wonder whist,° hushed
65 Smoothly the waters kissed,
Whispering new joys to the mild Ocean,
Who now hath quite forgot to rave,
While birds of calm[8] sit brooding on the charmèd wave.

The stars, with deep amaze,° amazement
70 Stand fixed in steadfast gaze,
Bending one way their precious influence,[9]
And will not take their flight,
For all the morning light,
Or Lucifer[1] that often warned them thence;
75 But in their glimmering orbs[2] did glow,
Until their Lord himself bespake, and bid them go.

And, though the shady gloom
Had given day her room,

4. According to Ptolemaic astronomy, the heavenly spheres revolving around Earth.
5. Turtledove; an emblem of Venus, Roman goddess of love and beauty, as the olive crown is an emblem of Peace. Harbinger: one who prepares the way, or makes an announcement.
6. War chariots were sometimes armed with sicklelike hooks projecting from the hubs of the wheels.
7. I.e., with a look full of awe and reverence.
8. Halcyons, or kingfishers, which in ancient times were believed to build floating nests at sea about the time of the winter solstice, and to calm the waves during the incubation of their young.
9. Medieval astrologers believed that stars emitted an ethereal liquid ("influence") that had the power to nourish or otherwise affect all things on Earth.
1. Light-bearer (Latin); a name for the morning star and also for Satan.
2. The concentric crystalline spheres of Ptolemaic astronomy; each sphere was supposed to contain one or more of the heavenly bodies in its surface and to revolve about Earth, creating beautiful music.

The Sun himself withheld his wonted° speed, usual
80 And hid his head for shame,
As° his inferior flame as if
The new-enlightened world no more should need:
He saw a greater Sun appear
Than his bright throne or burning axletree[3] could bear.

8

85 The shepherds on the lawn,° meadow
Or ere the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they than° then
That the mighty Pan[4]
90 Was kindly come to live with them below:
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly° thoughts so busy keep. simple

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet
95 As never was by mortal finger strook,° struck
Divinely-warbled voice
Answering the stringèd noise,
As all their souls in blissful rapture took:
The air, such pleasure loth to lose,
100 With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.° cadence

10

Nature, that heard such sound
Beneath the hollow round
Of Cynthia's seat[5] the airy region thrilling,
Now was almost won
105 To think her part was done,
And that her reign had here its last fulfilling:
She knew such harmony alone
Could hold all Heaven and Earth in happier uniòn.

11

At last surrounds their sight
110 A globe of circular light,
That with long beams the shamefaced Night arrayed;
The helmèd cherubim
And sworded seraphim[6]
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed,
115 Harping loud and solemn quire,° choir
With unexpressive° notes, to Heaven's new-born Heir. inexpressible

3. I.e., the sun's chariot. "Sun" includes the familiar Son/sun pun.
4. The Greek god of shepherds, whose name means "all," was often associated with Christ in Renaissance poetry.
5. I.e., beneath the sphere of the moon.
6. Seraphim and cherubim (both are plural forms) are the two highest of the nine orders of angels in the medieval classification.

12

Such music (as 'tis said)
Before was never made,
But when of old the sons of morning sung,[7]
120 While the Creator great
His constellations set,
And the well-balanced world on hinges° hung, the two poles
And cast the dark foundations deep,
And bid the weltering waves their oozy channel keep.

13

125 Ring out, ye crystal spheres,[8]
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have power to touch our senses so;
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
130 And let the bass of heaven's deep organ blow;
And with your ninefold harmony
Make up full consort° to th' angelic symphony. accord; mate

14

For, if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
135 Time will run back and fetch the age of gold;[9]
And speckled vanity
Will sicken soon and die;
And leprous sin will melt from earthly mold;[1]
And Hell itself will pass away,
140 And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.

15

Yea, Truth and Justice then
Will down return to men,
Orbed in a rainbow; and, like° glories wearing, similar
Mercy will sit between,
145 Throned in celestial sheen,[2]
With radiant feet the tissued[3] clouds down steering;
And Heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace-hall.

7. Job speaks of the creation of the universe as the time "when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" (Job 38.7).
8. A reference to the Pythagorean idea that the music of the spheres would be audible only to sinless humans (see note 2 above).
9. According to Roman mythology, Saturn, after his dethronement by Jupiter, fled to Italy and there brought in the Golden Age, a time of perfect peace and happiness. The idea of a "return" to the Golden Age, here and in line 142, alludes to the myth of Astraea, goddess of justice, who fled "unjust" Earth but came back as a virgin celebrated by Virgil (Eclogues 4) in a passage many Christians read as an allegorical prophecy of Christ's birth from the Virgin Mary.
1. I.e., Earth; also, mortal humans. Leprous sin: i.e., sin that is like the loathsome disease leprosy.
2. This allegorical scene recalls Psalm 85.10–11 ("Mercy and Truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other"), which was part of the Christmas liturgy. Milton may also allude to depictions of the "four daughters of God" (among whom was Peace, who descends in lines 45–52) in morality plays, paintings, and masques.
3. I.e., like a cloth woven with silver and gold.

16

But wisest Fate says no,
150 This must not yet be so;
The Babe lies yet in smiling infancy
That on the bitter cross
Must redeem our loss,
So both himself and us to glorify:
155 Yet first, to those ychained in sleep,[4]
The wakeful° trump of doom must thunder through the deep, awakening

17

With such a horrid clang
As on Mount Sinai rang,[5]
While the red fire and smoldering clouds outbrake:
160 The aged Earth, aghast,
With terror of that blast,
Shall from the surface to the center shake,
When, at the world's last sessiòn,
The dreadful Judge in middle air shall spread his throne.

18

165 And then at last our bliss
Full and perfect is,
But now begins; for from this happy day
Th' old Dragon° under ground, Satan
In straiter limits bound,
170 Not half so far casts his usurpèd sway,
And, wroth to see his kingdom fail,
Swinges° the scaly horror of his folded tail. lashes

19

The Oracles are dumb;[6]
No voice or hideous hum
175 Runs through the archèd roof in words deceiving.
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos leaving.
No nightly trance, or breathèd spell,
180 Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.

20

The lonely mountains o'er,
And the resounding shore,
A voice of weeping heard and loud lament;
From haunted spring, and dale
185 Edged with poplar pale,

4. I.e., death. Ychained: an archaic form recalling Chaucer and Spenser. Lines 155–64 allude to the Apocalypse as described in Revelation.
5. Moses received the Ten Commandments on Mount Sinai: "there were thunders and lightnings . . . and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud" (Exodus 19.16).
6. According to one ancient belief, pagan oracles ended with Christ's birth; according to another, the pagan gods became fallen angels.

The parting genius° is with sighing sent; local spirit
With flower-inwoven tresses torn
The Nymphs[7] in twilight shade of tangled thickets mourn.

21

In consecrated earth,
190 And on the holy hearth,
The Lars and Lemures[8] moan with midnight plaint;
In urns and altars round,
A drear and dying sound
Affrights the flamens° at their service quaint;° priests / elaborate
195 And the chill marble seems to sweat,
While each peculiar power forgoes his wonted° seat. usual

22

Peor[9] and Baalim
Forsake their temples dim,
With that twice-battered God of Palestine;[1]
200 And moonèd Ashtaroth,[2]
Heaven's queen and mother both,
Now sits not girt° with tapers'° holy shine: encircled / candles'
The Libyc Hammon[3] shrinks his horn;
In vain the Tyrian maids their wounded Thammuz mourn.[4]

23

205 And sullen Moloch,[5] fled,
Hath left in shadows dread
His burning idol all of blackest hue;
In vain with cymbals' ring
They call the grisly king,
210 In dismal dance about the furnace blue;
The brutish gods of Nile as fast,
Isis, and Orus, and the dog Anubis, haste.[6]

24

Nor is Osiris seen
In Memphian grove or green,
215 Trampling the unshowered grass[7] with lowings loud;
Nor can he be at rest
Within his sacred chest;
Nought but profoundest Hell can be his shroud;

7. Mythological female spirits inhabiting a particular place, object, or natural phenomenon.
8. Hostile spirits of the unburied dead. Lars: tutelary gods or spirits of the ancient Romans, associated with particular places.
9. Baal, or Baal-Peor, the highest Canaanite god, whose shrine was at Mt. Peor. Baalim (the plural form) were lesser gods related to him.
1. Dagon, god of the Philistines, whose statue twice fell to the ground before the ark of the Lord (1 Samuel 5.1–4).
2. Astarte, a Phoenician fertility goddess identified with the moon.
3. The Egyptian god Ammon, represented as a horned ram. He had a famous temple and oracle at an oasis in the Libyan desert.
4. The death of the god Thammuz, Ashtaroth's lover, symbolized the coming of winter. The Tyrian (Phoenician) women mourned for him in an annual ceremony.
5. A Phoenician fire god to whom children were sacrificed. Their cries were drowned out by the clang of cymbals.
6. The Egyptian goddess Isis was represented as a cow, the gods Orus and Anubis as a hawk and a dog (hence "brutish"). Osiris (line 213) the creator, who had a shrine at Memphis, was represented as a bull. As fast: i.e., hasten away as fast as Moloch fled.
7. I.e., the rainless Egyptian landscape.

In vain, with timbreled° anthems dark, tambourine-backed
220 The sable-stolèd sorcerers bear his worshipped ark.

25

He feels from Juda's land
The dreaded Infant's hand;[8]
The rays of Bethlehem blind his dusky eyn;° eyes
Nor all the gods beside 225 Longer dare abide,
Not Typhon[9] huge ending in snaky twine:
Our Babe, to show his Godhead true,
Can in his swaddling° bands control the damnèd crew. binding

26

So, when the sun in bed,
230 Curtained with cloudy red,
Pillows his chin upon an orient° wave, Eastern; bright
The flocking shadows pale
Troop to th' infernal[1] jail;
Each fettered ghost slips to his several° grave, separate
235 And the yellow-skirted fays° fairies
Fly after the night-steeds, leaving their moon-loved maze.[2]

27

But see! the Virgin blest
Hath laid her Babe to rest.
Time is our tedious song should here have ending:
240 Heaven's youngest-teemèd star[3]
Hath fixed her polished car,
Her sleeping Lord with handmaid lamp attending;
And all about the courtly stable
Bright-harnessed[4] angels sit in order serviceable.

On Shakespeare[5]

What needs my Shakespeare for his honored bones
The labor of an age in pilèd stones?
Or that his hallowed reliques should be hid
Under a star-ypointing[6] pyramid?
5 Dear son of Memory,[7] great heir of Fame,

8. I.e., the hand of Christ, who was descended from the tribe of Judah. Perhaps an allusion to Matthew 2.6, referring to Micah 5.2, on the power resident in Bethlehem, in the land of Judah.
9. In Greek mythology, a hundred-headed monster destroyed by Zeus.
1. Of the realm of the dead; i.e., hell(ish).
2. Labyrinth, i.e., the woods where the fairies dance.
3. I.e., newest-born star, the star that guided the wise men, now imagined as having halted its "car" or chariot over the manger.
4. I.e., clad in bright armor. Courtly: i.e., because it houses Christ, the king.
5. Milton's first published poem, printed in the Second Folio of Shakespeare's plays (1632) as "An Epitaph on the Admirable Dramatic Poet W. Shakespear."
6. An archaic form recalling Chaucer and Spenser.
7. In Greek mythology, Memory (Mnemosyne) was the mother of the Muses, the nine sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts.

What need'st thou such weak witness of thy name?
Thou in our wonder and astonishment
Hast built thyself a livelong monument.
For whilst, to th' shame of slow-endeavoring art,
10 Thy easy numbers° flow, and that each heart — verses
Hath from the leaves of thy unvalued° book — invaluable
Those Delphic[8] lines with deep impression took,
Then thou, our fancy of itself bereaving,
Dost make us marble with too much conceiving,
15 And so sepùlchred in such pomp dost lie
That kings for such a tomb would wish to die.

1630 — 1645

L'Allegro[9]

Hence loathèd Melancholy[1]
Of Cerberus[2] and blackest midnight born,
In Stygian[3] cave forlorn
'Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy,
5 Find out some uncouth[4] cell,
Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings,
And the night-raven sings;
There under ebon° shades, and low-browed rocks, — black
As ragged as thy locks,
10 In dark Cimmerian[5] desert ever dwell.
But come thou goddess fair and free,
In Heaven yclept° Euphrosyne,[6] — called
And by men, heart-easing Mirth,
Whom lovely Venus° at a birth — goddess of love and beauty
15 With two sister Graces° more — Aglaia and Thalia
To ivy-crownèd Bacchus° bore; — god of wine
Or whether (as some sager sing)[7]
The frolic wind that breathes the spring,
Zephyr with Aurora playing,
20 As he met her once a-Maying,
There on beds of violets blue,
And fresh-blown° roses washed in dew, — newly bloomed
Filled her with thee a daughter fair,
So buxom,° blithe, and debonair.° — merry / pleasant

8. Pertaining to Apollo, god of poetry, who had an oracle at Delphi.
9. "L'Allegro" (Italian, "the happy man") is a companion poem to "Il Penseroso" ("the pensive man"). Probably written late in Milton's years at Cambridge, the poems influenced many later poets and were illustrated by William Blake (1757–1827).
1. Thought to arise from an excess of black bile, melancholy was a physiological condition that could lead to depression and madness. Hence: a command to depart.
2. In Greek mythology, the three-headed dog that guarded the gates of hell.
3. Pertaining to the Styx, one of the rivers of the classical underworld.
4. Unknown and dreadful.
5. According to Homer's Odyssey, the Cimmerians lived in a mysterious land somewhere across the ocean, where the sun never shone.
6. One of the three Graces, Greek sister goddesses believed to bring joy to humans. Her name means "mirth."
7. The following mythical account of Euphrosyne's birth seems to be Milton's invention. Zephyr is the west wind; Aurora, the dawn.

25 Haste thee nymph,° and bring with thee — nature goddess
Jest and youthful Jollity,
Quips and Cranks,° and wanton Wiles, — jests
Nods, and Becks,° and wreathèd Smiles, — beckonings
Such as hang on Hebe's[8] cheek,
30 And love to live in dimple sleek;
Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter, holding both his sides.
Come, and trip° it as ye go — dance
On the light fantastic toe,
35 And in thy right hand lead with thee,
The mountain nymph, sweet Liberty;
And if I give thee honor due,
Mirth, admit me of thy crew
To live with her and live with thee,
40 In unreprovèd° pleasures free; — unblamed
To hear the lark[9] begin his flight,
And, singing, startle the dull night,
From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise;
45 Then to come in spite° of sorrow, — contempt
And at my window bid good morrow,
Through the sweetbriar, or the vine,
Or the twisted eglantine.[1]
While the cock with lively din,
50 Scatters the rear of darkness thin,
And to the stack, or the barn door,
Stoutly struts his dames before;
Oft listening how the hounds and horn
Cheerly rouse the slumbering morn,
55 From the side of some hoar[2] hill,
Through the high wood echoing shrill.
Sometime walking not unseen
By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
Right against the eastern gate,
60 Where the great sun begins his state,° — progress
Robed in flames, and amber light,
The clouds in thousand liveries dight;° — dressed
While the plowman near at hand,
Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
65 And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
And the mower whets his scythe,
And every shepherd tells his tale,
Under the hawthorn in the dale.
Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures
70 Whilst the landscape round it measures,
Russet° lawns and fallows° gray, — reddish brown / plowed land
Where the nibbling flocks do stray,
Mountains on whose barren breast

8. Zeus's cupbearer and goddess of youth.
9. Larks sing at sunrise.
1. The sweetbriar, possibly used here to mean the honeysuckle.
2. Grayish white, perhaps because of a morning frost.

The laboring clouds do often rest;
75 Meadows trim with daisies pied,° variegated
Shallow brooks, and rivers wide.
Towers and battlements it sees
Bosomed high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
80 The cynosure[3] of neighboring eyes.
Hard by, a cottage chimney smokes,
From betwixt two aged oaks,
Where Corydon and Thyrsis[4] met,
Are at their savory dinner set
85 Of herbs, and other country messes,° dishes
Which the neat-handed° Phyllis dresses;° dexterous / prepares
And then in haste her bower she leaves,
With Thestylis to bind the sheaves;
Or if the earlier season lead
90 To the tanned haycock in the mead.[5]
Sometimes with secure° delight carefree
The upland hamlets will invite,
When the merry bells ring round
And the jocund° rebecks[6] sound merry
95 To many a youth and many a maid,
Dancing in the checkered shade;
And young and old come forth to play
On a sunshine holiday,
Till the livelong daylight fail;
100 Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
With stories told of many a feat,
How fairy Mab the junkets eat;[7]
She was pinched and pulled, she said,
And he, by Friar's lantern[8] led,
105 Tells how the drudging goblin[9] sweat
To earn his cream-bowl, duly set,
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn
That ten day-laborers could not end;
110 Then lies him down the lubber° fiend, loutish
And, stretched out all the chimney's° length, fireplace's
Basks at the fire his hairy strength;
And crop-full out of doors he flings
Ere the first cock his matin° rings. morning
115 Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.
Towered cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men,

3. The North Star, or anything that attracts attention.
4. Conventional male names in pastoral poetry, like Thestylis (line 88); Phyllis (line 86) is a conventional female pastoral name.
5. I.e., the sun-dried, conical heap of hay in the field.
6. Small, three-stringed fiddles.
7. I.e., Mab, queen of the fairies, ate the delicacies ("junkets"). The behavior attributed to fairies here and in the following lines reflects traditional rustic lore.
8. The will-o'-the-wisp, which was said to draw travelers astray by holding a false light before them; the phenomenon of nocturnal light is caused by the combustion of marsh gas.
9. A hobgoblin, also known as Robin Goodfellow or Puck, was a small supernatural creature popular in northern-European folk traditions. He is an important character in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, a play that "L'Allegro" frequently echoes.

Where throngs of knights and barons bold,
120 In weeds° of peace high triumphs° hold, garments / pageants
With store° of ladies, whose bright eyes plenty
Rain influence,[1] and judge the prize
Of wit, or arms, while both contend
To win her grace, whom all commend.
125 There let Hymen° oft appear god of marriage
In saffron° robe, with taper° clear, orange-yellow / torch
And pomp, and feast, and revelry,
With masque, and antique[2] pageantry;
Such sights as youthful poets dream
130 On summer eves by haunted stream.
Then to the well-trod stage anon,
If Jonson's learned sock[3] be on,
Or sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child,
Warble his native wood-notes wild.
135 And ever against eating cares
Lap me in soft Lydian airs[4]
Married to immortal verse
Such as the meeting soul may pierce
In notes, with many a winding bout° turn
140 Of linkèd sweetness long drawn out,
With wanton heed, and giddy cunning,
The melting voice through mazes running;
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony;
145 That Orpheus' self[5] may heave his head
From golden slumber on a bed
Of heaped Elysian° flowers, and hear glorious
Such strains as would have won the ear
Of Pluto, to have quite set free
150 His half-regained Eurydice.
These delights if thou canst give,
Mirth, with thee I mean to live.[6]

ca. 1631 1645

Il Penseroso[7]

Hence[8] vain deluding Joys,
The brood of Folly without father bred.

1. The ladies' eyes are compared to stars, alluding to the medieval idea that the stars emitted an ethereal liquid ("influence") that could powerfully affect human lives.
2. Ancient; also, antic. Masque: an elaborate form of court entertainment, in which aristocrats performed in a dignified play, usually allegorical and mythological, that ended in a formal dance.
3. The light shoe worn by Greek comic actors, here standing for the comedies of Ben Jonson (1572–1637).
4. Lydian music was noted for its voluptuous sweetness.
5. The great poet and musician of classical mythology, whose wife, Eurydice, died on their wedding day. He won permission from Pluto, god of the underworld, to lead her back to the land of the living, but only on the condition that he not look to see if she was following him. Unable to resist a backward glance, he lost her forever.
6. Lines 151–52 echo Christopher Marlowe, "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love," lines 23–24 (see p. 256).
7. See "L'Allegro," note 9 (p. 402). Here, the Pensive Man celebrates a melancholy that produces not depression and madness but the scholarly temperament, ruled by the Roman god Saturn.
8. A command to depart.

How little you bestead,° profit
Or fill the fixèd mind with all your toys;° trifles
5 Dwell in some idle brain,
And fancies fond° with gaudy shapes possess, foolish
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes° that people the sunbeams, specks
Or likest hovering dreams,
10 The fickle pensioners° of Morpheus'[9] train. attendants
But hail thou Goddess, sage and holy,
Hail, divinest Melancholy,
Whose saintly visage is too bright
To hit° the sense of human sight; affect
15 And therefore to our weaker view,
O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom's hue.
Black, but such as in esteem,
Prince Memnon's sister[1] might beseem,
Or that starred Ethiope queen[2] that strove
20 To set her beauty's praise above
The sea nymphs, and their powers offended.
Yet thou art higher far descended;
Thee bright-haired Vesta long of yore
To solitary Saturn bore;[3]
25 His daughter she (in Saturn's reign
Such mixture was not held a stain).
Oft in glimmering bowers and glades
He met her, and in secret shades
Of woody Ida's inmost grove,
30 While yet there was no fear of Jove.[4]
Come pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain,° color
Flowing with majestic train,
35 And sable° stole of cypress lawn[5] black
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Come, but keep thy wonted° state, usual; wanted
With even step and musing gait,
And looks commercing with the skies,
40 Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes:
There held in holy passion still,
Forget thyself to marble, till
With a sad° leaden downward cast, serious
Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
45 And join with thee calm Peace and Quiet,
Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
And hears the Muses[6] in a ring

9. Greek god of sleep.
1. Memnon, an Ethiopian prince, was called the handsomest of men (Homer's Odyssey, book 11). His sister was Hemera, whose name means "day."
2. Cassiopeia, who boasted that her beauty (or her daughter's, in some accounts) surpassed that of the daughters of the sea god Nereus. "Starred" refers to the fact that a constellation bears her name.
3. The parentage here attributed to Melancholy is Milton's invention. Saturn, who ruled on Mt. Ida before being overthrown by his son Jove, was associated with melancholy because of the supposedly "saturnine" influence of the planet that bears his name. His daughter Vesta was the goddess of purity.
4. The most powerful god of Roman mythology.
5. A gauzy, crepelike material, usually dyed black and used for mourning garments; cypress: Cyprus, where the material was originally made.
6. The nine sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts; at the foot of Mt. Helicon, they danced about the altar of Jove.

Aye° round about Jove's altar sing. continually
And add to these retired Leisure,
50 That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;
But first, and chiefest, with thee bring,
Him that yon soars on golden wing,
Guiding the fiery-wheelèd throne,
The cherub Contemplation;[7]
55 And the mute Silence hist° along beckon
'Less Philomel[8] will deign a song,
In her sweetest, saddest plight,
Smoothing the rugged brow of night,
While Cynthia[9] checks her dragon yoke
60 Gently o'er th' accustomed oak;
Sweet bird that shunn'st the noise of folly,
Most musical, most melancholy!
Thee chantress oft the woods among,
I woo to hear thy evensong;[1]
65 And missing thee, I walk unseen
On the dry smooth-shaven green,
To behold the wandering moon,
Riding near her highest noon,
Like one that had been led astray
70 Through the Heaven's wide pathless way;
And oft as if her head she bowed,
Stooping through a fleecy cloud.
Oft on a plat° of rising ground, plot
I hear the far-off curfew sound,[2]
75 Over some wide-watered shore,
Swinging slow with sullen roar;
Or if the air will not permit,
Some still removèd place will fit,
Where glowing embers through the room
80 Teach light to counterfeit a gloom
Far from all resort of mirth,
Save the cricket on the hearth,
Or the bellman's° drowsy charm, night watchman's
To bless the doors from nightly harm;
85 Or let my lamp at midnight hour
Be seen in some high lonely tower,
Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,[3]
With thrice great Hermes, or unsphere[4]

7. A reference to the vision of the four cherubim (a high order of angels) stationed beside four wheels of fire under the throne of the Lord (Ezekiel 1 and 10).
8. I.e., or else Philomel will condescend to sing a song. Philomel, the nightingale, who sings a mournful song in the springtime: according to Ovid's version of this popular myth, Philomela was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not speak. She wove the story in a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. She was later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus.
9. Goddess of the moon, sometimes represented as driving a team of dragons.
1. The evening liturgy traditionally sung by cloistered monks and nuns (here, a "chantress"). Cf. "L'Allegro," line 114, where a cock announces "matins," the morning liturgy.
2. The customary ringing of a bell at a fixed hour in the evening.
3. The Great Bear, or Big Dipper, which in northern latitudes never sets.
4. To call Plato back, by magic, from whatever sphere of the universe he inhabits now, or, in practical terms, to read his books. "Thrice great Hermes" refers to an ancient Egyptian philosopher (Hermes Trismegistus) often identified with Thoth, Egyptian god of wisdom, and alleged to have written many books on astrological, alchemical, and other subjects.

The spirit of Plato to unfold
90 What worlds, or what vast regions hold
The immortal mind that hath forsook
Her mansion in this fleshly nook;
And of those demons[5] that are found
In fire, air, flood, or underground,
95 Whose power hath a true consent° correspondence
With planet, or with element.
Some time let gorgeous Tragedy
In sceptered° pall° come sweeping by, royal / robe
Presenting Thebes, or Pelops' line,
100 Or the tale of Troy divine.[6]
Or what (though rare) of later age
Ennobled hath the buskined stage.[7]
But, O sad virgin, that thy power
Might raise Musaeus[8] from his bower,
105 Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing
Such notes as, warbled to the string,
Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,
And made Hell grant what Love did seek.
Or call up him[9] that left half told
110 The story of Cambuscan bold,
Of Camball, and of Algarsife,
And who had Canacee to wife,
That owned the virtuous° ring and glass,° potent / mirror
And of the wondrous horse of brass,
115 On which the Tartar king did ride;
And if aught else great bards beside
In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
Of tourneys and of trophies hung,
Of forests and enchantments drear,
120 Where more is meant than meets the ear.
Thus, Night, oft see me in thy pale career,
Till civil-suited morn[1] appear,
Not tricked° and frounced° as she was adorned / curled wont,° accustomed to be
With the Attic boy to hunt,
125 But kerchiefed in a comely cloudly
While rocking winds are piping loud,
Or ushered with a shower still,° gentle; yet
When the gust hath blown his fill,
Ending on the rustling leaves,
130 With minute-drops from off the eaves.

5. Supernatural beings inhabiting each of the four "elements": fire, air, water, and earth.
6. The city of Thebes, the descendants of Pelops, and the Trojan War afforded the subjects of most Greek tragedies.
7. The buskin was the high boot worn by Greek tragic actors.
8. A legendary Greek poet, contemporary of Orpheus (line 105); for the story of Orpheus, see "L'Allegro," note 5 (p. 405).
9. Chaucer, whose "Squire's Tale" leaves unfinished the story of the Tartar king Cambuscan, his two sons, Camball and Algarsife, and his daughter, Canacee. At a banquet celebrating Cambuscan's reign, a mysterious guest offered several magical gifts to the king.
1. Aurora, goddess of the dawn, soberly dressed ("civil-suited"); she loved Cephalus ("the Attic boy," line 124).

And when the sun begins to fling
His flaring beams, me, Goddess, bring
To archèd walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown that Sylvan[2] loves
135 Of pine or monumental oak,
Where the rude ax with heavèd stroke,
Was never heard the nymphs[3] to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
There in close covert° by some brook, hidden place
140 Where no profaner eye may look,
Hide me from day's garish eye,
While the bee with honeyed thigh,
That at her flowery work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring
145 With such consort° as they keep, harmony
Entice the dewy-feathered sleep;
And let some strange mysterious dream,
Wave at his wings in airy stream,
Of lively portraiture displayed,
150 Softly on my eyelids laid.
And as I wake, sweet music breathe
Above, about, or underneath,
Sent by some spirit to mortals good,
Or th' unseen genius° of the wood. indwelling spirit
155 But let my due feet never fail
To walk the studious cloister's pale,° enclosure
And love the high embowèd roof,
With antic° pillars massy proof, fancifully decorated; antique
And storied windows[4] richly dight,° dressed
160 Casting a dim religious light.
There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full-voiced choir below,
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
165 Dissolve me into ectasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes.
And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown and mossy cell,
170 Where I may sit and rightly spell° speculate
Of every star that Heaven doth show,
And every herb that sips the dew
Till old experience do attain
To something like prophetic strain.
175 These pleasures, Melancholy, give,
And I with thee will choose to live.[5]

ca. 1631 1645

2. Sylvanus, Roman god of forests.
3. Mythological female spirits inhabiting a particular place, object, or natural phenomenon.
4. Stained-glass windows depicting biblical stories. Massy proof: massive solidity.
5. Cf. "L'Allegro," lines 151–52 and note 6 (p. 405).

How Soon Hath Time[6]

How soon hath Time, the subtle thief of youth,
Stoln on his wing my three and twentieth year!
My hasting days fly on with full career,
But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.° showeth
5 Perhaps my semblance° might deceive the truth, appearance
That I to manhood am arrived so near,
And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
That some more timely-happy spirits endu'th.° endoweth
Yet be it° less or more, or soon or slow, inner "ripeness"
10 It shall be still in strictest measure even° equal; adequate
To that same lot, however mean or high,
Toward which Time leads me, and the will of Heaven;
All is, if I have grace to use it so,
As ever in my great Taskmaster's eye.[7]

Lycidas

In This Monody the Author Bewails a Learned Friend,[8] Unfortunately Drowned in His Passage from Chester on the Irish Seas, 1637. And by Occasion Foretells the Ruin of Our Corrupted Clergy, Then in Their Height.

Yet once more, O ye laurels[9] and once more
Ye myrtles brown,° with ivy never sere,° dark / withered
I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,° unripe
And with forced fingers rude,° unskilled
5 Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year.
Bitter constraint, and sad occasion dear,° heartfelt, dire
Compels me to disturb your season due;
For Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime,
Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer.
10 Who would not sing for Lycidas? He knew
Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme.
He must not float upon his watery bier[1]
Unwept, and welter° to the parching wind, roll about
Without the meed° of some melodious tear.° tribute / elegy
15 Begin then, sisters of the sacred well

6. Milton's twenty-third birthday was on December 9, 1631. He enclosed a copy of this poem in a letter to a friend who, according to Milton, had accused him of dreaming away his "years in the arms of a studious retirement."
7. The metaphor of God as Taskmaster alludes to two parables in which God appears to be harsh to his servants: the parable of the talents (Matthew 25.14–30) and the parable of the vineyard (Matthew 20.1–10).
8. Edward King, a young scholar, poet, and clergyman at Cambridge with Milton. This poem, which draws heavily on pastoral traditions, was first published with some elegies by King's friends at Cambridge in 1638 after King's ship mysteriously foundered on a clear day in August 1637. His body was not recovered. Milton added this headnote when he published the elegy in his 1645 Poems. Monody: an elegy or dirge sung by a single voice.
9. Laurel, myrtle, and ivy were all traditional materials for garlands bestowed on poets.
1. A stand on which a corpse is carried to the grave.

That from beneath the seat of Jove doth spring,
Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.[2]
Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse;
So may some gentle° Muse° — kindly / poet
20 With lucky words favor my destined urn,[3]
And as he passes turn,
And bid fair peace be to my sable° shroud. — black
For we were nursed upon the selfsame hill,
Fed the same flock, by fountain, shade, and rill.° — brook
25 Together both, ere the high lawns° appeared — pastures
Under the opening eyelids of the morn,
We drove afield, and both together heard
What time the grayfly winds her sultry horn,[4]
Battening° our flocks with the fresh dews of night, — fattening
30 Oft till the star that rose at evening bright[5]
Toward Heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel.
Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute,
Tempered to th' oaten flute,[6]
Rough satyrs danced, and fauns with cloven heel[7]
35 From the glad sound would not be absent long,
And old Damoetas[8] loved to hear our song.
But O the heavy change, now thou art gone,
Now thou art gone, and never must return!
Thee, shepherd,[9] thee the woods and desert caves,
40 With wild thyme and the gadding° vine o'ergrown, — wandering
And all their echoes mourn.
The willows and the hazel copses° green — groves
Shall now no more be seen,
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.° — songs
45 As killing as the canker° to the rose, — cankerworm
Or taint-worm to the weanling herds that graze,
Or frost to flowers that their gay wardrobe wear,
When first the white thorn blows;° — blooms
Such, Lycidas, thy loss to shepherd's ear.
50 Where were ye, nymphs,[1] when the remorseless deep
Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?
For neither were ye playing on the steep,
Where your old Bards, the famous Druids lie,
Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high,
55 Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream:[2]
Ay me! I fondly° dream— — foolishly

2. I.e., play your music. Sisters of the sacred well: the Muses, nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts and goddesses of song; the well sacred to them was Aganippe, at the foot of Mt. Helicon, where they danced about the altar of Jove (Greek Zeus), the supreme god.
3. I.e., place of burial.
4. I.e., the insect hum of midday, as the grayfly blows ("winds") her horn in the ("sultry") heat of day.
5. I.e., Hesperus, the evening star.
6. Panpipes, traditionally played by shepherds in pastoral.
7. In Roman mythology, the half-goat, half-man woodland gods associated with lust and drinking (although the fauns were sometimes described as less wild than the satyrs).
8. A conventional pastoral name, here perhaps referring to one of the tutors at Cambridge.
9. I.e., Lycidas.
1. Mythological female spirits inhabiting a particular place, object, or natural phenomenon.
2. The "steep" is probably the mountain Kerig-y-Druidion, a burial ground in northern Wales for the Druids, priestly poet-kings of Celtic Britain. Mona is the Isle of Anglesey, Deva the river Dee, called "wizard" because its changes of course were supposed to foretell the country's fortune. All three places are just south of that part of the Irish Sea where King drowned.

Had ye been there—for what could that have done?
What could the Muse[3] herself that Orpheus bore,
The Muse herself, for her inchanting son
60 Whom universal Nature did lament,
When by the rout that made the hideous roar,
His gory visage° down the stream was sent, face
Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore?
Alas! What boots° it with uncessant care profits
65 To tend the homely slighted shepherd's trade,
And strictly meditate the thankless Muse?[4]
Were it not better done as others use,
To sport with Amaryllis[5] in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neaera's hair?
70 Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
(That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights, and live laborious days;[6]
But the fair guerdon° when we hope to find, reward
And think to burst out into sudden blaze,
75 Comes the blind Fury[7] with th' abhorrèd shears,
And slits the thin spun life. "But not the praise,"
Phoebus[8] replied, and touched my trembling ears;
"Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glistering foil[9]
80 Set off to th' world, nor in broad rumor lies,
But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes,
And perfect witness of all-judging Jove;
As he pronounces lastly on each deed,
Of so much fame in Heaven expect thy meed."° reward
85 O fountain Arethuse,[1] and thou honored flood,
Smooth-sliding Mincius, crowned with vocal reeds,
That strain I heard was of a higher mood.
But now my oat° proceeds, oaten pipe; song
And listens to the herald of the sea
90 That came in Neptune's plea.[2]
He asked the waves, and asked the felon° winds, savage
"What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain?"° rustic fellow
And questioned every gust of rugged° wings stormy
That blows from off each beakèd promontory;
95 They knew not of his story,
And sage Hippotades[3] their answer brings,
That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed,

3. Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry. Her son, Orpheus, the greatest of all poets and musicians, was torn limb from limb by a band of Thracian Maenads, who flung his head into the river Hebrus, whence it drifted across the Aegean to the island of Lesbos.
4. I.e., do a poet's work.
5. A conventional pastoral name for a woman, like Neaera in the next line.
6. I.e., fame is an incentive to virtue and hard work.
7. Atropos, the third of the three classical goddesses called the Fates; she cut the thread of a person's life after it had been spun and measured by her sisters.
8. Phoebus Apollo, god of poetic inspiration, who plucked Virgil's ears as a warning against impatient ambition (see Virgil's Eclogues 6.3–4).
9. The setting for a gem, especially one that enhances the appearance of an inferior or false stone.
1. A fountain in Sicily, associated with the pastoral poems of the Greek poet Theocritus (ca. 310–250 B.C.E). The Mincius (next line) is a river in Italy described in one of Virgil's pastorals.
2. The merman Triton comes to plead that his master, Neptune, is innocent of Lycidas's death.
3. Aeolus, son of Hippotas and god of the winds.

The air was calm, and on the level brine,[4]
Sleek Panope[5] with all her sisters played.
100 It was that fatal and perfidious bark[6]
Built in th' eclipse, and rigged with curses dark,[7]
That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.
Next Camus,[8] reverend sire, went footing slow,
His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge,
105 Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe.
"Ah! who hath reft," quoth he, "my dearest pledge?"° child
Last came and last did go
The pilot of the Galilean lake,[9]
110 Two massy keys he bore of metals twain° two
(The golden opes,° the iron shuts amain).° opens / vehemently
He shook his mitered locks, and stern bespake:
"How[1] well could I have spared° for thee, young swain, given up
Enow° of such as for their bellies' sake, enough
115 Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold!
Of other care they little reckoning make,
Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,
And shove away the worthy bidden guest.
Blind mouths! That scarce themselves know how to hold 120 A sheep-hook, or have learned aught else the least
That to the faithful herdsman's art belongs!
What recks it them?[2] What need they? They are sped;[3]
And when they list,° their lean and flashy° songs choose / insipid
Grate on their scrannel° pipes of wretched straw. meager
125 The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
But swoln with wind, and the rank mist they draw,° inhale
Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread,
Besides what the grim wolf with privy paw[4]
Daily devours apace,° and nothing said. quickly
130 But that two-handed engine at the door
Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more."[5]
Return, Alpheus,[6] the dread voice is past,
That shrunk thy streams; return, Sicilian muse,
And call the vales, and bid them hither cast

4. I.e., the surface; brine: saltwater.
5. One of the Nereids, daughters of Nereus, the Old Man of the Sea.
6. I.e., the ship.
7. Eclipses were considered evil omens.
8. The god of the river Cam, representing Cambridge University, personified as wearing an academic robe ("mantle" and "bonnet") with colors like the dark reeds ("sedge") on its banks, but relieved by the crimson hyacinth ("sanguine flower"). Certain markings on the hyacinth—created by Apollo from the blood of the youth Hyacinthus, whom he had killed by accident with a discus—are supposed to be the letters AIAI ("Alas, alas!"), inscribed by Apollo.
9. St. Peter, the Galilean fisherman, to whom Christ promised the keys of the kingdom of heaven (Matthew 16.19). He wears the bishop's miter (line 112) as the first head of Christ's Church.
1. Here begins the speech condemning the "corrupted clergy" and foretelling their "ruin" as described in the argument. Camus uses the common metaphor of the shepherd as the pastor (pastor is Latin for shepherd) and the sheep as the congregation.
2. I.e., what does it matter to them?
3. I.e., they have prospered.
4. I.e., anti-Protestant forces, either Roman Catholic or Anglican; privy: furtive, sly.
5. A satisfactory explanation of these two lines has yet to be made, although many have been attempted. Most have taken the "two-handed engine" as an instrument of retribution against those clergy who neglect their responsibilities; possibilities include the ax of reformation, the two-handed sword of the archangel Michael, the two houses of Parliament, or death and damnation.
6. A river god who fell in love with the nymph Arethusa. When she fled to Sicily, he pursued her by diving under the sea and emerging on the island. There she was turned into a fountain (see line 85), and their waters mingled.

135 Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues.
Ye valleys low where the mild whispers use,° frequent
Of shades° and wanton winds, and gushing brooks, shadows
On whose fresh lap the swart star[7] sparely looks,
Throw hither all your quaint enameled eyes,
140 That on the green turf suck the honeyed showers,
And purple all the ground with vernal° flowers.[8] springtime
Bring the rathe° primrose that forsaken dies, early
The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,[9]
The white pink, and the pansy freaked° with jet, mottled
145 The glowing violet,
The musk-rose, and the well attired woodbine.° honeysuckle
With cowslips wan° that hang the pensive head, pale
And every flower that sad embroidery wears:
Bid amaranthus[1] all his beauty shed,
150 And daffadillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureate° hearse° where Lycid lies. laurel-decked / bier
For so to interpose a little ease,
Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise.° conjecture
Ay me! Whilst thee the shores and sounding seas
155 Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled,
Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides,[2]
Where thou perhaps under the whelming° tide overwhelming
Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous° world; monster-filled; huge
Or whether thou, to our moist vows[3] denied,
160 Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old,[4]
Where the great vision of the guarded mount
Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold;
Look homeward angel now, and melt with ruth:° pity
And, O ye dolphins, waft° the hapless youth.[5] transport
165 Weep no more, woeful shepherds, weep no more,
For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead,
Sunk though he be beneath the watery floor,
So sinks the day-star° in the ocean bed, sun
And yet anon° repairs his drooping head, soon
170 And tricks° his beams, and with new-spangled ore,° dresses / gold
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:
So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
Through the dear might of him that walked the waves,[6]
Where other groves, and other streams along,
175 With nectar pure his oozy° locks he laves,° slimy / bathes
And hears the unexpressive° nuptial song,[7] inexpressible
In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love.

7. Sirius, the Dog Star, thought to have a swart, or malignant, influence (perhaps because this star is in the zenith in late summer, when vegetation often withers).
8. Here begins a catalog of flowers, a traditional element of pastoral elegy.
9. Jasmine, fragrant white flowers. Crow-toe: a name for various plants, either wild hyacinth or buttercups.
1. A legendary flower, supposed never to fade.
2. The islands that lie west of Scotland's coast.
3. I.e., tearful prayers.
4. A legendary figure supposedly buried at Land's End, in Cornwall. The "mount" of the next line is St. Michael's Mount, at the tip of Land's End, "guarded" by the archangel Michael, who gazes southward toward Nemancos and the stronghold of Bayona, in northwestern Spain.
5. According to Greek mythology, Palaemon, a boy, drowned near Corinth; a dolphin carried his body to shore, and a temple was built to commemorate him. Milton may also be alluding to the myths of Arion and of Icadius, youths saved by dolphins from drowning.
6. I.e., Christ (Matthew 14.26).
7. Perhaps a reference to the "marriage supper of the lamb" (i.e., Christ), as described by St. John in the Apocalypse (Revelation 19.9).

There entertain him all the saints above,
In solemn troops and sweet societies
180 That sing, and singing in their glory move,
And wipe the tears forever from his eyes.
Now, Lycidas, the shepherds weep no more;
Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore,[8]
In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
185 To all that wander in that perilous flood.
Thus sang the uncouth° swain to th' oaks and rills, unlettered
While the still morn went out with sandals gray;
He touched the tender stops of various quills,[9]
With eager thought warbling his Doric[1] lay:
190 And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
And now was dropped into the western bay;
At last he rose, and twitched his mantle° blue: cloak
Tomorrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.

From Comus[2]

Song[3]

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen
Within thy airy shell,[4]
By slow Meander's margent green,[5]
And in the violet-embroider'd vale,
5 Where the love-lorn nightingale[6]
Nightly to thee her sad song mourneth well;

Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair
That likest thy Narcissus are?
O, if thou have
10 Hid them in some flowery cave,
Tell me but where,

8. The local divinity who protects navigators on the Irish Sea ("flood").
9. The individual reeds in a set of panpipes.
1. Pastoral, because Doric was the dialect of the ancient Greek pastoral writers Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus.
2. The last English work in Milton's 1645 Poems, the poetic drama commonly called Comus was originally titled simply "A Mask Presented at Ludlow Castle." It was produced in collaboration with the English composer Henry Lawes (1569–1662), who wrote music for these songs. Masques, popular in the seventeenth century, were court entertainments that included dance, song, drama, and spectacle; they usually celebrated an occasion—in this case, the earl of Bridgewater's assuming the presidency of Wales and the Marches. In the action of this masque, the Lady (played by the earl's daughter, Alice) is separated from her two younger brothers in a wood and accosted by Comus (a classical god of feast and revelry) and his band of revelers. Comus attempts to persuade the chaste and virtuous Lady to join their revelry, but she resists and is rescued by her brothers with help from the river nymph, Sabrina.
3. Lost in the forest, the Lady calls on the nymph Echo for assistance.
4. The sphere of air around Earth; Echo, in love with the handsome youth Narcissus, who spurned her love, pined away until only her voice remained (see Ovid, Metamorphosis 3.359–401).
5. Meander is a river in Phrygia with a very winding (thus "slow") course. Margent: margin, i.e., bank.
6. The nightingale is known for its sweet, nocturnal song; there are many classical myths about this bird. The Ovidian story of Philomela seems a likely subtext for the Lady's song because Philomela, like Echo, loses her full powers of speech. Philomela, however, was "love-lorn" only in the ironic sense of being victimized by another's passion; she was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not speak. She wove the story into a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. She was later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus.

Sweet queen of parley,° daughter of the sphere![7] speech
So mayst thou be translated to the skies,
And give resounding grace to all heav'n's harmonies.[8]

Song[9]

Sabrina fair,
Listen where thou art sitting
Under the glassy, cool, translucent wave,
In twisted braids of lilies knitting
5 The loose train of thy amber-dropping hair;[1]
Listen for dear honor's sake,
Goddess of the silver lake,
Listen and save.

Sabrina rises, attended by water-nymphs, and sings.

By the rushy-fringèd bank,
10 Where grows the willow and the osier[2] dank,
My sliding chariot stays,° halts
Thick set with agate, and the azure sheen[3]
Of turkis° blue, and emerald green, turquoise
That in the channel strays;
15 Whilst from off the waters fleet,
Thus I set my printless feet
O'er the cowslip's° velvet head, a wildflower's
That bends not as I tread;
Gentle Swain,[4] at thy request
20 I am here.

To Mr. H. Lawes, On His Airs[5]

Harry, whose tuneful and well-measured song
First taught our English music how to span° measure
Words with just note and accent, not to scan

7. Echo was, according to some accounts, the daughter of Air and Earth. Before her encounter with Narcissus, she distracted Hera, queen of the gods, by chattering while Hera's husband, Zeus, consorted with other nymphs and mortal women. Hera punished Echo by depriving her of the ability to speak, except to repeat the words of others.
8. In myth, a traditional method of bestowing immortality is transformation into a star or constellation; thus "translated to the skies," Echo will provide, with her echoes, a resonance to "heav'n's harmonies," perhaps the songs of the angels or the music of the spheres—a music, according to Pythagorean tradition, caused by the motion of the planetary spheres.
9. The attendant Spirit, who has aided the brothers' search for the Lady, calls on Sabrina for help. Sabrina was the goddess of the Severn; according to a story retold by Spenser, among others, she was a mortal girl thrown into the river by her vengeful stepmother, who was angry at the illicit liaison that resulted in Sabrina's birth. Milton adds to the legend Sabrina's magical powers and her special concern for virgins. In the text of the masque that Milton published in 1645, the Spirit speaks twenty-one lines of poetry between the first and second segments of this song.
1. Amber may refer to the color of her hair, i.e., blonde, through which water drips; or perhaps her hair is wet with amber-colored water; or amber is a perfume (from ambergris, a product of the whale), and thus her hair is shedding perfume.
2. A species of willow.
3. Deep blue luster. Agate: a precious stone.
4. Shepherd; the attendant Spirit is dressed as a shepherd.
5. Melodies. The composer Henry Lawes (see note 2, p. 415) had written the music for Milton's masque Comus (and printed the masque without Milton's name in 1637).

With Midas' ears,[6] committing° short and long, misjoining

To after-age thou shalt be writ the man
That with smooth air couldst humor best our tongue.

I Did but Prompt the Age

I did but prompt the age to quit their clogs[9]
By the known rules of ancient liberty,
When straight a barbarous noise environs me
Of owls and cuckoos, asses, apes, and dogs;[1]
5 As when those hinds that were transformed to frogs
Railed at Latona's twin-born progeny,[2]
Which after held the sun and moon in fee.° possession
But this is got by casting pearl to hogs,[3]
That bawl for freedom in their senseless mood,
10 And still revolt when truth would set them free.[4]
License they mean when they cry liberty;
For who loves that must first be wise and good:
But from that mark how far they rove we see,
For all this waste of wealth and loss of blood.

6. In Greek mythology, King Midas was given ass's ears for preferring the music of Pan, god of pastures, flocks, and shepherds, to that of Phoebus Apollo, god of music and poetry.
7. Perhaps a reference to "The Story," a poem by William Cartwright (1611–1643) that Lawes set to music.
8. In The Divine Comedy, Dante represents himself, on the threshold of Purgatory, as meeting the shade of his musician friend Casella, who sings a ballad to him.
9. Heavy objects tied to prisoners' feet to impede motion.
1. Milton had been attacked for advocating liberalized divorce laws. "Known rules of ancient liberty" (line 2) refers to the law of divorce set forth in Deuteronomy 24.1 and also to the natural law of reason.
2. Apollo and Diana, afterwards deities of the sun and moon, respectively. Their mother, Latona, was refused a drink by Lycian peasants ("hinds"), whom she then transformed into frogs.
3. I.e., I receive this response because I gave something valuable to those who could not appreciate its value. Cf. Matthew 7.6: "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you."
4. Cf. John 8.32: "And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."
5. Oliver Cromwell (1599–1655), successor to Sir Thomas Fairfax as commander in chief of the Parliamentary armies. Because of its subject, this poem could not be published in Milton's 1673 Poems.

They also serve who only stand and wait."

On the Late Massacre in Piedmont[6]

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old

6. In 1651, Parliament issued a coin bearing the words "Truth and Peace," to express confidence in the results of Cromwell's victories over the Scots at Preston on the banks of the Darwen (line 7) and at Dunbar (line 8) and Worcester (line 9).
7. King Charles I was beheaded in 1649.
8. I.e., as in the garlands of laurels bestowed on victors in ancient Greece.
9. A possible reference to the clergy who in 1652 asked Parliament to establish the English Church on broad Protestant principles but with a State-salaried and State-controlled ministry.
1. Indicating a voracious appetite; see Christ's warning to "beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves" (Matthew 7.15).
2. Milton had become totally blind in 1652.
3. An allusion to the parable of the talents, in which the servant who buried the single talent his lord had given him, instead of investing it, was deprived of all he had and cast "into outer darkness" at the lord's return (Matthew 25.14–30).
4. With a pun on usury, or interest.
5. Alludes to the parable of the vineyard (Matthew 20.1–10) and to John 9.4, Jesus' statement before curing a blind man: "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work."
6. Some seventeen hundred members of the Protestant Waldensian sect in the Piedmont in northwestern Italy died as a result of a treacherous attack by the duke of Savoy's forces on Easter Day, 1655.

When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones,[7]
5 Forget not: in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piedmontese that rolled
Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they

O'er all th' Italian fields where still doth sway
The triple tyrant:[8] that from these may grow
A hundredfold, who having learnt thy way
Early may fly the Babylonian woe.[9]

Methought I Saw

Methought I saw my late espousèd saint[5]
Brought to me like Alcestis[6] from the grave,

7. In Milton's time, Protestants thought the Waldensian sect dated from early Christian times rather than (as historians now think) from the twelfth century. "Stocks and stones" echoes the prophet Jeremiah's denunciation of the Israelites' worship of idols made of wood and stone (Jeremiah 3.9); Milton's phrase could encompass both pagan and Catholic forms of idolatry, and is appropriate in a lament for members of a heretical sect known for rejecting materialist tendencies in the Catholic Church.
8. The pope, whose tiara has three crowns.
9. Babylon, as a city of luxury and vice, was often linked with the Papal Court by Protestants, who took the destruction of the city described in Revelation 18 as an allegory of the fate in store for the Roman Church.
1. Cyriack Skinner, a pupil of Milton and grandson of Sir Edward Coke, the great jurist who had been chief justice of the King's Bench under James I.
2. The Greek goddess of justice.
3. Euclid and Archimedes (both third century B.C.E.), Greek mathematicians; Skinner's interest in Greek mathematics may have begun when he was a pupil in Milton's school on Aldersgate Street.
4. In 1655, King Charles X of Sweden was leading military campaigns against the Poles; Cardinal Mazarin was leading French policy.
5. The "saint," or soul in heaven, is probably Milton's second wife, Katherine Woodcock, to whom he had been married less than two years (hence "late espousèd") when she died, in 1658; since Milton had become blind in 1652, he almost certainly had never seen his wife. However, critics do not agree on the identity of the "saint." It is possibly a reference to Mary Powell, Milton's first wife, who died in childbirth in 1652.
6. The wife brought back from the dead to her husband, Admetus, by the hero Hercules ("Jove's

And such, as yet once more I trust to have Full sight of her in heaven without restraint,

10 Her face was veiled; yet to my fancied sight
Love, sweetness, goodness, in her person shined
So clear as in no face with more delight.
But O, as to embrace me she inclined,
I waked, she fled, and day brought back my night.

FROM PARADISE LOST[1]

The Verse[2]

The measure is English heroic verse without rhyme, as that of Homer in Greek, and of Virgil in Latin;[3] rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true great son,") in Euripides' Alcestis. She is veiled and must remain silent until ritually cleansed.

7. Hebrew law (Leviticus 12) prescribed certain sacrificial rituals for the purification of women after childbirth.

1. Milton wrote this epic poem to "justify the ways of God to men," as he asserts in the opening of Book 1. Although he eschews the traditional subject matter of epic poetry—"fabled knights / In battles feigned" (9.30–31)—he follows many conventions of the epic form, including the beginning in medias res ("in the middle of things"), the invocation of a muse (a request for divine aid in the writing of the poem), the division of the poem into twelve books, the use of epic similes (extended and elaborately detailed comparisons that temporarily draw the reader's attention from the subject at hand), and the epic catalog (as of ships in Homer's Iliad and fallen angels in Paradise Lost). While Milton establishes that his poem is part of an epic tradition that includes Homer's Iliad and Odyssey and Virgil's Aeneid, he questions some assumptions of that tradition (he introduces, for example, a different concept of heroism) and incorporates other generic elements such as pastoral and drama.

The poem begins in hell, where Satan and his fallen angels plot their revenge against God through the destruction of his newest creation, the human race (Books 1 and 2). In Book 3, the scene shifts to heaven, where God predicts the disobedience of Adam and Eve, and Christ volunteers to undertake their redemption. In Book 4, Satan enters Eden and attempts to enter Eve's mind in a dream. God sends the angel Raphael to warn Adam and Eve of Satan's intentions. In Books 5 and 6, Raphael narrates to Adam the story of the war in heaven between Satan and his followers, and God, Christ, and the angels loyal to God. Raphael goes on to relate the creation of the world and its inhabitants by God (Book 7). Adam, in Book 8, tells Raphael what he remembers of his own creation and of Eve's. Book 9 chronicles the temptation and fall of Adam and Eve. Christ descends from heaven to the garden to pronounce punishment upon the humans, and Sin and Death create a broad highway between hell and Earth (Book 10). Finally, God sends the angel Michael to expel Adam and Eve from the garden, but first Michael shows Adam the history of the world up through the coming of Christ, relating God's promise to redeem the human race through the sacrifice of his Son (Books 11 and 12). Adam and Eve, heartened by this promise, depart the garden "hand in hand with wand'ring steps and slow" (12.648). Although Milton draws on biblical accounts of the events he narrates, he both embellishes these accounts and adds entire events of his own devising (such as the war in heaven, modeled on classical stories of battles among gods).

While there are many ways of approaching this poem, any approach will benefit from a careful consideration of Milton's language and the formal features of his poetry. Milton is a master of prosody, and he frequently varies the meter of his blank verse in ways that enhance or complicate the meaning of the words. His wordplay and the ambiguous syntax of his long, complexly subordinated sentences allow the reader the experience, in small, of the freedom to choose within a predetermined structure, an experience not unlike that of the characters in his poem.

2. This note first appeared in a 1668 reissue of the first edition of Paradise Lost, following a note in which the printer, S. Simmons, claimed that he had "procured" the note to satisfy many readers curious about why "the poem rhymes not." Milton's decision to add the note may have been influenced by a debate between the poet John Dryden (1631–1700) and the dramatist Sir Robert Howard (1626–1698). Dryden's Essay on Dramatic Verse (1668) records the controversy, in which Dryden argues the merits of rhyme and Howard champions blank verse.

3. English heroic verse was the iambic line of five feet, or ten syllables; heroic verse in Greek and Latin poetry was the hexameter.

ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age, to set off wretched matter and lame meter; graced indeed since by the use of some famous modern poets, carried away by custom, but much to their own vexation, hindrance, and constraint, to express many things otherwise, and for the most part worse, than else they would have expressed them. Not without cause, therefore, some both Italian and Spanish poets of prime note have rejected rhyme both in longer and shorter works, as have also, long since, our best English tragedies, as a thing of itself, to all judicious ears, trivial and of no true musical delight; which consists only in apt numbers, fit quantity of syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another, not in the jingling sound of like endings, a fault avoided by the learned ancients both in poetry and all good oratory. This neglect then of rhyme, so little is to be taken for a defect, though it may seem so perhaps to vulgar readers, that it rather is to be esteemed an example set, the first in English, of ancient liberty recovered to heroic poem from the troublesome and modern bondage of rhyming.

[The Invocation][4]

Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree[5] whose mortal° taste deadly
Brought death into the world, and all our woe,
With loss of Eden, till one greater Man[6]
5 Restore us, and regain the blissful seat,
Sing, Heavenly Muse,[7] that, on the secret top
Of Oreb, or of Sinai, didst inspire
That shepherd who first taught the chosen seed
In the beginning how the Heavens and Earth
10 Rose out of Chaos: or, if Sion hill
Delight thee more, and Siloa's brook that flowed
Fast by the oracle of God, I thence
Invoke thy aid to my adventurous song,
That with no middle flight intends to soar
15 Above th' Aonian mount, while it pursues
Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme.[8]
And chiefly thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer

4. In these opening lines, Milton follows long-established epic tradition by stating his subject and invoking divine aid in the treatment of it.
5. In Genesis 2.17, God commands that Adam and Eve not eat from the fruit of one tree.
6. Christ, the second Adam.
7. The invocation of the muse is an epic convention. In the invocation to Book 7, Milton specifically calls upon Urania, the patroness of astronomy and one of the nine Muses of Greek tradition, to assist him in telling the story of Creation. But he insists that it is the "meaning, not the Name I call" (7.5), suggesting that the non-Christian name is inadequate to his true intentions.

Here, the muse seems to represent the Spirit of God, the same Spirit that spoke to Moses ("That shepherd," line 8) out of the burning bush on Mt. Horeb (also called Sinai) and commanded him to lead Israel ("the chosen seed") out of Egypt. God's Spirit might also be found at Jerusalem in the Temple of Mount Sion ("the oracle of God," line 12) overlooking the stream Siloam, here contrasted with such haunts of the pagan Muses as "th' Aonian mount" (Helicon, in Greece, line 15). Milton asks this Spirit not only for inspiration but for instruction, since God alone was present "from the first" (line 19) and knows the whole truth of the events Milton is about to relate.
8. Ironically, Milton's claim of originality in this line translates a boast made by Ariosto in his Orlando Furioso (1.2). In Paradise Lost, Book 9, lines 27–47 (see p. 426), Milton criticizes the kind of chivalric epic written by Ariosto and by Edmund Spenser.

Before all temples th' upright heart and pure,
Instruct me, for thou know'st; thou from the first 20 Wast present, and, with mighty wings outspread,
Dovelike sat'st brooding on the vast abyss,
And mad'st it pregnant: what in me is dark
Illumine; what is low, raise and support;
That, to the height of this great argument,° theme
25 I may assert Eternal Providence,
And justify the ways of God to men.

From Book 4[9]

O for that warning voice, which he who saw
Th' Apocalypse, heard cry in heaven aloud,
Then when the Dragon, put to second rout,° defeat
Came furious down to be revenged on men,
5 "Woe to the inhabitants on earth!"[1] that now,
While time was,[2] our first parents had been warned
The coming of their secret foe, and scaped° escaped
Haply so scaped his mortal snare;[3] for now
Satan, now first inflamed with rage, came down,
10 The tempter ere° th' accuser of mankind, before being
To wreck° on innocent frail man his loss[4] avenge, wreak
Of that first battle, and his flight to Hell:
Yet not rejoicing in his speed, though bold,
Far off and fearless, nor with cause to boast,
15 Begins his dire attempt, which nigh the birth
Now rolling,° boils in his tumultuous breast, moving on
And like a devilish engine[5] back recoils
Upon himself; horror and doubt distract
His troubled thoughts, and from the bottom stir
20 The Hell within him, for within him Hell
He brings, and round about him, nor from Hell
One step no more than from himself can fly
By change of place: now conscience wakes despair
That slumbered, wakes the bitter memory
25 Of what he was, what is, and what must be

9. Book 4 opens on the newly created Earth, and specifically in the garden of Eden, which Satan is approaching as the "foe" of "our first parents" (lines 7–8), Adam and Eve. Satan is a "secret" enemy because Adam and Eve do not yet know of his fall and vengeful decision to continue his battle against God by attacking God's new, human creatures. The narrator opens the book by expressing a desire to warn Adam and Eve of the danger they face "now" (line 8), in the epic's re-creation of a paradisal present time. Before seeing Eden, the reader sees and "hears" Satan, speaking in soliloquy. This speech was, according to Milton's nephew Edward Phillips, the first part of the epic Milton wrote, when he was still contemplating treating the Genesis story as a drama (to be called Adam Unparadized). Satan's hostile address to the sun (with a punning allusion to the Son of God, who, we later learn, has driven Satan from heaven) recalls the opening soliloquy of Shakespeare's Richard III, in which Richard, in the "winter of our discontent," also depicts his rival as a son/sun.

1. John of Patmos, in Revelation 12.7–12, hears such a cry during a second war in heaven between the dragon and the angels, at the end of time.

2. While there was still time.

3. His deadly (and, in this case, death-creating) trap. Haply: i.e., perhaps; also, with a play on happily.

4. I.e., Satan's, for which he seeks to "wreck"—take revenge—on "man" as a substitute for God and Christ.

5. I.e., the cannon that Satan invents in Book 6; but also a play on engine as "plot."

Worse; of worse deeds worse sufferings must ensue.
Sometimes towards Eden which now in his view
Lay pleasant, his grieved look he fixes sad,
Sometimes towards Heav'n and the full-blazing sun,
30 Which now sat high in his meridian tow'r:[6]
Then much revolving,° thus in sighs began. pondering
"O thou that with surpassing glory crowned,
Look'st from thy sole dominion like the god
Of this new world: at whose sight all the stars
35 Hide their diminished heads; to thee I call,
But with no friendly voice, and add thy name
O sun, to tell thee how I hate thy beams
That bring to my remembrance from what state
I fell, how glorious once above thy sphere;
40 Till pride and worse ambition threw me down
Warring in Heav'n against Heav'n's matchless King:
Ah wherefore! he deserved no such return
From me, whom he created what I was
In that bright eminence, and with his good
45 Upbraided none,[7] nor was his service hard.
What could be less than to afford him praise,
The easiest recompense, and pay him thanks,
How due! yet all his good proved ill in me,
And wrought but malice; lifted up so high
50 I 'sdained° subjection, and thought one step higher disdained
Would set me highest, and in a moment quit° repay
The debt immense of endless gratitude,
So burthensome still° paying, still to owe; always
Forgetful what from him I still received,
55 And understood not that a grateful mind
By owing owes not, but still pays, at once
Indebted and discharged; what burden then?
O had his powerful destiny ordained
Me some inferior angel, I had stood
60 Then happy; no unbounded hope had raised
Ambition. Yet why not? some other Power° angel
As great might have aspired, and me though mean° inferior, low
Drawn to his part; but other Powers as great Fell not, but stand unshaken, from within 65 Or from without, to all temptations armed.
Hadst thou[8] the same free will and power to stand?
Thou hadst: whom hast thou then or what to accuse,
But Heav'n's free love dealt equally to all?
Be then his love accursed, since love or hate,
70 To me alike, it deals eternal woe.
Nay cursed be thou; since against his thy will Chose freely what it now so justly rues.° regrets
Me miserable![9] which way shall I fly

6. Midday, the height of noon.
7. Demanded no return for his benefits. Cf. James 1.5: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God . . . and upbraideth not. . . ."
8. Satan addresses himself.
9. This phrase recalls the common Latin construction describing the self as an object, in the "accusative" case: me miserum!

Infinite wrath, and infinite despair?[1]
75 Which way I fly is Hell; myself am Hell;
And in the lowest deep a lower deep
Still threat'ning to devour me opens wide,
To which the Hell I suffer seems a Heav'n.
O then at last relent! is there no place
80 Left for repentance, none for pardon left?
None left but by submission; and that word
Disdain forbids me, and my dread of shame
Among the Spirits beneath, whom I seduced
With other promises and other vaunts° boasts
85 Than to submit, boasting I could subdue
Th' Omnipotent. Ay me, they little know
How dearly I abide° that boast so vain, pay the penalty for
Under what torments inwardly I groan:
While they adore me on the throne of Hell,
90 With diadem° and scepter high advanced crown
The lower still I fall, only supreme
In misery; such joy ambition finds.
But say I could repent and could obtain
By act of grace[2] my former state; how soon
95 Would hight recall high thoughts, how soon unsay
What feigned submission swore: ease would recant[3]
Vows made in pain, as violent° and void. forced
For never can true reconcilement grow
Where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep:
100 Which would but lead me to a worse relapse,
And heavier fall: so should I purchase dear
Short intermission bought with double smart.° sting
This knows my punisher; therefore as far
From granting he, as I from begging peace:
105 All hope excluded thus, behold instead
Of us outcast, exiled, his new delight,
Mankind created, and for him this world.
So farewell hope, and with hope farewell fear,
Farewell remorse: all good to me is lost;
110 Evil be thou my good; by thee at least
Divided empire with Heav'n's King I hold
By thee, and more than half perhaps will reign;[4]
As man ere long, and this new world shall know."

1. Compressed syntax: whichever way I fly, I shall find. . . .
2. By a favor, not a right; the term was often used in political contexts to describe a formal pardon.
3. Literally, sing again; the verb was often used to describe formal renunciations of religious views that the state deemed erroneous (e.g., Catholics might "recant" their views when arrested and interrogated by official authorities). Satan is ironically suggesting that a condition of "ease" acquired through submission would lead him to change the vows of "repentance" made in his present condition of pain.
4. Spelled raign in the original text, the verb is transitive and means "rule over."

The Argument[5]

Satan, having compassed the Earth, with meditated guile returns as a mist by night into Paradise; enters into the Serpent sleeping. Adam and Eve in the morning go forth to their labors, which Eve proposes to divide in several places, each laboring apart: Adam consents not, alleging the danger lest that enemy of whom they were forewarned should attempt her found alone. Eve, loth to be thought not circumspect or firm enough, urges her going apart, the rather desirous to make trial of her strength; Adam at last yields. The Serpent finds her alone: his subtle approach, first gazing, then speaking, with much flattery extolling Eve above all other creatures. Eve, wondering to hear the Serpent speak, asks how he attained to human speech and such understanding not till now; the Serpent answers that by tasting of a certain tree in the Garden he attained both to speech and reason, till then void of both. Eve requires him to bring her to that tree, and finds it to be the Tree of Knowledge forbidden; the Serpent, now grown bolder, with many wiles and arguments induces her at length to eat. She, pleased with the taste, deliberates a while whether to impart thereof to Adam or not; at last brings him of the fruit; relates what persuaded her to eat thereof. Adam, at first amazed, but perceiving her lost, resolves, through vehemence of love, to perish with her, and, extenuating the trespass, eats also of the fruit. The effects thereof in them both; they seek to cover their nakedness; then fall to variance and accusation of one another.

No more of talk where God or angel guest[6]
With man, as with his friend, familiar used
To sit indulgent, and with him partake
Rural repast, permitting him the while
5 Venial° discourse unblamed. I now must change — allowable
Those notes to tragic—foul distrust, and breach
Disloyal, on the part of man, revolt
And disobedience; on the part of Heaven,
Now alienated, distance and distaste,
10 Anger and just rebuke, and judgment given,
That brought into this world a world of woe,
Sin and her shadow Death, and Misery,
Death's harbinger. Sad task, yet argument
Not less but more heroic than the wrath
15 Of stern Achilles on his foe pursued
Thrice fugitive about Troy wall; or rage
Of Turnus for Lavinia disespoused;
Or Neptune's ire, or Juno's, that so long
Perplexed the Greek, and Cytherea's son:[7]

5. The Argument is a prose summary of the action of the book. Paradise Lost was originally published without Arguments, but the printer asked Milton to provide them because many readers found the poem difficult. They first appeared, with the note on the verse, in a 1668 reissue of the first edition.
6. Adam has just concluded a conversation with the angel Raphael (at the end of Book 8).
7. Important moments in important epics. Achilles, whose "wrath" is the epic subject announced

Unsung), or to describe races and games,
Or tilting furniture,[9] emblazoned shields,

in the first line of the Iliad, pursued Hector three times around the walls of Troy before slaying him. Turnus (in the Aeneid) fought with Aeneas for the hand of Lavinia. Neptune hindered Odysseus ("the Greek") in his attempts to return home after the Trojan War, and Juno, hostile to Venus ("Cytherea"), made difficulties for Venus's son Aeneas.

8. Urania, the "Heavenly Muse" whose aid Milton had invoked in Book 1, line 6 (but see also note 7, p. 421).

9. The equipment used in a tilt, or tournament, examples of which follow. Impreses: heraldic emblems displayed on shields. Caparisons: ornamented coverings spread over the saddles or harnesses of horses. Bases: skirtlike coverings, sometimes of armor, intended to decorate and protect warhorses.

1. I.e., to me, not skilled or learned in these things, remains a more important subject.

2. I.e., "heroic name" (from line 40).

3. I.e., these things, "an age too late" (the age of the world), "cold Climate," or "years" (the poet's age), might indeed "damp" or benumb his intent if the effort of writing the poem were all his instead of "hers," i.e., that of his "celestial Patroness."

4. Of heavier: worse.

60 Since Uriel, regent of the sun, descried
His entrance, and forewarned the Cherubim[5]
That kept their watch. Thence, full of anguish, driven,
The space of seven continued nights he rode
With darkness; thrice the equinoctial line
65 He circled, four times crossed the car of Night
From pole to pole, traversing each colure;[6]
On the eighth returned, and on the coast° averse° side / turned away
From entrance or cherubic watch by stealth
Found unsuspected way. There was a place
70 (Now not, though Sin, not Time, first wrought the change)
Where Tigris, at the foot of Paradise,
Into a gulf shot under ground, till part
Rose up a fountain by the Tree of Life.
In with the river sunk and with it rose
75 Satan, involved in rising mist; then sought
Where to lie hid. Sea he had searched and land,
From Eden over Pontus,[7] and the pool
Maeotis, up beyond the river Ob;
Downward as far antarctic; and, in length,
80 West from Orontes to the ocean barred
At Darien, thence to the land where flows
Ganges and Indus. Thus the orb he roamed
With narrow search, and with inspection deep
Considered every creature, which of all
85 Most opportune might serve his wiles, and found
The serpent subtlest beast of all the field.[8]
Him, after long debate, irresolute
Of thoughts revolved, his final sentence° chose judgment
Fit vessel, fittest imp° of fraud, in whom offshoot, child
90 To enter, and his dark suggestions hide
From sharpest sight; for in the wily snake
Whatever sleights° none would suspicious mark, artifices
As from his wit and native subtlety
Proceeding, which, in other beasts observed,
95 Doubt° might beget of diabolic power suspicion
Active within beyond the sense of brute.
Thus he resolved, but first from inward grief
His bursting passion into plaints thus poured:
"O Earth, how like to Heaven, if not preferred
100 More justly, seat worthier of Gods, as built

5. An order of angels. In medieval astronomy, each of the concentric crystalline spheres containing one of the heavenly bodies was supposed to be inhabited by an angel, its "intelligence," who governed its motion; Uriel is one of the four great archangels of the Jewish tradition, along with Raphael, Gabriel, and Michael.

6. The "equinoctial line" is the equator. The "car of Night" is Earth's shadow, depicted as the chariot of the goddess Night. The colures are two of the great circles that pass through the celestial poles, one intersecting the ecliptic at the equinoxes, the other at the solstices. Satan circles Earth for the space of seven days, first along the equator and then over the poles, always timing his flight so as to remain hidden on the dark side.

7. In lines 77–82, Satan's search extends from the Black Sea (Pontus) to the connecting Sea of Azov (the pool Maeotis) and northward beyond the river Ob in Siberia: southward to the antarctic; and westward from the Orontes River in Syria to the isthmus of Panama (Darien) and on around the world to India.

8. Milton here follows Genesis 3.1: "Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made."

With second thoughts, reforming what was old!
For what God, after better, worse would build?
Terrestrial Heaven, danced round by other Heavens,
That shine, yet bear their bright officious° lamps, helpful
105 Light above light, for thee alone, as seems,
In thee concentring all their precious beams
Of sacred influence![9] As God in Heaven
Is center, yet extends to all, so thou
Centring receiv'st from all those orbs; in thee,
110 Not in themselves, all their known virtue appears,
Productive in herb, plant, and nobler birth
Of creatures animate with gradual life
Of growth, sense, reason, all summed up in man.[1]
With what delight could I have walked thee round,
115 If I could joy in aught; sweet interchange
Of hill and valley, rivers, woods, and plains,
Now land, now sea, and shores with forest crowned,
Rocks, dens, and caves! But I in none of these
Find place or refuge; and, the more I see
120 Pleasures about me, so much more I feel
Torment within me, as from the hateful siege
Of contraries; all good to me becomes
Bane,° and in Heaven much worse would be my state. poison, evil
But neither here seek I, no, nor in Heaven,
125 To dwell, unless by mastering Heaven's Supreme;
Nor hope to be myself less miserable
By what I seek, but others to make such
As I, though thereby worse to me redound.° return
For only in destroying I find ease
130 To my relentless thoughts; and him° destroyed, Adam
Or won to what may work his utter loss,
For whom all this was made, all this[2] will soon
Follow, as to him linked in weal° or woe: happiness
In woe then, that destruction wide may range!
135 To me shall be the glory sole among
The infernal Powers, in one day to have marred
What he, Almighty styled, six nights and days
Continued making, and who knows how long
Before had been contriving; though perhaps
140 Not longer than since I in one night freed
From servitude inglorious well nigh half
The angelic name,[3] and thinner left the throng
Of his adorers. He, to be avenged,
And to repair his numbers thus impaired—
145 Whether such virtue,° spent of old, now failed power, energy
More angels to create (if they at least
Are his created),[4] or to spite us more—

9. Satan seems to describe here a Ptolemaic system of the universe, in which Earth is the center around which many heavenly bodies turn.
1. Earth is populated with forms of life on a graduated scale ranging from plants, which merely grow; to animals, which both grow and feel; to humans, who grow, feel, and think.
2. I.e., Earth (and specifically Eden), which is harmed, as Satan predicts, at 9.782–84 (p. 442).
3. I.e., half the angels. Satan alludes to the revolt he led against God, the consequence of which was that he and his supporters (whose number he exaggerates here) were cast out of heaven into hell.
4. Only once (at the beginning of Book 4, line 43) does Satan speak of the angels as created by God, instead of self-created (as he implies here).

Determined to advance into our room
A creature formed of earth,[5] and him endow,
150 Exalted from so base original,
With Heavenly spoils, our spoils. What he decreed
He effected; Man he made, and for him built
Magnificent this World, and Earth his seat,
Him Lord pronounced, and, O indignity!
155 Subjected to his service angel-wings
And flaming ministers, to watch and tend
Their earthy charge. Of these the vigilance
I dread, and to elude, thus wrapped in mist
Of midnight vapor, glide obscure, and pry
160 In every bush and brake, where hap° may find — luck
The serpent sleeping, in whose mazy folds
To hide me, and the dark intent I bring.
O foul descent! that I, who erst contended
With Gods to sit the highest, am now constrained 165 Into a beast, and, mixed with bestial slime,
This essence to incarnate and imbrute,[6]
That to the height of deity aspired!
But what will not ambition and revenge
Descend to? Who aspires must down as low
170 As high he soared, obnoxious,° first or last, — exposed
To basest things. Revenge, at first though sweet,
Bitter ere long back on itself recoils.
Let it; I reck° not, so it light well aimed, — care
Since higher I fall short, on him who next
175 Provokes my envy, this new favorite
Of Heaven, this man of clay, son of despite,° — spite, scorn
Whom, us the more to spite, his Maker raised
From dust: spite then with spite is best repaid."
So saying, through each thicket, dank or dry,
180 Like a black mist low-creeping, he held on
His midnight search, where soonest he might find
The serpent. Him fast sleeping soon he found,
In labyrinth of many a round self-rolled,
His head the midst, well stored with subtle wiles:
185 Not yet in horrid shade or dismal den,
Nor nocent° yet, but on the grassy herb, — harmful
Fearless, unfeared, he slept. In at his mouth
The Devil entered, and his brutal° sense, — animal
In heart or head, possessing soon inspired
190 With act intelligential; but his sleep
Disturbed not, waiting close° the approach of morn. — hidden
Now, whenas sacred light began to dawn
In Eden on the humid flowers, that breathed
Their morning incense, when all things that breathe
195 From th' Earth's great altar send up silent praise
To the Creator, and his nostrils fill

5. Milton explains in Book 7 (lines 524–26) that Adam is made from earth: "he form'd thee, Adam, thee O man / Dust of the ground, and in thy nostrils breath'd / The breath of Life," following Genesis 2.7: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life."

6. Satan's incarnation in the body of the serpent is a grotesque parody of Christ's incarnation in human form.

With grateful smell, forth came the human pair,
And joined their vocal worship to the choir
Of creatures wanting° voice; that done, partake — lacking
200 The season, prime° for sweetest scents and airs; — best
Then cómmune how that day they best may ply
Their growing work; for much their work outgrew
The hands' dispatch of two gardening so wide:
And Eve first to her husband thus began:
205 "Adam, well may we labor still° to dress — continually
This garden, still to tend plant, herb, and flower,
Our pleasant task enjoined; but, till more hands
Aid us, the work under our labor grows,
Luxurious° by restraint: what we by day — luxuriant
210 Lop overgrown, or prune, or prop, or bind,
One night or two with wanton growth derides,
Tending to wild. Thou, therefore, now advise,
Or hear what to my mind first thoughts present.
Let us divide our labors; thou where choice
215 Leads thee, or where most needs, whether to wind
The woodbine[7] round this arbor, or direct
The clasping ivy where to climb; while I
In yonder spring° of roses intermixed — growth
With myrtle[8] find what to redress° till noon. — set upright
220 For, while so near each other thus all day
Our task we choose, what wonder if so near Looks intervene and smiles, or object new
Casual discourse draw on, which intermits
Our day's work, brought to little, though begun
225 Early, and the hour of supper comes unearned!"
To whom mild answer Adam thus returned:
"Sole Eve, associate sole,[9] to me beyond
Compare above all living creatures dear!
Well hast thou motioned,° well thy thoughts employed — suggested
230 How we might best fulfil the work which here
God hath assigned us, nor of me shalt pass
Unpraised; for nothing lovelier can be found
In woman than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote.
235 Yet not so strictly hath our Lord imposed
Labor as to debar us when we need
Refreshment, whether food, or talk between,
Food of the mind, or this sweet intercourse
Of looks and smiles; for smiles from reason flow,
240 To brute denied, and are of love the food;
Love, not the lowest end of human life.
For not to irksome toil, but to delight,
He made us, and delight to reason joined.
These paths and bowers° doubt not but our joint hands — arbors
245 Will keep from wilderness with ease, as wide
As we need walk, till younger hands ere long

7. A name for various climbing plants.
8. The myrtle tree, having shiny green leaves and white flowers; associated with the Roman goddess Venus, and thus an emblem of love.
9. With a pun: "unrivaled" and "only."

Assist us. But, if much converse perhaps
Thee satiate, to short absence I could yield;
For solitude sometimes is best society,
250 And short retirement urges sweet return.
But other doubt possesses me, lest harm
Befall thee, severed from me; for thou know'st
What hath been warned us—what malicious foe,
Envying our happiness, and of his own
255 Despairing, seeks to work us woe and shame
By sly assault, and somewhere nigh at hand
Watches, no doubt, with greedy hope to find
His wish and best advantage, us asunder,
Hopeless to circumvent° us joined, where each — outwit
260 To other speedy aid might lend at need.
Whether his first design be to withdraw
Our fealty from God, or to disturb
Conjugal love—than which perhaps no bliss
Enjoyed by us excites his envy more—
265 Or° this, or worse, leave not the faithful side — whether
That gave thee being,[1] still shades thee and protects.
The wife, where danger or dishonor lurks,
Safest and seemliest by her husband stays,
Who guards her, or with her the worst endures."
270 To whom the virgin° majesty of Eve, — innocent
As one who loves, and some unkindness meets,
With sweet austere composure thus replied:
"Offspring of Heaven and Earth, and all Earth's lord!
That such an enemy we have, who seeks
275 Our ruin, both by thee informed I learn,
And from the parting angel overheard,
As in a shady nook I stood behind,
Just then returned at shut of evening flowers.
But that thou shouldst my firmness therefore doubt
280 To God or thee, because we have a foe
May tempt it, I expected not to hear.
His violence thou fear'st not, being such
As we, not capable of death or pain,
Can either not receive, or can repel.
285 His fraud is, then, thy fear; which plain infers
Thy equal fear that my firm faith and love
Can by his fraud be shaken or seduced:
Thoughts, which how found they harbor in thy breast,
Adam, misthought of° her to thee so dear?" — about
290 To whom, with healing words, Adam replied:
"Daughter of God and Man, immortal Eve!
For such thou art, from sin and blame entire° — wholly free
Not diffident° of thee do I dissuade — mistrustful
Thy absence from my sight, but to avoid 295 Th' attempt itself, intended by our foe.
For he who tempts, though in vain, at least asperses[2]

1. In Book 8 (lines 465–71), Adam describes God's creation of Eve out of a rib taken from his side, following Genesis 2.22: "And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man."
2. Maligns (literally, sprinkles).

The tempted with dishonor foul, supposed
Not incorruptible of faith, not proof
Against temptation. Thou thyself with scorn
300 And anger wouldst resent the offered wrong,
Though ineffectual found; misdeem not, then,
If such affront I labor to avert
From thee alone, which on us both at once
The enemy, though bold, will hardly dare;
305 Or, daring, first on me th' assault shall light.
Nor thou his malice and false guile contemn°— regard scornfully
Subtle he needs must be who could seduce
Angels—nor think superfluous others' aid.
I from the influence of thy looks receive
310 Access° in every virtue—in thy sight increase
More wise, more watchful, stronger, if need were
Of outward strength; while shame, thou looking on,
Shame to be overcome or overreached,° outwitted
Would utmost vigor raise, and raised unite.
315 Why shouldst not thou like sense within thee feel
When I am present, and thy trial choose
With me, best witness of thy virtue tried?"
So spake domestic Adam in his care
And matrimonial love; but Eve, who thought
320 Less° attributed to her faith sincere, too little
Thus her reply with accent sweet renewed:
"If this be our condition, thus to dwell
In narrow circuit straitened° by a foe, constrained, limited
Subtle or violent, we not endued° endowed
325 Single with like defense wherever met,
How are we happy, still° in fear of harm? continually
But harm precedes not sin: only our foe
Tempting affronts us with his foul esteem
Of our integrity: his foul esteem
330 Sticks no dishonor on our front,° but turns brow
Foul on himself; then wherefore shunned or feared
By us, who rather double honor gain
From his surmise proved false, find peace within,
Favor from Heaven, our witness, from the event?° outcome
335 And what is faith, love, virtue, unassayed° untested
Alone, without exterior help sustained?
Let us not then suspect our happy state
Left so imperfect by the Maker wise
As not secure to single or combined.
340 Frail is our happiness, if this be so;
And Eden were no Eden, thus exposed."
To whom thus Adam fervently replied:
"O woman, best are all things as the will
Of God ordained them; his creating hand
345 Nothing imperfect or deficient left
Of all that he created, much less man,
Or aught that might his happy state secure,
Secure from outward force. Within himself

The danger lies, yet lies within his power;
350 Against his will he can receive no harm.
But God left free the will; for what obeys
Reason is free; and reason he made right,
But bid her[3] well beware, and still erect,° alert
Lest, by some fair appearing good surprised,
355 She dictate false, and misinform the will
To do what God expressly hath forbid.
Not then mistrust, but tender love, enjoins
That I should mind° thee oft; and mind thou me. remind; pay heed to
Firm we subsist,° yet possible to swerve, stand; exist
360 Since reason not impossibly may meet
Some specious° object by the foe suborned,[4] fair-appearing
And fall into deception unaware,
Not keeping strictest watch, as she was warned.
Seek not temptation, then, which to avoid
365 Were better, and most likely if from me
Thou sever not: trial will come unsought.
Wouldst thou approve° thy constancy, approve prove
First thy obedience; the other who can know,
Not seeing thee attempted, who attest?
370 But, if thou think trial unsought may find
Us both securer[5] than thus warned thou seem'st,
Go; for thy stay, not free, absents thee more.
Go in thy native innocence; rely
On what thou hast of virtue; summon all;
375 For God towards thee hath done his part: do thine."
So spake the patriarch of mankind; but Eve
Persisted; yet submiss,° though last, replied: submissive
"With thy permission, then, and thus forewarned,
Chiefly by what thy own last reasoning words
380 Touched only, that our trial, when least sought,
May find us both perhaps far less prepared,
The willinger I go, nor much expect
A foe so proud will first the weaker seek;
So bent, the more shall shame him his repulse."
385 Thus saying, from her husband's hand her hand
Soft she withdrew, and like a wood nymph light,
Oread or dryad, or of Delia's train,[6]
Betook her to the groves, but Delia's self
In gait surpassed and goddesslike deport,
390 Though not as she with bow and quiver armed,
But with such gardening tools as art yet rude,° primitive
Guiltless of fire had formed,[7] or angels brought.
To Pales, or Pomona, thus adorned,

3. I.e., Reason. Right reason, originally a classical concept, is the God-given ability to recognize truth and moral law.
4. Procured by corrupt means and with a sinister motive.
5. Milton may be playing on both senses of the Latin word securus, which means both "safe" or "free from care" and "careless" or "negligent."
6. Band of nymphs (minor nature divinities) who accompanied Delia, or Diana (born at Delos), goddess of the hunt. Oread or dryad: mountain nymph or wood nymph; neither class of nymphs was immortal; the dryads died with their trees.
7. There was no need of fire in Eden; the association of guilt with fire suggests the myth of Prometheus, who stole fire from the gods to give to humans.

Likest she seemed, Pomona when she fled
395 Vertumnus, or to Ceres in her prime,
Yet virgin of Proserpina from Jove.[8]
Her long with ardent look his eye pursued
Delighted, but desiring more her stay.
Oft he to her his charge of quick return
400 Repeated; she to him as oft engaged
To be returned by noon amid the bower,
And all things in best order to invite
Noontide repast, or afternoon's repose.
O much deceived, much failing, hapless Eve,
405 Of thy presumed return! Event perverse!
Thou never from that hour in Paradise
Found'st either sweet repast, or sound repose;
Such ambush hid among sweet flowers and shades
Waited with hellish rancor imminent
410 To intercept thy way, or send thee back
Despoiled of innocence, of faith, of bliss.
For now, and since first break of dawn, the fiend,
Mere serpent in appearance, forth was come,
And on his quest, where likeliest he might find
415 The only two of mankind, but in them
The whole included race, his purposed prey.
In bower and field he sought, where any tuft
Of grove or garden-plot more pleasant lay,
Their tendance° or plantation for delight; object of care
420 By fountain or by shady rivulet
He sought them both, but wished his hap° might find luck
Eve separate; he wished, but not with hope
Of what so seldom chanced; when to his wish,
Beyond his hope, Eve separate he spies,
425 Veiled in a cloud of fragrance, where she stood,
Half spied, so thick the roses bushing round
About her glowed, oft stooping to support
Each flower of slender stalk, whose head though gay
Carnation, purple, azure, or specked with gold,
430 Hung drooping unsustained, them she upstays
Gently with myrtle band, mindless° the while heedless
Herself, though fairest unsupported flower,
From her best prop so far, and storm so nigh.
Nearer he drew, and many a walk traversed
435 Of stateliest covert, cedar, pine, or palm;
Then voluble° and bold, now hid, now seen undulating
Among thick-woven arborets° and flowers shrubs
Embordered on each bank, the hand° of Eve: handiwork
Spot more delicious than those gardens feigned[9]

8. In Roman mythology, the supreme god, who impregnated Ceres, the supreme agricultural goddess, with Proserpina. Pales was the goddess of flocks and pastures. Pomona, goddess of fruit trees, was long pursued by Vertumnus, god of the seasons; disguised as a reaper, he awakened "answering passion" in Pomona, according to Ovid's Metamorphoses.

9. Mythical or legendary gardens. In the first (below), the youth Adonis was nursed by Venus after having been killed by a boar, then revived; the second was visited by Odysseus ("Laertes' son"), who found springtime and harvest time both continuous there. The third garden mentioned—the garden of Solomon ("the sapient king") and his bride, the pharaoh's daughter—Milton regards as historical, not "mystic," or mythical.

440 Or of revived Adonis, or renowned
Alcinous, host of old Laertes' son,
Or that, not mystic, where the sapient king
Held dalliance with his fair Egyptian spouse.
Much he° the place admired, the person more. Satan
445 As one who long in populous city pent,
Where houses thick and sewers annoy° the air, pollute
Forth issuing on a summer's morn to breathe
Among the pleasant villages and farms
Adjoined, from each thing met conceives delight,
450 The smell of grain, or tedded[1] grass, or kine,° cattle
Or dairy, each rural sight, each rural sound:
If chance with nymphlike step fair virgin pass,
What pleasing seemed, for° her now pleases more, because of
She most, and in her look sums all delight.
455 Such pleasure took the serpent to behold
This flowery plat,° the sweet recess° of Eve plot / retreat
Thus early, thus alone; her heavenly form
Angelic, but more soft, and feminine,
Her graceful innocence, her every air° manner
460 Of gesture or least action overawed
His malice, and with rapine[2] sweet bereaved
His fierceness of the fierce intent it brought:
That space the evil one abstracted° stood withdrawn
From his own evil, and for the time remained
465 Stupidly good, of enmity disarmed,
Of guile, of hate, of envy, of revenge.[3]
But the hot Hell that always in him burns,
Though in mid Heaven, soon ended his delight,
And tortures him now more, the more he sees
470 Of pleasure not for him ordained: then soon
Fierce hate he recollects, and all his thoughts
Of mischief, gratulating,° thus excites: exulting
"Thoughts, whither have ye led me? with what sweet
Compulsion thus transported to forget
475 What hither brought us? hate, not love, nor hope
Of Paradise for Hell, hope here to taste
Of pleasure, but all pleasure to destroy,
Save what is in destroying; other joy
To me is lost. Then let me not let pass
480 Occasion which now smiles; behold alone
The woman, opportune° to all attempts, open
Her husband, for I view far round, not nigh,
Whose higher intellectual° more I shun, intellect
And strength, of courage haughty, and of limb
485 Heroic built, though of terrestrial° mold;° earthly / composition
Foe not informidable, exempt from wound,
I not; so much hath Hell debased, and pain
Enfeebled me, to what I was in Heaven.

1. Spread out to dry to make hay.
2. Robbery; from rapere, Latin for "to seize," the root of both rape and rapture. Here, the ravisher is temporarily ravished.
3. Amazed by Eve's beauty, Satan is momentarily stunned into inaction and, while thus incapacitated, is insensibly good.

She fair, divinely fair, fit love for gods,
490 Not terrible,° though terror be in love — exciting fear
And beauty, not° approached by stronger hate, — unless
Hate stronger, under show of love well feigned,
The way which to her ruin now I tend."
So spake the enemy of mankind, enclosed
495 In serpent, inmate bad, and toward Eve
Addressed his way, not with indented° wave, — zigzag
Prone on the ground, as since, but on his rear,
Circular base of rising folds, that towered
Fold above fold a surging maze; his head
500 Crested aloft, and carbuncle° his eyes; — ruby-colored
With burnished neck of verdant gold, erect
Amidst his circling spires,° that on the grass — coils
Floated redundant.° Pleasing was his shape, — waving; excessive
And lovely; never since of serpent kind
505 Lovelier, not those that in Illyria changed
Hermione and Cadmus, or the god
In Epidaurus; nor to which transformed
Ammonian Jove, or Capitoline was seen,
He with Olympias, this with her who bore
510 Scipio, the height of Rome.[4] With tract° oblique — course
At first, as one who sought access, but feared
To interrupt, sidelong he works his way.
As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought
Nigh river's mouth or foreland, where the wind
515 Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail:
So varied he, and of his tortuous train
Curled many a wanton° wreath in sight of Eve, — unrestrained; lewd
To lure her eye: she busied heard the sound
Of rustling leaves, but minded not, as used
520 To such disport before her through the field,
From every beast, more duteous at her call,
Than at Circean call the herd disguised.[5]
He bolder now, uncalled before her stood:
But as in gaze admiring; oft he bowed
525 His turret crest, and sleek enameled° neck, — multicolored
Fawning, and licked the ground whereon she trod.
His gentle dumb expression turned at length
The eye of Eve to mark his play: he, glad
Of her attention gained, with serpent tongue
530 Organic, or impulse of vocal air,[6]
His fraudulent temptation thus began.
"Wonder not, sovereign mistress, if perhaps
Thou canst, who art sole wonder; much less arm

4. Cadmus, king of Thebes, and his wife, Harmonia ("Hermione"), were transformed into serpents after their retirement to Illyria. The "god in Epidaurus" is Aesculapius, god of healing, whose art included the use of serpents and who sometimes appeared in the form of a serpent at his temple in Epidaurus. Jove (here called Ammonian and Capitoline after temples associated with him) was said to have coupled with Olympias and Sempronia in the form of a serpent. Alexander the Great was born of the first union, and the Roman leader Scipio Africanus was born of the second.

5. In the Odyssey, book 10, the enchantress Circe changes men into swine, who then dutifully follow her about.

6. I.e., Satan speaks through the serpent either using the serpent's own tongue or by directly impelling the air to make it seem voicelike; there is a pun on "impulse," which means both "motion" and "strong suggestion from a spirit."

Thy looks, the heaven of mildness, with disdain,
535 Displeased that I approach thee thus, and gaze
Insatiate, I thus single, nor have feared
Thy awful° brow, more awful thus retired. awe-inspiring
Fairest resemblance of thy Maker fair,
Thee all things living gaze on, all things thine
540 By gift, and thy celestial beauty adore
With ravishment° beheld, there best beheld rapture, ecstasy
Where universally admired: but here
In this enclosure wild, these beasts among,
Beholders rude, and shallow to discern
545 Half what in thee is fair, one man except,
Who sees thee? (and what is one?) who shouldst be seen
A goddess among gods, adored and served
By angels numberless, thy daily train."
So glozed° the tempter, and his proem° tuned; flattered / prelude
550 Into the heart of Eve his words made way,
Though at the voice much marveling: at length,
Not unamazed, she thus in answer spake.
"What may this mean? Language of man pronounced
By tongue of brute, and human sense expressed?
555 The first at least of these I thought denied
To beasts, whom God on their creation-day
Created mute to all articulate sound;
The latter I demur,° for in their looks hesitate about
Much reason, and in their actions oft appears.
560 Thee, serpent, subtlest beast of all the field
I knew, but not with human voice endued:° endowed
Redouble then this miracle, and say,
How cam'st thou speakable° of mute, and how able to speak
To me so friendly grown above the rest
565 Of brutal kind, that daily are in sight?
Say, for such wonder claims attention due."
To whom the guileful tempter thus replied:
"Empress of this fair world, resplendent Eve!
Easy to me it is to tell thee all
570 What thou command'st and right thou shouldst be obeyed:
I was at first as other beasts that graze
The trodden herb, of abject thoughts and low,
As was my food, nor aught but food discerned
Or sex, and apprehended nothing high:
575 Till on a day, roving the field, I chanced
A goodly tree far distant to behold
Loaden with fruit of fairest colors mixed,
Ruddy and gold; I nearer drew to gaze;
When from the boughs a savory odor blown,
580 Grateful to appetite, more pleased my sense
Than smell of sweetest fennel, or the teats
Of ewe or goat dropping with milk at even,
Unsucked of lamb or kid,[7] that tend their play.

7. It was popularly believed that snakes were especially fond of the herb fennel and that they stole milk from sheep and goats.

To satisfy the sharp desire I had
585 Of tasting those fair apples, I resolved
Not to defer: hunger and thirst at once,
Powerful persuaders, quickened at the scent
Of that alluring fruit, urged me so keen.
About the mossy trunk I wound me soon,
590 For, high from ground, the branches would require
Thy utmost reach, or Adam's: round the tree
All other beasts that saw, with like desire
Longing and envying stood, but could not reach.
Amid the tree now got, where plenty hung
595 Tempting so nigh, to pluck and eat my fill
I spared not; for such pleasure till that hour
At feed or fountain never had I found.
Sated at length, ere long I might perceive
Strange alteration in me, to degree
600 Of reason in my inward powers, and speech
Wanted° not long, though to this shape retained. lacked
Thenceforth to speculations high or deep
I turned my thoughts, and with capacious° mind wide, spacious Considered all things visible in Heaven,
605 Or Earth, or middle,° all things fair and good: regions between
But all that fair and good in thy divine
Semblance, and in thy beauty's heavenly ray
United I beheld: no fair° to° thine beauty / compared to
Equivalent or second, which compelled
610 Me thus, though importune° perhaps, to come inopportunely
And gaze, and worship thee of right declared
Sovereign of creatures, universal dame."
So talked the spirited° sly snake: and Eve spirit-possessed
Yet more amazed, unwary thus replied:
615 "Serpent, thy overpraising leaves in doubt
The virtue° of that fruit, in thee first proved.° power / experienced
But say, where grows the tree, from hence how far?
For many are the trees of God that grow
In Paradise, and various, yet unknown
620 To us; in such abundance lies our choice,
As leaves a greater store of fruit untouched,
Still hanging incorruptible, till men
Grow up to their provision, and more hands
Help to disburden Nature of her birth."[8]
625 To whom the wily adder, blithe and glad:
"Empress, the way is ready, and not long,
Beyond a row of myrtles, on a flat,° plot
Fast by a fountain, one small thicket past
Of blowing° myrrh and balm: if thou accept blooming
630 My conduct,° I can bring thee thither soon." guidance

8. I.e., what Nature bears. Till men . . . provision: i.e., until enough humans exist to eat all the food on Earth.

"Lead then," said Eve. He leading swiftly rolled
In tangles, and made intricate seem straight,
To mischief swift. Hope elevates, and joy
Brightens his crest; as when a wandering fire
635 Compact of unctuous vapor,[9] which the night
Condenses, and the cold environs round,
Kindled through agitation to a flame
(Which oft, they say, some evil spirit attends),
Hovering and blazing with delusive light,
640 Misleads th' amazed night-wanderer from his way
To bogs and mires, and oft through pond or pool,
There swallowed up and lost, from succor° far: help
So glistered the dire snake, and into fraud
Led Eve our credulous mother, to the tree
645 Of prohibition,[1] root of all our woe:
Which when she saw, thus to her guide she spake:
"Serpent, we might have spared our coming hither,
Fruitless to me, though fruit be here to excess,
The credit of whose virtue rest with thee;[2]
650 Wondrous indeed, if cause of such effects!
But of this tree we may not taste nor touch:
God so commanded, and left that command
Sole daughter of his voice; the rest,[3] we live
Law to ourselves; our reason is our law."
655 To whom the Tempter guilefully replied:
"Indeed? Hath God then said that of the fruit
Of all these garden trees ye shall not eat,
Yet lords declared of all in Earth or air?"
To whom thus Eve, yet sinless: "Of the fruit
660 Of each tree in the garden we may eat,
But of the fruit of this fair tree amidst
The garden, God hath said, 'Ye shall not eat
Thereof, nor shall ye touch it, lest ye die.' "
She scarce had said, though brief, when now more bold,
665 The tempter, but with show of zeal and love
To man, and indignation at his wrong,
New part puts on, and as° to passion moved, as if Fluctuates disturbed, yet comely,° and in act° attractive / bearing
Raised, as of some great matter to begin.
670 As when of old some orator renowned
In Athens or free Rome, where eloquence
Flourished, since mute, to some great cause addressed,
Stood in himself collected, while each part,
Motion, each act, won audience ere the tongue,
675 Sometimes in height began, as no delay
Of preface brooking, through his zeal of right.[4]

9. Composed of oily vapor. The allusion is to the will-o'-the-wisp (ignis fatuus), which was said to draw travelers astray by holding a false light before them; the phenomenon of nocturnal light is caused by the combustion of marsh gas.
1. I.e., the prohibited tree.
2. I.e., my belief in the effects of the fruit must continue to depend solely on your testimony.
3. I.e., in everything else.
4. I.e., the orator, convinced of the rightness of his cause, bursts directly into his argument, impatient of the "delay" of an introduction.

So standing, moving, or to height upgrown
The tempter all impassioned thus began:
"O sacred, wise, and wisdom-giving plant,
680 Mother of science!° now I feel thy power — knowledge
Within me clear, not only to discern
Things in their causes, but to trace the ways
Of highest agents, deemed however wise.
Queen of this universe! do not believe
685 Those rigid threats of death. Ye shall not die;
How should ye? By the fruit? it gives you life
To° knowledge; by the Threatener? look on me, — in addition to
Me who have touched and tasted, yet both live,
And life more perfect have attained than Fate
690 Meant me, by venturing higher than my lot.
Shall that be shut to man, which to the beast
Is open? Or will God incense his ire
For such a petty trespass, and not praise
Rather your dauntless virtue,° whom the pain — courage
695 Of death denounced,° whatever thing death be, — threatened
Deterred not from achieving what might lead
To happier life, knowledge of good and evil?
Of good, how just![5] Of evil, if what is evil
Be real, why not known, since easier shunned?
700 God therefore cannot hurt ye, and be just;
Not just, not God; not feared then, nor obeyed:
Your fear itself of death removes the fear.
Why then was this forbid? Why but to awe,
Why but to keep ye low and ignorant,
705 His worshippers? He knows that in the day
Ye eat thereof, your eyes that seem so clear,
Yet are but dim, shall perfectly be then
Opened and cleared, and ye shall be as gods,
Knowing both good and evil, as they know.
710 That ye should be as gods, since I as man,
Internal° man, is but proportion meet, — internally
I, of brute, human; ye, of human, gods.
So ye shall die perhaps, by putting off
Human, to put on gods: death to be wished,
715 Though threatened, which no worse than this can bring.
And what are gods that man may not become
As they, participating° godlike food? — sharing
The gods are first, and that advantage use
On our belief, that all from them proceeds.
720 I question it; for this fair Earth I see,
Warmed by the sun, producing every kind,
Them nothing: If they all things,[6] who enclosed
Knowledge of good and evil in this tree,
That whoso eats thereof forthwith attains
725 Wisdom without their leave? And wherein lies

5. I.e., how just, to deny the knowledge of good! (Satan is being ironic.)

6. The verb here, "produce," is understood.

Th' offense, that man should thus attain to know?
What can your knowledge hurt him, or this tree
Impart against his will if all be his?
Or is it envy, and can envy dwell
730 In heavenly breasts? These, these, and many more
Causes import° your need of this fair fruit. imply, indicate
Goddess humane,[7] reach then, and freely taste!"
He ended, and his words, replete with guile,
Into her heart too easy entrance won:
735 Fixed on the fruit she gazed, which to behold
Might tempt alone, and in her ears the sound
Yet rung of his persuasive words, impregned° impregnated
With reason, to her seeming, and with truth;
Meanwhile the hour of noon drew on, and waked
740 An eager appetite, raised by the smell
So savory of that fruit, which with desire,
Inclinable now grown to touch or taste,
Solicited her longing eye;[8] yet first
Pausing a while, thus to herself she mused:
745 "Great are thy virtues,° doubtless, best of fruits, powers
Though kept from man, and worthy to be admired,
Whose taste, too long forborn, at first essay° testing
Gave elocution to the mute, and taught
The tongue not made for speech to speak thy praise:
750 Thy praise he also who forbids thy use,
Conceals not from us, naming thee the Tree
Of Knowledge, knowledge both of good and evil;
Forbids us then to taste; but his forbidding
Commends thee more, while it infers the good 755 By thee communicated, and our want:° lack
For good unknown, sure is not had, or had
And yet unknown, is as not had at all.
In plain° then, what forbids he but to know? plain words
Forbids us good, forbids us to be wise!
760 Such prohibitions bind not. But if Death
Bind us with after-bands, what profits then
Our inward freedom? In the day we eat
Of this fair fruit, our doom is, we shall die.
How dies the serpent? He hath eaten and lives,
765 And knows, and speaks, and reasons, and discerns,
Irrational till then. For us alone
Was death invented? Or to us denied
This intellectual food, for beasts reserved?
For beasts it seems: yet that one beast which first
770 Hath tasted, envies not, but brings with joy
The good befallen him, author unsuspect,[9]
Friendly to man, far from deceit or guile.
What fear I then, rather what know to fear

7. "Humane" probably means "kindly" or "gracious," but also suggests the oxymoron "human Goddess," expressing Satan's prediction of what Eve will become if she eats the fruit.

8. All five of Eve's senses—sight, hearing, smell, taste, and touch—are involved in her temptation.

9. I.e., authority whose testimony does not arouse suspicion.

Under this ignorance of good and evil,
775 Of God or death, of law or penalty?
Here grows the cure of all, this fruit divine,
Fair to the eye, inviting to the taste,
Of virtue° to make wise: what hinders then power
To reach, and feed at once both body and mind?"
780 So saying, her rash hand in evil hour,
Forth reaching to the fruit, she plucked, she eat.° ate
Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her seat
Sighing through all her works gave signs of woe,
That all was lost. Back to the thicket slunk
785 The guilty serpent, and well might, for Eve
Intent now wholly on her taste, naught else
Regarded; such delight till then, as seemed,
In fruit she never tasted, whether true
Or fancied so, through expectation high
790 Of knowledge; nor was godhead from her thought.[1]
Greedily she engorged without restraint,
And knew not eating death:[2] satiate at length,
And heightened as with wine, jocund and boon,° jovial
Thus to herself she pleasingly began:
795 "O sovereign, virtuous, precious of all trees
In Paradise! of operation blest
To sapience,[3] hitherto obscured, infamed,° defamed
And thy fair fruit let hang, as to no end
Created; but henceforth my early care,
800 Not without song each morning, and due praise
Shall tend thee, and the fertile burden ease
Of thy full branches offered free to all;
Till dieted by thee I grow mature
In knowledge, as the gods who all things know;
805 Though others[4] envy what they cannot give:
For had the gift been theirs, it had not here
Thus grown. Experience, next to thee I owe,
Best guide; not following thee I had remained
In ignorance; thou open'st Wisdom's way,
810 And giv'st access, though secret° she retire. hidden
And I perhaps am secret;° Heaven is high, unseen
High and remote to see from thence distinct
Each thing on Earth; and other care perhaps
May have diverted from continual watch
815 Our great Forbidder, safe with all his spies
About him. But to Adam in what sort° guise
Shall I appear? Shall I to him make known
As yet my change, and give him to partake
Full happiness with me, or rather not,
820 But keep the odds of knowledge in my power

1. I.e., she also expected to achieve godhead.
2. I.e., she was eating death and did not know it; also, she was unaware while she ate death.
3. Wisdom, of the wise and those with good taste; from the Latin sapere, "to be wise," which has its roots in the verb "to taste."
4. I.e., the other gods; Eve here echoes the lesson taught her by the serpent.

Without copartner? so to add what wants° — lacks
In female sex, the more to draw his love,
And render me more equal, and perhaps,
A thing not undesirable, sometime
825 Superior: for, inferior, who is free?
This may be well: but what if God have seen
And death ensue? Then I shall be no more,
And Adam, wedded to another Eve,
Shall live with her enjoying, I extinct;
830 A death to think. Confirmed then I resolve,
Adam shall share with me in bliss or woe:
So dear I love him, that with him all deaths
I could endure, without him live no life."
So saying, from the tree her step she turned,
835 But first low reverence done, as to the power
That dwelt within, whose presence had infused
Into the plant sciental° sap, derived — knowledge-giving
From nectar, drink of gods. Adam the while Waiting desirous her return, had wove
840 Of choicest flowers a garland to adorn
Her tresses, and her rural labors crown,
As reapers oft are wont° their harvest queen. — accustomed to do [to]
Great joy he promised to his thoughts, and new
Solace in her return, so long delayed:
845 Yet oft his heart, divine° of something ill, — apprehensive
Misgave him; he the faltering measure[5] felt;
And forth to meet her went, the way she took
That morn when first they parted. By the Tree
Of Knowledge he must pass; there he her met,
850 Scarce from the tree returning; in her hand
A bough of fairest fruit that downy smiled,
New gathered, and ambrosial smell diffused.
To him she hastened, in her face excuse
Came prologue, and apology to prompt,[6]
855 Which with bland° words at will she thus addressed: — mild; coaxing
"Hast thou not wondered, Adam, at my stay?
Thee I have missed, and thought it long, deprived
Thy presence, agony of love till now
Not felt, nor shall be twice; for never more
860 Mean I to try, what rash untried I sought,
The pain of absence from thy sight. But strange
Hath been the cause, and wonderful to hear:
This tree is not as we are told, a tree
Of danger tasted,° nor to evil unknown — if tasted
865 Opening the way, but of divine effect
To open eyes, and make them gods who taste;
And hath been tasted such. The serpent wise,
Or° not restrained as we, or not obeying, — either

5. I.e., the irregular beat (of his heart).
6. Her excuse, apparent in her expression, is a prologue to her "apology," or formal defense of her actions.

Hath eaten of the fruit, and is become,
870 Not dead, as we are threatened, but thenceforth
Endued with human voice and human sense,
Reasoning to° admiration, and with me — so as to produce
Persuasively hath so prevailed, that I
Have also tasted, and have also found
875 Th' effects to correspond—opener mine eyes,
Dim erst,° dilated spirits, ampler heart, — previously
And growing up to godhead; which for thee
Chiefly I sought, without thee can despise.
For bliss, as thou hast part, to me is bliss,
880 Tedious, unshared with thee, and odious soon.
Thou therefore also taste, that equal lot
May join us, equal joy, as equal love;
Lest, thou not tasting, different degree[7]
Disjoin us, and I then too late renounce
885 Deity for thee, when Fate will not permit."
Thus Eve with countenance blithe her story told;
But in her cheek distemper° flushing glowed. — intoxicated
On th' other side, Adam, soon as he heard
The fatal trespass done by Eve, amazed,
890 Astonied[8] stood and blank, while horror chill
Ran through his veins, and all his joints relaxed;
From his slack hand the garland wreathed for Eve
Down dropped, and all the faded roses shed.
Speechless he stood and pale, till thus at length
895 First to himself he inward silence broke:
"O fairest of creation, last and best
Of all God's works, creature in whom excelled
Whatever can to sight or thought be formed,
Holy, divine, good, amiable, or sweet!
900 How art thou lost, how on a sudden lost,
Defaced, deflowered, and now to death devote?° — doomed
Rather how hast thou yielded to transgress
The strict forbiddance, how to violate
The sacred fruit forbidden! Some cursèd fraud
905 Of enemy hath beguiled thee, yet unknown,
And me with thee hath ruined, for with thee
Certain my resolution is to die.
How can I live without thee, how forgo
Thy sweet converse and love so dearly joined,
910 To live again in these wild woods forlorn?
Should God create another Eve, and I
Another rib afford, yet loss of thee
Would never from my heart; no, no! I feel
The link of nature draw me: flesh of flesh,
915 Bone of my bone thou art, and from thy state
Mine never shall be parted, bliss or woe."
So having said, as one from sad dismay

7. I.e., different rank, since she, as she believes, has grown "up to godhead" while he has not.

8. Stunned, with a likely pun: turned to stone.

Recomforted, and after thoughts disturbed
Submitting to what seemed remediless,
920 Thus in calm mood his words to Eve he turned:
"Bold deed thou hast presumed, adventurous Eve
And peril great provoked, who thus hast dared
Had it been only coveting to eye
That sacred fruit, sacred° to abstinence, dedicated 925 Much more to taste it, under ban to touch.
But past who can recall, or done undo?
Not God omnipotent, nor Fate! Yet so
Perhaps thou shalt not die, perhaps the fact° deed
Is not so heinous now, foretasted fruit,
930 Profaned first by the serpent, by him first
Made common and unhallowed ere our taste,
Nor yet on him found deadly; he yet lives,
Lives, as thou saidst, and gains to live as man
Higher degree of life: inducement strong
935 To us, as likely, tasting, to attain
Proportional ascent, which cannot be
But to be gods, or angels, demigods.
Nor can I think that God, Creator wise,
Though threatening, will in earnest so destroy
940 Us his prime creatures, dignified so high,
Set over all his works, which in our fall,
For us created, needs with us must fail,
Dependent made; so God shall uncreate,
Be frustrate, do, undo, and labor lose;
945 Not well conceived of God, who, though his power
Creation could repeat, yet would be loath
Us to abolish, lest the adversary
Triumph and say: 'Fickle their state whom God
Most favors; who can please him long? Me first 950 He ruined, now mankind; whom will he next?'
Matter of scorn, not to be given the foe.
However, I with thee have fixed my lot,
Certain° to undergo like doom: if death resolved
Consort° with thee, death is to me as life; keep company
955 So forcible within my heart I feel
The bond of nature draw me to my own,
My own in thee, for what thou art is mine;
Our state cannot be severed; we are one,
One flesh; to lose thee were to lose myself."
960 So Adam, and thus Eve to him replied:
"O glorious trial of exceeding love,
Illustrious evidence, example high!
Engaging me to emulate; but short
Of thy perfection, how shall I attain,
965 Adam? from whose dear side I boast me sprung,
And gladly of our union hear thee speak,
One heart, one soul in both; whereof good proof
This day affords, declaring thee resolved,
Rather than death or aught than death more dread

970 Shall separate us, linked in love so dear,
To undergo with me one guilt, one crime,
If any be, of tasting this fair fruit;
Whose virtue (for of good still good proceeds,
Direct, or by occasion°) hath presented — indirection
975 This happy trial of thy love, which else
So eminently never had been known.
Were it I thought death menaced would ensue
This my attempt, I would sustain alone
The worst, and not persuade thee, rather die
980 Deserted, than oblige° thee with a fact° — involve in guilt / deed
Pernicious to thy peace, chiefly assured
Remarkably so late of thy so true,
So faithful love unequaled; but I feel
Far otherwise th' event°—not death, but life — outcome
985 Augmented, opened eyes, new hopes, new joys,
Taste so divine, that what of sweet before
Hath touched my sense, flat seems to this, and harsh.
On my experience, Adam, freely taste,
And fear of death deliver to the winds."
990 So saying, she embraced him, and for joy
Tenderly wept, much won that he his love
Had so ennobled, as of choice to incur
Divine displeasure for her sake, or death.
In recompense (for such compliance bad
995 Such recompense best merits), from the bough
She gave him of that fair enticing fruit
With liberal hand; he scrupled not to eat,
Against his better knowledge, not deceived,[9]
But fondly° overcome with female charm. — foolishly
1000 Earth trembled from her entrails, as again
In pangs, and Nature gave a second groan,
Sky lowered, and muttering thunder, some sad drops
Wept at completing of the mortal sin
Original; while Adam took no thought,
1005 Eating his fill, nor Eve to iterate
Her former trespass feared, the more to soothe
Him with her loved society; that now
As with new wine intoxicated both,
They swim in mirth, and fancy that they feel
1010 Divinity within them breeding wings
Wherewith to scorn the Earth. But that false fruit
Far other operation first displayed,
Carnal desire inflaming; he on Eve
Began to cast lascivious eyes, she him
1015 As wantonly repaid; in lust they burn,
Till Adam thus 'gan Eve to dalliance move:
"Eve, now I see thou art exact° of taste, — discriminating
And elegant, of sapience[1] no small part,

9. Cf. 1 Timothy 2.14: "And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression."
1. See note 3, p. 442.

Since to each meaning savor we apply,
1020 And palate call judicious. I the praise
Yield thee, so well this day thou hast purveyed.° provisioned us
Much pleasure we have lost, while we abstained
From this delightful fruit, nor known till now
True relish, tasting; if such pleasure be 1025 In things to us forbidden, it might be wished,
For this one tree had been forbidden ten.
But come; so well refreshed, now let us play,
As meet° is, after such delicious fare; appropriate
For never did thy beauty, since the day
1030 I saw thee first and wedded thee, adorned
With all perfections, so enflame my sense
With ardor to enjoy thee, fairer now
Than ever, bounty of this virtuous tree."
So said he, and forbore not glance or toy° caress
1035 Of amorous intent, well understood
Of° Eve, whose eye darted contagious fire. by
Her hand he seized, and to a shady bank,
Thick overhead with verdant roof embowered
He led her, nothing loath; flowers were the couch,
1040 Pansies, and violets, and asphodel,[2]
And hyacinth—Earth's freshest, softest lap.
There they their fill of love and love's disport
Took largely, of their mutual guilt the seal,
The solace of their sin, till dewy sleep
1045 Oppressed them, wearied with their amorous play.
Soon as the force of that fallacious fruit,
That with exhilarating vapor bland° pleasing
About their spirits had played, and inmost powers
Made err, was now exhaled, and grosser sleep
1050 Bred of unkindly° fumes,° with conscious dreams unnatural / vapors
Encumbered, now had left them, up they rose
As from unrest, and each the other viewing,
Soon found their eyes how opened, and their minds
How darkened. Innocence, that as a veil
1055 Had shadowed them from knowing ill, was gone;
Just confidence, and native righteousness,
And honor from about them, naked left
To guilty Shame; he° covered,° but his robe Shame / [them]
Uncovered more. So rose the Danite strong,
1060 Herculean Samson, from the harlot-lap
Of Philistean Dalilah, and waked
Shorn of his strength;[3] they destitute and bare
Of all their virtue. Silent, and in face
Confounded, long they sat, as strucken mute;
1065 Till Adam, though not less than Eve abashed,
At length gave utterance to these words constrained:

2. A flower conventionally held to be immortal and said to cover the Elysian meadows.
3. The Philistine Dalilah betrayed her husband, Samson (of the tribe of Dan), by cutting off his hair, the source of his strength, while he slept. Their story is told in Judges 16 and retold in Milton's "Samson Agonistes."

"O Eve, in evil[4] hour thou didst give ear
To that false worm,° of whomsoever taught — serpent
To counterfeit man's voice, true in our fall,
1070 False in our promised rising; since our eyes
Opened we find indeed, and find we know
Both good and evil, good lost, and evil got:
Bad fruit of knowledge, if this be to know,
Which leaves us naked thus, of honor void,
1075 Of innocence, of faith, of purity,
Our wonted° ornaments now soiled and stained, — customary
And in our faces evident the signs
Of foul concupiscence;° whence evil store, — lust
Even shame, the last of evils; of the first
1080 Be sure then. How shall I behold the face
Henceforth of God or angel, erst with joy
And rapture so oft beheld? Those heavenly shapes
Will dazzle now this earthly° with their blaze — earthly nature
Insufferably bright. O might I here
1085 In solitude live savage, in some glade
Obscured, where highest woods, impenetrable
To star or sunlight, spread their umbrage° broad, — shade
And brown as evening! Cover me, ye pines,
Ye cedars, with innumerable boughs
1090 Hide me, where I may never see them more!
But let us now, as in bad plight, devise
What best may for the present serve to hide
The parts of each from other, that seem most
To shame obnoxious,° and unseemliest seen; — liable
1095 Some tree whose broad smooth leaves together sewed,
And girded on our loins, may cover round
Those middle parts, that this newcomer, Shame,
There sit not, and reproach us as unclean."
So counseled he, and both together went
1100 Into the thickest wood; there soon they chose
The figtree, not that kind for fruit renowned,
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Deccan[5] spreads her arms
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
1105 The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother tree, a pillared shade
High overarched, and echoing walks between;
There oft the Indian herdsman, shunning heat,
Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds
1110 At loopholes cut through thickest shade. Those leaves
They gathered, broad as Amazonian targe,[6]
And with what skill they had, together sewed,
To gird their waist; vain covering, if to hide

4. Here punning bitterly on Eve's name, Adam will reaffirm its etymology—from hava, Hebrew for "life"—in 11.159–61.

5. Sections of southern India.

6. The Amazons, mythical female warriors, carried large, crescent-shaped shields called "targes."

Their guilt and dreaded shame! O how unlike 1115 To that first naked glory! Such of late
Columbus found th' American, so girt
With feathered cincture,° naked else and wild — belt
Among the trees on isles and woody shores.
Thus fenced, and, as they thought, their shame in part
1120 Covered, but not at rest or ease of mind,
They sat them down to weep; nor only tears
Rained at their eyes, but high winds worse within
Began to rise, high passions, anger, hate,
Mistrust, suspicion, discord, and shook sore
1125 Their inward state of mind, calm region once
And full of peace, now tossed and turbulent:
For Understanding ruled not, and the Will
Heard not her lore, both in subjection now
To sensual Appetite, who, from beneath
1130 Usurping over sovereign Reason, claimed
Superior sway.[7] From thus distempered breast,
Adam, estranged in look and altered style,
Speech intermitted thus to Eve renewed:
"Would thou hadst hearkened to my words, and stayed
1135 With me, as I besought thee, when that strange
Desire of wandering, this unhappy morn,
I know not whence possessed thee! we had then
Remained still happy, not as now, despoiled
Of all our good, shamed, naked, miserable.
1140 Let none henceforth seek needless cause to approve° — prove
The faith they owe;° when earnestly they seek — own
Such proof, conclude, they then begin to fail."
To whom, soon moved with touch of blame, thus Eve:
"What words have passed thy lips, Adam severe?
1145 Imput'st thou that to my default, or will
Of wandering, as thou call'st it, which who knows
But might as ill have happened, thou being by,
Or to thyself perhaps? Hadst thou been there,
Or here th' attempt, thou couldst not have discerned
1150 Fraud in the serpent, speaking as he spake;
No ground of enmity between us known,
Why he should mean me ill, or seek to harm?
Was I to have never parted from thy side?
As good have grown there still a lifeless rib.
1155 Being as I am, why didst not thou, the head,[8]
Command me absolutely not to go,
Going into such danger, as thou saidst?
Too facile° then, thou didst not much gainsay, — easy, mild
Nay, didst permit, approve, and fair dismiss.

7. As a result of the Fall, the higher faculties, reason and understanding, are subjected to appetite and the physical senses.

8. Cf. Corinthians 11.3: "the head of the woman is the man."

1160 Hadst thou been firm and fixed in thy dissent,
Neither had I transgressed, nor thou with me."
  To whom, then first incensed, Adam replied:
"Is this the love, is this the recompense
Of mine to thee, ingrateful Eve, expressed° revealed
1165 Immutable when thou were lost, not I,
Who might have lived and joyed immortal bliss,
Yet willingly chose rather death with thee?
And am I now upbraided as the cause
Of thy transgressing? not enough severe,
1170 It seems, in thy restraint! What could I more?
I warned thee, I admonished thee, foretold
The danger, and the lurking enemy
That lay in wait: beyond this had been force,
And force upon free will hath here no place.
1175 But confidence then bore thee on, secure
Either to meet no danger, or to find
Matter of glorious trial; and perhaps
I also erred in overmuch admiring
What seemed in thee so perfect, that I thought
1180 No evil durst attempt thee! but I rue
That error now, which is become my crime,
And thou th' accuser. Thus it shall befall
Him who, to worth in women overtrusting,
Lets her will rule; restraint she will not brook,° tolerate
1185 And, left to herself, if evil thence ensue,
She first his weak indulgence will accuse."
  Thus they in mutual accusation spent
The fruitless hours, but neither self-condemning;
And of their vain contèst appeared no end.

1660–65 1667, 1674

From Samson Agonistes[9]

60 But peace, I must not quarrel with the will
Of highest dispensation,[1] which herein
Haply° had ends above my reach to know: perhaps
Suffices that to me strength is my bane,[2]
And proves the source of all my miseries,
65 So many, and so huge, that each apart,
Would ask° a life to wail; but chief of all, need

9. This dramatic poem tells the story of the biblical Samson (Judges 13–16) from the time of his captivity to his death. Samson was given great strength by God to deliver his people from their longtime enemies, the Philistines. The source of his strength was his long hair. His Philistine wife, Dalila, badgered him into revealing the secret of his strength, then cut his hair and betrayed him to the Philistines, who blinded him and set him to work as a slave. In these lines, Samson laments his fate.

1. I.e., God; dispensation refers to the ordering of events by divine providence.

2. I.e., it is sufficient that (I know?) my strength is the cause of my downfall.

O loss of sight, of thee I most complain!
Blind among enemies, O worse than chains,
Dungeon, or beggary, or decrepit age!
70 Light the prime work of God to me is extinct,
And all her various objects of delight
Annull'd, which might in part my grief have eased,
Inferior to the vilest now become
Of man or worm; the vilest here excel me,
75 They creep, yet see; I dark in light exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.
Within doors, or without, still° as a fool — always
In power of others, never in my own;
Scarce half I seem to live, dead more than half.
80 O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse
Without all hope of day!
O first created beam, and thou great word,
Let there be light, and light was over all;[3]
85 Why am I thus bereaved° thy prime decree? — robbed of
The sun to me is dark
And silent as the moon,
When she deserts the night
Hid in her vacant interlunar cave.[4]
90 Since light so necessary is to life,
And almost life itself, if it be true
That light is in the soul,
She[5] all in every part; why was the sight
To such a tender ball as th' eye confined,
95 So obvious° and so easy to be quench'd, — exposed
And not, as feeling, through all parts diffused,
That she might look at will through every pore?
Then had I not been thus exiled from light,
As in the land of darkness yet in light,
100 To live a life half dead, a living death,
And buried; but O yet more miserable!
Myself my sepulchre, a moving grave,
Buried, yet not exempt
By privilege of death and burial
105 From worst of other evils, pains, and wrongs,
But made hereby obnoxious° more — exposed
To all the miseries of life,
Life in captivity
Among inhuman foes.

1647–70? 1671

3. Genesis 1.3: "And God said, Let there be light: and there was light"; this is God's "prime work" (line 70) and his "prime decree" (line 85) because it was his first (and perhaps most important) creation.
4. The Romans called the moon, when it was in conjunction with the sun, silentiis lunae; thus "silent" means "not shining." This phase of the moon was called the interlunar time (interlunii); during this time, according to myth, the moon retired to a cave somewhere beneath the earth; "vacant," from the Latin vacare, to be at leisure, i.e., resting.
5. I.e., the soul; according to Augustine (De Trinitate 5.6), the soul is whole in every part of the body.

SIR JOHN SUCKLING
1609–1642

Song[1]

Why so pale and wan, fond° lover? — foolish
  Prithee,° why so pale? — pray thee
Will, when looking well can't move her,
  Looking ill prevail?
5 Prithee, why so pale?

Why so dull and mute, young sinner?
  Prithee, why so mute?
Will, when speaking well can't win her,
  Saying nothing do 't?
10 Prithee, why so mute?

Quit, quit, for shame; this will not move,° — persuade
  This cannot take her.
If of herself she will not love,
  Nothing can make her:
15 The devil take her!

1638

Sonnet II[2]

Of thee, kind boy, I ask no red and white,[3]
  To make up my delight;
  No odd becoming graces,
Black eyes, or little know-not-whats in faces;
5 Make me but mad enough, give me good store
Of love for her I count;
  I ask no more,
'Tis love in love that makes the sport.

There's no such thing as that we beauty call,
10 It is mere cozenage° all; — fraud
  For though some, long ago,
Liked certain colors[4] mingled so and so,
That doth not tie me now from choosing new;
If I a fancy take
15 To black and blue,
That fancy doth it beauty make.

1. First printed in Suckling's play Aglaura 4.2 (1638). Orsames, a friend to the prince (Thersames), sings it upon request, and then claims it is "a little foolish counsell (Madam) I gave a friend of mine foure or five yeares agoe." It was evidently popular, occurring in at least five musical settings, with the first probably written by Henry Lawes for the first performance of the play, in 1637.
2. The term "sonnet" was formerly applied to any short love lyric.
3. The colors conventionally used to depict female beauty in love poetry (in the Petrarchan tradition). Kind boy: Cupid, as god of love.
4. I.e., the "red and white" of line 1.

'Tis not the meat, but 'tis the appetite
Makes eating a delight;
And if I like one dish
20 More than another, that a pheasant is;
What in our watches, that in us is found:
So to the height and nick° critical point
We up be wound,
No matter by what hand or trick.

Upon My Lady Carlisle's Walking in Hampton Court Garden

DIALOGUE[5]

T.C. J.S.

Thom.

Didst thou not find the place inspired,
And flowers, as if they had desired
No other sun, start from their beds,
And for a sight steal out their heads?
5 Heardst thou not music when she talked?
And didst not find that as she walked
She threw rare perfumes all about,
Such as bean-blossoms newly out,
Or chafèd° spices give?— warmed

J.S.

10 I must confess those perfumes, Tom,
I did not smell; nor found that from
Her passing by ought sprung up new.
The flowers had all their birth from you;
For I passed o'er the self-same walk
15 And did not find one single stalk
Of anything that was to bring
This unknown after-after-spring.

Thom.

Dull and insensible, couldst see
A thing so near a deity
20 Move up and down, and feel no change?

5. Lucy Hay, countess of Carlisle (1599–1660), was a patron of many poets. The "T.C." or "Thom." of this dialogue is the poet Thomas Carew (ca. 1595–1640; see pp. 385–90), who wrote two poems to Hay; "J.S." is John Suckling.

J.S.

None, and so great, were alike strange;
I had my thoughts, but not your way.
All are not born, sir, to the bay.[6]
Alas! Tom, I am flesh and blood,
25 And was consulting how I could
In spite of masks and hoods descry° reveal
The parts denied unto the eye.
I was undoing all she wore,
And had she walked but one turn more,
30 Eve in her first state had not been
More naked or more plainly seen.

Thom.

'Twas well for thee she left the place;
There is great danger in that face.
But hadst thou viewed her leg and thigh,
35 And upon that discovery
Searched after parts that are more dear
(As fancy seldom stops so near),
No time or age had ever seen
So lost a thing as thou hadst been.

1646

A Ballad upon a Wedding[7]

I tell thee, Dick,[8] where I have been,
Where I the rarest things have seen,
Oh, things without compare!
Such sights again cannot be found
5 In any place on English ground,
Be it at wake° or fair. parish festival

At Charing Cross,[9] hard by the way
Where we (thou know'st) do sell our hay,
There is a house with stairs;
10 And there did I see coming down

6. A crown of bay (or laurel) leaves was the traditional recognition of poetic achievement.
7. This poem parodies the epithalamion, a poem written to celebrate a marriage, the Greek name of which conveys that it was sung on the threshold of the bridal chamber. The genre, as practiced by the Latin poets, characteristically includes the invocation to the Muses (sources of artistic inspiration), the bringing home of the bride, the singing and dancing at the wedding party, and the preparations for the wedding night. The first English example was written by Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586) in about 1580, and Edmund Spenser (ca. 1552–1599) published perhaps the most well-known instance of the form in 1595 (see p. 195).
8. As a short form of the name Richard, a generic name for a man. The names used below (in lines 22–24) are all conventional or type names for men. "Bridget" and "Nell" (both line 132) are conventional peasant names for women.
9. A busy center in London located near the Haymarket; originally the site of a stone cross erected by King Edward I (1239–1307) in memory of his queen, Eleanor.

Such folk as are not in our town,
Forty, at least, in pairs.

Amongst the rest, one pest'lent° fine — exceptionally
(His beard no bigger, though, than thine)
15 Walked on before the rest.
Our landlord looks like nothing to him;
The king (God bless him!), 'twould undo him
Should he go still° so dressed. — always

At course-a-park,[1] without all doubt,
20 He should have first been taken out
By all the maids i' th' town,
Though lusty Roger there had been,
Or little George upon the Green,
Or Vincent of the Crown.

25 But wot° you what? the youth was going — know
To make an end of all his wooing;
The parson for him stayed.
Yet by his leave, for all his haste,
He did not so much wish all past,
30 Perchance, as did the maid.

The maid (and thereby hangs a tale),
For such a maid no Whitsun-ale[2]
Could ever yet produce;
No grape, that's kindly ripe,[3] could be 35 So round, so plump, so soft as she,
Nor half so full of juice.

Her finger was so small the ring
Would not stay on, which they did bring;
It was too wide a peck:[4]
40 And to say truth (for out it must),
It looked like the great collar (just)
About our young colt's neck.

Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice, stole in and out,
45 As if they feared the light;
But oh, she dances such a way,
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight!

He would have kissed her once or twice,
50 But she would not, she was so nice,° — demure
She would not do 't in sight;

1. A rural game in which a girl chooses a boy to chase her.
2. A church festival, or "ale," at which much ale was drunk; held at Whitsuntide (or Pentecost, seventh Sunday after Easter).
3. Naturally ripe; i.e., vine-ripened.
4. A measure of capacity; i.e., much too large.

And then she looked as who should say,
"I will do what I list° today; desire
And you shall do 't at night."

55 Her cheeks so rare a white was on,
No daisy makes comparison
(Who sees them is undone),
For streaks of red were mingled there,
Such as are on a Catherine pear[5]
60 (The side that's next the sun).

Her lips were red, and one was thin
Compared to that was next her chin
(Some bee had stung it newly);
But, Dick, her eyes so guard her face
65 I durst no more upon them gaze
Than on the sun in Jùly.

Her mouth so small, when she does speak,
Thou 'dst swear her teeth her words did break,
That they might passage get;
70 But she so handled still the matter,
They came as good as ours, or better,
And are not spent° a° whit.° used up / one / bit

If wishing should be any sin,
The parson himself had guilty been 75 (She looked that day so purely);
And did the youth so oft the feat
At night, as some did in conceit,° imagination
It would have spoiled him, surely.

Passion o' me, how I run on![6]
80 There's that that would be thought upon,
I trow,° besides the bride. suppose
The business of the kitchen's great,
For it is fit that man should eat,
Nor was it there denied.

85 Just in the nick the cook knocked thrice,
And all the waiters in a trice
His summons did obey;
Each serving-man, with dish in hand,
Marched boldly up, like our trained band,° militia
90 Presented, and away.

When all the meat was on the table,
What man of knife or teeth was able

5. A small variety of pear.
6. In the 1646 edition of Suckling's collection Fragmenta Aurea, this stanza, with the first three lines following the last three, appears after line 96. The order here is that of the 1648 and subsequent editions.

To stay to be entreated?[7]
And this the very reason was,
95 Before the parson could say grace,
The company was seated.

Now hats fly off, and youths carouse;
Healths° first go round, and then the house; toasts
The bride's came thick and thick:
100 And when 'twas named another's health,
Perhaps he made it hers by stealth;
And who could help it, Dick?

O' th' sudden up they rise and dance;
Then sit again and sigh and glance;
105 Then dance again and kiss.
Thus several ways the time did pass,
Till every woman wished her place,
And every man wished his!

By this time all were stolen aside
110 To counsel and undress the bride,
But that he must not know;
But yet 'twas thought he guessed her mind,
And did not mean to stay behind
Above an hour or so.

115 When in he came, Dick, there she lay
Like new-fallen snow melting away
('Twas time, I trow,° to part); believe
Kisses were now the only stay,
Which soon she gave, as who would say,
120 "God b' w' ye,[8] with all my heart."

But just as heaven would have, to cross it,
In came the bridesmaids with the posset.[9]
The bridegroom ate in spite,
For had he left the women to 't,
125 It would have cost two hours to do 't,
Which were too much that night.

At length the candle's out, and now
All that they had not done, they do.
What that is, who can tell?
130 But I believe it was no more
Than thou and I have done before
With Bridget and with Nell.

ca. 1641 1646

7. I.e., what man able to eat could wait to be asked to sit down?
8. A contraction for God be with ye, pronounced in two syllables.
9. A hot drink of spiced milk curdled with ale or wine, traditionally given to a groom on his wedding night.

Out upon It!

Out upon it! I have loved
  Three whole days together;
And am like to love three more,
  If it prove fair weather.

5 Time shall molt away his wings,
  Ere he shall discover
In the whole wide world again
  Such a constant lover.

But the spite on 't is, no praise
10 Is due at all to me;
Love with me had made no stays[1]
  Had it any been but she.

Had it any been but she,
  And that very face,[2]
15 There had been at least ere this
  A dozen dozen in her place.

ANNE BRADSTREET
ca. 1612–1672

In Honor of that High and Mighty Princess, Queen Elizabeth, of Most Happy Memory[1]

The Proem[2]

Although, great Queen, thou now in silence lie,
Yet thy loud herald° fame doth to the sky — royal crier
Thy wondrous worth proclaim in every clime,° — climate, region
And so has vowed, whilst there is world, or time;
5 So great's thy glory, and thine excellence,
The sound thereof raps° every humane sense; — enraptures
That men account it no impiety,
To say, thou wert a fleshly° deity.° — earthly / goddess
Thousands bring off'rings, (though out of date)
10 Thy world of honors to accumulate,
'Mongst hundred hecatombs of roaring[3] verse,

1. I.e., found no support.
2. In other versions, this line reads "That very very face."

1. Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603; see pp. 142–43), who ruled England for forty-four years.
2. Brief introductory verse.
3. Loud. Hecatombs: a great number of things presented as an offering (originally from the Greek, the sacrifice of one hundred oxen).

Mine bleating[4] stands before thy royal hearse:° grave
Thou never didst, nor canst thou now disdain,
T' accept the tribute of a loyal brain;
15 Thy clemency did yerst° esteem as much formerly
The acclamations of the poor, as rich;
Which makes me deem,° my rudeness is no wrong, think
Though I resound thy greatness 'mongst the throng.

The Poem

No° phoenix pen, nor Spenser's poetry, neither
20 No Speed's, nor Camden's learned history,[5]
Eliza's° works, wars, praise, can e're Elizabeth's compact,° summarize
The world's the theater where she did act;
No memories, nor volumes can contain,
The nine Olimp'ades[6] of her happy reign,
25 Who was so good, so just, so learned, so wise,
From all the kings on earth she won the prize;
Nor say I more than duly is her due,
Millions will testify that this is true;
She hath wiped off th' aspersion of her sex,
30 That women wisdom lack to play the Rex;° King
Spain's monarch says not so; nor yet his host,° followers
She taught them better manners to their cost.[7]
The Salique law[8] had not in force now been,
If France had ever hoped for such a Queen;
35 But can you Doctors[9] now this point dispute,
She's argument enough to make you mute;
Since first the sun did run, his ne'er° runned° race, never / finished
And earth had twice a year, a new-old face;[1]
Since time was time, and man unmanly man,[2]
40 Come show me such a phoenix[3] if you can;
Was ever people better ruled than hers?
Was ever land more happy, freed from stirs?° public disturbances

4. Crying of a sheep, goat, or calf, used contemptuously for a human utterance.
5. William Camden (1551–1623) wrote Annals or The History of the Most Renowned and Victorious Princess Elizabeth (translated from the Latin by R. Norton, 1630). The phoenix is a legendary bird, the only one of its kind. It is represented as living five hundred years in the Arabian desert before setting itself on fire, then rising anew from its own ashes; the "phoenix" here refers to Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586; see pp. 208–20). Edmund Spenser (1552–1599; see pp. 159–205) wrote The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596), the title of which refers to Queen Elizabeth. John Speed (1552–1629) wrote History of Great Britain under the Conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes and Normans from Julius Caesar to Our Most Gracious Sovereign King James (1611).
6. Olympiads: periods of four years reckoned from one celebration of the Olympics to the next, by which the ancient Greeks computed time. The version of this poem published in 1678 has " 'leven" in place of "nine"; eleven corresponds to Elizabeth's forty-four-year reign, while the meaning of nine is unclear.
7. Spain's monarch was Philip II (1527–1598); his great naval fleet, the Spanish Armada, was defeated by the British naval forces in 1588.
8. A much-debated law excluding females from succession to the French crown.
9. Learned men or, more specifically, men proficient in the knowledge of law.
1. A reference to the seasonal changes of spring and fall, at which times Earth dons a "new" face, though "old" because recurring annually.
2. Time became measurable with the creation of day and night, and distinct from eternity when God made humans mortal as punishment for the sin of Adam and Eve; as a result of the Fall, Adam lost his true manly nature, thus becoming "unmanly man."
3. The Phoenix was an emblem used to represent Queen Elizabeth (who was often called the "Virgin Queen") because of its associations with the Virgin Mary (the bird is both virginal and unique).

Did ever wealth in England so abound?
Her victories in foreign coasts resound?
45 Ships more invincible than Spain's, her foe
She racked, she sacked, she sunk his Armadoe;° Armada
Her stately troops advanced to Lisbon's wall,
Don Anthony in's right for to install;[4]
She frankly helped Franks' (brave) distressèd King,[5]
50 The states united now her fame do sing;[6]
She their protectrix was, they well do know,
Unto our dread virago,[7] what they owe;
Her nobles sacrificed their noble blood,
Nor men, nor coin she spared, to do them good;
55 The rude untamed Irish she did quell,
And Tiron[8] bound, before her picture fell.
Had ever Prince such counsellors as she?
Her self Minerva,[9] caused them so to be;
Such soldiers, and such captains never seen,
60 As were the subjects of our (Pallas) Queen;
Her sea-men through all straights[1] the world did round,
Terra incognitae[2] might know her sound;
Her Drake came laded home with Spanish gold,[3]
Her Essex took Cades, their Herculean hold.[4]
65 But time would fail me, so my wit would too,
To tell of half she did, or she could do;
Semiramis[5] to her is but obscure,
More infamy than fame she did procure;
She placed her glory but on Babel's walls,
70 World's wonder for a time, but yet it falls;
Fierce Tomris[6] (Cyrus' heads-man, Sythians' Queen)
Had put her harness off, had she but seen
Our Amazon i'th' camp at Tilberry:[7]

4. Don Antonio of Crato (1531–1595), a claimant to the throne of Portugal, was used by Elizabeth to cause trouble for Philip II. In 1589, he went to coastal Portugal and Spain with Sir Francis Drake (1546–1596) and Sir John Norris (1547–1597), their intention being to provoke rebellion in Portugal against the rule of Philip. Their expedition was a failure.
5. From 1589 to 1590, Elizabeth sent troops and £300,000 to Henry IV, the Huguenot king of France (the "Franks"), first against the Catholic League, which raised a puppet king against him, and later against Spain.
6. A reference to the provinces of the Low Countries (the representative assembly of the Netherlands was called the States General). Elizabeth aided the Protestant Netherlands in their wars against Spain.
7. A vigorous, heroic woman; a female warrior.
8. Hugh O'Neill (ca. 1540–1616), second earl of Tyrone and an Irish chieftain, intrigued with both the Spanish and the Scots against England. He was defeated by Lord Mountjoy and the English forces in 1601.
9. The Roman goddess of war, wisdom, chastity, the arts, and justice; also called Pallas Athena (Greek).
1. Straits: narrow waterways connecting two large bodies of water; may also mean difficulties.
2. Unknown lands (Latin).
3. In his expedition of 1577–80, Sir Francis Drake (1540 or 1543–1596) plundered spoils of immense value from Spanish settlements along the coast of Chile and Peru.
4. Robert Devereux (1566–1601), second earl of Essex, captured Cádiz, a Spanish port, in 1596. Hercules was a mythological hero with superhuman strength; thus "Herculean" suggests the port was very strong or well fortified.
5. Late ninth-century queen of Assyria famed for her beauty, military prowess, and promiscuity; she ruled after the death of her husband Ninus (in whose murder she may have had a hand); she reputedly built Babylon.
6. First-century queen of the Massagetae, a Scythian tribe, defeated Cyrus the Great of Persia; she had his head cut off and thrown into a pot of blood, because, she said, he thirsted for it.
7. A fortification on the north bank of the river Thames, near London. In August 1588, the English army was assembled there, in readiness to repulse an expected Spanish invasion. Queen Elizabeth reviewed the troops and gave a celebrated address, reportedly wearing a silver breastplate over her white dress and carrying a truncheon. The Amazons were a legendary tribe of women warriors.

(Judging all valor, and all majesty)
75 Within that Princess to have residence,
And prostrate yielded to her excellence:
Dido[8] first foundress of proud Carthage walls,
(Who living consummates her funerals)
A great Eliza,[9] but compared with ours,
80 How vanisheth her glory, wealth, and powers;
Proud profuse Cleopatra,[1] whose wrong name,
Instead of glory proved her country's shame:
Of her what worth in story's to be seen,
But that she was a rich Egyptian Queen;
85 Zenobia,[2] potent empress of the East,
And of all these without compare the best;
(Whom none but great Aurelius could quell)
Yet for our Queen is no fit parallel:
She was a phoenix Queen, so shall she be,
90 Her ashes not revived more phoenix she;
Her personal perfections, who would tell,
Must dip his pen i'th' Heliconian well;[3]
Which I may not, my pride doth but aspire,
To read what others write, and then admire.
95 Now say, have women worth, or have they none?
Or had they some, but with our Queen is't gone?
Nay Masculines, you have thus taxed° us long, accused
But she though dead, will vindicate our wrong.
Let such, as say our sex is void of reason,
100 Know 'tis a slander now, but once was treason.
But happy England, which had such a Queen,
O happy, happy, had those days still been,
But happiness lies in a higher sphere;
Then wonder not, Eliza moves not here.
105 Full fraught with honor, riches, and with days,
She set, she set, like Titan° in his rays. the sun
No more shall rise or set such glorious sun
Until the heavens' great revolution:[4]
If then new things, their old form must retain,
110 Eliza shall rule Albion° once again. England

8. Legendary founder and queen of Carthage, who burned herself on a funeral pyre, either to escape marriage to Iarbas, a local king, or, according to Virgil, because she had been abandoned by Aeneas, who left her before founding Rome.
9. According to some authors, Dido's true name was Elyssa; when depicted as a chaste queen, she was an appropriate figure for England's "Eliza," though less great, Bradstreet insists.
1. First-century Egyptian queen and mistress of Julius Caesar, she married Marc Antony and the two were defeated by Octavius at the battle of Actium; she killed herself rather than be paraded in triumph by Octavius. Her story is told in Shakespeare's tragedy Antony and Cleopatra. "Cleopatra" means "glory to the father" in Greek; Bradstreet evidently takes Cleopatra's name as referring by metaphorical extension to her "fatherland."
2. Queen of Palmyra, a city-state in ancient Syria. After the death of her husband, Odaenathus, whom she may have murdered, she embarked on wars of expansion and called herself "Augusta" and the "Empress of the East"; she distinguished herself in warfare but was finally defeated by the Roman emperor Aurelian in 273.
3. The Hippocrene Spring, on Mt. Helicon, was the haunt of the Muses, the nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be the sources of inspiration for the arts.
4. A reference to the Apocalypse, after which a "new heaven and a new earth" (Revelation 21.1), eternal and idyllic, will be established.

Her Epitaph

Here sleeps the Queen, this is the royal bed.
O'th' damask Rose, sprung from the white and red,[5]
Whose sweet perfume fills the all-filling air,
This Rose is withered, once so lovely fair,
115 On neither tree did grow such Rose before,
The greater was our gain, our loss the more.

Another

Here lies the pride of Queens, pattern of Kings,
So blaze° it fame, here's feathers for thy wings, — announce
Here lies the envied, yet unparalleled Prince
120 Whose living virtues speak (though dead long since)
If many worlds, as that fantastic framed,[6]
In every one, be her great glory famed.

1643 1650

The Prologue[7]

I

To sing of wars, of captains, and of kings,
Of cities founded, common-wealths begun,
For my mean° pen, are too superior things, — inferior
And how they all, or each, their dates have run
5 Let poets, and historians set these forth,
My obscure verse shall not so dim their worth.

But when my wond'ring eyes, and envious heart,
Great Bartas'[8] sugared lines do but read o'er,
Fool, I do grudge the Muses[9] did not part° — divide
10 'Twixt him and me that over-fluent store;
A Bartas can do what a Bartas will,
But simple I, according to my skill.

5. Queen Elizabeth I was the daughter of Henry VIII, whose father was Henry VII, of the House of Lancaster, and whose mother was Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV, of the house of York. These two houses, whose symbols were the red rose and the white rose respectively, warred upon each other for many years. The "Damask Rose," a pink or variegated red-and-white rose, is here used to represent the merging of the two houses in the person of Elizabeth.
6. I.e., if there are many worlds, as that visionary or fantastical person surmised; in fact, a number of Bradstreet's contemporaries, influenced by Copernicus's revolutionary theory of a heliocentric universe, had speculated about the possible existence of "other worlds"; see, e.g., Margaret Cavendish, "Of Many Worlds in This World" (p. 500).
7. This poem appeared at the beginning of Bradstreet's first volume of poetry, The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America (1650), which was evidently published without Bradstreet's knowledge.
8. Guillaume du Bartas (1544–1590), French poet and author of La Semaine (1578), an epic poem on Christian history; his works greatly influenced Bradstreet.
9. The nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be the source of inspiration for the arts.

From school-boys tongue, no rhetoric[1] we expect,
Nor yet a sweet consort,° from broken strings, concert, harmony
15 Nor perfect beauty, where's a main defect;
My foolish, broken, blemished Muse so sings;
And this to mend, alas, no art is able,
'Cause nature made it so irreparable.

Nor can I, like that fluent sweet-tongued Greek
20 Who lisped at first,[2] speak afterwards more plain.
By art, he gladly found what he did seek,
A full requital of his striving pain:
Art can do much, but this maxim's most sure.
A weak or wounded brain admits no cure.

25 I am obnoxious° to each carping tongue, vulnerable
Who says my hand a needle better fits;
A poet's pen all scorn I should thus wrong;
For such despite° they cast on female wits: scorn
If what I do prove well, it won't advance,° be recognized
30 They'll say it's stolen, or else it was by chance.

But sure the antick[3] Greeks were far more mild,
Else of our sex, why feignèd° they those nine,[4] invented
And poesy made Calliope's owne child?[5]
So 'mongst the rest, they placed the arts divine:
35 But this weak knot[6] they will full soon untie,
The Greeks did nought, but play the fool and lie.

Let Greeks be Greeks, and women what they are,
Men have precedency,[7] and still excel;
It is but vain, unjustly to wage war;
40 Men can do best, and women know it well;
Preeminence in each and all is yours,
Yet grant some small acknowledgement of ours.

1. Skill in using eloquent and persuasive language.
2. The Greek orator Demosthenes (384–322 B.C.E.), was said to have overcome a speech defect.
3. Ancient; but also absurd, bizarre.
4. I.e., the nine Muses.
5. Calliope was the Muse of heroic poetry.
6. I.e., this argument for women's right to compose poetry; "they" refers to those who disapprove of women writing poetry; the last line of the stanza is what "they" might say to refute the argument made by the speaker in the first four lines of the stanza.
7. Superiority in rank or estimation; also, priority in time or succession.

And oh, ye high flown quills[8] that soar the skies,
And ever with your prey, still catch your praise,
45 If e'er you deign° these lowly lines your eyes, think fit for
Give wholesome parsley wreath, I ask no bays:[9]
This mean and unrefinèd stuff of mine,
Will make your glistering gold but more to shine.

1650

Before the Birth of One of Her Children

All things within this fading world hath end,
Adversity doth still our joys attend;
No ties so strong, no friends so dear and sweet,
But with death's parting blow is sure to meet.
5 The sentence past is most irrevocable,[1]
A common thing, yet oh inevitable;
How soon, my dear,[2] death may my steps attend,
How soon't may be thy lot to lose thy friend;
We both are ignorant, yet love bids me
10 These farewell lines to recommend to thee,
That when that knot's untied[3] that made us one,
I may seem thine, who in effect am none.
And if I see not half my days that's due,[4]
What nature would, God grant to yours and you;
15 The many faults that well you know I have,
Let be interr'd in my oblivion's[5] grave;
If any worth or virtue were in me,
Let that live freshly in thy memory,
And when thou feel'st no grief, as I no harms,
20 Yet love thy dead, who long lay in thine arms:
And when thy loss shall be repaid with gains,
Look to my little babes, my dear remains.
And if thou love thy self, or loved'st me,
These O protect from step-dame's injury.
25 And if chance to thine eyes shall bring this verse,
With some sad sighs honor my absent Hearse;° corpse
And kiss this paper for thy love's dear sake,
Who with salt tears this last farewell did take.

1678

8. Feathers, poetic for wings; also, pens.
9. Leaves of the bay tree, woven into a wreath to reward a poet; hence the fame or repute gained by poetic achievement.
1. The sin of Adam and Eve brought the "sentence" of death to humans.
2. The poet addresses her husband; death due to complications in childbirth was common at this time.
3. I.e., the "knot" of marriage, "untied" by death.
4. I.e., she fears she may die before age thirty-five, half of the seventy years traditionally seen as humankind's allotment.
5. Some editors emend to "oblivious."

To My Dear and Loving Husband

If ever two were one, then surely we.
If ever man were loved by wife, then thee;
If ever wife was happy in a man,
Compare with me ye women if you can.
5 I prize thy love more than whole mines of gold,
Or all the riches that the East doth hold.
My love is such that rivers cannot quench,
Nor ought but love from thee give recompense.
Thy love is such I can no way repay;
10 The heavens reward thee manifold, I pray.
Then while we live, in love let's so persever,
That when we live no more we may live ever.

1678

The Author to Her Book[6]

Thou ill-formed offspring of my feeble brain,
Who after birth didst by my side remain,
Till snatched from thence by friends, less wise than true,
Who thee abroad, exposed to public view,
5 Made thee in rags, halting to th' press to trudge,
Where errors were not lessened (all may judge).
At thy return my blushing was not small,
My rambling brat (in print) should mother call,
I cast thee by as one unfit for light,
10 The visage was so irksome in my sight;
Yet being mine own, at length affection would
Thy blemishes amend, if so I could.
I washed thy face, but more defects I saw,
And rubbing off a spot still made a flaw.
15 I stretched thy joints to make thee even feet,[7]
Yet still thou run'st more hobbling than is meet;° appropriate
In better dress to trim thee was my mind,
But nought save homespun cloth i' th' house I find.
In this array 'mongst vulgars° may'st thou roam. common people
20 In critic's hands beware thou dost not come,
And take thy way where yet thou art not known;
If for thy father asked, say thou hadst none;
And for thy mother, she alas is poor,
Which caused her thus to send thee out of door.

1678

6. Bradstreet is thought to have written this poem in 1666, when a second edition of The Tenth Muse (see note 7, p. 462) was contemplated.
7. I.e., metrical feet; to smooth out the lines.

A Letter to Her Husband, Absent upon Public Employment[8]

My head, my heart, mine eyes, my life, nay, more,
My joy, my magazine° of earthly store, storehouse
If two be one, as surely thou and I,
How stayest thou there, whilst I at Ipswich[9] lie?
5 So many steps, head[1] from the heart to sever,
If but a neck, soon should we be together.
I, like the Earth this season, mourn in black,
My Sun is gone so far in's zodiac,
Whom whilst I 'joyed, nor storms, nor frost I felt,
10 His warmth such frigid colds did cause to melt.
My chillèd limbs now numbèd lie forlorn;
Return; return, sweet Sol, from Capricorn;[2]
In this dead time, alas, what can I more
Than view those fruits which through thy heat I bore?
15 Which sweet contentment yield me for a space,
True living pictures of their father's face.
O strange effect! now thou art southward gone,
I weary grow the tedious day so long;
But when thou northward to me shalt return,
20 I wish my Sun may never set, but burn
Within the Cancer[3] of my glowing breast,
The welcome house of him my dearest guest.
Where ever, ever stay, and go not thence,
Till nature's sad decree shall call thee hence;
25 Flesh of thy flesh, bone of thy bone,[4]
I here, thou there, yet both but one.

Here Follows Some Verses upon the Burning of Our House July 10th, 1666

Copied Out of a Loose Paper

In silent night when rest I took
For sorrow near I did not look
I wakened was with thund'ring noise
And piteous shrieks of dreadful voice.
5 That fearful sound of "Fire!" and "Fire!"
Let no man know is my desire.[5]

8. Simon Bradstreet was in Boston as a member of the General Court, which was working to combine several individual colonies into the United Colonies of New England.
9. Town in Massachusetts, north of Boston.
1. Perhaps including an allusion to the biblical idea that "the head of the woman is the man" (1 Corinthians 11.3).
2. Tenth sign of the zodiac; represents winter. Sol: sun.
3. Fourth sign of the zodiac; represents summer.
4. After God created Eve from Adam's rib, Adam said, "This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh" (Genesis 2.23).
5. I.e., I desire that no man know that "fearful sound."

I, starting up, the light did spy,
And to my God my heart did cry
To strengthen me in my distress
10 And not to leave me succorless.° without aid
Then, coming out, beheld a° space° for a / time
The flame consume my dwelling place.
And when I could no longer look,
I blest His name that gave and took,[6]
15 That laid my goods now in the dust.
Yea, so it was, and so 'twas just.
It was His own, it was not mine,
Far be it that I should repine;° complain
He might of all justly bereft
20 But yet sufficient for us left.
When by the ruins oft I past
My sorrowing eyes aside did cast,
And here and there the places spy
Where oft I sat and long did lie:
25 Here stood that trunk, and there that chest,
There lay that store I counted best.
My pleasant things in ashes lie,
And them behold no more shall I.
Under thy roof no guest shall sit,
30 Nor at thy table eat a bit.
No pleasant tale shall e'er be told,
Nor things recounted done of old.
No candle e'er shall shine in thee,
Nor bridegroom's voice e'er heard shall be.
35 In silence ever shall thou lie,
Adieu, Adieu, all's vanity.° empty, worthless
Then straight I 'gin my heart to chide,
And did thy wealth on earth abide?
Didst fix thy hope on mold'ring dust?
40 The arm of flesh didst make thy trust?
Raise up thy thoughts above the sky
That dunghill mists away may fly.
Thou hast an house on high erect,
Framed by that mighty Architect,
45 With glory richly furnished,
Stands permanent though this be fled.
It's purchasèd and paid for too
By Him[7] who hath enough to do.
A price so vast as is unknown
50 Yet by His gift is made thine own;
There's wealth enough, I need no more,
Farewell, my pelf,[8] farewell my store.
The world no longer let me love,
My hope and treasure lies above.

1867

6. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord" (Job 1.21).
7. I.e., Christ, whose death is said to pay for the sins of Adam and Eve.
8. Possessions, usually falsely gained.

RICHARD CRASHAW
1613–1649

On the Baptized Ethiopian[1]

Let it no longer be a forlorn hope
To wash[2] an Ethiope;
He's washed, his gloomy skin a peaceful shade
For his white soul is made,
5 And now, I doubt not, the Eternal Dove[3]
A black-faced house will love.

1646

To the Infant Martyrs[4]

Go, smiling souls, your new-built cages[5] break,
In heaven you'll learn to sing, ere here to speak,[6]
Nor let the milky fonts[7] that bathe your thirst
Be your delay;
5 The place that calls you hence is, at the worst,
Milk all the way.[8]

1646

Upon the Infant Martyrs

To see both blended in one flood,
The mothers' milk, the children's blood,
Make me doubt° if heaven will gather — wonder
Roses hence, or lilies rather.

1646

The Tear

What bright soft thing is this?
Sweet Mary, thy fair eyes' expense?[9]

1. Acts 8.26–39 tells how an Ethiopian eunuch of great authority under Queen Candace was converted and baptized by Philip the Evangelist.
2. I.e., baptize. An allusion to the phrase washing an Ethiope white, used as an expression for an impossible task.
3. I.e., the Holy Spirit; the spirit of God descends "like a dove" during Christ's baptism (Matthew 3.16).
4. The Holy Innocents, all the children of Bethlehem of two years and under, who were slain by Herod in an effort to destroy the one who, according to prophecy, would become the ruler of Israel, i.e., Jesus (Matthew 2.16).
5. I.e., their bodies, which confined them to an earthly existence.
6. "Infant" derives from infans, Latin for "unable to speak."
7. "Fonts" are receptacles used in the sacrament of baptism; i.e., a reference both to baptism and to mother's milk.
8. I.e., at worst, the Milky Way will replace their mothers' milk; at best, they will be even higher in the heavens.
9. I.e., is this the product of your fair eyes, Mary?

A moist spark it is,
A wat'ry diamond; from whence
5 The very term, I think, was found
The water[1] of a diamond.

O 'tis not a tear,
'Tis a star about to drop
From thine eye its sphere;
10 The sun will stoop and take it up.
Proud will his sister[2] be to wear
This thine eyes' jewel in her ear.

O 'tis a tear
Too true a tear; for no sad eyne,° eyes
15 How sad so e're,° ever
Rain so true a teare as thine;
Each drop leaving a place so dear,
Weeps for itself, is its own tear.

Such a pearl as this is,
20 (Slipped from Aurora's° dewy breast) the dawn's
The rose bud's sweet lip kisses;
And such the rose itself, when vexed
With ungentle flames, does shed,
Sweating in too warm a bed.

25 Such the maiden gem,
By the wanton spring put on,
Peeps from her parent stem,
And blushes on the manly sun:
This wat'ry blossom of thy eyne,
30 Ripe, will make the richer wine.

Faire drop, why quak'st thou so?
'Cause thou straight° must lay thy head immediately
In the dust? o no;
The dust shall never be thy bed:
35 A pillow for thee will I bring,
Stuffed with down of angels' wing.

Thus carried up on high,
(For to Heaven thou must go)
Sweetly shalt thou lie
40 And in soft slumbers bathe thy woe;
Till the singing orbs[3] awake thee,
And one of their bright chorus make thee.

There thy self shalt be
An eye, but not a weeping one,

1. The term for the transparency and luster of a diamond.
2. The moon.
3. In Ptolemaic astronomy, the concentric crystalline spheres that contained one or more of the heavenly bodies and revolved about Earth, creating beautiful music.

45 Yet I doubt of thee,
Whether th'hadst rather there have shone
An eye of Heaven; or still shine here,
In th'Heaven of Mary's eye, a tear.

ABRAHAM COWLEY
1618–1667

The Wish

Well then; I now do plainly see,
This busy world and I shall ne'er agree;
The very honey of all earthly joy
Does of all meats the soonest cloy;[1]
5 And they, methinks, deserve my pity
Who for it can endure the stings,
The crowd, and buzz, and murmurings
Of this great hive, the city.

Ah, yet, ere I descend to the grave
10 May I a small house and large garden have!
And a few friends, and many books, both true,
Both wise, and both delightful too!
And since love ne'er will from me flee,
A mistress moderately fair,
15 And good as guardian angels are,
Only beloved, and loving me!

O fountains, when in you shall I
Myself, eased of unpeaceful thoughts, espy?
O fields! O woods! when, when shall I be made
20 The happy tenant of your shade?
Here's the spring-head of pleasure's flood,
Here's wealthy Nature's treasury,
Where all the riches lie that she
Has coined and stamped for good.

25 Pride and ambition here
Only in farfetched metaphors appear;
Here naught but winds can hurtful murmurs scatter,
And naught but Echo[2] flatter.
The gods, when they descended, hither
30 From heaven did always choose their way;
And therefore we may boldly say
That 'tis the way, too, thither.[3]

1. Overfeed to the point of loathing.
2. In Greek mythology, a nymph, who misused her power of speech and was therefore condemned to repeat others' words.
3. I.e., since the gods always come here when they descend from heaven, we can say that the way to heaven ("thither") is from here.

How happy here should I
And one dear she live and, embracing, die!
35 She who is all the world, and can exclude
In deserts, solitude.
I should have then this only fear,
Lest men, when they my pleasures see,
Should hither throng to live like me,
40 And so make a city here.

1647

Platonic Love[4]

Indeed I must confess,
When souls mix 'tis an happiness,
But not complete till bodies too do join,
And both our wholes into one whole combine;
5 But half of heaven the souls in glory taste
Till by love in heaven at last
Their bodies too are placed.

In thy immortal part
Man, as well as I, thou art.[5]
10 But something 'tis that differs° thee and me, distinguishes
And we must one even in that difference be.
I thee both as a man and woman prize,[6]
For a perfect love implies
Love in all capacities.

15 Can that for true love pass
When a fair woman courts her glass?° mirror
Something unlike must in love's likeness be:
His° wonder is one and variety. love's
For he whose soul nought but a soul can move
20 Does a new Narcissus prove,[7]
And his own image love.

That souls do beauty know
'Tis to the body's help they owe;
If when they know't they straight abuse that trust
25 And shut the body from't, 'tis as unjust

4. Based on the ideas of the ancient Greek philosopher Plato, the concept of Platonic love (as it was expressed by many Renaissance writers) held that physical beauty is the outer sign of a moral and spiritual beauty of the soul; the proper Platonic lover adores the beloved's physical beauty only as a manifestation of spirit.

5. I.e., in your soul, you are equal to man.

6. I.e., I value you both as my equal (as a "man") and as a lover (as a "woman").

7. I.e., prove to be a new Narcissus: in Greek mythology, a youth who fell in love with his own reflection in a pool of water, then drowned in an attempt to embrace the reflection.

As if I brought my dearest friend to see
  My mistress and at th' instant he
  Should steal her quite from me.

RICHARD LOVELACE*
1618–1658

To Althea, from Prison

When Love with unconfinèd wings[1]
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at the grates;
5 When I lie tangled in her hair
And fettered to her eye,
The gods[2] that wanton in the air
Know no such liberty.

When flowing cups run swiftly round,
10 With no allaying Thames,[3]
Our careless heads with roses bound,
Our hearts with loyal flames;
When thirsty grief in wine we steep,
When healths° and draughts go free, toasts
15 Fishes, that tipple° in the deep, drink
Know no such liberty.

When, like committed° linnets,° I caged / finches
With shriller throat shall sing
The sweetness, mercy, majesty,
20 And glories of my King;
When I shall voice aloud how good
He is, how great should be,
Enlargèd winds, that curl the flood,
Know no such liberty.

25 Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage.
If I have freedom in my love,

*Since all the poems here are from Lovelace's volume Lucasta (1649), we do not repeat the publication date for each.
1. I.e., Cupid, the winged god of erotic love in Roman mythology.
2. Some seventeenth-century versions read "birds."
3. I.e., with no mixture of water in the wine (the river Thames flows through London).

30 And in my soul am free,
Angels alone, that soar above,
Enjoy such liberty.

To Lucasta, Going to the Wars

Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind,
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind,
To war and arms I fly.

5 True, a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field;
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such
10 As you too shall adore;
I could not love thee, dear, so much,
Loved I not honor more.

To Amarantha, That She Would Dishevel Her Hair

Amarantha sweet and fair,
Ah, braid no more that shining hair!
As my curious hand or eye,
Hovering round thee, let it fly.

5 Let it fly as unconfined
As its calm ravisher, the wind,
Who hath left his darling, th' East,
To wanton o'er that spicy nest.

Every tress must be confessed[4]
10 But neatly tangled at the best,
Like a clue° of golden thread, ball
Most excellently ravelèd.

Do not then wind up that light
In ribands,° and o'ercloud in night; ribbons
15 Like the sun in's early ray,
But shake your head and scatter day.

See, 'tis broke![5] Within this grove,
The bower and the walks of love,

4. I.e., said to be.
5. I.e., the morning has broken, or started (a continuation of the previous stanza, in which the speaker compares Amarantha's hair to the sun, and encourages her to shake it free, as the sun scatters its light and begins day).

Weary lie we down and rest
20 And fan each other's panting breast.

Here we'll strip and cool our fire
In cream below, in milk-baths higher;
And when all wells are drawn dry,
I'll drink a tear out of thine eye.

25 Which our very joys shall leave,
That sorrows thus we can deceive;
Or our very sorrows weep,
That joys so ripe so little keep.

The Grasshopper[6]

To My Noble Friend, Mr. Charles Cotton[7]

O thou that swing'st upon the waving hair
Of some well-fillèd oaten beard,[8]
Drunk every night with a delicious tear° dew, water
Dropped thee from heaven, where now th'° art reared; you

5 The joys of earth and air are thine entire,
That with thy feet and wings dost hop and fly;
And, when thy poppy° works, thou dost retire sleeping potion
To thy carved acorn-bed to lie.

Up with the day, the sun thou welcom'st then,
10 Sport'st in the gilt-plats° of his beams, golden braids
And all these merry days mak'st merry men,
Thyself, and melancholy streams.[9]

But ah, the sickle! Golden ears are cropped;
Ceres and Bacchus[1] bid good night;
15 Sharp, frosty fingers all your flowers have topped,
And what scythes spared, winds shave off quite.

Poor verdant° fool, and now green ice! thy joys, green
Large and as lasting as thy perch of grass,
Bid us lay in[2] 'gainst winter rain, and poise° balance
20 Their floods with an o'erflowing glass.

Thou best of men and friends! we will create
A genuine summer in each other's breast,

6. This poem, a translation of an ancient Greek lyric thought to be by Anacreon, embellishes the traditional ant and grasshopper fable, in which the ant dutifully prepares for the coming winter, while the grasshopper plays instead of working. The circumstances are evidently those of the Interregnum, a winter of Puritanism for Royalists such as Lovelace.
7. A poet and fellow Royalist.
8. I.e., grain.
9. "Men," "thyself" and "melancholy streams" are all possible objects of "mak'st merry."
1. The grain and the grape, from Ceres, Roman goddess of the harvest, and Bacchus, Roman god of wine.
2. Prepare for by storing food and drink ("o'erflowing glass," line 20). Now green ice: i.e., the grasshopper has frozen.

And spite of this cold time and frozen fate,
Thaw us a warm seat to our rest.

25 Our sacred hearths shall burn eternally,
As vestal flames;[3] the North Wind, he Shall strike his frost-stretched wings, dissolve, and fly
This Etna in epitome.[4]

Dropping December shall come weeping in,
30 Bewail th' usurping of his reign:
But when in showers of old Greek we begin,
Shall cry he hath his crown again![5]

Night, as clear Hesper,[6] shall our tapers whip
From the light casements where we play,
35 And the dark hag from her black mantle strip,[7]
And stick there everlasting day.

Thus richer than untempted kings[8] are we,
That, asking nothing, nothing need:
Though lord of all what seas embrace, yet he 40 That wants himself is poor indeed.[9]

1649

ANDREW MARVELL*
1621–1678

The Coronet[1]

When for the thorns with which I long, too long,
With many a piercing wound,
My Savior's head have crowned,
I seek with garlands[2] to redress that wrong;
5 Through every garden, every mead,° meadow
I gather flowers (my fruits are only flowers)
Dismantling all the fragrant towers° high headdresses
That once adorned my shepherdess's head.

3. The vestal virgins, consecrated to Vesta, Roman goddess of the hearth, kept a sacred fire burning perpetually on her altar.
4. I.e., Boreas, the north wind, strikes (or folds up) his wings and flees from the underground warmth of Etna, a Sicilian volcano, whose flame serves as an emblem (or "epitome") of the flame of friendship.
5. Greek wine was favored in the classical world, and drinkers often wore festive crowns; December "crowns" or terminates the year; also, may allude to the crown worn by "King Christmas" at festivities banned by Puritans and to the crown Cavaliers hoped Charles II would regain.
6. Hesperus, the evening star.
7. I.e., by keeping our lights ("tapers") burning all night, we will strip her black garment ("mantle") from Hecate ("the dark hag"), a Greek goddess associated with night.
8. I.e., kings who have everything.
9. I.e., even one who is lord of all and can embrace the seas is poor, if he "wants" himself (does not have self-knowledge).
*Since all of Marvell's poems were first published (posthumously) in 1681, we do not print the date for each selection.
1. A wreath of flowers; also, a small crown; here, the devotional poem itself. See also note 5 above.
2. Wreaths; also, since garlands were a symbol of poetic achievement, poems of praise.

And now when I have summed up all my store,
10 Thinking (so I myself deceive)
So rich a chaplet° thence to weave — garland
As never yet the king of glory[3] wore;
Alas I find the serpent old[4]
That, twining in his speckled breast,
15 About the flowers disguised does fold,
With wreaths° of fame and interest.[5] — coils
Ah, foolish man, that wouldst debase with them,
And mortal glory, heaven's diadem!° — crown
But Thou[6] who only couldst the serpent tame,
20 Either his slippery knots at once untie,
And disentangle all his winding snare;
Or shatter too with him my curious° frame,° — elaborate / structure
And let these° wither, so that he may die, — poetic flowers
Though set with skill and chosen out with care,
25 That they, while Thou on both their spoils dost tread,
May crown Thy feet, that could not crown Thy head.[7]

Bermudas

Where the remote Bermudas ride,° — float
In th' ocean's bosom unespied,
From a small boat that rowed along,
The listening winds received this song:
5 "What should we do but sing His praise,
That led us through the watery maze
Unto an isle so long unknown,
And yet far kinder than our own?
Where He the huge sea monsters wracks,° — casts ashore
10 That lift the deep upon their backs;
He lands us on a grassy stage,
Safe from the storms, and prelate's rage.[8]
He gave us this eternal spring
Which here enamels everything,
15 And sends the fowls to us in care,
On daily visits through the air;
He hangs in shades the orange bright,
Like golden lamps in a green night,
And does in the pomegranates close
20 Jewels more rich than Ormus[9] shows;
He makes the figs our mouths to meet,
And throws the melons at our feet;
But apples° plants of such a price, — pineapples

3. I.e., Christ.
4. A reference to the serpent who tempted Eve and thus brought about humanity's Fall from paradise (Genesis 3).
5. I.e., self-glorification and self-advancement.
6. I.e., Christ.
7. Cf. God's curse on Satan, from Genesis 3.15: "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."
8. Storms at sea are here associated with bishops (thus indicating a Puritan stance by Marvell).
9. Hormuz, a Persian Gulf island from which gems were exported.

No tree could ever bear them twice;
25 With cedars, chosen by His hand,
From Lebanon,[1] He stores the land;
And makes the hollow seas, that roar,
Proclaim the ambergris[2] on shore;
He cast (of which we rather° boast) — more properly
30 The Gospel's pearl upon our coast,[3]
And in these rocks for us did frame
A temple, where to sound His name.
O! let our voice His praise exalt,
Till it arrive at heaven's vault,
35 Which, thence (perhaps) rebounding, may
Echo beyond the Mexique Bay."[4]
  Thus sung they in the English boat,
An holy and a cheerful note;
And all the way, to guide their chime,
40 With falling oars they kept the time.

A Dialogue between the Soul and Body[5]

Soul

Oh, who shall from this dungeon raise
A soul enslaved so many ways?[6]
With bolts of bones that fettered stands
In feet, and manacled in hands;
5 Here blinded with an eye, and there
Deaf with the drumming of an ear;
A soul hung up, as 'twere, in chains
Of nerves and arteries and veins;
Tortured, besides each other part,
10 In a vain head and double° heart. — deceitful

Body

Oh, who shall me deliver whole
From bonds of this tyrannic soul?
Which stretched upright, impales me so
That mine own precipice[7] I go,
15 And warms and moves this needless frame[8]—
A fever could but do the same—
And, wanting where[9] its spite to try,

1. The tree called the cedar of Lebanon from its most famous early locality.
2. The roaring seas announce ("proclaim") their bounty. Ambergris: a soapy secretion of the sperm whale, gathered on beaches and used in perfumes.
3. In Matthew 13.45–46, the kingdom of heaven is compared to a "pearl of great price."
4. I.e., the Gulf of Mexico.
5. Deriving from the medieval "débat," a literary form wherein two speakers dispute a topic.
6. Cf. St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, 7.24: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"
7. Humans walk "upright" instead of prowling like animals because they possess souls; however, possession of a soul is also the reason they can fall and be damned, so the soul is an internal "precipice."
8. I.e., this frame, which does not need the soul.
9. I.e., lacking an object.

Has made me live to let me die:
A body that could never rest,
20 Since this ill spirit it possessed.

Soul

What magic could me thus confine
Within another's grief to pine?
Where whatsoever it complain,
I feel, that cannot feel,[1] the pain,
25 And all my care itself employs,
That to preserve which me destroys,
Constrained not only to endure
Diseases, but, what's worse, the cure;
And ready oft the port[2] to gain,
30 And shipwrecked into health again.

Body

But physic° yet could never reach — medicine
The maladies thou me dost teach:
Whom first the cramp of hope does tear,
And then the palsy shakes of fear;
35 The pestilence of love does heat,
Or hatred's hidden ulcer eat;
Joy's cheerful madness does perplex,
Or sorrow's other madness vex;
Which knowledge forces me to know,
40 And memory will not forgo.
What but a soul could have the wit
To build me up for sin so fit?
So architects do square and hew
Green trees that in the forest grew.

To His Coy[3] Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
5 Thou by the Indian Ganges'° side — Ganges River
Shoudst rubies[4] find; I by the tide
Of Humber would complain.[5] I would

1. I.e., the soul can sympathize even though it has no power of physical sensation.
2. I.e., death.
3. In the seventeenth century, "coy" could mean "shy" or "quiet" as well as "coquettish," the common modern meaning.
4. Rubies were thought to help preserve virginity.
5. The Humber River flows through Marvell's native town of Hull (i.e., on the other side of the world from the Ganges); "complain" implies plaintive lyrics of unavailing love.

Love you ten years before the flood,
And you should, if you please, refuse
10 Till the conversion of the Jews.[6]
My vegetable[7] love should grow
Vaster than empires and more slow;
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze;
15 Two hundred to adore each breast,
But thirty thousand to the rest;
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart.
For, lady, you deserve this state,° dignity
20 Nor would I love at lower rate.[8]
But at my back I always hear
Time's wingèd chariot hurrying near;
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.
25 Thy beauty shall no more be found;
Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
My echoing song; then worms shall try
That long-preserved virginity,
And your quaint[9] honor turn to dust,
30 And into ashes all my lust:
The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.
Now therefore, while the youthful hue
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,[1]
35 And while thy willing soul transpires° breathes out
At every pore with instant fires,
Now let us sport us while we may,
And now, like amorous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour
40 Than languish in his slow-chapped° power. slowly devouring
Let us roll all our strength and all
Our sweetness up into one ball,
And tear our pleasures with rough strife
Through the iron gates[2] of life:
45 Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still,[3] yet we will make him run.

6. To occur, as Christian tradition had it, at the end of recorded history.
7. I.e., characterized by growth; in context, increasing without conscious nurturing.
8. I.e., at any smaller amounts of time ("lower rate") than what I've just mentioned.
9. Has several meanings, including fine, elegant, fastidious, oversubtle, and out of date; also, with a pun on the Middle English noun queynte, or female genitals.
1. In the 1681 text, line 34 ends with the word "glew," rhyming with hew. Some modern editors emend to "glow" rather than "dew." One recent scholar argues for retaining "glew" on the grounds that the term had a specific meaning in alchemical processes of distillation and that Marvell was deeply interested in alchemy.
2. The obscure "iron gates" suggests that the "ball" of line 42 has become a missile from a siege gun, battering its way into a citadel. One manuscript has "iron grates."
3. An allusion to the power of Zeus, the chief Greek god, who, to prolong his night with the mortal Alcmena, ordered the sun not to shine; also, see Joshua 10.12–13.

The Fair Singer[4]

To make a final conquest of all me,
Love did compose so sweet an enemy,
In whom both beauties to my death agree,
Joining themselves in fatal harmony;
5 That while she with her eyes my heart does bind,
She with her voice might captivate my mind.

I could have fled from one but singly fair:
My disentangled soul itself might save,
Breaking the curlèd trammels° of her hair. fine nets; braids
10 But how should I avoid to be her slave,
Whose subtle art invisibly can wreathe
My fetters of the very air I breathe?

It had been easy fighting in some plain,
Where victory might hang in equal choice,
15 But all resistance against her is vain,
Who has th' advantage both of eyes and voice,
And all my forces needs must be undone,
She having gainèd both the wind and sun.[5]

The Definition of Love[6]

My Love is of a birth as rare
As 'tis, for object, strange and high;[7]
It was begotten by Despair
Upon Impossibility.

5 Magnanimous Despair alone
Could show me so divine a thing,
Where feeble Hope could ne'er have flown
But vainly flapped its tinsel[8] wing.

And yet I quickly might arrive
10 Where my extended soul is fixed;[9]
But Fate does iron wedges drive,
And always crowds itself betwixt.

For Fate with jealous eye does see
Two perfect loves, nor lets them close;° unite

4. A poem in the genre of the courtly compliment paid to a lady to commend her skill in music or dancing.
5. In earlier warfare (especially at sea), the force with the wind and sun behind it had distinct advantages.
6. This poem plays upon a Platonic definition of love as an unfulfilled longing. Cf. Abraham Cowley, "Platonic Love" (p. 471).
7. I.e., my love's lineage is as rare as my love itself is strange and high.
8. Glittering; also, flashy, with little or no intrinsic worth.
9. The speaker describes his soul as having gone out of his body ("extended") and attached ("fixed") itself to his mistress.

15 Their union would her ruin be,
And her tyrannic power depose.[1]

And therefore her decrees of steel
Us as the distant poles have placed
(Though Love's whole world on us doth wheel),[2]
20 Not by themselves to be embraced,

Unless the giddy heaven fall,
And earth some new convulsion tear,
And, us to join, the world should all
Be cramped into a planisphere.[3]

25 As lines, so loves oblique may well
Themselves in every angle greet;[4]
But ours, so truly parallel,
Though infinite, can never meet.

Therefore the love which us doth bind,
30 But Fate so enviously debars,
Is the conjunction of the mind,
And opposition of the stars.[5]

The Picture of Little T. C. in a Prospect[6] of Flowers

See with what simplicity
This nymph[7] begins her golden days!
In the green grass she loves to lie,
And there with her fair aspect tames
5 The wilder flowers, and gives them names;
But only with the roses plays,
And them does tell
What color best becomes them, and what smell.

Who can foretell for what high cause
10 This darling of the gods was born?
Yet this is she whose chaster laws
The wanton Love[8] shall one day fear,

1. A reference to the idea that an even mixture of pure elements formed an altogether stable compound, able to withstand any sudden change, and hence, in context, defying fate.
2. Though by decree of fate the lovers are as far apart as Earth's two poles, the relationship (literally, the line) between them forms the axis on which love's world turns.
3. A chart formed by the projection of a sphere on a plane; the two poles could come together only if the charted world were collapsed.
4. I.e., the lines may converge at any angle. "Oblique" lovers, in one sense, might deviate from accepted behavior or thought.
5. In this astronomical image, the minds of the lovers are in accord (literally in "conjunction," or occupying the same celestial longitude), but the stars determining their destinies are entirely hostile (literally in "opposition," or 180 degrees apart).
6. A background scene, or representation of a view. T. C.: a little girl; possibly Theophila Cornewall, who was baptized on September 26, 1644, the second daughter of that name in the family. The first Theophila had died two days after birth.
7. A young, beautiful female; in Greek mythology, nymphs inhabited a particular place or natural phenomenon.
8. I.e., Cupid, Roman god of erotic love. The speaker predicts that "T. C." will follow "chaster laws," with a likely allusion to those laws followed by Diana, the mythological goddess of chastity and hunting.

And, under her command severe,
See his bow broke and ensigns torn.
15 Happy who can
Appease this virtuous enemy of man![9]

O then let me in time compound° bargain
And parley[1] with those conquering eyes,
Ere they have tried their force to wound;
20 Ere with their glancing wheels they drive
In triumph over hearts that strive,
And them that yield but more despise:
Let me be laid
Where I may see thy glories from some shade.

25 Meantime, whilst every verdant° thing green
Itself does at thy beauty charm,[2]
Reform the errors of the spring;
Make that the tulips may have share
Of sweetness, seeing they are fair;
30 And roses of their thorns disarm;
But most procure
That violets may a longer age endure.

But, O young beauty of the woods,
Whom nature courts with fruits and flowers,
35 Gather the flowers, but spare the buds,
Lest Flora, angry at thy crime
To kill her infants[3] in their prime,
Do quickly make the example yours;
And ere we see,
40 Nip in the blossom all our hopes and thee.

The Mower against Gardens[4]

Luxurious man, to bring his vice in use,[5]
Did after him the world seduce,
And from the fields the flowers and plants allure,
Where Nature was most plain and pure.
5 He first enclosed within the gardens square
A dead and standing pool of air,
And a more luscious earth for them did knead,
Which stupefied them while it fed.
The pink grew then as double as his mind;[6]
10 The nutriment did change the kind.

9. By doing battle with Cupid, breaking his bow and tearing his flags ("ensigns"), she ("T. C.") will be a "virtuous enemy" to man (i.e., one whose chaste virtue causes her to be the foe of love).
1. Speak; also, hold a conference with the enemy.
2. Enchants itself at thy beauty.
3. I.e., the buds. Flora: Roman goddess of flowers.
4. One of four "mower" poems that examine different aspects of rural life. Mower: one who cuts grass with a scythe.
5. I.e., to establish his vice as custom. Luxurious: lustful; voluptuous.
6. The double pink carnation is produced by a hypocritical ("double") mind, i.e., one who counterfeits the natural color.

With strange perfumes he did the roses taint;
  And flowers themselves were taught to paint.
The tulip white did for complexion seek,
  And learned to interline its cheek;
15 Its onion root they then so high did hold,
  That one was for a meadow sold:[7]
Another world was searched through oceans new,
  To find the Marvel of Peru;[8]
And yet these rarities might be allowed
20 To man, that sovereign thing and proud,
Had he not dealt between the bark and tree,[9]
  Forbidden mixtures there to see.
No plant now knew the stock from which it came;
  He grafts upon the wild the tame,
25 That the uncertain and adulterate° fruit counterfeit
  Might put the palate in dispute.[1]
His green seraglio has its eunuchs too,
  Lest any tyrant him outdo;[2]
And in the cherry he does Nature vex,
30 To procreate without a sex.[3]
'Tis all enforced, the fountain and the grot,[4]
  While the sweet fields do lie forgot,
Where willing Nature does to all dispense
  A wild and fragrant innocence;
35 And fauns[5] and fairies do the meadows till
  More by their presence than their skill.
Their statues polished by some ancient hand,
  May to adorn the gardens stand;
But, howsoe'er the figures do excel,
40 The Gods themselves with us do dwell.

The Mower to the Glowworms[6]

Ye living lamps, by whose dear light
The nightingale does sit so late,
And studying all the summer night,
Her matchless songs does meditate;[7]

7. A tulip fad in the 1630s brought extremely high prices for rare varieties. Onion root: bulb.
8. A tuliplike flower (mirabilis jalapa) that opens late in the afternoon.
9. I.e., by grafting; proverbial for interfering.
1. I.e., the result of which grafting confuses the palate as to what it tastes.
2. Seraglio: harem in a sultan's palace, hence a place of confinement. I.e., his garden ("green seraglio") has its castrated slaves ("eunuchs"; here, the grafted plants, some of which could not reproduce) just like any tyrant.
3. Cherries are often propagated by budding on the stocks of sturdier but less productive varieties.
4. Grotto, a picturesque structure made to imitate a cave, serving as a cool retreat.
5. In classical mythology, half-goat, half-man woodland gods associated with lust and drinking (often described as less wild than satyrs).
6. Insects, the females of which emit a shining green light from the abdomen. Mower: see note 4, p. 482.
7. The nightingale is known for its sweet and sad song, which has perhaps given rise to one tradition that the bird's song laments the tragic result of wrongful love. Another tale of the nightingale, as told by Ovid, has the mournful song refer to the violence committed on Philomela, who was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not speak. She wove the story in a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. She was later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus, after seeking revenge on him.

5 Ye country comets, that portend
No war nor prince's funeral,[8]
Shining unto no higher end
Than to presage° the grass's fall; foretell

Ye glowworms, whose officious° flame dutiful
10 To wandering mowers shows the way,
That in the night have lost their aim,
And after foolish fires[9] do stray;

Your courteous lights in vain you waste,
Since Juliana here is come,
15 For she my mind hath so displaced
That I shall never find my home.

The Garden

How vainly men themselves amaze° perplex
To win the palm, the oak, or bays,[1]
And their incessant° labors see unceasing
Crowned from some single herb, or tree,
5 Whose short and narrow-vergèd[2] shade
Does prudently their toils upbraid;
While all flowers and all trees do close° join
To weave the garlands of repose!

Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
10 And Innocence, thy sister dear?
Mistaken long, I sought you then
In busy companies of men.
Your sacred plants,° if here below, cuttings
Only among the plants will grow;
15 Society is all but° rude° merely / barbarous
To° this delicious solitude. compared to

No white nor red[3] was ever seen
So amorous as this lovely green.
Fond° lovers, cruel as their flame, foolish
20 Cut in these trees their mistress' name:[4]
Little, alas, they know or heed
How far these beauties hers exceed!
Fair trees, wheresoe'er your barks I wound,
No name shall but your own be found.

8. Comets were sometimes believed to be portents of approaching disasters.
9. Ignis fatuus (Latin), also known as the will-o'-the-wisp; said to draw travelers astray by holding a false light before them; the phenomenon of nocturnal light is caused by the combustion of marsh gas.
1. The wreaths awarded, respectively, for military, civic, and poetic accomplishments.
2. Confined, not spreading luxuriantly like the living branch.
3. The colors conventionally used to depict female beauty in love poetry (in the Petrarchan tradition).
4. According to a poetic tradition, a lover carved his beloved's name in a tree (as Petrarch did with Laura's).

25 When we have run our passion's heat,° course
Love hither makes his best retreat.
The gods, that mortal beauty chase,
Still in a tree did end their race:[5]
Apollo hunted Daphne so,
30 Only that she might laurel grow;
And Pan did after Syrinx speed,
Not as a nymph, but for a reed.

What wondrous life is this I lead!
Ripe apples drop about my head;
35 The luscious clusters of the vine
Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
The nectarine and curious° peach exquisite
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on melons,[6] as I pass,
40 Insnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

Meanwhile the mind, from pleasure less,[7]
Withdraws into its happiness;
The mind, that ocean where each kind
Does straight° its own resemblance find;[8] immediately
45 Yet it creates, transcending these,
Far other worlds and other seas,
Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade.

Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
50 Or at some fruit tree's mossy root,
Casting the body's vest[9] aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide:
There, like a bird, it sits and sings,
Then whets° and combs its silver wings, preens
55 And, till prepared for longer flight,
Waves in its plumes the various° light. iridescent

Such was that happy garden-state,
While man there walked without a mate:
After a place so pure and sweet,
60 What other help could yet be meet![1]
But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
To wander solitary there:
Two paradises 'twere in one
To live in paradise alone.[2]

5. I.e., even the gods who chase after their desired nymphs (events described in the following lines) succeed only in achieving a garden prize. According to Ovid's versions of these two myths, the nymphs (Daphne and Syrinx) both elude the unwanted sexual advances of their pursuers (Apollo and Pan, respectively) by being metamorphosed into a laurel tree (Daphne) and reeds (Syrinx) through the intervention of sympathetic deities.
6. "Melon" has an etymological root in the Greek word for apple; perhaps an allusion to the apple that led to the Fall (or "stumbling") of humankind.
7. "Less" may modify either "pleasure" or "mind."
8. As every land creature was thought to have its counterpart sea creature, so also in the ocean of the mind (in Neoplatonic philosophy).
9. Garment; i.e., the body itself.
1. Fit, suitable; also, God created Eve because "for Adam there was not found an help meet for him" (Genesis 2.20).
2. I.e., it would be twice as wonderful to be alone in paradise (i.e., before Eve).

65 How well the skillful gardener drew
Of flowers and herbs this dial[3] new,
Where, from above, the milder sun
Does through a fragrant zodiac run;
And as it works, th' industrious bee
70 Computes its time[4] as well as we!
How could such sweet and wholesome hours
Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers?

An Horatian Ode[5]

Upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland[6]

The forward° youth that would appear — eager, ambitious
Must now forsake his Muses[7] dear,
Nor in the shadows sing
His numbers° languishing: — poems

5 'Tis time to leave the books in dust,
And oil the unusèd armor's rust,
Removing from the wall
The corslet of the hall.[8]

So restless Cromwell could not cease° — rest
10 In the inglorious arts of peace,
But through adventurous war
Urgèd his active star;

And like the three-forked lightning, first
Breaking the clouds where it was nursed,
15 Did thorough° his own side — through
His fiery way divide.[9]

For 'tis all one to courage high,
The emulous[1] or enemy;
And with such to inclose
20 Is more than to oppose.[2]

3. Flowers planted to form a dial face, through which the sun follows its course; it is "milder" because its intense rays are tempered by the flowers through which they filter.
4. With a pun on thyme.
5. Originally a classical form, an ode is a serious lyric poem, dignified by its theme, occasion, or subject. In contrast to the odes of the Greek poet Pindar (ca. 522–ca. 438 B.C.E.), which typically praised or glorified someone, a Horatian ode, derived from the work of the Roman poet Horace (65–8 B.C.E.), promises a poem of cool and balanced judgment. Balanced judgments of Oliver Cromwell (see note 6 below) were not politic in the Restoration, and the poem was canceled from all but two known copies of the 1681 edition of Miscellaneous Poems.
6. Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), English general and statesman, lord protector of England, returned from conquering Ireland in May 1650, about eighteen months after the execution of King Charles I. His victory over the Irish was sometimes taken as a sign that God approved of Charles's beheading.
7. The nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts.
8. The suit of armor belonging to the household.
9. Cromwell had begun as a Presbyterian, but became the leader of the more radical group known as the Independents, or the Rump. The comparison to the "three-forked lightning" links him to Zeus, the chief classical god, whose daughter Athena sprang fully formed from Zeus's head.
1. One who is greedy for praise or power; also, one who imitates or rivals.
2. Possible paraphrase of stanza: It challenges high courage as much to deal with competitors as to deal with the enemy; and to make common cause with men like the sectarians of the Parlia-

Then burning through the air he went,
And palaces and temples rent;° tore
    And Caesar's head at last
    Did through his laurels blast.[3]

25 'Tis madness to resist or blame
The force of angry heaven's flame;[4]
    And if we would speak true,
    Much to the man is due,

Who, from his private gardens, where 30 He lived reservèd and austere
    (As if his highest plot
    To plant the bergamot),[5]

Could by industrious valor climb
To ruin the great work of time,
35   And cast the kingdom old
    Into another mold;[6]

Though Justice against Fate complain,
And plead the ancient rights in vain;
    But those do hold or break,
40   As men are strong or weak.

Nature, that hateth emptiness,
Allows of penetration less,[7]
    And therefore must make room
    Where greater spirits come.

45 What field of all the civil wars,
Where his were not the deepest scars?
    And Hampton shows what part
    He had of wiser art;[8]

Where, twining subtle fears with hope,
50 He wove a net of such a scope
    That Charles himself might chase
    To Carisbrooke's narrow case,[9]

mentary Party is more of an accomplishment than effectually to oppose them. (Marvell's obscurities may be deliberate and politic.)
3. I.e., like lightning, Cromwell beheaded Charles I ("Caesar"). Laurels were used for classical crowns because they were supposed to protect from lightning, which represented the gods' jealousy.
4. The lightning hurled by Zeus represents divine judgment.
5. A variety of pear; its etymology (from the Turkish, "prince's pear") may hold the insinuation that Cromwell had been plotting for power even in his early days of private life.
6. I.e., a reference to the change from monarchy to republic.
7. I.e., Nature, which abhors a vacuum, is even less willing to let two bodies occupy the same space.
8. Cromwell purportedly let Charles escape from Hampton Court to Carisbrooke Castle, on the Isle of Wight, to convince Parliament that the king could not be trusted and must be executed.
9. "Case" may mean either "plight" or "prison."

That thence the royal actor borne
The tragic scaffold might adorn;
55 While round the armèd bands
Did clap their bloody hands.

He[1] nothing common did or mean
Upon that memorable scene,
But with his keener eye
60 The axe's edge did try;° test

Nor called the gods with vulgar spite
To vindicate his helpless right;
But bowed his comely head
Down, as upon a bed.

65 This was that memorable hour
Which first assured the forcèd power:
So, when they did design
The Capitol's first line,

A bleeding head, where they begun,
70 Did fright the architects to run;
And yet in that the state
Foresaw its happy fate.[2]

And now the Irish are ashamed
To see themselves in one year tamed;
75 So such one man can do
That does both act and know.

They can affirm his praises best,
And have, though overcome, confessed
How good he is, how just,
80 And fit for highest trust.

Nor yet grown stiffer with command,
But still in the republic's hand—
How fit he is to sway
That can so well obey!

85 He to the Commons' feet presents
A kingdom for his first year's rents;
And, what he may, forbears
His fame to make it theirs;

1. I.e., Charles.
2. When foundations were being dug for Jupiter's temple in Rome (according to Livy and Pliny), a bloody head was uncovered. The workers at first thought it was an ill omen, but then were persuaded to believe it meant that Rome would be "head" of an empire. The temple and the hill on which it stood were thereafter called Capitoline or the Capitol (from the Latin caput, head).

And has his sword and spoils ungirt,
90 To lay them at the public's skirt:[3]
So when the falcon high
Falls heavy from the sky,

She, having killed, no more does search
But on the next green bough to perch;
95 Where, when he first does lure,
The falconer[4] has her sure.

What may not, then, our isle presume,
While victory his crest[5] does plume?
What may not others fear,
100 If thus he crown each year?

A Caesar he, ere long, to Gaul
To Italy an Hannibal,[6]
And to all states not free
Shall climactèric[7] be.

105 The Pict no shelter now shall find
Within his parti-colored mind,[8]
But from this valor sad° — steadfast
Shrink underneath the plaid;° — tartan kilts

Happy if in the tufted brake° — bushes
110 The English hunter him mistake,
Nor lay his hounds in near
The Caledonian° deer.[9] — Scottish

But thou, the war's and fortune's son,
March indefatigably on!
115 And for the last effect,
Still keep thy sword erect;

Besides the force it has to fright
The spirits of the shady night,[1]
The same arts that did gain
120 A power must it maintain.

1681

3. I.e., at the feet of the Republic, conceived as a Roman senator wearing a toga.
4. I.e., when the falconer casts out his lure—a bunch of feathers attached to a cord and baited with meat.
5. Of the falcon; also, the plumed helmet of the warrior.
6. The Roman general Gaius Julius Caesar (100–44 B.C.E.) conquered Gaul; the Carthaginian general Hannibal (247–183 B.C.E.) conquered Italy. Cromwell was expected to take action against European Catholic States.
7. I.e., ushering in a new epoch.
8. The Scots, called Picti ("painted men") by the Romans because they painted their bodies for battle, are stigmatized as factious (with a pun on party and "parti-colored"). They were in fact torn between their Calvinism and their loyalty to the Catholic or Anglo-Catholic Stuart kings.
9. I.e., the "Pict" shall be happy if the English hunter mistakenly misses him and fails to send his hounds in after him.
1. Swords held upright to suggest a cross were believed to ward off evil spirits.

HENRY VAUGHAN*
1621–1695

Regeneration

A ward, and still in bonds,[1] one day
I stole abroad;
It was high spring, and all the way
Primrosed and hung with shade;
5 Yet was it frost within,
And surly winds
Blasted my infant buds, and sin
Like clouds eclipsed my mind.

Stormed thus, I straight perceived my spring
10 Mere stage and show,
My walk a monstrous,° mountained thing, strange, unnatural
Roughcast with rocks and snow;
And as a pilgrim's eye,
Far from relief,
15 Measures the melancholy sky,
Then drops and rains for grief,

So sighed I upwards still;[2] at last
'Twixt steps and falls
I reached the pinnacle,° where placed summit
20 I found a pair of scales;
I took them up and laid
In th' one, late pains;
The other smoke and pleasures weighed,
But proved the heavier grains.[3]

25 With that some cried, "Away!" Straight° I immediately
Obeyed, and led
Full east,[4] a fair, fresh field could spy;
Some called it Jacob's bed,[5]
A virgin soil which no
30 Rude feet ere trod,
Where, since he stepped there, only go
Prophets and friends of God.

*The poems printed here are from Vaughan's book Silex Scintillans (Latin for "sparkling, or fiery, flint"). First published in 1650 and reissued with additional poems in 1655, the volume dramatizes Vaughan's experience of religious conversion. Its title alludes to the poet's "stony" heart, from which God strikes divine, purifying sparks. In the 1650 edition, the subtitle on the engraved title page acknowledges Vaughan's indebtedness to George Herbert (1593–1633; see pp. 367–85), who had used the same subtitle for The Temple (1633): "Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations."

1. Literally, the constraints of being below legal age; metaphorically, the bondage of sin; the line has been variously interpreted. "Ward" may mean "prisoner" or "young person under the guardianship of another," here, perhaps, God.

2. I.e., as a pilgrim still far from relief looks up at the dark sky—but also, albeit perhaps unknowingly, up toward God—then cries, so did I keep sighing as I climbed.

3. I.e., his sins ("smoke and pleasures"), being compared to grains of corn or other seed, weigh more than his recent penance ("late pains").

4. I.e., toward the place of rebirth.

5. Sleeping in a field, Jacob saw a ladder reaching from Earth to heaven, with angels ascending and descending on it (Genesis 28.10–12).

Here I reposed; but scarce° well set,° scarcely / settled
A grove descried° saw
35 Of stately height, whose branches met
And mixed on every side;
I entered, and once in,
Amazed to see 't,
Found all was changed, and a new spring
40 Did all my senses greet.

The unthrift° sun shot vital gold, spendthrift
A thousand pieces,
And heaven its azure did unfold,
Checkered with snowy fleeces;
45 The air was all in spice,
And every bush
A garland wore; thus fed my eyes,
But all the ear lay hush.° quiet

Only a little fountain[6] lent
50 Some use for ears,
And on the dumb shades language spent° expended
The music of her tears;
I drew her near, and found
The cistern full
55 Of divers stones, some bright and round,
Others ill-shaped and dull.[7]

The first, pray mark, as quick as light
Danced through the flood,[8]
But the last, more heavy than the night,
60 Nailed to the center stood;[9]
I wondered much, but tired
At last with thought,
My restless eye that still desired
As strange an object brought.[1]

65 It was a bank of flowers, where I descried
Though 'twas midday,
Some fast asleep, others broad-eyed
And taking in the ray;[2]
Here, musing long, I heard
70 A rushing wind
Which still increased, but whence it stirred
No where I could not find.

6. Perhaps alluding to a baptismal font, or, perhaps, to the traditional allegory of Christ as a fountain.
7. Critics have proposed various interpretations of the stones, e.g., ideas, images, and souls.
8. The water. Pray mark: i.e., take note.
9. Probably the "heaviest stone" is the idea of Christ's Crucifixion, with the cross as the "center" of Christian theology. Other interpretations of "center" include Earth and hell.
1. I.e., his eye, still desiring to see something, brought to his sight an object as strange as the one just described.
2. God and Christ were often symbolized by the sun. Fast asleep: i.e., spiritually sluggish.

I turned me round, and to each shade
Dispatched an eye
75 To see if any leaf had made
Least motion or reply,
But while I listening sought
My mind to ease
By knowing where 'twas, or where not,
80 It whispered, "Where I please."[3]

"Lord," then said I, "on me one breath,[4]
And let me die before my death!"

Cant. chap. 5. ver. 17[5]

Arise O North, and come thou South-wind and blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out.

1650

The Retreat

Happy those early days! when I
Shined in my angel infancy.
Before I understood this place
Appointed for my second race,[6]
5 Or taught my soul to fancy aught
But a white, celestial thought;
When yet I had not walked above
A mile or two from my first love,[7]
And looking back, at that short space,
10 Could see a glimpse of His bright face;
When on some gilded cloud or flower
My gazing soul would dwell an hour,
And in those weaker glories spy
Some shadows of eternity;
15 Before I taught my tongue to wound
My conscience with a sinful sound,
Or had the black art to dispense
A several° sin to every sense, separate
But felt through all this fleshly dress[8]
20 Bright shoots of everlastingness.
O, how I long to travel back,
And tread again that ancient track!

3. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit" (John 3.8).
4. I.e., blow one of your life-giving (and perhaps also poetry-inspiring) breaths on me.
5. The poem ends by merging its voice, imaged as breath, with that of the biblical Song of Solomon (though from 4.16, not 5.17).
6. "Race" is a traditional Christian metaphor for "life"; by "second" race Vaughan evidently alludes to a belief in the soul's heavenly existence prior to its human life. Such a belief was held by some Christian Neoplatonists and Hermetic authors; it reappears in Wordsworth's "Ode: Intimations of Immortality" (see p. 796).
7. I.e., Christ; see Revelation 2.4.
8. I.e., the mortal body.

That I might once more reach that plain
Where first I left my glorious train,[9]
25 From whence th' enlightened spirit sees
That shady city of palm trees.[1]
But, ah! my soul with too much stay° delay
Is drunk, and staggers in the way.
Some men a forward motion love;
30 But I by backward steps would move,
And when this dust falls to the urn,[2]
In that state I came, return.

1650

The World

I saw eternity the other night,
Like a great ring of pure and endless light,
All calm as it was bright;
And round beneath it, Time, in hours, days, years,
5 Driven by the spheres[3]
Like a vast shadow moved, in which the world
And all her train were hurled.
The doting lover in his quaintest° strain most ingenious
Did there complain;
10 Near him, his lute, his fancy, and his flights,
Wit's sour delights,
With gloves and knots,° the silly snares of pleasure, love knots
Yet his dear treasure,
All scattered lay, while he his eyes did pour
15 Upon a flower.

The darksome statesman hung with weights and woe
Like a thick midnight fog moved there so slow
He did nor° stay nor go; neither
Condemning thoughts, like sad eclipses, scowl
20 Upon his soul,
And clouds of crying witnesses without° all around
Pursued him with one shout.
Yet digged the mole,[4] and, lest his ways be found,
Worked underground,
25 Where he did clutch his prey. But one did see
That policy:° strategy
Churches and altars fed him; perjuries
Were gnats and flies;
It rained about him blood and tears; but he
30 Drank them as free.[5]

9. I.e., my previous mode of existence, or, possibly, my place in God's angelic entourage.
1. Heaven or the Promised Land, as shown to Moses (Deuteronomy 34.1–4); for its identification with Jericho, see Deuteronomy 34.3.
2. Tomb. This dust: my body.
3. The concentric crystalline spheres of Ptolemaic astronomy.
4. I.e., the "darksome statesman" of line 16.
5. I.e., as freely as they rained.

The fearful miser on a heap of rust
Sat pining all his life there, did scarce° trust — scarcely
His own hands with the dust;
Yet would not place° one piece above, but lives — invest
35 In fear of thieves.
Thousands there were as frantic as himself,
And hugged each one his pelf:° — money, riches
The downright epicure[6] placed heaven in sense,
And scorned pretense;
40 While others, slipped into a wide excess,
Said little less;
The weaker sort slight, trivial wares enslave,
Who think them brave° — fine, showy
And poor, despised Truth sat counting by[7]
45 Their victory.

Yet some, who all this while did weep and sing,
And sing and weep, soared up into the ring;
But most would use no wing.
"O fools!" said I, "thus to prefer dark night
50 Before true light!
To live in grots° and caves, and hate the day — caverns
Because it shows the way,
The way which from this dead and dark abode
Leads up to God,
55 A way where you might tread the sun and be
More bright than he!"
But as I did their madness so discuss,
One whispered thus:
"This ring the bridegroom did for none provide,
60 But for his bride."[8]

John Chap. 2. ver. 16, 17

All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the father, but is of the world.

And the world passeth away, and the lusts thereof, but he that doth the will of God abideth forever.

1650

They Are All Gone into the World of Light!

They are all gone into the world of light!
And I alone sit lingering here;
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth clear.

6. One who delights in the experience of the senses.
7. Counting by: recording.
8. See Revelation 19.7–9 and 21 for the marriage of the Lamb and the bride (Christ and his Church).

5 It° glows and glitters in my cloudy breast — the memory
Like stars upon some gloomy grove,
Or those faint beams in which this hill is dressed
After the sun's remove.

I see them walking in an air of glory,
10 Whose light doth trample on my days;
My days, which are at best but dull and hoary,° — gray, ancient
Mere glimmering and decays.

O holy hope! and high humility,
High as the heavens above!
15 These are your walks, and you have showed them me
To kindle my cold love.

Dear, beauteous death! the jewel of the just,
Shining nowhere but in the dark;
What mysteries do lie beyond thy dust,
20 Could man outlook that mark!° — boundary

He that hath found some fledged bird's nest may know[9]
At first sight if the bird be flown;
But what fair well° or grove he sings in now, — spring
That is to him° unknown. — the seeker

25 And yet, as angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul when man doth sleep,
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes,[1]
And into glory peep.

If a star were confined into a tomb,[2]
30 Her captive flames must needs burn there;
But when the hand that locked her up gives room,
She'll shine through all the sphere.

O Father of eternal life, and all
Created glories under Thee!
35 Resume° Thy spirit from this world of thrall° — take back / slavery
Into true liberty!

Either disperse these mists, which blot and fill
My perspective[3] still as they pass;
Or else remove me hence unto that hill
40 Where I shall need no glass.[4]

1655

9. The bird often symbolizes the human soul; cf. George Herbert, "Easter Wings" (p. 368). Fledged: fit to fly.
1. I.e., accustomed ideas.
2. Probably a metaphor for the body, with the "star" as the soul.
3. Literally, telescope; more generally, ability to see into the distance.
4. Vaughan superimposes the modern image of the magnifying telescope onto the traditional Christian and Platonic image of life as an experience of distorted vision or darkness; "for now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face" (1 Corinthians 13.12). Hill: Sion hill; figuratively, heaven.

The Waterfall

With what deep murmurs through time's silent stealth
Doth thy transparent, cool, and watery wealth
    Here flowing fall,
    And chide, and call,
5 As if his liquid, loose retìnue[5] stayed
Lingering, and were of this steep place afraid,
    The common pass
    Where, clear as glass,
    All must descend—
10 Not to an end,
But quickened by this deep and rocky grave,
Rise to a longer course more bright and brave.[6]

Dear stream! dear bank, where often I
Have sat and pleased my pensive eye,
15 Why, since each drop of thy quick° store — living
Runs thither whence it flowed before,[7]
Should poor souls fear a shade or night,
Who came, sure, from a sea of light?[8]
Or since those drops are all sent back
20 So sure to thee, that none doth lack,
Why should frail flesh doubt any more
That what God takes He'll not restore?

O useful element and clear!
My sacred wash and cleanser here,
25 My first consignor[9] unto those
Fountains of life where the Lamb goes!
What sublime truths and wholesome themes
Lodge in thy mystical deep streams!
Such as dull man can never find
30 Unless that Spirit lead his mind
Which first upon thy face did move,[1]
And hatched all with His quickening love.
As this loud brook's incessant fall
In streaming rings restagnates° all, — becomes stagnant
35 Which reach by course the bank, and then
Are no more seen, just so pass men.

5. Those in service; i.e., the water that has not yet flowed over the edge is likened to time's ("his") followers or "retainers," with a probable bilingual pun on retenu, French for "held back."
6. I.e., elaborating on the central Christian paradox of resurrection, Vaughan imagines death as a quickening in the grave (a movement like that of a child in the womb) followed by a rising that defies the waterfall's apparently natural downward "course." Brave: splendid; cf. George Herbert, "Virtue," line 5 (p. 375).
7. A reference to the cyclical movement of water (from river to sea to clouds to rain or snow to rivers again), often held to be a sign of God's ordering of the universe.
8. A Hermetic concept; see "The Retreat," line 4 (p. 492).
9. One who dispatches goods to another, i.e., the baptismal water ("cleanser here") delivers the speaker to eternal life ("where the Lamb goes"). Cf. Revelation 7.17: "For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."
1. Describes the beginning of Creation (thus "hatched all," line 31): "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" (Genesis 1.2).

O my invisible estate,° condition
My glorious liberty, still late![2]
Thou art the channel my soul seeks,
40 Not this with cataracts° and creeks. waterfalls

The Night

John 3.2

Through that pure virgin shrine,[3]
That sacred veil drawn o'er Thy glorious noon,[4]
That men might look and live, as glowworms[5] shine,
And face the moon,
5 Wise Nicodemus saw such light
As made him know his God by night.[6]

Most blest believer he!
Who in that land of darkness and blind eyes
Thy long-expected healing wings[7] could see,
10 When Thou didst rise!
And, what can never more be done,
Did at midnight speak with the Sun![8]

O who will tell me where
He found Thee at that dead and silent hour?
15 What hallowed solitary ground did bear
So rare a flower,
Within whose sacred leaves did lie
The fulness of the Deity?

No mercy-seat of gold,
20 No dead and dusty cherub, nor carved stone,
But His own living works did my Lord hold
And lodge alone;[9]

2. I.e., not yet arrived (i.e., the liberty of eternal life after death); cf. Romans 8.21: "Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."
3. Refers both to Christ's mortal body and to the night sky; indeed, the "virgin shrine" condenses allusions not only to Christ but also to his mother, Mary, and probably to Diana, virgin and goddess of the moon (according to classical myth).
4. Christ was often figured as the sun. Sacred veil: Paul writes of "a new and living way which he [Christ] hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh" (Hebrews 10.20).
5. An insect, (the female of) which emits a shining green light from the abdomen; i.e., perhaps, as the glowworms shine by reflecting the moon's light, so humans spiritually shine by reflecting Christ's light.
6. Nicodemus, coming to Christ at night, addressed him as "come from God"; in the same account, Christ speaks of his coming as "the light" (John 3.1–21).
7. A prophecy of Christ's coming: "But unto you that fear my Name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings" (Malachi 4.2).
8. A reference back to Nicodemus, who spoke with Christ at midnight in a miracle the speaker thinks (perhaps erroneously) can never recur.
9. God instructed Moses on how to make the ark of the Covenant: "And thou shalt make a mercy seat of pure gold. . . . And thou shalt make two cherubims of gold, of beaten work shalt thou make them, in the two ends of the mercy seat" (Exodus 25.17–18). Vaughan contrasts the physical temples of the Old Testament with the "living works" in which Christ lodges.

Where trees and herbs did watch and peep
And wonder, while the Jews did sleep.[1]

25 Dear night! this world's defeat;
The stop to busy fools; care's check and curb;
The day of spirits; my soul's calm retreat
Which none disturb!
Christ's progress, and His prayer time;[2]
30 The hours to which high heaven doth chime;

God's silent, searching flight;
When my Lord's head is filled with dew, and all
His locks are wet with the clear drops of night;
His still, soft call;
35 His knocking time;[3] the soul's dumb watch,
When spirits their fair kindred catch.

Were all my loud, evil days
Calm and unhaunted as is thy dark tent,
Whose peace but by some angel's wing or voice
40 Is seldom rent,° torn
Then I in heaven all the long year
Would keep, and never wander here.

But living where the sun
Doth all things wake, and where all mix and tire
45 Themselves and others, I consent and run
To every mire,
And by this world's ill-guiding light,[4]
Err more than I can do by night.

There is in God, some say,
50 A deep but dazzling darkness, as men here
Say it is late and dusky, because they
See not all clear.
O for that night! where I in Him
Might live invisible and dim!

1655

1. Vaughan imputes to plants an eagerness for Christ's coming lacking in the Jews. Their spiritual lethargy ("sleep") prevents them from recognizing Christ's divinity.
2. "Mark, chap. i.35. Luke, chap. xxi.37" [Vaughan's note]. The cited passages mention Christ's praying at night.
3. "I sleep, but my heart waketh: it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled: for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night" (Song of Solomon 5.2).
4. The speaker's own "consent" to error, along with the "ill-guiding light" of the world, cause him to run into a spiritual swamp ("mire"). The "ill-guiding light" may allude to the will-o'-the-wisp, which was said to draw travelers astray into bogs by holding a false light before them; the phenomenon of nocturnal light is caused by the combustion of marsh gas.

MARGARET CAVENDISH
1623–1673

An Apology for Writing So Much upon This Book[1]

Condemn me not, I make so much ado
About this book; it is my child, you know.
Just like a bird, when her young are in nest,
Goes in, and out, and hops, and takes no rest:
5 But when their young are fledg'd, their heads out-peep,
Lord! What a chirping does the old one keep!
So I, for fear my strengthless child should fall
Against a door, or stool, aloud I call;
Bid have a care of such a dangerous place:
10 Thus write I much, to hinder all disgrace.

The Sea Similized to Meadows and Pastures: the Mariners, to Shepherds: the Mast, to a May-Pole:[2] the Fish, to Beasts

The waves, like ridges of plow'd land, are high;
Whereat the ship oft stumbling, down doth lie.
But, in a calm, the sea's like meadows seen
Level; its saltness makes it look as green.
5 When ships thereon a slow soft pace do walk;
Then mariners, as shepherds, sing and talk:
Some whistle, and some on their pipes do play;
And thus, with mirth, they pass their time away.
And every mast is like a May-pole high,
10 Round which they dance, though not so merrily
As shepherds do, when they their lasses bring
Garlands, to May-poles tied with a silk string.
Instead of garlands, they hang on their mast
Huge sails and ropes, to tie these garlands fast.
15 Instead of lasses, they do dance with Death;
And for their music, they have Boreas[3] breath.
Instead of wine and wassails,[4] drink salt tears;
And for their meat, they feed on nought but fears.
For flocks of sheep, great schools of herrings swim;
20 The whales, as ravenous wolves, do feed on them.
As sportful kids skip over hillocks green,
So dancing dolphins, on the waves are seen.
The porpoise, like their watchful dog espies,
And gives them warning when great winds will rise.

1. This poem appeared in slightly different versions at the beginning of all three editions of Margaret Cavendish's poems published during her lifetime (in 1653, 1664, and 1668; our selections follow the 1668 text). For the metaphor of the book or poem as child, see Sir Philip Sidney, Astrophil and Stella, sonnet 1 (p. 213) and Anne Bradstreet, "The Author to Her Book" (p. 465).
2. A high pole, painted with spiral stripes of different colors, decked with flowers, set up on a green for revelers to dance around at a May Day festival. Similized: compared.
3. The north wind's.
4. The liquor with which healths were drunk.

25 Instead of barking, he his head doth show
Above the waters, when they roughly flow:
And, like as men, in time of show'ring rain
And wind, do not in open fields remain;
But quickly run for shelter to a tree:
30 So ships at anchor lie upon the sea.

Of Many Worlds in This World

Just like as in a nest of boxes[5] round,
Degrees of sizes in each box are found:
So, in this world, may many others be
Thinner and less, and less still by degree:
5 Although they are not subject to our sense,
A world may be no bigger than two-pence.[6]
Nature is curious,° and such works may shape, ingenious, skillful
Which our dull senses easily escape:
For creatures, small as atoms,[7] may be there,
10 If every one a creature's figure bear.
If atoms four, a world can make,[8] then see
What several worlds might in an ear-ring be:
For, millions of those atoms may be in
The head of one small, little, single pin.
15 And if thus small, then ladies may well wear
A world of worlds, as pendents in each ear.

JOHN DRYDEN
1631–1700

Song from The Indian Emperor[1]

Ah, fading joy, how quickly art thou past!
Yet we thy ruin haste.
As if the cares of human life were few,
We seek out new:
5 And follow fate, which would too fast pursue.[2]

5. A set of boxes of graduated sizes packed inside one another.
6. An English silver coin having the value of two pennies; a very small amount.
7. Very minute or microscopic objects.
8. In another poem, Cavendish declares that the four elements—earth, water, air, and fire—are made of four different kinds of atoms: "square flat," "round," "long straight," and "sharpest," respectively.
1. This play, first performed by the King's Company in the spring of 1665, focuses on the conquest of Mexico by the Spanish conquistador Hernán Cortés (1485–1547). The song is sung by an Indian woman to a group of Spaniards reclining by a fountain (4.3); immediately after the song's end, they are captured by Indian forces.
2. I.e., which, even if we did not conspire with it, would hurry us too quickly to our end. Dryden, in response to criticism of this metaphor, explained that it was borrowed from a line in Virgil's Aeneid (11.695).

See how on every bough the birds express
In their sweet notes their happiness.
They all enjoy and nothing spare;
But on their mother nature lay their care.
10 Why then should man, the lord of all below,
Such troubles choose to know
As none of all his subjects undergo?

Hark, hark, the waters fall, fall, fall,
And with a murmuring sound
15 Dash, dash upon the ground,
To gentle slumbers call.

1667

Song from Troilus and Cressida[3]

Can life be a blessing,
Or worth the possessing,
Can life be a blessing, if love were away?
Ah, no! though our love all night keep us waking,
5 And though he[4] torment us with cares all the day,
Yet he sweetens, he sweetens our pains in the taking;
There's an hour at the last, there's an hour to repay.

In every possessing
The ravishing blessing,
10 In every possessing the fruit of our pain,
Poor lovers forget long ages of anguish,
Whate'er they have suffered and done to obtain;
'Tis a pleasure, a pleasure to sigh and to languish,
When we hope, when we hope to be happy again.

1679

From Absalom and Achitophel: A Poem[5]

In pious times, ere priestcraft did begin,
Before polygamy was made a sin;

3. Troilus and Cressida, or Truth Found Too Late is Dryden's third and last adaptation of a Shakespeare play; the Homeric story of two lovers, Troilus and Cressida, separated during the siege of Troy, had also been told by Chaucer (see p. 67). Dryden alters Shakespeare's play considerably; unlike Shakespeare, Dryden has both title characters die, for instance. In both versions, Cressida's uncle, Pandarus, is a voyeuristic, lewd character who schemes to bring about the physical consummation of the lovers' desires, but only in Dryden's text does Pandarus use a song to serenade the lovers. In this scene (3.2), Pandarus listens outside the lovers' door the morning after they have consummated their love, and then instructs a group of musicians to sing this song.

4. Love is commonly personified as the young boy, Cupid.

5. The title names refer the reader to 2 Samuel 13–18. Absalom there rebels against his father, King David; Achitophel advises Absalom to destroy David at once. Like many other texts from this period, Dryden's poem uses this biblical story as an analogue for the religious and political crisis of 1678 that came to be known as the "Popish Plot," and its aftermath of bitter political struggle

When man on many multiplied his kind,
Ere one to one was cursedly confined;
5 When nature prompted and no law denied
Promiscuous use of concubine and bride;
Then Israel's monarch after Heaven's own heart,[6]
His vigorous warmth did variously impart
To wives and slaves; and, wide as his command,
10 Scattered his Maker's image through the land.
Michal,[7] of royal blood, the crown did wear,
A soil ungrateful to the tiller's care:
Not so the rest; for several mothers bore
To godlike David several sons before.
15 But since like slaves his bed they did ascend,
No true succession could their seed attend.
Of all this numerous progeny was none
So beautiful, so brave, as Absalom:
Whether, inspired by some diviner lust,
20 His father got° him with a greater gust,° begot / enjoyment
Or that° his conscious destiny made way, whether
By manly beauty, to imperial sway.[8]
Early in foreign fields he won renown,
With kings and states allied to Israel's crown:
25 In peace the thoughts of war he could remove,
And seemed as° he were only born for love. as if
Whate'er he did, was done with so much ease,
In him alone 'twas natural to please;
His motions all accompanied with grace;
30 And paradise was opened in his face.
With secret joy indulgent David viewed
His youthful image in his son renewed:
To all his wishes nothing he denied;
And made the charming Annabel his bride.
35 What faults he had (for who from faults is free?)
His father could not, or he would not see.
Some warm excesses which the law forbore,
Were cònstrued youth that purged by boiling o'er:

between King Charles II and the earl of Shaftesbury: David stands for Charles II and Absalom for the duke of Monmouth, Charles's illegitimate son. Achitophel represents the earl of Shaftesbury, who urged Monmouth to seek the succession to the throne in an attempt to displace Charles's brother James, the duke of York, an openly practicing Catholic. In 1678, Titus Oates offered sworn testimony of the existence of a Jesuit plot to assassinate the king, burn London, massacre Protestants, and restore the Catholic Church; this testimony, combined with the discovery of the murder of a London justice of the peace, Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, who had received a copy of the oath for safekeeping, prompted fear of a Catholic uprising; Protestant leaders took advantage of the panic to try to exclude James from the succession. To what extent (if any) such a plot really existed is a matter of historical debate. Charles managed to retain his brother's position as heir and charged Shaftesbury with high treason. Dryden anonymously published the first part of "Absalom and Achitophel" in 1681 while the earl was under arrest, apparently as an attempt to stir public opinion against him; however, the grand jury soon set the earl free (he died two years later). A second part appeared in 1682, although much of this work is attributed to Nahum Tate. After Charles II died in 1685 and James II succeeded to the throne, Dryden (and his two sons) converted to Catholicism in 1686; he remained a Catholic for the rest of his life.

6. God calls David "a man after mine own heart" in Acts 13.22.

7. David's childless wife. She stands for Charles's childless queen, Catherine of Portugal.

8. Although the lines are ambiguous, Dryden seems to be asking whether Absalom gained imperial power (sway) by heredity or by deliberate use of his "manly beauty." Dryden alludes here to Monmouth's personal attractiveness and, in the following lines, to his prowess in wars against the Dutch and later the French, and to his marriage (arranged by the king) to the Scottish heiress Anne Scott.

And Amnon's murder,[9] by a specious name,
40 Was called a just revenge for injured fame.
Thus praised and loved the noble youth remained,
While David, undisturbed, in Sion[1] reigned.
But life can never be sincerely° blest; wholly
Heaven punishes the bad, and proves° the best. tries
45 The Jews,[2] a headstrong, moody, murmuring race,
As ever tried the extent and stretch of grace;
God's pampered people, whom, debauched with ease,
No king could govern, nor no God could please (Gods they had tried of every shape and size
50 That god-smiths could produce, or priests devise);[3]
These Adam-wits,[4] too fortunately free,
Began to dream they wanted° liberty; lacked
And when no rule, no precedent was found,
Of men by laws less circumscribed and bound,
55 They led their wild desires to woods and caves,[5]
And thought that all but savages were slaves.
They who, when Saul was dead, without a blow,
Made foolish Ishbosheth the crown forego;[6]
Who banished David did from Hebron[7] bring,
60 And with a general shout proclaimed him king:
Those very Jews, who, at their very best,
Their humor° more than loyalty expressed, caprice
Now wondered why so long they had obeyed
An idol monarch,[8] which their hands had made;
65 Thought they might ruin him they could create,
Or melt him to that golden calf, a state.[9]
But these were random bolts;° no formed design shots
Nor interest made the factious crowd to join:
The sober part of Israel, free from stain,
70 Well knew the value of a peaceful reign;
And, looking backward with a wise affright,° fear
Saw seams of wounds, dishonest° to the sight: dishonorable
In contemplation of whose ugly scars
They cursed the memory of civil wars.[1]

9. Absalom killed his half-brother Amnon, who had raped Absalom's half-sister, Tamar (2 Samuel 13.28–29). The parallel with Monmouth is vague, although he had a reputation for violence in his youth, and his troopers had recently attacked an abusive Parliamentarian, Sir John Coventry. Cònstrued: interpreted as the result of.
1. I.e., London.
2. I.e., the English.
3. Perhaps a reference to the novelties in Church doctrine and practice that had issued in the disestablishment of the Anglican Church under the Commonwealth; more generally, the recent political and religious controversies that had divided England. The Israelites (God's chosen people) were frequently converted to the worship of the pagan gods of the tribes and peoples with whom they fought and traded.
4. The word calls attention to the supposedly untutored quality of the dissenters from the Anglican Communion, and also to the biblical Adam's rebellion against the single restraint imposed on him (see Genesis 2.16–17).
5. Dissenters from the Church of England were sometimes forced to worship in hiding.
6. Saul stands for Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), English general and statesman, lord protector of England; Ishbosheth, Saul's son who briefly ruled Israel, here represents Richard Cromwell (1626–1712), who had succeeded his father as lord protector before being forced to abdicate in 1659.
7. David was first crowned king of the tribe of Judah, in Hebron, before becoming king of Israel (2 Samuel 1–5); Charles II was first crowned king in Scotland, before being restored to the throne in England in 1660.
8. I.e., Oliver Cromwell. Jews were not allowed to worship idols (Exodus 20.4).
9. I.e., that idol, a republic or commonwealth. The biblical reference is to the image of a calf, made of melted golden earrings, which the Israelites worshiped while Moses was on Mt. Sinai (Exodus 32.1–4).
1. I.e., such as the religious and political turmoil

75 The moderate sort of men, thus qualified,° mollified
Inclined the balance to the better side;
And David's mildness managed it so well,
The bad found no occasion to rebel.
But when to sin our biased nature leans,[2]
80 The careful° Devil is still at hand with means; watchful
And providently pimps for ill desires:[3]
The Good Old Cause[4] revived, a plot requires.
Plots, true or false, are necessary things,
To raise up commonwealths and ruin kings.
85 The inhabitants of old Jerusalem
Were Jebusites;[5] the town so called from them;
And theirs the native right.
But when the chosen people[6] grew more strong,
The rightful cause at length became the wrong;
90 And every loss the men of Jebus bore,
They still were thought God's enemies the more.
Thus worn and weakened, well or ill content,
Submit they must to David's government:
Impoverished and deprived of all command,
95 Their taxes doubled as they lost their land;
And, what was harder yet to flesh and blood,
Their gods disgraced, and burnt like common wood.
This set the heathen priesthood[7] in a flame;
For priests of all religions are the same:
100 Of whatsoe'er descent their godhead be,
Stock,[8] stone, or other homely pedigree,
In his defense his servants are as bold,
As if he had been born of beaten gold.
The Jewish rabbins, though their enemies,
105 In this conclude them honest men and wise:[9]
For 'twas their duty, all the learned think,
To espouse his cause, by whom they eat and drink.[1]
From hence began that Plot,[2] the nation's curse,
Bad in itself, but represented worse;
110 Raised in extremes, and in extremes decried;
With oaths affirmed, with dying vows denied;
Not weighed or winnowed by the multitude;[3]

that had led to the beheading of Charles II's father, Charles I, in 1649.

2. Biased: prejudiced, or inclined in some direction (the O.E.D. cites Dryden's line); i.e., when our human inclination to sin takes over.

3. I.e., the devil prudently provides the means ("pimps") for sinful desires.

4. A popular phrase referring to the Commonwealth.

5. The Jebusites (Judges 1.21) represent Roman Catholics; Jerusalem stands for London.

6. The Protestants, some of whom claimed for England a divinely appointed destiny like that of the Hebrews.

7. The Catholic clergy, suffering from the recent flare-up of prejudice as well as from the long history of restrictions to which Dryden has just alluded; in particular, many oppressive laws against Catholics were established under the forty-five-year reign of Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603; see pp. 142–43).

8. Block of wood, i.e., of humble descent.

9. I.e., even though the Anglican divines ("Jewish rabbins") are "enemies" to Catholics, they consider Catholics wise in the "bold" defense of their God.

1. I.e., Christ, whose body Catholics "eat and drink" in Communion; according to the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, the bread and wine actually become the body of Christ during Communion (whereas Protestant doctrine holds that the bread and wine symbolize or represent his body).

2. I.e., the Catholic plot described in note 5, p. 501.

3. According to this simile, in which the reports of a plot are compared to grain, the populace has not carefully "weighed" and "winnowed" (separated the good from the bad) the grain, but has swallowed it whole.

But swallowed in the mass, unchewed and crude.
Some truth there was, but dashed° and brewed with lies, mixed
115 To please the fools, and puzzle all the wise.
Succeeding times did equal folly call,
Believing nothing, or believing all.
The Egyptian[4] rites the Jebusites embraced,
Where gods were recommended by their taste.
120 Such savory deities must needs be good,
As served at once for worship and for food.
By force they could not introduce these gods,
For ten to one in former days was odds;[5]
So fraud was used (the sacrificer's trade):[6]
125 Fools are more hard to conquer than persuade.
Their busy teachers mingled with the Jews,
And raked for converts even the court and stews:° brothels
Which Hebrew priests the more unkindly took,
Because the fleece accompanies the flock.[7]
130 Some thought they God's anointed[8] meant to slay
By guns, invented since full many a day:
Our author swears it not; but who can know
How far the Devil and Jebusites may go?
This Plot, which failed for want of common sense,
135 Had yet a deep and dangerous consequence:
For, as when raging fevers boil the blood,
The standing lake soon floats into a flood,
And every hostile humor, which before
Slept quiet in its channels, bubbles o'er;
140 So several factions from this first ferment
Work up to foam, and threat the government.
Some by their friends, more by themselves thought wise,
Opposed the power to which they could not rise.
Some had in courts been great, and thrown from thence,
145 Like fiends were hardened in impenitence;° unrepentance
Some, by their monarch's fatal mercy, grown
From pardoned rebels kinsmen to the throne,
Were raised in power and public office high;
Strong bands, if bands ungrateful men could tie.
150 Of these the false Achitophel[9] was first;
A name to all succeeding ages cursed:
For close° designs, and crooked counsels fit; secret
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;° imagination
Restless, unfixed in principles and place;
155 In power unpleased, impatient of disgrace:
A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
Fretted the pygmy° body to decay, overly small
And o'er-informed the tenement of clay.[1]

4. I.e., the French; hence Roman Catholics. The allusion is to the Mass, incorporating the doctrine of transubstantiation.
5. I.e., because Protestants outnumbered Catholics (although the difference in numbers was probably much smaller than Dryden indicates).
6. I.e., those who use fraud sacrifice innocent people.
7. Dryden implies that the Anglican clergy ("Hebrew priests") resented any loss of tithes ("fleece") paid to the established Church; such loss was caused by Catholic conversions.
8. The king.
9. Shaftesbury had been a member of Cromwell's council of state; later, he had helped bring back Charles II and was made a member of the Cabal, a powerful committee of the Privy Council.
1. I.e., overanimated his body.

A daring pilot in extremity;
160 Pleased with the danger, when the waves went high,
He sought the storms; but, for a calm unfit,
Would steer too nigh the sands, to boast his wit.
Great wits° are sure to madness near allied, geniuses
And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
165 Else why should he, with wealth and honor blest,
Refuse his age the needful hours of rest?
Punish a body which he could not please,
Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?
And all to leave what with his toil he won,
170 To that unfeathered two-legged thing,[2] a son;
Got,° while his soul did huddled° notions try; begotten / confused
And born a shapeless lump, like anarchy.
In friendship false, implacable in hate,
Resolved to ruin or to rule the state.
175 To compass° this the triple bond he broke,[3] accomplish
The pillars of the public safety shook,
And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke;
Then seized with fear, yet still affecting fame,
Usurped a patriot's all-atoning name.[4]
180 So easy still it proves in factious times,
With public zeal to cancel private crimes.
How safe is treason, and how sacred ill,
Where none can sin against the people's will!
Where crowds can wink, and no offense be known,
185 Since in another's guilt they find their own!
Yet fame deserved, no enemy can grudge;
The statesman we abhor, but praise the judge.
In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abbethdin[5]
With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean;
190 Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress;
Swift of dispatch, and easy of access.
Oh, had he been content to serve the crown,
With virtues only proper to the gown;° judiciary
Or had the rankness of the soil been freed
195 From cockle,° that oppressed the noble seed; weedlike plant
David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
And Heaven had wanted one immortal song.[6]
But wild Ambition loves to slide, not stand,
And Fortune's ice prefers to Virtue's land.
200 Achitophel, grown weary to possess
A lawful fame, and lazy happiness,
Disdained the golden fruit to gather free,

2. Plato's definition of cloddish man.
3. Shaftesbury helped bring about the war against Holland, with France as an ally, in 1672. Triple bond: an alliance (1668) between England, Sweden, and the Dutch Republic against France, which was thought to pose the threat of an invasion (line 177).
4. The name of "patriot" was "affected" (put on), then and thereafter, by the party out of power.
5. A rabbinical term for a justice. Shaftesbury presided over the Court of Chancery from 1672 to 1673.
6. I.e., heaven would have lacked one Psalm of David. Many interpretations exist for this difficult couplet: perhaps it is a reference to Psalm 3, written, as tradition would have it, when David fled from Absalom; other suggestions include Psalm 4 and Psalm 109. The application to Charles II is unclear; some have suggested that it refers to Dryden's poem.

And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.
Now, manifest° of° crimes contrived long since, detected / in 205 He stood at bold defiance with his prince;
Held up the buckler° of the people's cause protector
Against the crown, and skulked behind the laws.
The wished occasion of the Plot he takes;
Some circumstances finds, but more he makes.
210 By buzzing emissaries fills the ears
Of listening crowds with jealousies° and fears suspicions
Of arbitrary counsels brought to light,
And proves the king himself a Jebusite.
Weak arguments! which yet he knew full well
215 Were strong with people easy to rebel.
For, governed by the moon, the giddy Jews
Tread the same track when she the prime renews;
And once in twenty years, their scribes record,[7]
By natural instinct they change their lord.
220 Achitophel still wants a chief, and none
Was found so fit as warlike Absalom:
Not that he wished his greatness to create
(For politicians neither love nor hate),
But, for he knew his title not allowed,
225 Would keep him still depending on the crowd,
That kingly power, thus ebbing out, might be
Drawn to the dregs of a democracy.[8]
Him he attempts with studied arts to please,
And sheds his venom in such words as these:
230 "Auspicious prince, at whose nativity
Some royal planet[9] ruled the southern sky;
Thy longing country's darling and desire;
Their cloudy pillar and their guardian fire:
Their second Moses,[1] whose extended wand
235 Divides the seas, and shows the promised land;
Whose dawning day in every distant age
Has exercised the sacred prophet's rage:
The people's prayer, the glad diviners' theme,
The young men's vision, and the old men's dream![2]
240 Thee, savior, thee, the nation's vows confess,
And, never satisfied with seeing, bless:
Swift unbespoken° pomps° thy steps proclaim, voluntary / celebrations
And stammering babes are taught to lisp thy name.
How long wilt thou the general joy detain,

7. The phases of the moon fall on the same day of the calendar year at roughly twenty-year intervals. Crises in English politics occurred in 1640 (the rebellion against Charles I), 1660 (the restoration of Charles II), and the time of the poem.
8. I.e., mob rule.
9. A planet whose influence determines that he (Absalom) should be king.
1. I.e., their guide; after their exodus from Egypt under the leadership of Moses, who separated the waters of the Red Sea long enough to allow them to escape, the Israelites were led in their forty-year wandering by a pillar of clouds by day and a pillar of fire by night (Exodus 13–14). In reference to Christ, Moses said, "A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me": Christ is sometimes referred to as "the second Moses" (see Acts 7.37). Here, Achitophel tells Absalom that he is meant to be a second Moses.
2. Cf. the prophecy delivered to Joel: "And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions" (Joel 2.28).

245 Starve and defraud the people of thy reign?
Content ingloriously to pass thy days
Like one of Virtue's fools that feeds on praise;
Till thy fresh glories, which now shine so bright,
Grow stale and tarnish with our daily sight.
250 Believe me, royal youth, thy fruit must be
Or° gathered ripe, or rot upon the tree. either
Heaven has to all allotted, soon or late,
Some lucky revolution of their fate;
Whose motions if we watch and guide with skill
255 (For human good depends on human will),
Our Fortune rolls as from a smooth descent,[3]
And from the first impression takes the bent;
But, if unseized, she glides away like wind,
And leaves repenting Folly far behind.
260 Now, now she meets you with a glorious prize,
And spreads her locks before her as she flies.
Had thus Old David, from whose loins you spring,
Not dared, when Fortune called him, to be king,
At Gath[4] an exile he might still remain,
265 And heaven's anointing oil[5] had been in vain.
Let his successful youth your hopes engage;
But shun the example of declining age;
Behold him setting in his western skies,
The shadows lengthening as the vapors rise.[6]
270 He is not now, as when on Jordan's sand[7]
The joyful people thronged to see him land,
Covering the beach, and blackening all the strand;° shore
But, like the Prince of Angels,[8] from his height
Comes tumbling downward with diminished light,
275 Betrayed by one poor plot to public scorn
(Our only blessing since his cursed return),[9]
Those heaps of people which one sheaf did bind,
Blown off and scattered by a puff of wind.[1]
What strength can he to your designs oppose,
280 Naked of friends, and round beset with foes?
If Pharaoh's[2] doubtful succor he should use,
A foreign aid would more incense the Jews:
Proud Egypt would dissembled friendship bring;
Foment° the war, but not support the king: heat, rouse
285 Nor would the royal party e'er unite
With Pharaoh's arms to assist the Jebusite;
Or if they should, their interest soon would break,
And with such odious aid make David weak.

3. Achitophel stresses the workings of Fortune, or what emblem books called "Occasion," rather than divine Providence. He uses traditional images of Fortune standing on a ball and having to be seized by a forelock as she approaches, the back of her head being bald.
4. David escaped Saul by fleeing to Gath (1 Samuel 27.1–4); here, a reference to Brussels, where Charles spent much of his exile.
5. God sent Samuel to anoint David as a token that he would finally come to the throne (1 Samuel 16.1–13).
6. The vapors or humors associated with night.
7. I.e., at Dover, where Charles II landed at the time of the Restoration.
8. I.e., Lucifer; cf. Luke 10.18: "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven."
9. I.e., the crisis of 1678 was the only favorable opportunity for the conspirators since the Restoration.
1. I.e., the unity and loyalty of the people who had supported the king are easily dispersed.
2. I.e., King Louis XIV of France.

All sorts of men by my successful arts,
290 Abhorring kings, estrange their altered hearts
From David's rule: and 'tis the general cry,
'Religion, commonwealth, and liberty.'
If you, as champion of the public good,
Add to their arms a chief of royal blood,
295 What may not Israel hope, and what applause
Might such a general gain by such a cause?
Not barren praise alone, that gaudy flower
Fair only to the sight, but solid power;
And nobler is a limited command,
300 Given by the love of all your native land,
Than a successive title, long and dark,
Drawn from the moldy rolls of Noah's ark."[3]
What cannot praise effect in mighty minds,
When flattery soothes, and when ambition blinds!
305 Desire of power, on earth a vicious weed,
Yet, sprung from high, is of celestial seed:
In God 'tis glory; and when men aspire,
'Tis but a spark too much of heavenly fire.[4]
The ambitious youth, too covetous of fame,
310 Too full of angel's metal[5] in his frame,
Unwarily was led from virtue's ways,
Made drunk with honor, and debauched with praise.
Half loath, and half consenting to the ill
(For loyal blood within him struggled still),
315 He thus replied: "And what pretense have I
To take up arms for public liberty?
My father governs with unquestioned right;
The faith's defender, and mankind's delight,
Good, gracious, just, observant of the laws:
320 And heaven by wonders has espoused his cause.
Whom has he wronged in all his peaceful reign?
Who sues for justice to his throne in vain?
What millions has he pardoned of his foes,
Whom just revenge did to his wrath expose?
325 Mild, easy, humble, studious of our good,
Inclined to mercy, and averse from blood;
If mildness ill with stubborn Israel suit,
His crime is God's belovèd attribute.
What could he gain, his people to betray,
330 Or change his right for arbitrary sway?
Let haughty Pharaoh curse with such a reign
His fruitful Nile, and yoke a servile train.[6]
If David's rule Jerusalem displease,
The Dog Star[7] heats their brains to this disease.

3. Achitophel (Shaftesbury) espouses constitutional monarchy ("a limited command") and parliamentary as opposed to hereditary determination of the succession.
4. Perhaps including a reference to Prometheus, who angered the gods by stealing fire for the benefit of mortals.
5. A double pun: the gold of which the coin ("angel") is made, and the spirit ("mettle") of the rebellious angels led by Satan.
6. I.e., if King Louis XIV of France were to help Charles II remain in power, he would only be cursing his own country. In Exodus, the Pharaoh's refusal to release the enslaved Israelites caused God to visit a series of plagues on the Egyptian people.
7. Sirius, the morning and evening star of late summer, associated with crazing heat.

335 Why then should I, encouraging the bad,
Turn rebel and run popularly mad?
Were he a tyrant, who, by lawless might
Oppressed the Jews, and raised the Jebusite,
Well might I mourn; but nature's holy bands
340 Would curb my spirits and restrain my hands:
The people might assert their liberty,
But what was right in them were crime in me.
His favor leaves me nothing to require,
Prevents my wishes, and outruns desire.
345 What more can I expect while David lives?
All but his kingly diadem° he gives: crown
And that"—But there he paused; then sighing, said—
"Is justly destined for a worthier head.
For when my father from his toils shall rest
350 And late augment the number of the blest,[8]
His lawful issue shall the throne ascend,
Or the collateral° line, where that shall end. brother's
His brother,[9] though oppressed with vulgar spite,
Yet dauntless, and secure of native right,
355 Of every royal virtue stands possessed;
Still dear to all the bravest and the best.
His courage foes,[1] his friends his truth proclaim;
His loyalty the king, the world his fame.
His mercy even the offending crowd will find,
360 For sure he comes of a forgiving kind.° family
Why should I then repine° at heaven's decree, complain
Which gives me no pretense to royalty?
Yet O that fate, propitiously° inclined, favorably
Had raised my birth, or had debased my mind;
365 To my large soul not all her treasure lent,
And then betrayed it to a mean° descent! low
I find, I find my mounting spirits bold,
And David's part disdains my mother's mold.
Why am I scanted by a niggard[2] birth?
370 My soul disclaims the kindred of her earth;[3]
And, made for empire, whispers me within,
'Desire of greatness is a godlike sin.' "
Him staggering so when hell's dire agent[4] found,
While fainting Virtue scarce maintained her ground,
375 He pours fresh forces in, and thus replies:
"The eternal God, supremely good and wise,
Imparts not these prodigious gifts in vain:
What wonders are reserved to bless your reign!
Against your will, your arguments have shown,
380 Such virtue's only given to guide a throne.

8. I.e., increase the number of souls in heaven.
9. Although Monmouth and the duke of York were able to get along for many years, by 1679 they were opposed to each other, and so it is unlikely that Monmouth would have felt the emotions for his uncle that Dryden here has him express.
1. I.e., his foes proclaim his courage.
2. Ungenerous; the birth of a king's son should confer succession to the throne.
3. I.e., her body.
4. I.e., as Absalom (Monmouth) wavers, tempted by the sin of pride to attempt the throne despite his own arguments against it, Achitophel (Shaftesbury), acting as "hell's agent," again tries to persuade him to rebel.

Not that your father's mildness I contemn,
But manly force becomes the diadem.
'Tis true he grants the people all they crave;
And more, perhaps, than subjects ought to have:
385 For lavish grants suppose a monarch tame,
And more his goodness than his wit° proclaim. intelligence
But when should people strive their bonds to break,
If not when kings are negligent or weak?
Let him give on till he can give no more,
390 The thrifty Sanhedrin[5] shall keep him poor;
And every shekel which he can receive,
Shall cost a limb of his prerogative.[6]
To ply him with new plots shall be my care;
Or plunge him deep in some expensive war;
395 Which when his treasure can no more supply,
He must, with the remains of kingship, buy.
His faithful friends our jealousies and fears
Call Jebusites, and Pharaoh's pensioners;
Whom when our fury from his aid has torn,
400 He shall be naked left to public scorn.
The next successor, whom I fear and hate,
My arts have made obnoxious to the state;
Turned all his virtues to his overthrow,
And gained our elders[7] to pronounce a foe.
405 His right, for sums of necessary gold,
Shall first be pawned, and afterward be sold;
Till time shall ever-wanting David draw,
To pass your doubtful title into law:
If not, the people have a right supreme
410 To make their kings; for kings are made for them.
All empire is no more than power in trust,
Which, when resumed, can be no longer just.
Succession, for the general good designed,
In its own wrong a nation cannot bind;
415 If altering that the people can relieve,
Better one suffer than a nation grieve.
The Jews well know their power: ere Saul they chose,
God was their king, and God they durst depose.[8]
Urge now your piety,° your filial name, dutifulness
420 A father's right, and fear of future fame;
The public good, that universal call,
To which even heaven submitted, answers all.
Nor let his love enchant your generous mind;
'Tis Nature's trick to propagate her kind.

5. The high council of the Jews; here, the Parliament, which provided the crown with its monies. The Whigs hoped to limit the powers of the crown by refusing to vote money to Charles, but he lived on French subsidies and refused to summon Parliament for the duration of the crisis.
6. A term used with particular reference to a sovereign's rights (in theory, subject to no restrictions).
7. In the Bible, the Jewish magistrates; in the poem, the Parliamentarians who voted to exclude James from the succession.
8. The Israelites' demand that a secular king (Saul, as it happened) replace the theocratic Judges was condemned as impious: "And the Lord said . . . , they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them" (1 Samuel 8.7). As Saul replaced the Judges, so, in the poem, Oliver Cromwell took over authority from the theocrats of the Commonwealth.

425 Our fond begetters, who would never die,
Love but themselves in their posterity.
Or let his kindness by the effects be tried,
Or let him lay his vain pretense aside.
God said he loved your father; could he bring 430 A better proof than to anoint him king?
It surely showed he loved the shepherd[9] well,
Who gave so fair a flock as Israel.
Would David have you thought his darling son?
What means he then, to alienate[1] the crown?
435 The name of godly he may blush to bear:
'Tis after God's own heart to cheat his heir.[2]
He to his brother gives supreme command;
To you a legacy of barren land,[3]
Perhaps the old harp, on which he thrums his lays,° songs
440 Or some dull Hebrew ballad in your praise.
Then the next heir, a prince severe and wise,
Already looks on you with jealous eyes;
Sees through the thin disguises of your arts,
And marks your progress in the people's hearts.
445 Though now his mighty soul its grief contains,
He meditates revenge who least complains;
And, like a lion, slumbering in the way,
Or sleep dissembling, while he waits his prey,
His fearless foes within his distance draws,
450 Constrains his roaring, and contracts his paws;
Till at the last, his time for fury found,
He shoots with sudden vengeance from the ground;
The prostrate vulgar° passes o'er and spares, populace
But with a lordly rage his hunters tears.
455 Your case no tame expedients will afford:
Resolve on death, or conquest by the sword,
Which for no less a stake than life you draw;
And self-defense is nature's eldest law.
Leave the warm[4] people no considering time;
460 For then rebellion may be thought a crime.
Prevail° yourself of what occasion gives, avail
But try your title while your father lives;
And that your arms may have a fair pretense,° pretext
Proclaim you take them in the king's defense;
465 Whose sacred life each minute would expose
To plots, from seeming friends, and secret foes.
And who can sound the depth of David's soul?
Perhaps his fear his kindness may control.[5]
He fears his brother, though he loves his son,
470 For plighted vows too late to be undone.
If so, by force he wishes to be gained,

9. As a youth, David tended sheep for his father.
1. I.e., transfer title to another (a legal term).
2. A reference to the story of Jacob and Esau (Genesis 27–28). Esau, the older twin, was entitled to the birthright and blessing of his father, but God chose Jacob to continue the covenant he had made with Abraham. Jacob tricked Esau out of his birthright and blessing, apparently with God's approval; see also line 981. Conflicting interpretations exist for how these lines apply to Charles II.
3. James had been titled generalissimo (the supreme commander of combined forces) in 1678; Monmouth had been exiled the following year.
4. I.e., recently heated or roused in anger.
5. I.e., perhaps his fear of James keeps Charles II from being kind to you.

Like women's lechery, to seem constrained.° forced
Doubt not; but when he most affects the frown,
Commit a pleasing rape° upon the crown. seizure
475 Secure his person to secure your cause:
They who possess the prince, possess the laws."
He said, and this advice above the rest
With Absalom's mild nature suited best:
Unblamed of life (ambition set aside),[6]
480 Not stained with cruelty, nor puffed with pride,
How happy had he been, if destiny
Had higher placed his birth, or not so high!
His kingly virtues might have claimed a throne,
And blest all other countries but his own.
485 But charming greatness since so few refuse,
'Tis juster to lament him than accuse.
Strong were his hopes a rival to remove,
With blandishments to gain the public love;
To head the faction while their zeal was hot,
490 And popularly prosecute the Plot.
To further this, Achitophel unites
The malcontents of all the Israelites;[7]
Whose differing parties he could wisely join,
For several ends, to serve the same design:
495 The best (and of the princes some were such),
Who thought the power of monarchy too much;
Mistaken men, and patriots in their hearts;
Not wicked, but seduced by impious arts.
By these the springs of property were bent,
500 And wound so high, they cracked the government.
The next[8] for interest sought to embroil the state,
To sell their duty at a dearer rate;
And make their Jewish markets of the throne,
Pretending public good, to serve their own.
505 Others thought kings an useless heavy load,
Who cost too much, and did too little good.
These were for laying honest David by,
On principles of pure good husbandry.° economy
With them joined all the haranguers of the throng,
510 That thought to get preferment by the tongue.
Who follow next, a double danger bring,
Not only hating David, but the king:
The Solymaean rout,[9] well-versed of old
In godly faction, and in treason bold;
515 Cowering and quaking at a conqueror's sword,
But lofty to a lawful prince restored;
Saw with disdain an ethnic[1] plot begun,
And scorned by Jebusites to be outdone.
Hot Levites[2] headed these; who, pulled before

Resumed their cant, and with a zealous cry
Pursued their old beloved theocracy:
Where Sanhedrin and priest enslaved the nation,
And justified their spoils by inspiration:

'Gainst form and order they their power employ,
Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.
But far more numerous was the herd of such,
Who think too little, and who talk too much.
535 These out of mere instinct, they knew not why,
Adored their fathers' God and property;
And, by the same blind benefit of fate,
The Devil and the Jebusite did hate:
Born to be saved, even in their own despite,

Such were the tools; but a whole Hydra[6] more

Some of their chiefs were princes of the land:
In the first rank of these did Zimri[7] stand;

Not one, but all mankind's epitome:
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong;
Was everything by starts, and nothing long;
But, in the course of one revolving moon,

3. The priestly family; (derisively) the theocratically disposed dissenters.
4. A term used by some dissenters for those elected to salvation.
5. Dryden calls attention to the Calvinist doctrines of predestination and election, and (in line 536) to the commercial origins of many dissenters.
6. Mythical beast with nine heads, each of which was replaced by two heads when it was cut off.
7. An Israelite executed for whoredom (Numbers 25); a second Zimri was a traitor and regicide (1 Kings 26.8–20). Dryden gives the name to George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, a latecomer to Monmouth's cause (described in lines 492–543).

On Absalom and wise Achitophel:
Thus, wicked but in will, of means bereft,
He left not faction, but of that was left.[8]

With all these loads of injuries oppressed,
And long revolving in his careful breast
935 The event° of things, at last, his patience tired, outcome
Thus from his royal throne, by Heaven inspired,
The godlike David spoke: with awful fear
His train their Maker in their master hear.
"Thus long have I, by native mercy swayed,
940 My wrongs dissembled, my revenge delayed:
So willing to forgive the offending age,
So much the father did the king assuage.
But now so far my clemency they slight,
The offenders question my forgiving right.[9]
945 That one was made for many, they contend;
But 'tis to rule; for that's a monarch's end.
They call my tenderness of blood my fear;
Though manly tempers can the longest bear.
Yet, since they will divert my native course,
950 'Tis time to show I am not good by force.
Those heaped affronts that haughty subjects bring,
Are burdens for a camel, not a king:
Kings are the public pillars of the State,
Born to sustain and prop the nation's weight:
955 If my young Samson will pretend a call
To shake the column, let him share the fall:[1]
But, oh, that yet he would repent and live!
How easy 'tis for parents to forgive!
With how few tears a pardon might be won
960 From nature, pleading for a darling son!
Poor pitied youth, by my paternal care
Raised up to all the height his frame could bear:
Had God ordained his fate for empire born,
He would have given his soul another turn:

8. The passage here omitted has five parts. (1) Lines 569–681: A further roll of the rebels or dissenters, including briefly "The well-hung Balaam and cold Caleb," "canting Nadab" and "bull-faced Jonas," and, extensively, Shimei (Slingsby Bethel, a sheriff of London), "whose youth did early promise bring / Of zeal to God and hatred to his king," and Corah (Titus Oates), whose "zeal to heaven made him his prince despise." (2) Lines 682–752: Absalom's courting of the people and the development of the plot against David. (3) Lines 753–810: Dryden's analysis of the issues involved in conflicts between the people (divinely obligated to obedience) and their monarchs (divinely obligated to just stewardship), culminating thus: "Yet, grant our lords the people kings can make, / What prudent men a settled throne would shake? / For whatsoe'er their sufferings were before, / That change they covet makes them suffer more. . . . If ancient fabrics nod, and threat to fall, / To patch the flaws, and buttress up the wall, / Thus far 'tis duty; but here fix the mark; / For all beyond it is to touch the ark" (lines 795–804; to touch the ark of the Covenant, which contained the Ten Commandments, is to commit sacrilege). (4) Lines 811–913: A short roll of David's supporters, including at length Barzillai (the duke of Ormond)—"The court he practiced, not the courtier's art: / Large was his wealth, but larger was his heart"—and, briefly, Zadoc, Adriel, Jotham, Hushai, and Amiel. (5) Lines 914–932: A brief reprise of number 2, Absalom's courting of the people, and an indication of the mounting danger of open revolt.

9. The right of the king to pardon, questioned by some members of the opposition.

1. Samson, pulling down the supporting columns of a Philistine temple, was destroyed in the ruin (Judges 16.29–30).

965 Gulled° with a patriot's name, whose modern sense deceived
Is one that would by law supplant his prince:
The people's brave,[2] the politician's tool;
Never was patriot yet, but was a fool.
Whence comes it that religion and the laws
970 Should more be Absalom's than David's cause?
His old instructor, ere he lost his place,[3]
Was never thought indued° with so much grace. endowed
Good heavens, how faction can a patriot paint!
My rebel ever proves my people's saint:
975 Would they impose an heir upon the throne?
Let Sanhedrins be taught to give their own.
A king's at least a part of government,
And mine as requisite as their consent;
Without my leave a future king to choose,
980 Infers a right the present to depose:
True, they petition me to approve their choice;
But Esau's hands suit ill with Jacob's voice.[4]
My pious subjects for my safety pray,
Which to secure, they take my power away.
985 From plots and treasons Heaven preserve my years,
But save me most from my petitioners.[5]
Unsatiate as the barren womb or grave;
God cannot grant so much as they can crave.
What then is left but with a jealous eye
990 To guard the small remains of royalty?
The law shall still direct my peaceful sway,
And the same law teach rebels to obey:
Votes shall no more established power control—
Such votes as make a part exceed the whole:
995 No groundless clamors shall my friends remove,
Nor crowds have power to punish ere they prove:
For gods and godlike kings their care express,
Still to defend their servants in distress.
O that my power to saving were confined:
1000 Why am I forced, like Heaven, against my mind,
To make examples of another kind?
Must I at length the sword of justice draw?
O curst effects of necessary law!
How ill my fear they by my mercy scan![6]
1005 Beware the fury of a patient man.
Law they require, let Law then show her face;
They could not be content to look on Grace,
Her hinder parts, but with a daring eye
To tempt the terror of her front and die.[7]

4. Jacob deceived his old, blind father by making his hands hairy (like Esau's) with animal fur; but he could not mask his voice (Genesis 27).
5. Shaftesbury (and others) made use of petitions in attempts to force the king to meet the demands of the Parliament in 1681.
6. I.e., how wrong they are to estimate my fear (determine that I am afraid) by the mercy I show.
7. Moses, on Mt. Sinai, was forbidden on pain of death to look upon God's face, but he was able to see God's back after God had passed by (Exodus 33.20–23).

Those dire artificers of death shall bleed.
Against themselves their witnesses will swear,
Till viper-like their mother Plot they tear:
And suck for nutriment that bloody gore,[8]

Their Belial with their Belzebub[9] will fight;
Thus on my foes, my foes shall do me right:

In their first onset, all their brutal rage.
1020 Then let 'em take an unresisted course,
Retire and traverse, and delude their force:
But when they stand all breathless, urge the fight,
And rise upon 'em with redoubled might:
For lawful power is still superior found,
1025 When long driven back, at length it stands the ground."
He said. The Almighty, nodding, gave consent;
And peals of thunder shook the firmament.° heavens
Henceforth a series of new time began,
The mighty years in long procession ran:
1030 Once more the godlike David was restored,
And willing nations knew their lawful lord.

1681

Mac Flecknoe[1]

All human things are subject to decay,
And when fate summons, monarchs must obey.
This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus, young
Was called to empire, and had governed long;[2]
5 In prose and verse, was owned, without dispute,
Through all the realms of Nonsense, absolute.
This agèd prince, now flourishing in peace,
And blest with issue of a large increase,[3]
Worn out with business, did at length debate
10 To settle the succession of the state;[4]

8. The simile is based on a common idea that vipers eat their own mothers.
9. I.e., their principal leaders; in Milton's Paradise Lost, Belial and Beelzebub, leaders of Satan's host, disagree about their course of action (Book 2).
1. Or Thomas Shadwell (1640–1692), a comic playwright who considered himself the dramatic heir of Ben Jonson and the champion of the type of comedy that Jonson had written, the "comedy of humors." Such plays allude to the medical theory that said a healthy human body was composed of four humors, kept in careful balance. Characters without such a balance have a predominant humor portrayed as a comic eccentricity. Dryden and Shadwell conducted a public argument for years on the merits of Jonson's plays. Dryden names Shadwell "Mac" (Gaelic for "son of") Flecknoe, making him heir not of Jonson but of the recently dead Irish priest Richard Flecknoe, a poet Dryden considered not only prolific but tiresome.
"Mac Flecknoe" was probably circulated in manuscript for a few years before being printed in a pirated edition in 1682 by an obscure publisher. A subtitle, "Or a Satire Upon the True-Blue Protestant Poet, T. S.," evoked contemporary political controversies by referring to Shadwell's membership in the Whig party, the political haven of dissenting Protestants. This subtitle, presumably added when the poem was published to stimulate sales, was removed in the 1684 edition and all others that Dryden oversaw.
2. Augustus (Octavian) became the first Roman emperor at thirty-six and reigned from 27 B.C.E. to 14 C.E.
3. Figuratively, children; also, perhaps, a more specific reference to Flecknoe's practice of collecting pieces from his earlier publications and publishing them again with a new title. "Increase" was stressed on the second syllable.
4. Comic allusion to the serious question of who would succeed King Charles II. Business: with a play on sexual intercourse.

And, pondering which of all his sons was fit
To reign, and wage immortal war with wit,[5]
Cried: " 'Tis resolved; for Nature pleads that he Should only rule, who most resembles me.
15 Sh——[6] alone my perfect image bears,
Mature in dullness from his tender years:
Sh—— alone, of all my sons, is he
Who stands confirmed in full stupidity.
The rest to some faint meaning make pretense,
20 But Sh—— never deviates into sense.
Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike through, and make a lucid interval;[7]
But Sh——'s genuine night admits no ray,
His rising fogs prevail upon the day.
25 Besides, his goodly fabric[8] fills the eye,
And seems designed for thoughtless majesty:
Thoughtless as monarch oaks that shade the plain,
And, spread in solemn state, supinely reign.
Heywood and Shirley[9] were but types° of thee, precursors
30 Thou last great prophet of tautology.[1]
Even I, a dunce of more renown than they,
Was sent before but to prepare thy way;
And, coarsely clad in Norwich drugget,[2] came
To teach the nations in thy greater name.
35 My warbling lute, the lute I whilom° strung, formerly
When to King John of Portugal I sung,[3]
Was but the prelude to that glorious day,
When thou on silver Thames didst cut thy way,[4]
With well-timed oars before the royal barge,
40 Swelled with the pride of thy celestial charge;
And big with hymn, commander of a host,
The like was ne'er in Epsom blankets tossed.[5]
Methinks I see the new Arion[6] sail,
The lute still trembling underneath thy nail.° fingernail
45 At thy well-sharpened thumb from shore to shore
The treble squeaks for fear, the basses roar;
Echoes from Pissing Alley Sh—— call,
And Sh—— they resound from A—— Hall.[7]
About thy boat the little fishes throng,

5. "Wit," here as in other poems of the time, variously denotes the intellect, the poetic imagination, and a general sprightliness of mind.
6. A transparent pretense of anonymity for Shadwell. The use of dashes is a common device of the period's satire. Also, a scatological suggestion. The name is spelled out in some manuscripts.
7. A bright period; also, a medical term referring to periods of sanity between attacks of lunacy.
8. His body; Shadwell was corpulent.
9. Thomas Heywood (1574?–1641) and James Shirley (1596–1666), prolific playwrights of an earlier time, now out of fashion. Dryden suggests that they prefigure Shadwell as the Hebrew Scripture prophets and (in lines 31–34) John the Baptist prefigured Christ.
1. A repetition of the same point in different words.
2. A coarse cloth.
3. Flecknoe, a Catholic priest, visited the king of Portugal and claimed him as a patron.
4. Dryden alludes here to the royal pageants performed on the river Thames, which flows through London.
5. A simultaneous reference to two of Shadwell's plays: The Virtuoso (1676), in which a character who thinks himself a "wit" is tossed in a blanket in a farcical scene, and Epsom Wells (1673).
6. When the semilegendary Greek poet Arion was cast into the sea, a dolphin, charmed by his singing, bore him ashore. Shadwell was proud of his own musical accomplishments.
7. This scatologically named hall, written out as "Aston" in the 1682 edition, has not been located. Pissing Alley ran between the Strand and the Thames.

50 As at the morning toast[8] that floats along.
Sometimes, as prince of thy harmonious band,
Thou wield'st thy papers in thy threshing hand.[9]
St. André's feet[1] ne'er kept more equal time,
Not ev'n the feet of thy own Psyche's rhyme,
55 Though they in number° as in sense excel: meter
So just, so like tautology, they° fell, the papers
That, pale with envy, Singleton forswore
The lute and sword, which he in triumph bore,
And vowed he ne'er would act Villerius[2] more."
60 Here stopped the good old sire, and wept for joy
In silent raptures of the hopeful boy.[3]
All arguments, but most his plays, persuade,
That for anointed dullness[4] he was made.
Close to the walls which fair Augusta[5] bind
65 (The fair Augusta much to fears inclined),
An ancient fabric° raised to inform the sight building
There stood of yore, and Barbican it hight:° was called
A watchtower once; but now, so fate ordains,
Of all the pile an empty name remains.
70 From its old ruins brothel houses rise,
Scenes of lewd loves, and of polluted joys,
Where their vast courts the mother-strumpets keep,
And, undisturbed by watch, in silence sleep.
Near these a Nursery[6] erects its head,
75 Where queens are formed, and future heroes bred;
Where unfledged actors learn to laugh and cry,
Where infant punks° their tender voices try, prostitutes
And little Maximins[7] the gods defy.
Great Fletcher never treads in buskins here,
80 Nor greater Jonson dares in socks appear;[8]
But gentle Simkin[9] just reception finds
Amidst this monument of vanished minds:
Pure clinches° the suburbian Muse[1] affords, puns
And Panton° waging harmless war with words. a punster
85 Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well known,

8. A comic metaphor for sewage.
9. I.e., his hand beats or strikes as with a flail, with a pun on the violence of his "beating," or writing, and the accents or beats in measured verse. In the following lines, Dryden continues to make fun of the mechanical metrics of the songs in Shadwell's opera Psyche (1675). Shadwell had apologized for his use of rhyme in the preface to the printed text.
1. With a pun on dancing and metrical feet. St. André: a French dancing master, choreographer of Shadwell's Psyche.
2. A role in Sir William Davenant's The Siege of Rhodes (1656), the first English opera. Singleton: John Singleton (d. 1686), a musician of the Theatre Royal. Dryden seems to be suggesting (sarcastically) that Shadwell's art is so skilled that it evokes the admiration of an undistinguished performer.
3. I.e., Mac Flecknoe, or Shadwell (who was in his mid thirties). Good old sire: i.e., Flecknoe.
4. The expected phrase is anointed majesty, since English kings are anointed with oil at their coronations; i.e., all arguments favor Mac Flecknoe's ascent to the throne of dullness, but most of all his plays.
5. I.e., London; an allusion to contemporary fears of a Catholic plot to burn down the city (see "From Absalom and Achitophel: A Poem," note 5, p. 501).
6. The name of a training school for young actors built in the Barbican in 1671, against the wishes of many residents.
7. The bombastic Roman emperor in Dryden's Tyrannic Love (1669).
8. "Buskins," the high-soled boots worn in Athenian tragedy, are opposed to "socks," the low shoes worn in comedy (thus the reference to Ben Jonson). Fletcher: John Fletcher (1579–1625), a playwright.
9. A clown; a popular character in farces.
1. The nine Muses were Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts; this Muse, unlike the classical ones, is associated with the licentious suburbs of London, where brothels and theaters were located.

Ambitiously designed his Sh——'s throne;
For ancient Dekker[2] prophesied long since,
That in this pile would reign a mighty prince,
Born for a scourge of wit, and flail of sense;[3]
90 To whom true dullness should some Psyches owe,
But worlds of Misers from his pen should flow;[4]
Humorists and Hypocrites it should produce,
Whole Raymond families, and tribes of Bruce.
Now Empress Fame had published the renown
95 Of Sh——'s coronation through the town.
Roused by report of Fame, the nations meet,
From near Bunhill, and distant Watling Street.[5]
No Persian carpets spread the imperial way,
But scattered limbs of mangled poets lay;
100 From dusty shops neglected authors come,
Martyrs of pies, and relics of the bum.[6]
Much Heywood, Shirley, Ogilby[7] there lay,
But loads of Sh—— almost choked the way.
Bilked stationers[8] for yeomen stood prepared,
105 And H—— was captain of the guard.
The hoary° prince in majesty appeared, gray, aged
High on a throne of his own labors reared.
At his right hand our young Ascanius[9] sate,
Rome's other hope, and pillar of the state.
110 His brows thick fogs, instead of glories, grace,
And lambent dullness played around his face.
As Hannibal did to the altars come,
Sworn by his sire a mortal foe to Rome,[1]
So Sh—— swore, nor should his vow be vain,
115 That he till death true dullness would maintain;
And, in his father's right, and realm's defense,
Ne'er to have peace with wit, nor truce with sense.
The king himself the sacred unction° made, ointment
As king by office, and as priest by trade.
120 In his sinister hand, instead of ball,[2]
He placed a mighty mug of potent ale;

2. Thomas Dekker (ca. 1572–1632), a playwright satirized by Ben Jonson in The Poetaster (1602). He probably figures in the line of poets leading up to Shadwell because he was a city poet and a proponent of a dramatic realism that Dryden deplored.
3. I.e., born to be one who punishes wit and whips sense.
4. In these lines, Dryden names plays of (and characters in plays by) Shadwell.
5. Victims of the plague (1665–66) were buried in Bunhill. Because these locations are both within a half-mile of the scene of the supposed coronation ("the Nursery"), Mac Flecknoe's fame is narrowly circumscribed; furthermore, his subjects live in the unfashionable commercial center of the city, regarded as a place of bad taste and vulgarity.
6. I.e., unsold books, the paper of which was used in bakers' shops and in privies (toilets).
7. John Ogilby (1600–1676), a translator of Virgil and Homer and a dramatic entrepreneur derided by Dryden (and later by Pope); Thomas Heywood and James Shirley (see note 9, p. 518).
8. Booksellers, impoverished because they had stocked the works of Shadwell and others, stood guard to protect what remained of their interests. Their "captain," Henry Herringman, however, referred to in line 105, had been Dryden's publisher as well as Shadwell's.
9. Aeneas's son; hence, like Shadwell, the destined heir. Virgil referred to him as "spes altera Romae" ("Rome's other hope," Aeneid 12.168); as Troy fell, his favor with the gods was marked by a flickering ("lambent") flame that played around his head (Aeneid 2.680–84).
1. Hannibal (247–183 B.C.E.), the Carthaginian general who invaded Italy, and whose father ("sire") had dedicated Hannibal to the conquering of Rome.
2. In British coronations, the monarch holds in his or her left ("sinister") hand a globe surmounted by a cross.

Love's Kingdom[3] to his right he did convey,
At once his scepter, and his rule of sway;
Whose righteous lore the prince had practiced young,
125 And from whose loins recorded Psyche sprung.
His temples, last, with poppies[4] were o'erspread,
That nodding seemed to consecrate his head.
Just at that point of time, if fame not lie,
On his left hand twelve reverend owls[5] did fly.
130 So Romulus, 'tis sung, by Tiber's brook,
Presage of sway from twice six vultures took.[6]
The admiring throng loud acclamations make,
And omens of his future empire take.
The sire then shook the honors[7] of his head,
135 And from his brows damps° of oblivion shed vapors
Full on the filial dullness: long he stood,
Repelling from his breast the raging god;
At length burst out in this prophetic mood:
"Heavens bless my son, from Ireland let him reign
140 To far Barbadoes on the western main;[8]
Of his dominion may no end be known,
And greater than his father's be his throne;
Beyond Love's Kingdom let him stretch his pen!"
He paused, and all the people cried, "Amen."
145 Then thus continued he: "My son, advance
Still in new imprudence, new ignorance.
Success let others teach, learn thou from me
Pangs without birth, and fruitless industry.
Let Virtuosos in five years be writ;
150 Yet not one thought accuse thy toil of wit.[9]
Let gentle George[1] in triumph tread the stage,
Make Dorimant betray, and Loveit rage;
Let Cully, Cockwood, Fopling, charm the pit,
And in their folly show the writer's wit.
155 Yet still thy fools shall stand in thy defense,
And justify their author's want of sense.
Let 'em be all by thy own model made
Of dullness, and desire no foreign aid;
That they to future ages may be known,
160 Not copies drawn, but issue of thy own.
Nay, let thy men of wit too be the same,
All full of thee, and differing but in name.

3. A pastoral tragicomedy by Flecknoe, apparently visualized by Dryden as a rolled-up manuscript held like a scepter. Shadwell's Psyche, a pastoral opera, could be described as the child ("from whose loins") of Love's Kingdom (1644).
4. Connoting both intellectual heaviness and Shadwell's addiction to opiates; a parody of the laurel wreath with which a poet was traditionally crowned as a sign of poetic achievement.
5. Symbols of dullness.
6. When the site ("Tiber's brook") that Romulus had chosen for Rome was visited by twelve vultures, or twice as many as had visited the site picked by his brother Remus, the kingship ("sway") of Romulus was presaged.
7. Locks; in Virgil's Aeneid, Jove, ruler of the gods, shakes his locks. Here and in the following lines, Dryden parodies two epic motifs: the father influencing his son and the Sybil receiving the "raging God" who speaks through her (see Aeneid 6.46–51).
8. I.e., a realm of empty ocean.
9. I.e., even if Shadwell spent five years writing a comedy, it would still lack wit.
1. Sir George Etherege (ca. 1635–1691), playwright who set the tone for stylish Restoration comedy; Dryden proceeds to name five of his characters.

But let no alien S—dl—y[2] interpose,
To lard with wit[3] thy hungry Epsom prose.
165 And when false flowers of rhetoric thou wouldst cull,
Trust nature, do not labor to be dull;
But write thy best, and top; and, in each line,
Sir Formal's[4] oratory will be thine:
Sir Formal, though unsought, attends thy quill,
170 And does thy northern dedications[5] fill.
Nor let false friends seduce thy mind to fame,
By arrogating Jonson's hostile name.
Let father Flecknoe fire thy mind with praise,
And uncle Ogilby thy envy raise.
175 Thou art my blood, where Jonson has no part:
What share have we in nature, or in art?
Where did his wit on learning fix a brand,
And rail at arts he did not understand?[6]
Where made he love in Prince Nicander's vein,
180 Or swept the dust in Psyche's humble strain?[7]
Where sold he bargains,[8] 'whip-stitch, kiss my arse,'
Promised a play and dwindled to a farce?
When did his Muse from Fletcher scenes purloin,° steal
As thou whole Eth'rege dost transfuse to thine?
185 But so transfused, as oil on water's flow,
His always floats above, thine sinks below.
This is thy province, this thy wondrous way,
New humors to invent for each new play:
This is that boasted bias[9] of thy mind,
190 By which one way, to dullness, 'tis inclined;
Which makes thy writings lean on one side still,
And, in all changes, that way bends thy will.
Nor let thy mountain-belly make pretense
Of likeness; thine's a tympany[1] of sense.
195 A tun° of man in thy large bulk is writ, big cask
But sure thou'rt but a kilderkin° of wit. little cask
Like mine, thy gentle numbers° feebly creep; verses
Thy tragic Muse gives smiles, thy comic sleep.
With whate'er gall thou sett'st thyself to write,
200 Thy inoffensive satires never bite.
In thy felonious heart though venom lies,
It does but touch thy Irish pen, and dies.
Thy genius[2] calls thee not to purchase fame

2. Sir Charles Sedley (ca. 1639–1701), Restoration wit who had contributed a prologue and (Dryden suggests in line 184) a part of the text to Shadwell's Epsom Wells.
3. The phrase recalls a sentence in Anatomy of Melancholy (1621), by the English clergyman and scholar Robert Burton (1577–1640): "They lard their lean books with the fat of others' works."
4. Sir Formal Trifle was an inflated orator in The Virtuoso.
5. I.e., to Shadwell's patron the duke of Newcastle, whose seat was in northern England.
6. Perhaps an allusion to the satire on experimental science in The Virtuoso.
7. Nicander pays court to the title character, Psyche, in Shadwell's opera.
8. A "bargain" is a gross rejoinder to an innocent question. The rest of the line, a kind of bargain, echoes a farcical character in The Virtuoso.
9. In bowling, the spin a player puts on the ball to make it swerve. Humors: parodying Shadwell's dedication to The Virtuoso, in which he claims that "four of the humours are entirely new."
1. A swelling caused by air.
2. The tutelary spirit allotted to every person at birth to govern his or her fortunes and determine the individual's character. Dryden terms Shadwell Irish as an insult.

In keen iambics,[3] but mild anagram.[4]
205 Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command
Some peaceful province in acrostic land.
There thou may'st wings display and altars raise,
And torture one poor word ten thousand ways.
Or, if thou wouldst thy different talent suit,
210 Set thy own songs, and sing them to thy lute."
He said: but his last words were scarcely heard
For Bruce and Longville had a trap prepared,
And down they sent the yet declaiming bard.[5]
Sinking he left his drugget° robe behind, coarse
215 Borne upwards by a subterranean wind.
The mantle fell to the young prophet's part,[6]
With double portion of his father's art.

ca. 1676 1682, 1684

To the Memory of Mr. Oldham[7]

Farewell, too little, and too lately known,
Whom I began to think and call my own:
For sure our souls were near allied, and thine
Cast in the same poetic mold with mine.[8]
5 One common note on either lyre did strike,
And knaves and fools we both abhorred alike.
To the same goal did both our studies° drive; endeavors
The last set out the soonest did arrive.
Thus Nisus[9] fell upon the slippery place,
10 While his young friend performed° and won the race. completed
O early ripe! to thy abundant store
What could advancing age have added more?
It might (what nature never gives the young)
Have taught the numbers° of thy native tongue. metrics
15 But satire needs not those, and wit will shine
Through the harsh cadence of a rugged line:
A noble error, and but seldom made,
When poets are by too much force betrayed.

3. The meter of (Greek) satire; hence satire itself.
4. The transposition of letters in a word so as to make a new word; mild: tame, feeble. Dryden scorns this form of ingenuity, and the others that follow, as trivial. An "acrostic" (line 206) is a poem in which the first letter of each line, read downward, makes up the name of the person or thing that is the subject of the poem. "Wings" and "altars" (line 207) refer to poems in the shape of their subjects, such as George Herbert's "The Altar" (p. 367) and "Easter Wings" (p. 368).
5. These characters in The Virtuoso so trap Sir Formal Trifle.
6. When the prophet Elijah was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire borne on a whirlwind, his mantle fell on Elisha, his successor (2 Kings 2.8–14). Flecknoe's "subterranean wind" is a fart, and an allusion to the moment in Paradise Lost where Satan lands on ground seemingly destroyed by "the force / Of subterranean wind" (1.231).
7. John Oldham (1653–1683), author of Satires Upon the Jesuits (1681), was a promising young poet, harsh (partly by calculation) in metrics and manner, but earnest and vigorous. He died of smallpox.
8. Dryden cast horoscopes and had the same birthday as Oldham.
9. A footracer in Virgil's Aeneid, he slipped in a pool of blood. His young friend Euryalus came from behind to reach the goal before him (5.315 ff.).

Thy generous fruits, though gathered ere their prime,
20 Still showed a quickness,° and maturing time — sharpness
But mellows what we write to the dull sweets of rhyme.
Once more, hail and farewell; farewell, thou young,
But ah too short, Marcellus[1] of our tongue;
Thy brows with ivy, and with laurels bound;
25 But fate and gloomy night encompass thee around.[2]

A Song for St. Cecilia's Day[3]

From harmony, from heavenly harmony
This universal frame[4] began:
When Nature[5] underneath a heap
Of jarring atoms lay,
5 And could not heave her head,
The tuneful voice was heard from high:
"Arise, ye more than dead."
Then cold, and hot, and moist, and dry,[6]
In order to their stations leap,
10 And Music's power obey.
From harmony, from heavenly harmony
This universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass° of the notes it ran, — full range
15 The diapason[7] closing full in man.

What passion cannot Music raise and quell!
When Jubal[8] struck the corded shell,
His listening brethren stood around,
And, wondering, on their faces fell
20 To worship that celestial sound.
Less than a god they thought there could not dwell

1. Roman Emperor Augustus Caesar's nephew, who died at twenty after a meteoric military career.
2. The Roman elegiac phrase Hail and farewell! (line 22); the mention of Marcellus (line 23) and of the classical poet's wreath, a symbol of poetic achievement (line 24); and the echo of Virgil's lament for Marcellus (see Aeneid 6.866) work to Romanize Oldham.
3. St. Cecilia, a Roman martyr of the second or third century, was patron saint of music, customarily represented at the organ (cf. line 52). Celebrations of her festival day (November 22) in England were usually devoted to music, and from about 1683 to 1703 the Musical Society in London annually commemorated it with a religious service and a public concert. Dryden's ode was set to music (by the Italian composer Giovanni Battista Draghi) for this occasion in 1687. In 1739, the British (German-born) composer George Frideric Handel composed a new musical setting for the poem.
4. The physical universe.
5. Created nature as distinguished from chaos.
6. The four elements: earth, fire, water, and air.
7. The entire range or scale of tones; representing the perfection of God's harmony in his final creation, humankind. The just gradation of notes in a scale is analogous to the equally just gradation in the ascending scale of created beings according to the idea of the Chain of Being (in which the Creation is ordered from inanimate nature up to humans, God's best and final work).
8. "Father of all such as handle the harp and organ" (Genesis 4.21). The "corded" or stringed tortoise "shell" is a harp or lyre.

Within the hollow of that shell
That spoke so sweetly and so well.
What passion cannot Music raise and quell!

25 The trumpet's loud clangor
Excites us to arms,
With shrill notes of anger,
And mortal alarms.
The double double double beat
30 Of the thundering drum
Cries: "Hark! the foes come;
Charge, charge, 'tis too late to retreat."

The soft complaining flute
In dying notes discovers
35 The woes of hopeless lovers,
Whose dirge is whispered by the warbling lute.

Sharp violins[9] proclaim
Their jealous pangs, and desperation,
Fury, frantic indignation,
40 Depth of pains, and height of passion,
For the fair, disdainful dame.

But O! what art can teach,
What human voice can reach,
The sacred organ's praise?
45 Notes inspiring holy love,
Notes that wing their heavenly ways
To mend the choirs above.[1]

Orpheus could lead the savage race;
And trees unrooted left their place,
50 Sequacious of[2] the lyre;
But bright Cecilia raised the wonder higher:
When to her organ vocal breath[3] was given,
An angel heard, and straight appeared,
Mistaking earth for heaven.

9. A reference to the bright tone of the violin, recently introduced into England. The tone of the old-fashioned viol is much duller.
1. I.e., to improve the music of the angels.
2. Following. According to Greek mythology, Orpheus, son of the Muse Calliope, played so wonderfully on the lyre that wild beasts ("the savage race") grew tame and followed him, as did even rocks and trees.
3. I.e., its ability to sustain notes as the human voice does. According to the legend, however, Cecilia's piety, not her music, made an angel appear.

Grand Chorus

55 As from the power of sacred lays
The spheres began to move,
And sung the great Creator's praise[4]
To all the blest above;
So, when the last and dreadful hour
60 This crumbling pageant[5] shall devour,
The trumpet[6] shall be heard on high,
The dead shall live,[7] the living die,
And Music shall untune the sky.

1687

KATHERINE PHILIPS
1632–1664

Epitaph

On Her Son H. P. at St. Syth's Church Where Her Body Also Lies Interred

What on Earth deserves our trust?
Youth and beauty both are dust.
Long we gathering are with pain,
What one moment calls again.
5 Seven years childless marriage past,
A son, a son is born at last;
So exactly limbed[1] and fair,
Full of good spirits, mien, and air,[2]
As a long life promisèd,
10 Yet, in less than six weeks dead.
Too promising, too great a mind
In so small room to be confined:
Therefore, fit in Heaven to dwell,
He quickly broke the prison shell.
15 So the subtle alchimist,[3]
Can't with Hermes' seal[4] resist
The powerful spirit's subtler flight,

4. As it was harmony that ordered the universe, so it was angelic song ("sacred lays") that put the celestial bodies ("spheres") in motion. The harmonious chord that results from the music of the spheres (in Ptolemaic astronomy, angelic music produced by the turning of the spheres, concentric transparent shells containing the heavenly bodies) is a hymn of "praise" sung by created nature to its "Creator."
5. The universe, the stage on which the drama of human salvation has been acted out. The last and dreadful hour: Judgment Day.
6. The sounding of the last trumpet announces the Resurrection (in which the "dead shall live") and the Last Judgement (1 Corinthians 15.52).
7. I.e., the sounding of the last trumpet will end the harmony of the spheres.
1. I.e., having perfect limbs.
2. Apparent character or disposition. Mien: appearance or expression.
3. Alchemy was the science aiming to achieve the transmutation of baser metals into gold and also to find a panacea or universal remedy.
4. Hermetic seal, the airtight closure of a container, named after Hermes, the Greek messenger god.

But t'will bid him long good night.
So the Sun if it arise
20 Half so glorious as his eyes,
Like this infant, takes a shroud,
Buried in a morning cloud.

To Mr. Henry Lawes[5]

Nature, which is the vast creation's soul,
That steady curious agent[6] in the whole,
The art of Heaven, the order of this frame,
Is only number[7] in another name.
5 For as some king conqu'ring what was his own,
Hath choice of several titles to his crown;
So harmony on this score now, that then,
Yet still is all that takes and governs men.[8]
Beauty is but composure, and we find
10 Content° is but the concord of the mind, contentment
Friendship the unison of well-tuned hearts,
Honor the chorus of the noblest parts,[9]
And all the world on which we can reflect
Music to th'ear, or to the intellect.
15 If then each man a little world must be,[1]
How many worlds are copied out in thee,
Who art so richly formed, so complete
T'epitomize all that is good and great;
Whose stars[2] this brave advantage did impart,
20 Thy nature's as harmonious as thy art?
Thou dost above the poets' praises live,
Who fetch from thee th'eternity they give.

5. A friend of Philips, and a well-known musician and composer, he set to music the words of some of the most prominent poets of his day, including Jonson, Davenant, Waller, Herrick, Carew, Lovelace, Cartwright, and Milton (see "To Mr. H. Lawes, On His Airs," p. 416).

6. The material cause whereby effects are produced. In the Timaeus, Plato gives an account of the generation of the soul of the world in terms of the Pythagorean generation of the consonant intervals in music; in the Somnium Scipionis, Cicero describes the musical creation of the universe in terms of proportional intervals and tones. Many early Christian writers also explained the creation of the world in Pythagorean terms.

7. Music; drawing on Pythagorean ideas, many classical and Neoplatonic writers believed that to understand God, the universe, or humankind, one had to understand numbers and their relationships. Music, based on numerical relationships, spatial measurements of intervals, and metrical measurements of time, afforded one access to the measurements of those things that were intangible or invisible.

8. I.e., just as a king, who has conquered lands that are by rights his, may be called by the title of any of those lands, so harmony, by natural right, may be credited with being both the force that initiates and preserves the order of the natural world ("that then" refers to this topic, mentioned in the first four lines) and that which "takes and governs" the world of human society (as Philips demonstrates in the next four lines, thus "on this score now").

9. In these lines, Philips plays on the musical meanings of words. Composure: collectedness, but also referring to a musical composition. Concord: agreement, but also referring to a combination of notes that is pleasing to the ear. Unison: a sound or note of the same pitch as another. Chorus: both a choir and the song sung by the choir.

1. Perhaps a reference to the Platonic idea that the soul of humankind and the soul of the universe are similarly harmonious, and therefore music may reveal to the human being ("a little world") the divine harmony of the universe, or larger world, in which his or her soul shares.

2. Destiny as determined by astrology.

And as true reason triumphs over sense,
Yet is subjected to intelligence:[3]
25 So poets on the lower world look down,
But Lawes on them; his height is all his own.
For, like Divinity it self, his lyre
Rewards the wit it did at first inspire.[4]
And thus by double right poets allow
30 His and their laurel should adorn his brow.[5]
Live then, great soul of nature, to assuage
The savage dulness of this sullen age.
Charm us to sense; for though experience fail
And reason too,[6] thy numbers° may prevail. songs
35 Then, like those ancients, strike, and so command
All nature to obey thy gen'rous hand.[7]
None will resist but such who needs will be
More stupid° than a stone, a fish, a tree. senseless
Be it thy care our age to new-create:
40 What built a world may sure repair a state.[8]

1667

On the Welsh Language[9]

If honor to an ancient name be due,
Or riches challenge it for one that's new,
The British language[1] claims in either sense
Both for its age, and for its opulence.° wealth
5 But all great things must be from us removed,
To be with higher reverence beloved.
So landskips° which in prospects distant lie, landscapes
With greater wonder draw the pleasèd eye.
Is not great Troy to one dark ruin hurled?
10 Once the fam'd scene of all the fighting world.[2]

3. According to Aristotle, reason governs the lesser faculties of the soul—the physical senses and the appetites they generate. Both reason and sense are subject to intelligence, which Aristotle believed to be the divine element in humans.
4. I.e., his songs "reward" (by setting to music) the poetry originally inspired by his art.
5. The laurel was a symbol of poetic achievement.
6. According to Aristotle, sense experience gives knowledge of the concrete, while reason acts on that knowledge to arrive at an understanding of universal or first principles.
7. Perhaps a reference to Orpheus, famed for singing and playing the lyre, and said to have charmed birds, animals, rocks, and trees with his music. Other "ancients" that Philips may have had in mind: Amphion, who with his music caused stones to build the walls of Thebes, and Arion, whose singing won him the love of dolphins. Strike: here, to play a stringed instrument.
8. Philips is thought to have had Royalist sympathies; therefore this line, along with the reference to "this sullen age" in line 32, may refer to her dissatisfaction with the British government during the Interregnum (1649–60).
9. The Welsh language appears here to mean that language spoken by the earliest settlers of Britain, namely the Britons, or Celts. That language was thought to have survived in Wales, which was a stronghold of resistance against the Romans in the first century and against the Anglo-Saxons in the fourth and fifth centuries. After the defeat of Wales by King Edward I, in the thirteenth century, Welsh cultural identity began to erode, and in 1636, when Wales was officially incorporated into England, Welshmen holding positions in Henry VIII's regime were required to speak English. In the seventeenth century, however, some interest developed among the Welsh in preserving their language. Philips moved with her husband to Cardigan, Wales, when she was seventeen years old, and lived there for twelve years.
1. The language spoken by the ancient Britons.
2. Troy was the site of the legendary Trojan War, in which the Greeks fought with the Trojans to possess Helen. Helen, married to Menelaus, a Greek king, was carried off by Paris, a son of the king of Troy. At the end of the ten-year war, the Greeks defeated the Trojans and destroyed the city.

Where's Athens now, to whom Rome learning owes,
And the safe laurels that adorned her brows?[3]
A strange reverse of fate she did endure,
Never once greater, than she's now obscure.
15 Even Rome her self can but some footsteps show
Of Scipio's times, or those of Cicero.[4]
And as the Roman and the Grecian state,
The British fell,[5] the spoil of time and fate.
But though the language hath the beauty lost,
20 Yet she has still some great remains to boast.
For 'twas in that,[6] the sacred bards of old,
In deathless numbers° did their thoughts unfold. poetry
In groves, by rivers, and on fertile plains,
They civilized and taught the listening swains;° rustics
25 Whilst with high raptures, and as great success,
Virtue they clothed in music's charming dress.
This Merlin spoke, who in his gloomy cave,
Even Destiny her self seemed to enslave.
For to his sight the future time was known,
30 Much better than to others is their own;
And with such state, predictions from him fell,
As if he did decree, and not foretell.
This spoke King Arthur,[7] who, if fame be true,
Could have compelled mankind to speak it too.
35 In this once Boadicca[8] valor taught,
And spoke more nobly than her soldiers fought:
Tell me what hero could be more than she,
Who fell at once for fame and liberty?
Nor could a greater sacrifice belong,
40 Or° to her children's, or her country's wrong. either
This spoke Caractacus,[9] who was so brave,
That to the Roman fortune check he gave:
And when their yoke he could decline no more,
He it so decently and nobly wore,
45 That Rome her self with blushes did believe,
A Britain° would the law of honor[1] give; a Briton, British person

3. Athens was the Greek city that became the cultural, military, and economic center of an extensive empire (during the sixth and fifth centuries B.C.E.) In 86 B.C.E., the city was taken over by the Romans, who adopted and imitated Greek culture and learning. Laurel wreaths, sometimes worn on the head, were symbols of both poetic and military achievement.
4. Marcus Tullius Cicero (106–43 B.C.E.), a Roman statesman and orator who was executed on the order of Marc Antony after the assassination of Julius Caesar. There were two "Scipios": Scipio the Great, or Publius Cornelius Scipio (236–184 or 183 B.C.E.), a Roman general and statesman who distinguished himself in the Punic Wars; and Aemilianus Numantinus (185 or 184–129 B.C.E.), who was represented by Cicero as the ideal of wise statesmanship.
5. A reference to the Roman conquest of the British Isles. By 78 C.E, Wales had been brought under Roman control, but its language survived.
6. I.e., the Welsh language, also the referent of "this" in lines 27, 33, 35, and 41.
7. A legendary king of Britain, who, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniae, defeated a Roman army but was mortally wounded in battle during a rebellion at home by his nephew, Mordred. Chrétien de Troyes added to the legend of King Arthur in the late twelfth century, as did Thomas Malory in his Le Morte Darthur, written in the fifteenth century. Merlin, a magician who could foresee the future, served both Arthur and his father, Uther Pendragon.
8. A British queen who led a revolt against the Romans but was finally defeated in 61 C.E.
9. A king of Silures, in the west of Britain, during the reign of Claudius, Caractacus (or Caraduc) was defeated by the Romans and taken as a prisoner to Rome in 51 C.E. The Roman emperor was so impressed by his noble spirit that he pardoned and released him.
1. Perhaps a reference to the agreement between the Roman emperor and Caractacus that the latter, if pardoned, would not engage in armed resistance against the Romans.

And hastily his chains away she threw,
Lest her own captive else should her subdue.

To My Excellent Lucasia, on Our Friendship[2]

I did not live until this time
  Crowned my felicity,
When I could say without a crime,[3]
  I am not thine, but thee.

5 This carcass breathed, and walked, and slept,
  So that the world believed
There was a soul the motions kept;[4]
  But they were all deceived.

For as a watch by art[5] is wound
10 To motion, such was mine:
But never had Orinda[6] found
  A soul till she found thine;

Which now inspires, cures and supplies,
  And guides my darkened breast:
15 For thou art all that I can prize,
  My joy, my life, my rest.

No bridegroom's nor crown-conqueror's mirth
  To mine compared can be:
They have but pieces of the earth,
20 I've all the world in thee.

Then let our flames still light and shine,
  And no false fear control,
As innocent as our design,
  Immortal as our soul.

2. In her poems on the theme of friendship, Philips frequently employs the terminology and imagery of love poems. The addressee of this poem is Mrs. Anne Owens, whom Philips calls "Lucasia," a name taken from William Cartwright's play The Lady Errant (1636).
3. This line recalls a famous and disputed phrase in line 19 of Ovid's Heroides 15, a verse letter in which Ovid imagines the Greek poet Sappho addressing a male beloved, Phaon, and mentioning the many women she previously loved "without crime" (sine crimine). Some Renaissance editors emended Ovid's line to "not without crime." Same-sex love was a legally and culturally debated topic in the seventeenth century.
4. I.e., that guided the body's movements.
5. I.e., by artificial means.
6. Philips's name for herself.

THOMAS TRAHERNE*
1637–1674

The Salutation

These little limbs,
These eyes and hands which here I find,
These rosy cheeks wherewith my life begins,
Where have ye been? behind
5 What curtain were ye from me hid so long?
Where was, in what abyss, my speaking tongue?

When silent I
So many thousand, thousand years
Beneath the dust did in a chaos lie,
10 How could I smiles or tears,
Or lips or hands or eyes or ears perceive?
Welcome ye treasures which I now receive.

I that so long
Was nothing from eternity,
15 Did little think such joys as ear or tongue
To celebrate or see:
Such sounds to hear, such hands to feel, such feet,
Beneath the skies on such a ground to meet.

New burnished joys,
20 Which yellow gold and pearls excel!
Such sacred treasures are the limbs in boys,
In which a soul doth dwell;
Their organizèd joints and azure veins
More wealth include than all the world contains.

25 From dust I rise,
And out of nothing now awake;
These brighter regions which salute mine eyes,
A gift from God I take.
The earth, the seas, the light, the day, the skies,
30 The sun and stars are mine if those I prize.

Long time before
I in my mother's womb was born,
A God, preparing, did this glorious store,
The world, for me adorn.
35 Into this Eden so divine and fair,
So wide and bright, I come His son and heir.

*Traherne's poems were discovered in 1903 by the scholar Bertram Dobell, who found an anonymous manuscript and attributed it to Traherne after comparing it with the one work that Traherne published in his lifetime, an anti-Catholic prose tract called Roman Forgeries (1673). Traherne's poems do not appear to have circulated widely (if at all) during his lifetime.

A stranger here
Strange things doth meet, strange glories see;
Strange treasures lodged in this fair world appear,
40 Strange all and new to me;
But that they mine should be, who nothing was,
That strangest is of all, yet brought to pass.

ca. 1665 1903

Wonder

How like an angel came I down!
How bright are all things here!
When first among his works I did appear
Oh, how their glory me did crown!
5 The world resembled his eternity,
In which my soul did walk;
And everything that I did see
Did with me talk.

The skies in their magnificence,
10 The lively, lovely air,
Oh, how divine, how soft, how sweet, how fair!
The stars did entertain my sense,
And all the works of God, so bright and pure,
So rich and great did seem,
15 As if they ever must endure
In my esteem.

A native health and innocence
Within my bones did grow;
And while my God did all his glories show,
20 I felt a vigor in my sense
That was all Spirit. I within did flow
With seas of life, like wine;
I nothing in the world did know
But° 'twas divine. except that

25 Harsh ragged objects were concealed;
Oppressions, tears, and cries,
Sins, griefs, complaints, dissensions, weeping eyes
Were hid, and only things revealed
Which heavenly spirits and the angels prize.
30 The state of innocence
And bliss, not trades° and poverties, goods
Did fill my sense.

The streets were paved with golden stones,
The boys and girls were mine,
35 Oh, how did all their lovely faces shine!

The sons of men were holy ones,
In joy and beauty they appeared to me,
And everything I found,
While like an angel I did see,
40 Adorned the ground.

Rich diamond and pearl and gold
In every place was seen;
Rare splendors, yellow, blue, red, white, and green,
Mine eyes did everywhere behold.
45 Great wonders clothed with glory did appear,
Amazement was my bliss,
That and my wealth met everywhere;
No joy to° this! compared to

Cursed and devised proprieties,[1]
50 With envy, avarice,
And fraud, those fiends that spoil even paradise,
Flew from the splendor of mine eyes;
And so did hedges, ditches, limits, bounds:
I dreamed not aught of those,
55 But wandered over all men's grounds,
And found repose.

Proprieties themselves were mine,
And hedges ornaments;
Walls, boxes, coffers, and their rich contents
60 To make me rich combine.
Clothes, ribbons, jewels, laces, I esteemed
My joys by others worn:
For me they all to wear them seemed
When I was born.

ca. 1665 1903

To the Same Purpose

To the same purpose: he, not long before
Brought home from nurse, going to the door
To do some little thing
He must not do within,
5 With wonder cries,
As in the skies
He saw the moon, "O yonder is the moon,
Newly come after me to town,
That shined at Lugwardin[2] but yesternight,
10 Where I enjoyed the self-same sight."

1. Properties, including both private property and the self.

2. A town in south-central England on the Lugg River.

As if it had ev'n twenty thousand faces,
It shines at once in many places;
To all the earth so wide
God doth the stars divide,
15 With so much art
The moon impart,
They serve us all; serve wholly every one
As if they servèd him alone.
While every single person hath such store,
20 'Tis want of sense that makes us poor.

Shadows in the Water

In unexperienced° infancy — inexperienced
Many a sweet mistake doth lie:
Mistake though false, intending° true; — directing to
A seeming somewhat more than view;[3]
5 That doth instruct the mind
In things that lie behind,
And many secrets to us show
Which afterwards we come to know.

Thus did I by the water's brink
10 Another world beneath me think;
And while the lofty spacious skies
Reversèd there, abused mine eyes,
I fancied other feet
Came mine to touch or meet;
15 As by some puddle I did play
Another world within it lay.

Beneath the water people drowned,
Yet with another heaven crowned,
In spacious regions seemed to go
20 As freely moving to and fro:
In bright and open space
I saw their very face;
Eyes, hands, and feet they had like mine;
Another sun did with them shine.

25 'Twas strange that people there should walk,
And yet I could not hear them talk:
That through a little watery chink,
Which one dry ox or horse might drink,
We other worlds should see,
30 Yet not admitted be;

3. I.e., an outward appearance ("seeming") that suggests more than what is visible to the eye.

And other confines there behold
Of light and darkness, heat and cold.

I called them oft, but called in vain;
No speeches we could entertain:
35 Yet did I there expect to find
Some other world, to please my mind.
I plainly saw by these
A new antipodes,[4]
Whom, though they were so plainly seen,
40 A film kept off that stood between.

By walking men's reversèd feet
I chanced another world to meet;
Though it did not to view exceed
A phantom, 'tis a world indeed,
45 Where skies beneath us shine,
And earth by art divine
Another face presents below,
Where people's feet against ours go.

Within the regions of the air,
50 Compassed about with heavens fair,
Great tracts of land there may be found
Enriched with fields and fertile ground;
Where many numerous hosts
In those far distant coasts,
55 For other great and glorious ends
Inhabit, my yet unknown friends.

O ye that stand upon the brink,
Whom I so near me through the chink
With wonder see: what faces there,
60 Whose feet, whose bodies, do ye wear?
I my companions see
In you, another me.
They seemèd others, but are we;
Our second selves these shadows be.

65 Look how far off those lower skies
Extend themselves! scarce with mine eyes
I can them reach. O ye my friends,
What secret borders on those ends?
Are lofty heavens hurled
70 'Bout your inferior world?
Are yet the representatives
Of other peoples' distant lives?

Of all the playmates which I knew
That here I do the image view
75 In other selves, what can it mean?

4. People living at a diametrically opposite point on the globe (literally, "with the feet opposite").

But that below the purling° stream — swirling; murmuring
Some unknown joys there be
Laid up in store for me;
To which I shall, when that thin skin
80 Is broken, be admitted in.

EDWARD TAYLOR

ca. 1642–1729

Meditation 8[1]

I kenning[2] through astronomy divine
The world's bright battlement,° wherein I spy — heavens
A golden path my pencil cannot line,
From that bright throne unto my threshold lie.
5 And while my puzzled thoughts about it pore
I find the bread of life in it at my door.

When that this bird of paradise[3] put in
This wicker cage (my corpse)[4] to tweedle° praise — sing
Had pecked the fruit forbad,[5] and so did fling
10 Away its food, and lost its golden days,
It fell into celestial famine sore,
And never could attain a morsel more.

Alas! alas! Poor bird, what wilt thou do?
The creatures' field no food for souls e'er gave.
15 And if thou knock at angels' doors they show
An empty barrel; they no soul bread have.
Alas! Poor bird, the world's white loaf[6] is done,
And cannot yield thee here the smallest crumb.

In this sad state, God's tender bowels[7] run
20 Out streams of grace; and he to end all strife
The purest wheat in heaven, his dear, dear son
Grinds, and kneads up into this bread of life.
Which bread of life from heaven down came and stands
Dished on my table up by angels' hands.

1. Based on the words of Christ in John 6.51: "I am the living bread that came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."
2. Here, an adjective describing the speaker as "learning," through divine astronomy, how the universe is constructed; as a noun, "kenning" signifies the distance bounding the range of ordinary vision. A kenning-glass is a small telescope.
3. I.e., the soul.
4. In this context, the living body, with an emphasis on its mortality.
5. A reference to the sin of Adam and Eve, who ate the fruit that God had forbidden them (Genesis 2.17).
6. A reference to God's gift to the Israelites, the manna "like coriander seed, white" (Exodus 16.31).
7. I.e., God's powers of mercy and compassion.

25 Did God mould up this bread in heaven, and bake,
Which from his table came, and to thine goeth?
Doth he bespeak thee thus: This soul bread take;
Come eat thy fill of this thy God's white loaf?
It's food too fine for angels, yet come, take 30 And eat thy fill: it's heaven's sugar cake.

What grace is this knead° in this loaf? This thing — kneaded
Souls are but petty things it to admire.
Ye angels, help. This fill would to the brim
Heaven's whelmed-down[8] crystal meal bowl, yea and higher,
35 This bread of life dropped in thy mouth, doth cry:
Eat, eat me, soul, and thou shalt never die.

1684 — 1937

Upon Wedlock, and Death of Children[9]

A curious knot[1] God made in paradise,
And drew it out enameled° neatly fresh. — variously colored
It was the truelove knot, more sweet than spice
And set with all the flowers of grace's dress.
5 Its wedding knot, that ne'er can be untied;
No Alexander's sword can it divide.[2]

The slips° here planted, gay and glorious grow, — sprigs
Unless an hellish breath do singe their plumes.
Here primrose, cowslips, roses, lilies blow° — bloom
10 With violets and pinks that void° perfumes: — give off, exude
Whose beauteous leaves o'er laid with honey-dew,
And chanting birds chirp out sweet music true.

When in this knot I planted was, my stock[3]
Soon knotted, and a manly flower out brake.
15 And after it my branch again did knot;
Brought out another flower its sweet breathed mate.
One knot gave one t'other the t'other's place;
Whence chuckling smiles fought in each other's face.

But oh! a glorious hand from glory came
20 Guarded with angels, soon did crop this flower
Which almost tore the root up of the same

8. Turned over upon something so as to cover it.
9. Taylor had fourteen children; this poem appears to allude to his first four children: two daughters who died in childhood and two sons who lived to maturity.
1. In this poem, Taylor plays on several meanings of the word "knot," including the marriage bond; an intricately laid out flower bed; the base of a woody branch enclosed in the stem from which it arises; figuratively, something intricate, involved, or difficult to trace out or explain; as a verb, of plants: to bud, to begin to develop fruit.
2. In Greek mythology, Gordius, king of Phrygia, devised a complicated knot to be undone only by the person who was to rule Asia; Alexander the Great cut the knot with a blow of his sword. Jesus said, concerning marriage, "what, therefore, God hath joined together, let not man put asunder" (Matthew 19.6).
3. Stem, as in cuttings used for grafting; but also genealogical tree.

At that unlooked for, dolesome, darksome hour.
In prayer to Christ perfumed it did ascend,
And angels bright did it to heaven tend.

25 But pausing on't, this sweet[4] perfumed my thought,
Christ would in glory have a flower, choice, prime,
And having choice, chose this my branch forth brought.
Lord take't. I thank thee, thou takest aught° of mine, nothing
It is my pledge in glory; part of me
30 Is now in it, Lord, glorified with thee.

But praying o'er my branch, my branch did sprout
And bore another manly flower, and gay;
And after that another, sweet, brake out,
The which the former hand soon got° away. took 35 But oh! the tortures, vomit, screechings, groans,
And six weeks fever would pierce hearts like stones.

Grief o'er doth flow, and nature fault would find
Were not thy will, my spell charm, joy, and gem;
That as I said, I say, take, Lord, they're thine.
40 I piecemeal pass to glory bright in them.
I joy, may I sweet flowers for glory breed,
Whether thou getst them green, or let them seed.

Upon a Spider Catching a Fly

Thou sorrow, venom elf:
Is this thy ploy,
To spin a web out of thyself
To catch a fly?
5 For why?

I saw a pettish° wasp peevish, petulant
Fall foul therein,
Whom yet thy whorl-pins[5] did not clasp
Lest he should fling
10 His sting.

But as afraid, remote
Didst stand hereat
And with thy little fingers stroke
And gently tap
15 His back.

4. I.e., this sweet thought or idea.
5. Technically, the pin that attaches the spindle of a spinning wheel to the whorl, the flywheel on the spindle that regulates speed. Here, the spider's legs.

Thus gently him didst treat
  Lest he should pet,° take offense
And in a froppish,° waspish heat fretful
  Should greatly fret
20   Thy net.

Whereas the silly fly,
  Caught by its leg
Thou by the throat tookst hastily
  And hind° the head behind
25   Bite dead.

This goes to pot, that not[;][6]
  Nature doth call.
Strive not above what strength hath got
  Lest in the brawl
30   Thou fall.

This fray seems thus to us.
  Hell's spider gets
His entrails spun to whip-cords[7] thus,
  And wove to nets
35   And sets.

To tangle Adam's race
  In's° strategems in his
To their destructions, spoiled, made base
  By venom things,
40   Damned sins.

But mighty, gracious Lord
  Communicate
Thy grace to break the cord, afford
  Us glory's gate
45   And state.

We'll nightingale sing like
  When perched on high
In glory's cage, thy glory, bright,
  And thankfully,
50   For joy.

ca. 1680–82 1939

6. An enigmatic statement, especially because the manuscript supplies no punctuation between "not" and "Nature." If punctuation is supplied editorially, one can paraphrase, "This (i.e., the fly) deteriorates, that (i.e., the spider) does not, according to the law ('call') of nature." Another possible meaning: "this goes to show ('pot' as an old form of 'put,' as in put forward for consideration) that what is 'not nature' (i.e., the hellish spider) compels or calls."

7. Strong cord or binding, like that made of hemp or catgut.

Housewifery

Make me, O Lord, thy spinning wheel complete.[8]
  Thy holy word my distaff make for me.
Make mine affections thy swift flyers neat,
  And make my soul thy holy spool to be.
5 My conversation make to be thy reel,
  And reel the yarn thereon spun on thy wheel.

Make me thy loom then, knit therein this twine;
  And make thy holy spirit, Lord, wind quills.[9]
Then weave the web thyself. The yarn is fine.
10 Thine ordinances make my fulling mills.[1]
  Then dye the same in heavenly colors choice,
  All pinked° with varnished° flowers of paradise. ornamented / luminous

Then clothe therewith mine understanding, will,
  Affections, judgment, conscience, memory,
15 My words, and actions, that their shine may fill
  My ways with glory and thee glorify.
  Then mine apparel shall display before ye
  That I am clothed in holy robes for glory.

APHRA BEHN

1640?–1689

Song

Love Armed[1]

Love in fantastic triumph[2] sat,
Whilst bleeding hearts a round him flowed,
For whom fresh pains he did create,
And strange tyrannic power he showed;

8. In the first stanza, parts of the spinning wheel specified are: the "distaff," which holds the material to be spun; "flyers," which twist the thread as it conducts it to and winds it upon the bobbin; "spool," on which the thread is wound as it is spun; "reel," which receives the finished thread.

9. "Quills" are the spools of a looming machine.

1. In the "fulling mills," the cloth is "fulled," or milled, by being pressed between rollers and cleansed with soap or fuller's earth.

1. This lyric, one of Behn's most popular, was first published at the beginning of her play Abdelazar, or the Moor's Revenge. The song arouses the heroic villain Abdelazar to action and seems initially to describe the emotional condition of the queen who illicitly loves him—and whom he secretly scorns. The song ironically foreshadows the Moor's own fate of suffering from unrequited love.

2. A formal celebration of conquest in which the defeated party in a war was, according to Roman tradition, paraded through the streets as a trophy of victory; a popular Renaissance masque (a court entertainment that included dancing, song, drama, and spectacle) was the Triumph of Cupid, in which the Roman god of erotic love displays his spoils; the scene in this poem is reminiscent of the masque of Cupid depicted in Edmund Spenser's The Faerie Queene, in which Amoret appears carrying her own heart, steeped in blood, "in silver basin layd, / Quite through transfixèd with a deadly dart" (3.12.21.2–3). Cf. also Mary Wroth, Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, sonnet 1 (p. 347).

5 From thy bright eyes he took his fire,
Which round about, in sport he hurled;
But 'twas from mine he took desire,
Enough to undo the amorous world.

From me he took his sighs and tears,
10 From thee his pride and cruelty;
From me his languishments and fears,
And every killing dart from thee;
Thus thou and I, the God have armed,
And set him up a deity;
15 But my poor heart alone is harmed,
Whilst thine the victor is, and free.

1677

The Disappointment[3]

I

One day the amorous Lysander,[4]
By an impatient passion swayed,
Surprised fair Cloris,[5] that lovèd maid,
Who could defend her self no longer.
5 All things did with his love conspire;
The gilded planet of the day,[6]
In his gay chariot drawn by fire,
Was now descending to the sea,
And left no light to guide the world,
10 But what from Cloris' brighter eyes was hurled.

II

In a lone thicket made for love,
Silent as yielding maids' consent,
She with a charming languishment,
Permits his force, yet gently strove;° struggled
15 Her hands his bosom softly meet,
But not to put him back designed,
Rather to draw 'em on inclined;
Whilst he lay trembling at her feet,
Resistance 'tis in vain to show;
20 She wants° the power to say—Ah! What d'ye do?[7] lacks

3. A free translation of parts of a French poem about impotence by Jean Benech de Cantenac (ca. 1630–1714), Behn's poem, like others on this topic, harks back to Ovid's Amores 3.7. Her poem was originally attributed to John Wilmot, earl of Rochester, but her speaker adopts a distinctly different perspective on impotence than Rochester's speaker does in "The Imperfect Enjoyment" (p. 551).

4. A conventional name for a male lover in pastoral poetry.

5. A conventional name for a young woman in pastoral poetry.

6. I.e., the sun; according to myth, the god Apollo drove his chariot, the sun, across the sky daily.

7. The question of whether an alleged victim of rape had "shown resistance" by crying out was important in English trials for rape.

III

Her bright eyes sweet, and yet severe,
Where love and shame confusedly strive,
Fresh vigor to Lysander give;
And breathing faintly in his ear,
25 She cried—Cease, cease—your vain desire,
Or I'll call out—What would you do?
My dearer honor ev'n to you
I cannot, must not give—retire,
Or take this life, whose chiefest part
30 I gave you with the conquest of my heart.

IV

But he as much unused to fear,
As he was capable of love,
The blessèd minutes to improve,° employ to advantage
Kisses her mouth, her neck, her hair;
35 Each touch her new desire alarms,
His burning trembling hand he prest
Upon her swelling snowy brest,
While she lay panting in his arms.
All her unguarded beauties lie
40 The spoils and trophies of the enemy.

V

And now without respect or fear,
He seeks the object of his vows,
(His love no modesty allows)
By swift degrees advancing—where
45 His daring hand that altar seized,
Where gods of love do sacrifice:
That awful[8] throne, that paradise
Where rage is calmed, and anger pleased;
That fountain where delight still flows,
50 And gives the universal world repose.

VI

Her balmy lips encount'ring his,
Their bodies, as their souls, are joined;
Where both in transports unconfined
Extend themselves upon the moss.
55 Cloris half dead and breathless lay;
Her soft eyes cast a humid light,
Such as divides the day and night;
Or falling stars, whose fires decay:
And now no signs of life she shows,
60 But what in short-breathed sighs returns and goes.

8. Awe-inspiring; the word has the sense both of "causing dread" and of "commanding profound respect or reverential fear."

VII

He saw how at her length she lay;
He saw her rising bosom bare;
Her loose thin robes, through which appear
A shape designed for love and play;
65 Abandoned by her pride and shame,
She does her softest joys dispense,
Off'ring her virgin-innocence
A victim to love's sacred flame;
While the o'er-ravished shepherd lies
70 Unable to perform the sacrifice.

VIII

Ready to taste a thousand joys,
The too transported hapless swain° rustic fellow
Found the vast pleasure turned to pain;
Pleasure which too much love destroys:
75 The willing garments by he laid,
And heaven all opened to his view,
Mad to possess, himself he threw
On the defenseless lovely maid.
But Oh what envying gods conspire
80 To snatch his power, yet leave him the desire!

IX

Nature's support, (without whose aid
She can no human being give)[9]
It self now wants° the art° to live; lacks / capacity
Faintness its slackened nerves invade:
85 In vain th' enragèd youth essayed° tried
To call its fleeting vigor back,
No motion 'twill from motion take;
Excess of love his love betrayed;
In vain he toils, in vain commands;
90 The insensible[1] fell weeping in his hand.

X

In this so amorous cruel strife,
Where love and fate were too severe,
The poor Lysander in despair
Renounced his reason with his life:
95 Now all the brisk and active fire
That should the nobler part inflame,
Served to increase his rage and shame,
And left no spark for new desire:
Not all her naked charms could move
100 Or calm that rage that had debauched his love.

9. I.e., the aid of "Nature's support," without which Nature ("she") cannot give life ("being") to any human.
1. Lacking feeling; also, too small to be noticed.

XI

Cloris returning from the trance
Which love and soft desire had bred,
Her timorous hand she gently laid
(Or° guided by design or chance) whether
105 Upon that fabulous Priapus,[2]
That potent god, as poets feign;
But never did young shepherdess,
Gath'ring of fern upon the plain,
More nimbly draw her fingers back,
110 Finding beneath the verdant leaves a snake;

XII

Than Cloris her fair hand withdrew,
Finding that god of her desires
Disarmed of all his awful fires,
And cold as flowers bathed in the morning dew.
115 Who can the Nymph's confusion guess?
The blood forsook the hinder place,
And strewed with blushes all her face,
Which both disdain and shame expressed:
And from Lysander's arms she fled,
120 Leaving him fainting on the gloomy bed.

XIII

Like lightning through the grove she hies,
Or Daphne from the Delphic God,[3]
No print upon the grassy road
She leaves, t' instruct pursuing eyes.
125 The wind that wantoned in her hair,
And with her ruffled garments played,
Discovered in the flying maid
All that the gods e'er made, if fair.
So Venus, when her love was slain,
130 With fear and haste flew o'er the fatal plain.[4]

XIV

The Nymph's resentments none but I
Can well imagine or condole:
But none can guess Lysander's soul,
But° those who swayed his destiny. except
135 His silent griefs swell up to storms,
And not one god his fury spares;

2. A god of fertility often represented with grotesquely enlarged genitals; here, a euphemism for penis.
3. The nymph Daphne spurned the advances of Apollo ("the Delphic God"), whose oracle was at Delphi. Fleeing from him, she begged assistance from her father, a river god, and was turned into a laurel.
4. Adonis, the beloved of Venus, goddess of love, was killed by a wild boar during a hunt. Venus rushed to his side, but was unable to save him.

He cursed his birth, his fate, his stars;
But more the shepherdess's charms,
Whose soft bewitching influence
140 Had damn'd him to the hell of impotence.

Song

On Her Loving Two Equally[5]

SET BY CAPTAIN PACK[6]

I

How strongly does my passion flow,
Divided equally 'twixt two?
Damon had ne'er subdu'd my heart,
Had not Alexis took his part;
5 Nor cou'd Alexis pow'rful prove,
Without my Damon's aid, to gain my love.

II

When my Alexis present is,
Then I for Damon sigh and mourn;
But when Alexis I do miss,
10 Damon gains nothing but my scorn.
But if it chance they both are by,
For both alike I languish, sigh, and die.

III

Cure then, thou mighty winged god,[7]
This restless fever in my blood;
15 One golden-pointed dart take back:
But which, O Cupid, wilt thou take?
If Damon's, all my hopes are crost;
Or that of my Alexis, I am lost.

1684

5. This poem first appeared as "How Strangely Does My Passion Grow" in Behn's play The False Count (1682). This version of the poem was first printed in Behn's volume Poems on Several Occasions (1684).

6. Simon Pack (1654–1701), an amateur musician who achieved some fame as a composer of songs for plays.

7. Cupid, Roman god of erotic love.

On the Death of the Late Earl of Rochester[8]

Mourn, mourn, ye Muses,[9] all your loss deplore,
The young, the noble Strephon[1] is no more.
Yes, yes, he fled quick as departing light,
And ne'er shall rise from Death's eternal night,
5 So rich a prize the Stygian[2] gods ne'er bore,
Such wit, such beauty, never graced their shore.
He was but lent this duller world t' improve
In all the charms of poetry, and love;
Both were his gift, which freely he bestowed,
10 And like a god, dealt to the wond'ring crowd.
Scorning the little vanity of fame,
Spight° of himself attained a glorious name. in spite
But oh! in vain was all his peevish[3] pride,
The sun as soon might his vast luster hide,
15 As piercing, pointed, and more lasting bright,
As suffering no vicissitudes[4] of night.
Mourn, mourn, ye Muses, all your loss deplore,
The young, the noble Strephon is no more.
Now uninspired upon your banks[5] we lie,
20 Unless when we would mourn his elegy;[6]
His name's a genius[7] that would wit dispense,
And give the theme a soul, the words a sense.
But all fine thought that ravisht° when it spoke, enraptured
With the soft youth eternal leave has took;
25 Uncommon wit that did the soul o'ercome,
Is buried all in Strephon's worshipped tomb;
Satire has lost its art, its sting is gone,
The Fop and Cully[8] now may be undone;
That dear instructing rage is now allayed,° laid down
30 And no sharp pen dares tell 'em how they've strayed;
Bold as a god was ev'ry lash he took,
But kind and gentle the chastizing stroke.
Mourn, mourn, ye youths, whom fortune has betrayed,
The last reproacher of your vice is dead.

8. This poem eulogizes John Wilmot, the second earl of Rochester (1647–1680; see pp. 549–53), a lyric poet, satirist, and leading member of the "wits" at the court of King Charles II. Rochester lived a fashionable life in London, reputedly had several mistresses, and, according to Samuel Johnson, "blazed out his youth and health in lavish voluptuousness."
9. The nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be the sources of inspiration for the arts.
1. A conventional name for a pastoral lover.
2. Infernal; Styx was one of the rivers of the underworld, over which Charon ferried the shades of the dead.
3. Obstinate; "peevish" can also be an epithet of disparagement expressing the speaker's feeling toward, rather than a quality of, the object referred to.
4. Changes, mutations; particularly an alternation of opposite or contrasting things or conditions.
5. According to mythology, the Muses sang on the banks of the Hippocrene spring, on Mt. Helicon.
6. A funeral song or lament; here, a sorrowful utterance.
7. A spirit with the capacity to influence or inspire the character, conduct, or fortunes of a person.
8. The fool and dupe (one easily taken in); these types were frequent objects of satire in Restoration literature.

35 Mourn, all ye beauties, put your Cyprus[9] on,
The truest swain[1] that e're adored you's gone;
Think how he loved, and writ, and sighed, and spoke,
Recall his mien,° his fashion, and his look. bearing, manner
By what dear arts the soul he did surprise,
40 Soft as his voice, and charming as his eyes.
Bring garlands all of never-dying flowers,
Bedewed with everlasting falling showers;
Fix your fair eyes upon your victimed slave,
Sent gay and young to his untimely grave.
45 See where the noble swain extended lies,
Too sad a triumph of your victories;[2]
Adorned with all the graces Heaven e'er lent,
All that was great, soft, lovely, excellent
You've laid into his early monument.
50 Mourn, mourn, ye beauties, your sad loss deplore,
The young, the charming Strephon is no more.

Mourn, all ye little gods of love,[3] whose darts
Have lost their wonted° power of piercing hearts; usual
Lay by the gilded quiver and the bow,
55 The useless toys can do no mischief now,
Those eyes that all your arrows' points inspired,
Those lights[4] that gave ye fire are now retired,
Cold as his tomb, pale as your mother's doves;[5]
Bewail him then oh all ye little loves,
60 For you the humblest votary° have lost devoted worshiper
That ever your divinities could boast;
Upon your hands your weeping heads decline,
And let your wings encompass round his shrine;
In stead of flowers your broken arrows strow,° scatter about
65 And at his feet lay the neglected bow.
Mourn, all ye little gods, your loss deplore,
The soft, the charming Strephon is no more.

Large was his fame, but short his glorious race,
Like young Lucretius[6] lived and died apace.° quickly
70 So early roses fade, so over all
They cast their fragrant scents, then softly fall,
While all the scattered perfumed leaves declare,
How lovely 'twas when whole, how sweet, how fair.
Had he been to the Roman Empire known,

9. A light, transparent material like lawn or crepe, originally from Cyprus; but also, perhaps, with reference to a branch of the cypress tree, regarded as a symbol of mourning.
1. Lover; but also, shepherd, in keeping with the pastoral references in the poem.
2. Triumph here refers to the defeated party in a war, who was, according to Roman tradition, paraded through the streets as a trophy of victory.
3. Figures of Eros, or Cupid, the god of erotic love, who was often portrayed as a winged child or boy armed with a quiver and bow. His gold-tipped arrows incited his victims to love.
4. I.e., eyes.
5. Venus, Cupid's mother and the goddess of love and beauty, was often depicted attended by doves.
6. A Roman poet of the early first century B.C.E., author of De Rerum Natura ("On the Nature of Things"), the themes of which included the mortality of the soul and the pointlessness of the fear of death; he was said to have committed suicide.

75 When great Augustus[7] filled the peaceful throne;
Had he the noble wond'rous poet seen,[8]
And known his genius, and surveyed his mien,
(When wits, and heroes graced divine abodes),
He had increased the number of their gods;
80 The royal judge[9] had temples rear'd to's° name, to his
And made him as immortal as his fame;
In love and verse his Ovid he'ad[1] out-done,
And all his laurels, and his Julia[2] won.
Mourn, mourn, unhappy world, his loss deplore,
85 The great, the charming Strephon is no more.

1685

To the Fair Clarinda, Who Made Love to Me, Imagined More Than Woman[3]

Fair lovely maid, or if that title be
Too weak, too feminine for nobler thee,
Permit a name that more approaches truth:
And let me call thee, lovely charming youth.[4]
5 This last will justify my soft complaint,[5]
While that may serve to lessen my constraint;
And without blushes I the youth pursue,
When so much beauteous woman is in view.
Against thy charms we struggle but in vain
10 With thy deluding form thou giv'st us pain,
While the bright nymph betrays us to the swain.[6]
In pity to our sex sure thou wert sent,
That we might love, and yet be innocent:
For sure no crime with thee we can commit;
15 Or if we should—thy form excuses it.
For who, that gathers fairest flowers believes
A snake lies hid beneath the fragrant leaves.

Thou beauteous wonder of a different kind,
Soft Cloris with the dear Alexis joined;[7]

7. The first Roman emperor, Augustus ruled from 27 B.C.E. until his death in 14 C.E., a period marked by relative peace, cultural achievement, and civil improvements. Virgil, Horace, and Ovid were among the writers of this period.
8. I.e., if "he," Augustus, had seen Rochester, "the noble wond'rous poet"; this line begins an "if . . . then" construction: if Augustus had known Rochester, then he (Augustus) would have added the English poet to the ranks of the Roman gods, built temples in his honor, and made him immortal.
9. I.e., Augustus.
1. He had, i.e., he would have. Ovid is famous for, among other things, his love poems, including the Amores, purportedly based on his own experiences. Ovid was popular during the Restoration for his wit and sensuality.
2. The daughter of Augustus, thought to have been Ovid's mistress and one cause of his being banished from Rome by Augustus; "his laurels" refers to Ovid's poetic achievement.
3. This final phrase can modify either "Clarinda" or "me," the speaker. Clarinda is a conventional pastoral name.
4. Young man; although "youth" can denote simply a young person, it is used here in opposition to the title of "maid," i.e., young woman, in line 1.
5. A lyric poem in which the speaker bewails the misery caused by his or her absent or unresponsive beloved.
6. The nymph and the swain are conventional characters of pastoral poetry. The nymph is a young, beautiful woman; the swain is a young, male shepherd or rustic.
7. I.e., she combines features of stock male and female pastoral figures.

20 When e'er the manly part of thee, would plead
Thou tempts us with the image of the maid,
While we the noblest passions do extend
The love to Hermes, Aphrodite[8] the friend.

1688

A Thousand Martyrs[9]

A thousand martyrs I have made,
All sacrificed to my desire;
A thousand beauties have betrayed,
That languish in resistless fire.
5 The untamed heart to hand I brought,
And fixed the wild and wandering thought.

I never vowed nor sighed in vain
But both, though false, were well received.
The fair are pleased to give us pain,
10 And what they wish is soon believed.
And though I talked of wounds and smart,
Love's pleasures only touched my heart.

Alone the glory and the spoil
I always laughing bore away;
15 The triumphs, without pain or toil,
Without the hell, the heav'n of joy.
And while I thus at random rove
Despise the fools that whine for love.

1688

JOHN WILMOT, EARL OF ROCHESTER
1647–1680

The Disabled Debauchee

As some brave admiral, in former war
Deprived of force, but pressed with courage still,
Two rival fleets appearing from afar,
Crawls to the top of an adjacent hill;

8. Hermaphroditus was the son of Hermes (Mercury), the messenger god, and Aphrodite (Venus). Bathing in the fountain of the nymph Salmacis, whose love he spurned, he merged with her and became male and female in one body. Behn was described by a contemporary, Daniel Kendricks, as belonging to a "third" sex: "ah, more than woman, more than man she is," he wrote in 1688.

9. This lyric is from Behn's Lycidus: Or the Lover in Fashion, a prose work with verse interspersed that translates Le Second Voyage de l'Isle d'Amour (1664), by the Abbé Paul Tallemant. This song is introduced by the narrator with the line "Take then the history of my heart, which I assure, boasts itself of the conquests it has made."

5 From whence, with thoughts full of concern, he views
The wise and daring conduct of the fight,
Whilst each bold action to his mind renews
His present glory and his past delight;

From his fierce eyes flashes of fire he throws,
10 As from black clouds when lightning breaks away;
Transported, thinks himself amidst the foes,
And absent, yet enjoys the bloody day;

So, when my days of impotence approach,
And I'm by pox[1] and wine's unlucky chance
15 Forced from the pleasing billows of debauch
On the dull shore of lazy temperance,

My pains at least some respite shall afford
While I behold the battles you maintain
When fleets of glasses sail about the board,° table
20 From whose broadsides[2] volleys of wit shall rain.

Nor let the sight of honorable scars,
Which my too forward valor did procure,
Frighten new-listed° soldiers from the wars: newly enlisted
Past joys have more than paid what I endure.

25 Should any youth (worth being drunk) prove nice,° reluctant, fastidious
And from his fair inviter meanly shrink,
'Twill please the ghost of my departed vice
If, at my counsel, he repent and drink.

Or should some cold-complexioned sot° forbid, fool
30 With his dull morals, our bold night-alarms,
I'll fire his blood by telling what I did
When I was strong and able to bear arms.

I'll tell of whores attacked, their lords at home;
Bawds' quarters beaten up,[3] and fortress won;
35 Windows demolished, watches° overcome; watchmen
And handsome ills by my contrivance done.

Nor shall our love-fits, Chloris,[4] be forgot,
When each the well-looked linkboy[5] strove t' enjoy,
And the best kiss was the deciding lot
40 Whether the boy fucked you, or I the boy.

With tales like these I will such thoughts inspire
As to important mischief shall incline:

1. Venereal disease often left extensive scarring.
2. The table's sides; ship's artillery; sheets on which satirical verses were printed.
3. Madams' "houses" aroused, disturbed.
4. A conventional poetic name for a young woman.
5. A boy employed to carry a torch to light the way for people in the streets.

I'll make him long some ancient church to fire,
And fear no lewdness he's called to by wine.

45 Thus, statesmanlike, I'll saucily impose,
And safe from action, valiantly advise;
Sheltered in impotence, urge you to blows,
And being good for nothing else, be wise.

1680

The Imperfect Enjoyment[6]

Naked she lay, clasped in my longing arms,
I filled with love, and she all over charms;
Both equally inspired with eager fire,
Melting through kindness, flaming in desire.
5 With arms, legs, lips close clinging to embrace,
She clips° me to her breast, and sucks me to her face. hugs
Her nimble tongue, love's lesser lightning, played
Within my mouth, and to my thoughts conveyed
Swift orders that I should prepare to throw
10 The all-dissolving thunderbolt below.
My fluttering soul, sprung with the pointed kiss,
Hangs hovering o'er her balmy brinks of bliss.
But whilst her busy hand would guide that part
Which should convey my soul up to her heart,
15 In liquid raptures I dissolve all o'er,
Melt into sperm, and spend at every pore.
A touch from any part of her had done 't:
Her hand, her foot, her very look's a cunt.
Smiling, she chides in a kind murmuring noise,
20 And from her body wipes the clammy joys,
When, with a thousand kisses wandering o'er
My panting bosom, "Is there then no more?"
She cries. "All this to love and rapture's due;
Must we not pay a debt to pleasure too?"
25 But I, the most forlorn, lost man alive,
To show my wished obedience vainly strive:
I sigh, alas! and kiss, but cannot swive.° screw
Eager desires confound my first intent,
Succeeding shame does more success prevent,
30 And rage at last confirms me impotent.
Ev'n her fair hand, which might bid heat return
To frozen age, and make cold hermits burn,
Applied to my dead cinder,[7] warms no more
Than fire to ashes could past flames restore.
35 Trembling, confused, despairing, limber,° dry, slack, limp

6. Like Ovid (Amores 3.7) and several seventeenth-century poets, both French and English, Rochester here explores a scene of erotic failure from the man's point of view. For a similar scenario that includes a "nymph's" point of view, see Aphra Behn, "The Disappointment" (p. 541).
7. Partly burned coal that, unlike ashes, could be reignited and reused a number of times.

A wishing, weak, unmoving lump I lie.
This dart of love, whose piercing point, oft tried,
With virgin blood ten thousand maids has dyed,
Which nature still directed with such art
40 That it through every cunt reached every heart—
Stiffly resolved, 'twould carelessly invade
Woman or man, nor ought° its fury stayed:° anything / kept back
Where'er it pierced, a cunt it found or made—
Now languid lies in this unhappy hour,
45 Shrunk up and sapless like a withered flower.
Thou treacherous, base deserter of my flame,
False to my passion, fatal to my fame,
Through what mistaken magic dost thou prove
So true to lewdness, so untrue to love?
50 What oyster-cinder-beggar-common whore[8]
Didst thou e'er fail in all thy life before?
When vice, disease, and scandal lead the way,
With what officious haste doest thou obey!
Like a rude,° roaring hector° in the streets blustery / bully
55 Who scuffles, cuffs, and justles all he meets,
But if his king or country claim his aid,
The rakehell villain shrinks and hides his head;
Ev'n so thy brutal valor is displayed,
Breaks every strew,[9] does each small whore invade,
60 But when great Love the onset does command,
Base recreant to thy prince, thou dar'st not stand.
Worst part of me, and henceforth hated most,
Through all the town a common fucking post,
On whom each whore relieves her tingling cunt
65 As hogs on gates do rub themselves and grunt,
Mayst thou to ravenous chancres° be a prey, venereal ulcers
Or in consuming weepings waste away;
May strangury and stone[1] they days attend;
May'st thou never piss, who didst refuse to spend
70 When all my joys did on false thee depend.
And may ten thousand abler pricks agree
To do the wronged Corinna right for thee.

The Mock Song[2]

I swive° as well as others do, screw
I'm young, not yet deformed,
My tender heart, sincere, and true,
Deserves not to be scorned.

8. I.e., what oyster-woman, cinder-woman, beggar-woman, or common whore?
9. Enters forcefully every brothel.
1. Usually fatal diseases in men that rendered urination difficult. Weepings: the flow or discharge of humors from the body.
2. This poem is a burlesque of a song probably composed by Rochester's enemy Sir Carr Scroope.

5 Why Phyllis then, why will you swive,
With forty lovers more?
Can I (said she) with Nature strive,
Alas I am, alas I am a whore.

Were all my body larded[3] o'er,
10 With darts of love, so thick,
That you might find in ev'ry pore,
A well stuck standing prick;
Whilst yet my eyes alone were free,
My heart, would never doubt,
15 In am'rous rage, and ecstasy,
To wish those eyes, to wish those eyes fucked out.

A Song of a Young Lady to Her Ancient Lover

Ancient person, for whom I
All the flattering youth defy,
Long be it ere thou grow old,
Aching, shaking, crazy, cold;
5 But still continue as thou art,
Ancient person of my heart.

On thy withered lips and dry,
Which like barren furrows lie,
Brooding kisses I will pour
10 Shall thy youthful [heat][4] restore
(Such kind showers in autumn fall,
And a second spring recall);
Nor from thee will ever part,
Ancient person of my heart.

15 Thy nobler part, which but to name
In our sex would be counted shame,
By age's frozen grasp possessed,
From [his] ice shall be released,
And soothed by my reviving hand,
20 In former warmth and vigor stand.
All a lover's wish can reach
For thy joy my love shall teach,
And for they pleasure shall improve
All that art can add to love.
25 Yet still I love thee without art,
Ancient person of my heart.

3. Smeared with lard, greased.
4. Modern editorial conjecture; the posthumously printed text reads "heart."

ANNE KILLIGREW
1660–1685

Alexandreis[1]

I sing the man that never equal knew,
Whose mighty arms all Asia did subdue,[2]
Whose conquests through the spacious world do ring,
That city-raser,[3] king-destroying king,
5 Who o'er the warlike Macedons did reign,
And worthily the name of Great did gain.
This is the prince (if fame you will believe,
To ancient story any credit give.)
Who when the globe of Earth he had subdued,
10 With tears the easy victory pursued;
Because that no more worlds there were to win,
No further scene to act his glories in.

Ah that some pitying Muse[4] would now inspire
My frozen style with a poetic fire,
15 And raptures worthy of his matchless fame,
Whose deeds I sing, whose never fading name
Long as the world shall fresh and deathless last,
No less to future ages, then° the past. than
Great my presumption is, I must confess,
20 But if I thrive, my glory's ne'er the less;
Nor will it from his conquests derogate° detract
A female pen his acts did celebrate.
If thou O Muse wilt thy assistance give,
Such as made Naso and great Maro[5] live,
25 With him whom Melas'[6] fertile banks did bear,
Live, though their bodies dust and ashes are;
Whose laurels[7] were not fresher, than their fame
Is now, and will for ever be the same.
If the like favor thou wilt grant to me,
30 O Queen of Verse,[8] I'll not ungrateful be,
My choicest hours to thee I'll dedicate,
'Tis thou shalt rule, 'tis thou shalt be my fate.

1. This unfinished poem was an early work of the young poet, who apparently (according to the note, reprinted here, at the end of the poem in the volume of collected works published after her death) felt herself unequal to the task of completing an epic poem about Alexander the Great. Alexander (356–323 B.C.E.), considered one of the greatest military leaders of all time, became king of Macedon in 336 B.C.E. and succeeded during his short life in conquering Egypt and most of Southeast Asia.
2. Cf. the beginning of Virgil's great epic, the Aeneid: "Of arms and the man I sing . . ."
3. One who razes, or obliterates, cities. In 335 B.C.E., Thebes, a Greek state, revolted. Alexander put down the revolt and destroyed the city. In the course of his conquests (of Phoenicia, Egypt, Tyre, Asia Minor, Persia, and the Punjab), Alexander destroyed many kings.
4. The Muses were nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be the sources of inspiration for the arts. The invocation of the Muse, requesting divine aid in the writing of the poem, is an epic convention.
5. Publius Vergilius Maro (70–19 B.C.E.) is the full name of the Roman poet Virgil; Publius Ovidius Naso (43 B.C.E.–17? C.E.) is the full name of the Roman poet Ovid, author of the Metamorphoses.
6. The ancient Greek poet Homer, author of the Iliad and the Odyssey, was said to have been born and lived by the Melas River.
7. The laurel was a symbol of poetic achievement.
8. I.e., the Muse of epic poetry, Calliope.

But if coy goddess thou shalt this deny,
And from my humble suit disdaining fly,
35 I'll stoop and beg no more, since I know this,
Writing of him, I cannot write amiss:
His lofty deeds will raise each feeble line,
And god-like acts will make my verse divine.
'Twas at the time the golden sun doth rise,
40 And with his beams enlights the azure skies,
When lo a troop in silver arms drew near,
The glorious sun did nere° so bright appear; never
Dire[9] scarlet plumes adorned their haughty crests,° helmets
And crescent shields did shade their shining breasts;
45 Down from their shoulders hung a panther's hide,
A bow and quiver rattled by their side;
Their hands a knotty well tried spear did bear,
Jocund° they seemed, and quite devoid of fear. merry
These warlike virgins were, that do reside
50 Near Thermodon's smooth banks[1] and verdant° side, green
The plains of Themiscyre[2] their birth do boast,
Thalestris[3] now did head the beauteous host;
She emulating that illustrious dame,
Who to the aid of Troy and Priam came,[4]
55 And her who the Retulian prince did aid,[5]
Though dearly both for their assistance paid.
But fear she scorned, nor the like fate did dread,
Her host she often to the field had led,
As oft in triumph had returned again,
60 Glory she only sought for all her pain.
This martial queen[6] had heard how loudly fame,
Echoed our conqueror's redoubted° name, respected; dreaded
Her soul his conduct and his courage fired,
To see the hero she so much admired;
65 And to Hyrcania for this cause she went,
Where Alexander (wholly then intent
On triumphs[7] and such military sport)
At truce with war held both his camp and court.
And while before the town she did attend° await
70 Her messengers return, she saw ascend
A cloud of dust, that covered all the sky,
And still at every pause there stroke° her eye. struck
The interrupted beams of burnished gold,

9. Terrible, in the sense of inspiring terror or fear in an onlooker.
1. The Amazons were a tribe of warrior women believed to live on the plain of the Thermodon River, which sprang from the Amazonian Mountains and emptied into the Black Sea.
2. The capital city of the Amazons.
3. A queen of the Amazons who desired to have a daughter sired by Alexander. Legend has it that she consorted with him for thirteen days at Hyrcania, but died shortly after returning to her own country.
4. Penthesilea, an earlier queen of the Amazons, fought in the Trojan War against the Greeks. In most versions of her story, she arrives in Troy after the death of the Trojan hero Hector, with the Trojans all but defeated. She and a small band of Amazons fight valiantly against the Greeks, killing many Greek heroes, before she is killed by Achilles, who is so impressed by her beauty and valor that he laments her death and prevents the Greeks from desecrating her body. Priam was the king of Troy.
5. In the Aeneid, Virgil records the bravery of the warrior queen Camilla, who fought with Turnus, prince of the Rutulians, against Aeneas and the Trojans. She is killed in the battle.
6. I.e., Thalestris.
7. Formal celebrations of conquests.

As dust the splendor hid, or did unfold;
75 Loud neighings of the steeds, and trumpets' sound
Filled all the air, and echoed from the ground:
The gallant Greeks with a brisk march drew near,
And their great chief did at their head appear.
And now come up to th'Amazonian band,
80 They made a halt and a respectful stand:
And both the troops (with like amazement strook°) struck
Did each on other with deep silence look.
Th'heroic queen (whose high pretence° to war aspiration
Cancelled the bashful laws and nicer bar
85 Of modesty,[8] which did her sex restrain)
First boldly did advance before her train,
And thus she spake. All but a god in name,
And that a debt time owes unto thy fame.

This was the first essay° of this young lady in poetry, but finding the task she had undertaken hard, she laid it by till practice and more time should make her equal to so great a work. attempt

ANNE FINCH, COUNTESS OF WINCHILSEA
1661–1720

The Introduction[1]

Did I, my lines intend for public view,
How many censures, would their faults pursue,
Some would, because such words they do affect,
Cry they're insipid, empty, uncorrect.
5 And many have attained, dull and untaught,
The name of wit only by finding fault.
True judges might condemn their want° of wit, lack
And all might say, they're by a woman writ.
Alas! a woman that attempts the pen,
10 Such an intruder on the rights of men,
Such a presumptuous creature, is esteemed,
The fault can by no virtue be redeemed.
They tell us we mistake our sex and way;
Good breeding, fashion, dancing, dressing, play
15 Are the accomplishments we should desire;

8. I.e., the queen's martial aims cancel (or supercede) the laws that usually "restrain" women by requiring them to be bashful and to adhere to the stricter limits ("nicer bar") of modesty.

1. Most critics think this poem was written early in Finch's poetic career, probably as a preface to an imagined book of poems. For reasons explained in the text, Finch did not publish this poem; indeed, many of her works remained in manuscript at her death, or were first printed anonymously. She did, however, allow a collection of poems to be published in 1713. With the exception of "The Introduction," our ordering follows dates of first printing and, for poems first printed in her 1713 book, the order given there.

To write, or read, or think, or to inquire
Would cloud our beauty, and exhaust our time,
And interrupt the conquests of our prime;
Whilst the dull manage of a servile house
20 Is held by some our outmost° art, and use. utmost
Sure 'twas not ever thus, nor are we told
Fables, of women that excelled of old;
To whom, by the diffusive hand of Heaven
Some share of wit, and poetry was given.
25 On that glad day, on which the Ark returned,[2]
The holy pledge, for which the land had mourned,
The joyful tribes, attend it on the way,
The Levites do the sacred charge convey,
Whilst various instruments, before it play;
30 Here, holy virgins in the concert join
The louder notes, to soften, and refine,
And with alternate verse[3] complete the hymn divine.
Lo! the young Poet,[4] after God's own heart,
By Him inspired, and taught the Muses'[5] art,
35 Returned from conquest, a bright chorus meets,
That sing his slain ten thousand in the streets.
In such loud numbers[6] they his acts declare,
Proclaim the wonders of his early war,
That Saul upon the vast applause does frown,
40 And feels its mighty thunder shake the crown.
What, can the threatened judgment now prolong?
Half of the kingdom is already gone;
The fairest half, whose influence guides the rest,
Have David's empire o'er their hearts confessed.
45 A woman[7] here, leads fainting Israel on,
She fights, she wins, she triumphs with a song,
Devout, majestic, for the subject fit,
And far above her arms,[8] exalts her wit;
Then, to the peaceful, shady palm withdraws,
50 And rules the rescued nation, with her laws.
How are we fall'n, fall'n by mistaken rules?
And education's, more than nature's fools,
Debarred from all improvements of the mind,

2. The ark of the Covenant was captured by the Philistines, but God forced them to return it by smiting them with pestilence. However, God did not allow the ark to be returned to Jerusalem, because of the transgressions of the Israelites, and during its absence "all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord" (1 Samuel 7.2). The ark was returned to Jerusalem twenty years later, during the reign of David. The Levites (the tribe of priests) were assigned to convey it to the city, and it was accompanied by a procession with much singing and music (1 Chronicles 15.25–28).
3. A series of couplets. The choir of virgins (Finch's invention) chants every other line, in response, as in some of the Psalms.
4. I.e., David, second king of Israel, who wrote many of the Psalms. Before he became king, during the reign of Saul, David won a great battle over the Philistines. Upon returning to Jerusalem, the women of the city sang and said, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" (1 Samuel 18.7). The prophet Samuel had earlier predicted Saul's downfall and replacement by "a neighbor of thine, who is better than thou" (1 Samuel 15.28), and the women's praise initiated Saul's jealous rage against David.
5. The nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts.
6. Measures of music and verse.
7. Deborah, the fourth judge of Israel (before Israel had kings, judges administered the laws given by God; see Judges 4.5). When the Israelites were enslaved by the Canaanites, Deborah urged her fellow judge, Barak, to wage war against the enslavers and accompanied him to the site of the battle. After their victory, Deborah and Barak wrote a song of praise (Judges 5).
8. I.e., her military feats.

And to be dull, expected and designed;° appointed, intended
55 And if some one would soar above the rest,
With warmer fancy, and ambition pressed,
So strong th' opposing faction still appears,
The hopes to thrive can ne'er outweigh the fears,
Be cautioned then my Muse, and still[9] retired;
60 Nor be despised, aiming to be admired;
Conscious of wants, still with contracted wing,
To some few friends, and to thy sorrows sing;
For groves of laurel[1] thou wert never meant;
Be dark enough thy shades, and be thou there content.

The Spleen[2]

A Pindaric Poem[3]

What art thou, Spleen, which ev'ry thing dost ape?
Thou Proteus[4] to abused mankind,
Who never yet thy real cause could find,
Or fix thee to remain in one continued shape.
5 Still varying thy perplexing form,
Now a Dead Sea[5] thou'lt represent,
A calm of stupid° discontent, unfeeling, unreasoning
Then, dashing on the rocks wilt rage into a storm.
Trembling sometimes thou dost appear,
10 Dissolved into a panic fear;
On sleep intruding dost thy shadows spread,
Thy gloomy terrors round the silent bed,
And crowd with boding° dreams the melancholy head; forboding
Or, when the midnight hour is told,
15 And drooping lids thou still dost waking hold,
Thy fond delusions cheat° the eyes, deceive
Before them antic° spectres dance, antique; bizarre
Unusual fires their pointed heads advance,
And airy phantoms rise.
20 Such was the monstrous vision seen,
When Brutus[6] (now beneath his cares oppress,

9. Here and in line 61, may mean both "always" and "motionless."
1. The laurel was a symbol of poetic achievement.
2. A mysterious illness, believed to be connected with the organ of the same name, the effects of which seemed to be depression, hypochondria, ill-temper, melancholy, and a variety of other nervous disorders. Although considered largely a disease of women, it sometimes afflicted men. It often affected lovers and poets, and other eighteenth-century poets examined it, notably Alexander Pope, in The Rape of the Lock (see p. 604), and Matthew Green, in The Spleen (see p. 645). In this poem, Finch distinguishes between those who pretend to be affected by the disorder and those who really do suffer from it. Finch suffered from "spleen" and was praised by at least one contemporary physician for this accurate portrayal of the symptoms of the disease.
3. The Greek poet Pindar (ca. 522–ca. 438 B.C.E.) was an early practitioner of the ode form. An ode is a lyric poem, usually with a serious subject and a dignified style.
4. In Greek mythology, a shape-changing sea god.
5. The Dead Sea, located on the border between Israel and Jordan, is a salt lake, called "dead" because it contains no visible plant or animal life.
6. Before the Battle of Philippi (42 B.C.E.), the Roman politician Brutus saw the ghost of Caesar, whom he had assassinated. Brutus was defeated at Philippi by Marc Anthony and Octavius, Caesar's nephew and eventual successor.

And all Rome's fortunes rolling in his breast,
Before Philippi's latest field,
Before his fate did to Octavius lead)
25 Was vanquished by the Spleen.

Falsely, the mortal part we blame
Of our depressed, and pond'rous° frame, heavy, unwieldy
Which, till the first degrading sin
Let thee,° its dull attendant, in, spleen
30 Still with the other did comply,[7]
Nor clogged the active soul, disposed to fly,
And range the mansions of its native sky.
Nor, whilst in his own heaven he dwelt,
Whilst Man his paradise possessed,
35 His fertile Garden in the fragrant East,
And all united odors smelled,
No armèd sweets,[8] until thy reign,
Could shock the sense, or in the face
A flushed, unhandsome color place.
40 Now the jonquil° o'ercomes the feeble brain; daffodil
We faint beneath the aromatic pain,
Till some offensive scent thy pow'rs appease,
And pleasure we resign° for short and nauseous ease. give up

In ev'ry one thou dost possess,
45 New are thy motions,° and thy dress: effects
Now in some grove a list'ning friend
Thy false suggestions must attend,
Thy whispered griefs, thy fancied sorrows hear,
Breathed in a sigh, and witnessed° by a tear; confirmed
50 Whilst in the light and vulgar crowd,[9]
Thy slaves, more clamorous and loud,
By laughters unprovoked, thy influence too confess.
In the imperious wife thou vapors[1] art,
Which from o'erheated passions rise
55 In clouds to the attractive[2] brain,
Until descending thence again,
Through the o'er-cast and show'ring eyes,
Upon her husband's softened heart,
He the disputed point must yield,
60 Something resign of the contested field;
Till lordly Man, born to imperial sway,
Compounds° for peace, to make that right away, bargains
And Woman, arm'd with Spleen, does servilely obey.

7. I.e., before Adam and Eve's original sin let spleen into the human body, it (our "frame," denoting the uncorrupted, immortal body) complied with the soul ("the other"). Finch here revises traditional stories that see the mortal body as a clog (hindrance) to the soul.
8. Finch seems to imply that sweet odors bring on the disorder and that foul odors can "appease" or lessen the symptoms.
9. A description of those (the frivolous and pretentious or uncultivated) who counterfeit the symptoms of "spleen," such as the two examples that follow: the "imperious wife" of line 53 and the "fool" of line 64.
1. A disorder associated with "spleen" and supposed to be caused by exhalations within the organs of the body and characterized by depression, hypochondria, hysteria, and other nervous disorders.
2. In the medical sense of drawing something (the "passions," in this case) to itself.

The fool, to imitate the wits,
65 Complains of thy pretended fits,
And dullness, born with him, would lay
Upon[3] thy accidental sway;
Because, sometimes, thou dost presume
Into the ablest heads to come:
70 That, often, men of thoughts refined,
Impatient of unequal sense,
Such slow returns, where they so much dispense,
Retiring from the crowd, are to thy shades inclined.[4]
O'er me alas! thou dost too much prevail:
75 I feel thy force, whilst I against thee rail;
I feel my verse decay, and my cramped numbers° fail. verses, poetry
Through thy black jaundice I all objects see,
As dark and terrible as thee,
My lines decried, and my employment thought
80 An useless folly, or presumptuous fault:
Whilst in the Muses'[5] paths I stray,
Whilst in their groves, and by their secret springs
My hand delights to trace° unusual things, write
And deviates from the known and common way;
85 Nor will in fading silks compose
Faintly th' inimitable rose,
Fill up an ill-drawn bird, or paint on glass[6]
The sov'reign's blurred and undistinguished face,
The threat'ning angel, and the speaking ass.[7]

90 Patron thou art to ev'ry gross° abuse, flagrant
The sullen husband's feigned excuse,
When the ill humor with his wife he spends,° exhausts
And bears recruited° wit, and spirits° to his friends. strengthened / cheerfulness
The son of Bacchus[8] pleads thy pow'r,
95 As to the glass he still° repairs,° continually / returns to
Pretends but to remove thy cares,
Snatch from thy shades one gay and smiling hour,
And drown thy kingdom in a purple show'r.[9]
When the Coquette,[1] whom ev'ry fool admires,
100 Would in variety be fair,

3. I.e., would blame.
4. According to Robert Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (1621), love of learning could be a cause of "spleen."
5. The nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be sources of inspiration for the arts. Originally they were nymphs of wells or springs, which inspired those who drank from them and near which they were worshipped.
6. Acceptable artistic pursuits for women were embroidery, painting, and tapestry making. Inimitable: surpassing or defying imitation.
7. The subjects of such art (see previous note): the "sov'reign" at this time would have been William of Orange (1650–1702); line 89 refers to the biblical story of the prophet Balaam and his ass. Intent on cursing the Israelites, Balaam ignores the commands of God until he is rebuked by his ass and threatened by an angel of the Lord (Numbers 22.21–25).
8. Bacchus is the Roman god of wine, sometimes called the "drunken god"; thus "Son of Bacchus" is one who indulges or overindulges in drink.
9. I.e., in wine or drink.
1. A flirtatious woman who uses arts to gain the admiration and affection of men for the gratification of vanity or desire for conquest. A type much commented on and satirized during the Restoration.

And, changing hastily the scene,
From light, impertinent, and vain,
Assumes a soft, a melancholy air,
And of her eyes rebates° the wand'ring fires, diminishes
105 The careless posture, and the head reclined,
The thoughtful, and composèd face,
Proclaiming the withdrawn, the absent mind,
Allows the Fop[2] more liberty to gaze,
Who gently for the tender cause inquires;
110 The cause, indeed, is a defect in sense,
Yet is the Spleen alleged,° and still the dull pretence. blamed
But these are thy fantastic° harms, imaginary
The tricks of thy pernicious stage,
Which do the weaker sort engage;
115 Worse are the dire effects of thy more pow'rful charms.
By thee Religion, all we know,
That should enlighten here below,
Is veiled in darkness, and perplexed
With anxious doubts, with endless scruples° vexed, uncertainties
120 And some restraint implied from each perverted text.[3]
Whilst touch not, taste not, what is freely giv'n,
Is but thy niggard° voice, disgracing bounteous heav'n.[4] miserly
From speech restrained, by thy deceits abused,
To deserts banished, or in cells reclused,
125 Mistaken vot'ries° to the pow'rs divine, devout worshipers
Whilst they a purer sacrifice design,
Do but the Spleen obey, and worship at thy shrine.
In vain to chase thee ev'ry art we try,
In vain all remedies apply,
130 In vain the Indian leaf° infuse, tea
Or the parched Eastern berry° bruise; coffee
Some pass, in vain, those bounds, and nobler liquors use.
Now harmony, in vain, we bring,
Inspire the flute, and touch the string.
135 From harmony no help is had;
Music but soothes thee, if too sweetly sad,
And if too light, but turns thee gaily mad.
Though the physicians greatest gains,
Although his growing wealth he sees
140 Daily increased by ladies' fees,
Yet dost thou baffle all his studious pains.
Not skillful Lower[5] thy source could find,
Or through the well-dissected body trace
The secret, the mysterious ways,
145 By which thou dost surprise, and prey upon the mind.

2. A fool or dandy; one who is foolishly attentive to his attentions and manners; another type satirized during the Restoration.
3. I.e, some prohibition ("restraint") inferred from misreadings of biblical texts.
4. Puritan zeal was considered another manifestation of "spleen." The Puritans were seen as harshly repressive.
5. Richard Lower (1631–1691), an English physician noted for his research in anatomy and physiology; author of Treatise on the Heart (1669).

Though in the search, too deep for humane thought,
With unsuccessful toil he wrought,° worked
'Till thinking thee to've catched, himself by thee was caught,
Retained thy pris'ner, thy acknowledged slave,
150 And sunk beneath thy chain to a lamented grave.

1701, 1713

Adam Posed[6]

Could our first father, at his toilsome plow,
Thorns in his path, and labor on his brow,
Clothed only in a rude, unpolished skin,
Could he a vain fantastic nymph[7] have seen,
5 In all her airs, in all her antic° graces, bizarre
Her various fashions, and more various faces;
How had it posed that skill, which late assigned
Just appellations to each several kind![8]
A right idea of the sight to frame;
10 T'have guessed from what new element[9] she came;
T'have hit the wav'ring form,[1] or giv'n this thing a name.

1709, 1713

To Death

O King of terrors, whose unbounded sway
All that have life must certainly obey;
The King, the Priest, the Prophet, all are thine,
Nor would ev'n God (in flesh) thy stroke decline.[2]
5 My name is on thy roll, and sure I must Increase thy gloomy kingdom in the dust.
My soul at this no apprehension feels,
But trembles at thy swords, thy racks, thy wheels;[3]
Thy scorching fevers, which distract the sense,
10 And snatch us raving, unprepared, from hence;
At thy contagious darts, that wound the heads
Of weeping friends, who wait at dying beds.
Spare these, and let thy time be when it will;

6. Perplexed.
7. "Fantastic" may mean "capricious" or "foppish in attire," but may also have the sense of "imaginary" or "unreal." "Nymph" is a conventional pastoral word for a young woman. The character is a coquette, or flirtatious young woman, a type much commented on and satirized during the Restoration. Attacks on artificiality and the use of cosmetics were common during the Renaissance and still popular during the Restoration.
8. According to Genesis 2.19, Adam named ("assign'd / just appellations to") all the animals.
9. I.e., she is not created from one of the four elements—earth, air, water, and fire—out of which all things were believed to be composed.
1. I.e., to have accurately identified the nature of her changing form.
2. I.e., Christ (God in his human incarnation) suffered death on the cross.
3. Like "racks," instruments of torture.

My bus'ness is to die, and thine to kill.
15 Gently thy fatal scepter on me lay,
And take to thy cold arms, insensibly, thy prey.

Friendship between Ephelia and Ardelia[4]

Eph. What Friendship is, Ardelia show.
Ard. 'Tis to love, as I love you.
Eph. This account, so short (tho' kind)
Suits not my inquiring mind.
5 Therefore farther now repeat:
What is Friendship when complete?
Ard. 'Tis to share all joy and grief;
'Tis to lend all due relief
From the tongue, the heart, the hand;
10 'Tis to mortgage house and land;
For a friend be sold a slave;
'Tis to die upon a grave,
If a friend therein do lie.
Eph. This indeed, tho' carried high,[5]
15 This, tho' more than e'er was done
Underneath the rolling sun,
This has all been said before.
Can Ardelia say no more?
Ard. Words indeed no more can show:
20 But 'tis to love, as I love you.

A Nocturnal Reverie

In such a night,[6] when every louder wind
Is to its distant cavern safe confined;
And only gentle Zephyr[7] fans his wings,
And lonely Philomel, still waking,[8] sings;
5 Or from some tree, famed for the owl's delight,
She, hollowing° clear, directs the wand'rer right: crying out
In such a night, when passing clouds give place,
Or thinly veil the heav'ns' mysterious face;

4. Ardelia is a conventional poetic name that Finch sometimes used to refer to herself.
5. I.e., expressed loudly or in high style; or, perhaps, highly esteemed.
6. This phrase, repeated twice below, recalls the same repeated phrase in the night scene that opens act 5 of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice. Finch also echoes many words from Milton's "Il Penseroso" (see p. 405).
7. According to myth, Zephyr, the west wind, is warm and mild. The four winds resided in caves.
8. I.e., ever wakeful; according to myth, Philomela was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not speak. She wove the story into a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. She was later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus.

When in some river, overhung with green,
10 The waving moon and trembling leaves are seen;
When freshened grass now bears itself upright,
And makes cool banks to pleasing rest invite,
Whence springs the woodbind,° and the bramble-rose, honeysuckle
And where the sleepy cowslip sheltered grows;
15 Whilst now a paler hue the foxglove takes,
Yet checkers still with red the dusky brakes[9]
When scatter'd glow-worms,[1] but in twilight fine,
Shew trivial beauties, watch their hour to shine;[2]
Whilst Salisb'ry stands the test of every light,
20 In perfect charms, and perfect virtue bright:
When odors, which declined repelling day,[3]
Through temp'rate air uninterrupted stray;
When darkened groves their softest shadows wear,
And falling waters we distinctly hear;
25 When through the gloom more venerable[4] shows
Some ancient fabric, awful[5] in repose,
While sunburnt hills their swarthy looks conceal,
And swelling haycocks[6] thicken up the vale:° valley
When the loosed horse now, as his pasture leads,
30 Comes slowly grazing through th' adjoining meads,° meadows
Whose stealing pace, and lengthened shade we fear,
Till torn-up forage in his teeth we hear:
When nibbling sheep at large pursue their food,
And unmolested kine° rechew the cud; cattle
35 When curlews[7] cry beneath the village walls,
And to her straggling brood the partridge calls;
Their shortlived jubilee the creatures keep,
Which but endures, whilst tyrant man does sleep;
When a sedate content the spirit feels,
40 And no fierce light disturbs, whilst it reveals;
But silent musings urge the mind to seek
Something, too high for syllables to speak;
Till the free soul to a composedness charmed,
Finding the elements of rage disarmed,
45 O'er all below a solemn quiet grown,
Joys in th' inferior world, and thinks it like her own:
In such a night let me abroad remain,
Till morning breaks, and all's confused again;
Our cares, our toils, our clamors are renewed,
50 Or pleasures, seldom reached, again pursued.

9. Thickets; tall ferns or bracken. English cowslips (line 13) have droopy yellow petals.
1. Insects, (the females of) which emit a shining green light from the abdomen.
2. I.e., show lesser beauties and—unlike the countess of Salisbury, Anne Tufton, of the following line—make the most of their limited opportunities to shine.
3. I.e., when the aromas ("odors") of field and wood, which refused to come forth ("declined") under the hot, "repelling" rays of the sun ("day").
4. Impressive or worthy of religious reverence.
5. May mean both awe-inspiring and causing fear or dread. Fabric: structure, i.e., building.
6. Conical piles of hay.
7. A kind of shore bird, similar to a sandpiper.

The Answer[8]

(To Pope's Impromptu)

Disarmed with so genteel an air,
  The contest I give o'er;
Yet, Alexander, have a care,
  And shock the sex no more.
5 We rule the world our life's whole race,
  Men but assume that right;
First slaves to ev'ry tempting face,
  Then martyrs to our spite.
You of one Orpheus[9] sure have read,
10 Who would like you have writ
Had he in London town been bred,
  And polished too his wit;
But he poor soul thought all was well,
  And great should be his fame,
15 When he had left his wife in hell,
  And birds and beasts could tame.
Yet venturing then with scoffing rhymes
  The women to incense,
Resenting heroines of those times
20 Soon punished his offense.
And as the Hebrus rolled his skull,
  And harp besmeared with blood,
They clashing as the waves grew full,
  Still harmonized the flood.
25 But you our follies gently treat,
  And spin so fine the thread,
You need not fear his awkward fate,
  The lock[1] won't cost the head.
Our admiration you command
30 For all that's gone before;
What next we look for at your hand
  Can only raise it more.
Yet sooth° the ladies I advise truly
  (As me too pride has wrought)
35 We're born to wit, but to be wise
  By admonitions taught.

8. Finch and Alexander Pope engaged in a dispute over some lines in his Rape of the Lock that deprecated female wits (see 4.59–62 [p. 616]). He responded to her complaint in a short poem, "Impromptu," subtitled "To Lady Winchelsea" (see p. 637), in which he complimented her poetic talent while slighting the talent of earlier women poets. This poem is her response.
9. According to Greek mythology, Orpheus, famed for singing and playing the lyre, was able to charm birds and animals with his music. When his wife, Eurydice, died, he traveled to the underworld, charmed the infernal gods with his singing, and was granted permission to lead Eurydice out of hell on condition that he not look back to see her following. When they were nearly out of hell, he glanced over his shoulder and she returned to the ranks of the dead. Inconsolable, Orpheus never again took pleasure in women, but continued to sing, enchanting even the stones and trees. The Maenads, frenzied devotees of the god Dionysus, hated Orpheus (perhaps because of his lack of interest in them), and one day they tore him to pieces, casting his head and lyre into the river Hebros. The severed head continued to sing as it floated down the river.
1. I.e., The Rape of the Lock; see note 8 above.

On Myself

Good Heav'n, I thank thee, since it was designed
I should be framed, but of the weaker kind,
That yet, my Soul, is rescued from the love
Of all those trifles which their passions move.
5 Pleasures and praise and plenty have with me
But° their just value. If allowed they be, only
Freely, and thankfully as much I taste,
As will not reason or religion waste.
If they're denied, I on my self can live,
10 And slight° those aids unequal chance does give. disdain
When in the sun, my wings can be displayed,
And, in retirement, I can bless the shade.

MATTHEW PRIOR
1664–1721

A Fable

In Æsop's tales an honest wretch we find,
Whose years and comforts equally declined;
He in two wives had two domestic ills,
For different age they had, and different wills;
5 One plucked his black hairs out, and one his gray,
The man for quietness did both obey,
Till all his parish saw his head quite bare,
And thought he wanted brains as well as hair.

The Moral

The parties, henpecked William,[1] are thy wives,
10 The hairs they pluck are thy prerogatives;[2]
Tories thy person hate, the Whigs thy power,[3]
Though much thou yieldest, still they tug for more,
Till this poor man and thou alike are shown,
He without hair, and thou without a crown.

1703

1. King William III (1650–1702), who ruled England from 1689 until his death.
2. The rights of the king, previously not subject to parliamentary restriction.
3. The Tories and Whigs were the two main political parties in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century England.

To a Lady: She Refusing to Continue a Dispute with Me, and Leaving Me in the Argument

Spare, gen'rous victor, spare the slave,
  Who did unequal war pursue;
That more than triumph he might have,
  In being overcome by you.

5 In the dispute whate'er I said,
  My heart was by my tongue belied;
And in my looks you might have read,
  How much I argued on your side.

You, far from danger as from fear,
10 Might have sustained an open fight:
For seldom your opinions err;
  Your eyes are always in the right.

Why, fair one, would you not rely
  On reason's force with beauty's joined?
15 Could I their prevalence deny;
  I must at once be deaf and blind.

Alas! not hoping to subdue,
  I only to the fight aspired:
To keep the beauteous foe in view
20 Was all the glory I desired.

But she, howe'er of vict'ry sure,
  Contemns the wreath[4] too long delayed;
And, armed with more immediate pow'r,
  Calls cruel silence to her aid.

25 Deeper to wound, she shuns the fight:
  She drops her arms, to gain the field:
Secures her conquest by her flight;
  And triumphs, when she seems to yield.

So when the Parthian[5] turned his steed,
30 And from the hostile camp withdrew;

4. A wreath of laurel or other leaves was a symbol of victory.

5. A people of western Asia, whose cavalry fought in the manner Prior describes.

With cruel skill the backward reed° — arrow
He sent; and as he fled, he slew.

1718

An Ode

The merchant, to secure his treasure,
Conveys it in a borrowed name;
Euphelia serves to grace my measure,[6]
But Cloe is my real flame.

5 My softest verse, my darling lyre,
Upon Euphelia's toilet° lay; — dressing table
When Cloe noted her desire
That I should sing, that I should play.

My lyre I tune, my voice I raise,
10 But with my numbers° mix my sighs; — songs
And whilst I sing Euphelia's praise,
I fix my soul on Cloe's eyes.

Fair Cloe blushed; Euphelia frowned;
I sung and gazed; I played and trembled;
15 And Venus to the Loves around[7]
Remarked how ill we all dissembled.

JONATHAN SWIFT
1667–1745

A Description of the Morning

Now hardly here and there a hackney-coach[1]
Appearing, showed the ruddy morn's approach.
Now Betty from her master's bed had flown,
And softly stole to discompose her own;
5 The slip-shod 'prentice from his master's door
Had pared the dirt and sprinkled round the floor.
Now Moll[2] had whirled her mop with dext'rous airs,
Prepared to scrub the entry and the stairs.
The youth with broomy stumps began to trace

6. I.e., Euphelia adorns or adds grace to my poetry, or is the name used in my poetry.
7. Venus is the Greek goddess of love and beauty. Her attendant "Loves" are, in mythology, the Graces, givers of charm and beauty; in the social context, attractive young women.
1. A horse-drawn carriage, for hire.
2. A diminutive form of Mary; a common name for a servant.

10 The kennel-edge,[3] where wheels had worn the place.
The small-coal man[4] was heard with cadence deep,
Till drowned in shriller notes of chimney-sweep:
Duns° at his lordship's gate began to meet; bill collectors
And brickdust Moll[5] had screamed through half the street.
15 The turnkey° now his flock returning sees, jailer
Duly let out a-nights to steal for fees:[6]
The watchful bailiffs[7] take their silent stands,
And schoolboys lag with satchels in their hands.

1709

A Description of a City Shower

Careful observers may foretell the hour
(By sure prognostics) when to dread a shower:
While rain depends,° the pensive cat gives o'er impends
Her frolics, and pursues her tail no more.
5 Returning home at night, you'll find the sink° sewer
Strike your offended sense with double stink.
If you be wise, then go not far to dine;
You'll spend in coach hire more than save in wine.
A coming shower your shooting corns presage,
10 Old achès throb, your hollow tooth will rage.
Sauntering in coffeehouse is Dulman° seen; dull man
He damns the climate and complains of spleen.° melancholy
Meanwhile the South,° rising with dabbled° wings, a wind / spattered
A sable cloud athwart the welkin° flings, sky
15 That swilled more liquor than it could contain,
And, like a drunkard, gives it up again.
Brisk Susan whips her linen from the rope,
While the first drizzling shower is borne aslope:° slanting
Such is that sprinkling which some careless quean° wench
20 Flirts° on you from her mop, but not so clean: flicks
You fly, invoke the gods; then turning, stop
To rail; she singing, still whirls on her mop.
Not yet the dust had shunned the unequal strife,
But, aided by the wind, fought still for life,
25 And wafted with its foe by violent gust,
'Twas doubtful which was rain and which was dust.
Ah! where must needy poet seek for aid,
When dust and rain at once his coat invade?
Sole coat, where dust cemented by the rain
30 Erects the nap,[8] and leaves a mingled stain.
Now in contiguous drops the flood comes down,
Threatening with deluge this devoted° town. doomed

3. Curb of the road.
4. Seller of charcoal.
5. A woman selling powdered brick (used for cleaning knives).
6. Prisoners were allowed out to get money to pay their jailers, who could charge fees for allowing certain privileges, such as better accommodations.
7. I.e., sheriff's deputies.
8. I.e., makes the fibers on the surface of the fabric stand up stiffly.

To shops in crowds the daggled° females fly, mud-spattered
Pretend to cheapen° goods, but nothing buy. bargain for 35 The Templar spruce,[9] while every spout's abroach,° running
Stays till 'tis fair, yet seems to call a coach.
The tucked-up sempstress° walks with hasty strides, seamstress
While streams run down her oiled umbrella's sides.
Here various kinds, by various fortunes led,
40 Commence acquaintance underneath a shed.
Triumphant Tories and desponding Whigs[1]
Forget their feuds, and join to save their wigs.
Boxed in a chair° the beau impatient sits, sedan chair
While spouts run clattering o'er the roof by fits,
45 And ever and anon with frightful din
The leather[2] sounds; he trembles from within.
So when Troy chairmen bore the wooden steed,
Pregnant with Greeks impatient to be freed
(Those bully Greeks, who, as the moderns do,
50 Instead of paying chairmen, run them through),
Laocoön struck the outside with his spear,
And each imprisoned hero quaked for fear.[3]
Now from all parts the swelling kennels° flow, gutters
And bear their trophies with them as they go:
55 Filth of all hues and odors seem to tell
What street they sailed from, by their sight and smell.
They, as each torrent drives with rapid force,
From Smithfield or St. Pulchre's shape their course,
And in huge confluence joined at Snow Hill ridge,
60 Fall from the conduit prone° to Holborn Bridge.[4] downward
Sweepings from butchers' stalls, dung, guts, and blood,
Drowned puppies, stinking sprats,° all drenched in mud, herring
Dead cats, and turnip tops, come tumbling down the flood.

Stella's Birthday

March 13, 1727[5]

This day, whate'er the fates decree,
Shall still° be kept with joy by me: always
This day then, let us not be told
That you are sick, and I grown old,
5 Nor think on our approaching ills,
And talk of spectacles and pills;
Tomorrow will be time enough

9. The dapper law student.
1. The Tories and Whigs were the two main political parties in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century England; the Tories (Swift's party) had recently assumed power.
2. Leather roof of the sedan chair.
3. In Virgil's Aeneid 2, Laocoön so struck the side of the Trojan horse, frightening the Greeks within.
4. The offal from the Smithfield cattle market would be swept toward the Fleet Ditch, spanned by Holborn Bridge, where it would merge with garbage floating down the Snow Hill stream. St. Pulchre's: St. Sepulchre's Church, in Holborn.
5. The forty-sixth birthday of Swift's devoted companion and protégée, Esther Johnson.

To hear such mortifying° stuff. depressing
Yet since from reason may be brought
10 A better and more pleasing thought,
Which can in spite of all decays
Support a few remaining days:
From not the gravest of divines,
Accept for once some serious lines.
15 Although we now can form no more
Long schemes of life, as heretofore;
Yet you, while time is running fast,
Can look with joy on what is past.
Were future happiness and pain
20 A mere contrivance of the brain,
As atheists argue, to entice
And fit their proselytes° for vice converts
(The only comfort they propose,
To have companions in their woes),
25 Grant this the case, yet sure 'tis hard
That virtue, styled its own reward,
And by all sages understood
To be the chief of human good,
Should acting, die, nor leave behind
30 Some lasting pleasure in the mind,
Which, by remembrance, will assuage
Grief, sickness, poverty, and age;
And strongly shoot a radiant dart,
To shine through life's declining part.
35 Say, Stella, feel you no content,
Reflecting on a life well spent?
Your skillful hand employed to save
Despairing wretches from the grave;
And then supporting from your store
40 Those whom you dragged from death before
(So Providence on mortals waits, Preserving what it first creates);
Your generous boldness to defend
An innocent and absent friend;
45 That courage which can make you just,
To merit humbled in the dust:
The detestation you express
For vice in all its glittering dress:
That patience under torturing pain,
50 Where stubborn stoics[6] would complain.
Must these like empty shadows pass,
Or forms reflected from a glass?
Or mere chimeras° in the mind, wild fancies
That fly and leave no marks behind?
55 Does not the body thrive and grow
By food of twenty years ago?
And, had it not been still supplied,
It must a thousand times have died.

6. Those who practice repression of emotion, indifference to pleasure and pain, and patient endurance.

Then who with reason can maintain
60 That no effects of food remain?
And is not virtue in mankind
The nutriment that feeds the mind?
Upheld by each good action past,
And still continued by the last:
65 Then who with reason can pretend
That all effects of virtue end?
 Believe me, Stella, when you show
That true contempt for things below,
Nor prize your life for other ends
70 Than merely to oblige your friends,
Your former actions claim their part,
And join to fortify your heart.
For virtue in her daily race,
Like Janus,[7] bears a double face,
75 Looks back with joy where she has gone,
And therefore goes with courage on.
She at your sickly couch will wait,
And guide you to some better state.
 O then, whatever Heaven intends,
80 Take pity on your pitying friends;
Nor let your ills affect your mind,
To fancy they can be unkind.
Me, surely me, you ought to spare,
Who gladly would your sufferings share;
85 Or give my scrap of life to you,
And think it far beneath your due;
You, to whose care so oft I owe
That I'm alive to tell you so.

The Lady's Dressing Room

Five hours, (and who can do it less in?)
By haughty Celia[8] spent in dressing;
The goddess from her chamber issues,
Arrayed in lace, brocades and tissues.[9]
5 Strephon, who found the room was void,
And Betty otherwise employed,
Stole in, and took a strict survey,
Of all the litter as it lay;
Whereof, to make the matter clear,
10 An inventory follows here.
 And first a dirty smock appeared,
Beneath the armpits well besmeared.

7. The Roman god of doors, with opposed faces, one looking forward, the other back.
8. Celia and Strephon (line 5) are conventional poetic names often used in pastoral poetry.
9. Fine, lightweight fabric. Brocades: a rich silk fabric with raised patterns in gold and silver.

Strephon, the rogue, displayed it wide,
And turned it round on every side.
15 On such a point few words are best,
And Strephon bids us guess the rest,
But swears how damnably the men lie,
In calling Celia sweet and cleanly.
Now listen while he next produces
20 The various combs for various uses,
Filled up with dirt so closely fixt,
No brush could force a way betwixt.
A paste of composition rare,
Sweat, dandruff, powder, lead[1] and hair;
25 A forehead cloth with oil upon't
To smooth the wrinkles on her front;° brow
Here alum flower to stop the steams,[2]
Exhaled from sour unsavory streams,
There night-gloves made of Tripsy's hide,
30 Bequeathed by Tripsy when she died,
With puppy water,[3] beauty's help
Distilled from Tripsy's darling whelp;
Here gallypots[4] and vials placed,
Some filled with washes, some with paste,
35 Some with pomatum, paints and slops,
And ointments good for scabby chops.[5]
Hard by a filthy basin stands,
Fouled with the scouring of her hands;
The basin takes whatever comes
40 The scrapings of her teeth and gums,
A nasty compound of all hues,
For here she spits, and here she spews.
But oh! it turned poor Strephon's bowels,
When he beheld and smelled the towels,
45 Begummed, bemattered, and beslimed
With dirt, and sweat, and earwax grimed.
No object Strephon's eye escapes,
Here petticoats in frowzy° heaps; ill-smelling, unkempt
Nor be the handkerchiefs forgot
50 All varnished o'er with snuff[6] and snot.
The stockings why should I expose,
Stained with the marks of stinking toes;
Or greasy coifs and pinners[7] reeking,
Which Celia slept at least a week in?
55 A pair of tweezers next he found
To pluck her brows in arches round,
Or hairs that sink the forehead low,
Or on her chin like bristles grow.

1. Then used to make hair glossy.
2. Vapors or exhalations produced as an excretion of the body, e.g., hot breath, perspiration, or the infectious effluvium of a disease. Alum flower: powdered mineral salt used in medicine.
3. The urine of a puppy, used as a cosmetic.
4. Small ceramic pots, often containers for medicine.
5. Painful fissures or cracks in the skin. Washes: liquid cosmetic for the complexion. Paste: either medicinal or cosmetic compound. Pomatum: scented ointment for application to the skin. Paints: rouges. Slops: refuse liquid.
6. Powdered tobacco inhaled through the nostrils.
7. Coifs and pinners: types of headwear.

The virtues we must not let pass,
60 Of Celia's magnifying glass.
When frighted Strephon cast his eye on't
It showed visage° of a giant. face
A glass that can to sight disclose,
The smallest worm in Celia's nose,
65 And faithfully direct her nail
To squeeze it out from head to tail;
For catch it nicely by the head,
It must come out alive or dead.
Why Strephon will you tell the rest?
70 And must you needs describe the chest?° commode
That careless wench! no creature warn her
To move it out from yonder corner;
But leave it standing full in sight
For you to exercise your spite.
75 In vain the workman showed his wit
With rings and hinges counterfeit
To make it seem in this disguise
A cabinet to vulgar eyes;
For Strephon ventured to look in,
80 Resolved to go through thick and thin;
He lifts the lid, there needs no more,
He smelled it all the time before.
As from within Pandora's box,
When Epimetheus[8] op'd the locks,
85 A sudden universal crew
Of human evils upwards flew;
He still was comforted to find
That Hope at last remained behind;
So Strephon lifting up the lid,
90 To view what in the chest was hid.
The vapors flew from out the vent,
But Strephon cautious never meant
The bottom of the pan° to grope, vessel
And foul his hands in search of Hope.
95 O never may such vile machine
Be once in Celia's chamber seen!
O may she better learn to keep
Those "secrets of the hoary deep!"[9]
As mutton cutlets, prime of meat,
100 Which though with art you salt and beat
As laws of cookery require,
And toast them at the clearest fire;
If from adown the hopeful chops
The fat upon a cinder drops,
105 To stinking smoke it turns the flame
Pois'ning the flesh from whence it came,

8. In Greek mythology, brother of Prometheus and husband of Pandora. Created by the gods as the first human woman, Pandora brought with her to Earth a box containing all human ills, which, when it was opened, were released into the world, leaving only Hope behind.

9. From Milton's Paradise Lost (2.891), a poetic reference to the ocean; Swift puns on "hoary," which means ancient but may also mean corrupt, and perhaps also on whore and on the homonym, hory, meaning filthy.

And up exhales a greasy stench,
For which you curse the careless wench;
So things, which must not be expressed,
110 When plumped° into the reeking chest, dropped
Send up an excremental smell
To taint the parts from whence they fell.
The petticoats and gown perfume,
Which waft a stink round every room.
115 Thus finishing his grand survey,
Disgusted Strephon stole away
Repeating in his amorous fits,
Oh! Celia, Celia, Celia shits!
 But Vengeance, goddess never sleeping
120 Soon punished Strephon for his peeping;
His foul imagination links
Each Dame he sees with all her stinks:
And, if unsavory odors fly,
Conceives a lady standing by:
125 All women his description fits,
And both ideas jump like wits:[1]
By vicious fancy coupled fast,
And still appearing in contrast.
I pity wretched Strephon blind
130 To all the charms of female kind;
Should I the queen of love[2] refuse,
Because she rose from stinking ooze?
To him that looks behind the scene,
Satira's but some pocky queen.[3]
135 When Celia in her glory shows,
If Strephon would but stop his nose
(Who now so impiously blasphemes
Her ointments, daubs, and paints and creams,
Her washes, slops, and every clout,° rag
140 With which he makes so foul a rout°) fuss
He soon would learn to think like me,
And bless his ravished sight to see
Such order from confusion sprung,
Such gaudy tulips raised from dung.

1730

A Beautiful Young Nymph Going to Bed

Corinna, pride of Drury-Lane[4]
For whom no shepherd sighs in vain;
Never did Covent Garden[5] boast

1. Jump: match; from the proverbial phrase good wits jump, i.e., great minds think alike.
2. Aphrodite, or Venus, the classical goddess often depicted as rising out of the sea.
3. Whore, here infected with pox (usually syphilis), or marked with pocks or pustules. Satira: probably Statira, one of the wives of Alexander the Great in Nathaniel Lee's tragedy Rival Queens (1677).
4. A London street notorious for prostitutes.
5. A flashy, vulgar district in London.

So bright a battered, strolling toast;
5 No drunken rake to pick her up,
No cellar where on tick° to sup; credit
Returning at the midnight hour;
Four stories climbing to her bow'r;° room
Then, seated on a three-legged chair,[6]
10 Takes off her artificial hair:
Now, picking out a crystal eye,
She wipes it clean, and lays it by.
Her eye-brows from a mouse's hide,
Stuck on with art on either side,
15 Pulls off with care, and first displays 'em,
Then in a play-book smoothly lays 'em.
Now dextrously her plumpers[7] draws,
That serve to fill her hollow jaws.
Untwists a wire; and from her gums
20 A set of teeth completely comes.
Pulls out the rags contrived to prop
Her flabby dugs° and down they drop. breasts
Proceeding on, the lovely goddess
Unlaces next her steel-ribbed bodice;
25 Which by the operator's skill,
Press down the lumps, the hollows fill,
Up goes her hand, and off she slips
The bolsters that supply her hips.
With gentlest touch, she next explores
30 Her shankers,[8] issues, running sores,
Effects of many a sad disaster;
And then to each applies a plaister.° plaster for face
But must, before she goes to bed,
Rub off the dawbs of white and red;
35 And smooth the furrows in her front° forehead
With greasy paper stuck upon't.
She takes a bolus[9] ere she sleeps;
And then between two blankets creeps.
With pains of love tormented lies;
40 Or if she chance to close her eyes,
Of Bridewell and the Compter[1] dreams,
And feels the lash, and faintly screams;
Or, by a faithless bully° drawn, pimp
At some hedge-tavern° lies in pawn; poor, squalid inn
45 Or to Jamaica seems transported,[2]
Alone, and by no planter courted;
Or, near Fleet-Ditch's[3] oozy brinks,
Surrounded with a hundred stinks,
Belated, seems on watch to lie,
50 And snap some cully° passing by; simpleton

6. I.e., one missing a leg.
7. Small, light balls sometimes carried in the mouth for filling out hollow cheeks.
8. Chancres: ulcers resulting from venereal disease.
9. A larger than ordinary pill.
1. Pronounced counter; a city prison. Bridewell was a prison for vagrant women and prostitutes.
2. Some convicts were shipped to Jamaica and other West Indian sites, although the majority were transported to the North American colonies.
3. An open sewer in London.

Or, struck with fear, her fancy runs
On watchmen, constables and duns,° debt collectors
From whom she meets with frequent rubs;° unpleasant encounters
But, never from religious clubs;[4]
55 Whose favor she is sure to find,
Because she pays 'em all in kind.
Corinna wakes. A dreadful sight!
Behold the ruins of the night!
A wicked rat her plaster stole,
60 Half eat, and dragged it to his hole.
The crystal eye, alas, was missed;
And puss had on her plumpers pissed.
A pigeon picked her issue-peas;
And Shock[5] her tresses° filled with fleas. artificial hair
65 The nymph, tho' in this mangled plight,
Must ev'ry morn her limbs unite.
But how shall I describe her arts
To recollect the scattered parts?
Or shew the anguish, toil, and pain,
70 Of gath'ring up herself again?
The bashful muse° will never bear source of inspiration
In such a scene to interfere.
Corinna in the morning dizened,° dressed up
Who sees, will spew; who smells, be poison'd.

Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift, D.S.P.D.[6]

Occasioned by Reading a Maxim in Rochefoucauld[7]

Dans l'adversité de nos meilleurs amis nous trouvons toujours quelque chose, qui ne nous déplaît pas.

"In the adversity of our best friends, we find something that does not displease us."

As Rochefoucauld his maxims drew
From nature, I believe 'em true:
They argue° no corrupted mind suggest

4. Groups of religious dissenters or enthusiasts who were often suspected of hypocrisy.

5. Shough, the name for a kind of lapdog, became "Shock" in Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock 1.115 (see p. 607). Issue-peas: peas or other small, globular bodies placed in surgical incisions to continue the irritation that made a discharge.

6. The initials signify "Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin." Evidently intending this poem to be published only after his death, Swift allowed some of his friends to see the (changing) text in manuscript; he completed explanatory notes for it in 1732. We have included most of these notes below. They were omitted, along with over 150 lines deemed potentially offensive, in the version of the poem that one of Swift's friends, Dr. William King, arranged to have printed in London in 1739. Editing the poem with the help of other English friends of Swift, most notably Alexander Pope, King managed to offend the author while thinking to do him a favor. "Much dissatisfied" with the censored version, Swift arranged for the poem and notes to be printed in Dublin; this version, although much longer, still had many blanks in lieu of proper names. Swift correctly foresaw that the poem would prove controversial, both in its attacks on Queen Caroline and her prime minister, Robert Walpole, and in its praise of leading political opponents of Walpole such as William Pulteney and Henry St. John, Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, to whom Pope had written his "Essay on Man" (see p. 623) and whom Swift praises in his note to line 196.

7. François de la Rochefoucauld (1613–1680), writer of witty, cynical maxims.

In him; the fault is in mankind.
5 This maxim more than all the rest
Is thought too base for human breast:
"In all distresses of our friends
We first consult our private ends,
While Nature, kindly bent to ease us,
10 Points out some circumstance to please us."
If this perhaps your patience move,
Let reason and experience prove.[8]
We all behold with envious eyes
Our equal raised above our size.
15 Who would not at a crowded show
Stand high himself, keep others low?
I love my friend as well as you,
But why should he obstruct my view?
Then let me have the higher post;
20 Suppose it but an inch at most.
If in a battle you should find
One, whom you love of all mankind,
Had some heroic action done,
A champion killed, or trophy won;
25 Rather than thus be overtopped° outdone
Would you not wish his laurels[9] cropped?
Dear honest Ned is in the gout,[1]
Lies racked with pain, and you without:
How patiently you hear him groan!
30 How glad the case is not your own!
What poet would not grieve to see
His brethren write as well as he?
But rather than they should excel,
He'd wish his rivals all in hell.
35 Her end when emulation° misses, imitation
She turns to envy, stings, and hisses:
The strongest friendship yields to pride,
Unless the odds be on our side.
Vain humankind! fantastic race!
40 Thy various follies who can trace?
Self-love, ambition, envy, pride,
Their empire in our hearts divide.
Give others riches, power, and station;
'Tis all on me an usurpation;
45 I have no title to aspire,[2]
Yet, when you sink, I seem the higher.
In Pope I cannot read a line,
But with a sigh I wish it mine:
When he can in one couplet fix

8. I.e., if this perhaps strains your patience, let reason and experience prove its truth. Rochefoucauld evidently thought this maxim would tax some readers' patience, because he omitted it from all editions of his Reflexions . . . et maximes after the first edition of 1665.
9. Laurels were traditionally worn by poets, athletes, and warriors as a sign of victory or distinction.
1. A disease characterized by painful inflammation of the joints. Ned is a generic name for the type of "friend" Rochefoucauld had described.
2. I.e., I don't aim for a title of noble rank; or, I have no title to announce.

50 More sense than I can do in six,
It gives me such a jealous fit,
I cry, "Pox take him and his wit!"
I grieve to be outdone by Gay[3]
In my own humorous biting way.
55 Arbuthnot[4] is no more my friend,
Who dares to irony pretend,
Which I was born to introduce,
Refined it first, and showed its use.
St. John, as well as Pulteney,[5] knows
60 That I had some repute for prose;
And, till they drove me out of date,
Could maul a minister of state.
If they have mortified my pride,
And made me throw my pen aside;
65 If with such talents Heaven hath blessed 'em,
Have I not reason to detest 'em?
To all my foes, dear Fortune, send
Thy gifts, but never to my friend:
I tamely can endure the first,
70 But this with envy makes me burst.
Thus much may serve by way of proem;° preface
Proceed we therefore to our poem.
The time is not remote, when I
Must by the course of nature die;
75 When, I foresee, my special friends
Will try to find their private ends:° benefits
Though it is hardly° understood° hard to / understand
Which way my death can do them good;
Yet thus methinks I hear 'em speak:
80 "See how the Dean begins to break!° weaken
Poor gentleman! he droops apace!° quickly
You plainly find it in his face.
That old vertigo° in his head dizziness
Will never leave him till he's dead.
85 Besides, his memory decays;
He recollects not what he says;
He cannot call his friends to mind;
Forgets the place where last he dined;
Plies you with stories o'er and o'er;
90 He told them fifty times before.
How does he fancy we can sit
To hear his out-of-fashion wit?
But he takes up with younger folks,
Who for his wine will bear his jokes.
95 Faith, he must make his stories shorter,
Or change his comrades once a quarter;

3. John Gay (1685–1732; see pp. 594–96), poet, playwright, author of the Beggar's Opera (1728), and intimate friend of Swift and Pope.
4. Dr. John Arbuthnot (1667–1735), physician and wit, friend of Swift, Gay, and Pope. See the latter's "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot" (p. 626).
5. For these two politicians, both opposed to Prime Minister Walpole, see note 1 above and Swift's notes to line 194 and 196.

In half the time he talks them round,[6]
There must another set be found.
"For poetry, he's past his prime;
100 He takes an hour to find a rhyme;
His fire is out, his wit decayed,
His fancy sunk, his Muse a jade.[7]
I'd have him throw away his pen—
But there's no talking to some men."
105 And then their tenderness appears
By adding largely to my years:
"He's older than he would be reckoned,
And well remembers Charles the Second.[8]
He hardly drinks a pint of wine;
110 And that, I doubt,° is no good sign. suspect
His stomach,° too, begins to fail; appetite
Last year we thought him strong and hale;° healthy
But now he's quite another thing;
I wish he may hold out till spring."
115 They hug themselves, and reason thus:
"It is not yet so bad with us."
In such a case they talk in tropes,° figures of speech
And by their fears express their hopes.
Some great misfortune to portend° predict
120 No enemy can match a friend.
With all the kindness they profess,
The merit of a lucky guess
(When daily how-d'ye's come of course,[9]
And servants answer, "Worse and worse!")
125 Would please 'em better, than to tell
That God be praised the Dean is well.
Then he who prophesied the best,
Approves his foresight to the rest:
"You know I always feared the worst,
130 And often told you so at first."
He'd rather choose that I should die,
Than his prediction prove a lie.
Not one foretells I shall recover,
But all agree to give me over.
135 Yet, should some neighbor feel a pain
Just in the parts where I complain,
How many a message would he send!
What hearty prayers that I should mend!
Inquire what regimen I kept;
140 What gave me ease, and how I slept,
And more lament, when I was dead,
Then all the snivelers round my bed.
My good companions, never fear;
For though you may mistake a year,

6. I.e., he tells all his stories once, then starts again.
7. His Muse, source of inspiration personified as a female, is a worn-out horse or a whore.
8. King of England who died in 1685, when Swift was eighteen.
9. I.e., when it's routinely asked, "How is he?"

145 Though your prognostics run too fast,
They must be verified at last.
  Behold the fatal day arrive!
"How is the Dean?"—"He's just alive."
Now the departing prayer is read.
150 "He hardly breathes"—"The Dean is dead."
Before the passing° bell begun,° death / begun to ring
The news through half the town has run.
"Oh! may we all for death prepare!
What has he left? and who's his heir?"
155 "I know no more than what the news is;
'Tis all bequeathed to public uses."[1]
"To public use! a perfect whim!
What had the public done for him?
Mere envy, avarice, and pride.
160 He gave it all—but first he died.
And had the Dean in all the nation
No worthy friend, no poor relation?
So ready to do strangers good,
Forgetting his own flesh and blood?"
165 Now Grub Street[2] wits are all employed;
With elegies the town is cloyed;° overfilled
Some paragraph in every paper
To curse the Dean, or bless the Drapier.[3]
  The doctors, tender° of their fame, careful
170 Wisely on me lay all the blame.
"We must confess his case was nice,[4]
But he would never take advice.
Had he been ruled, for aught appears,
He might have lived these twenty years:
175 For, when we opened him, we found,
That all his vital parts were sound."
  From Dublin soon to London spread,
'Tis told at court, "The Dean is dead."
Kind Lady Suffolk,[5] in the spleen,
180 Runs laughing up to tell the Queen.
The Queen, so gracious, mild and good,
Cries, "Is he gone? 'tis time he should.
He's dead, you say; why, let him rot:
I'm glad the medals were forgot.[6]

1. I.e., the inheritance is all left to charity.
2. Originally a street in London inhabited largely by hack writers; later, a term applied to all writers paid to produce (often scandalous) stories for London publishers.
3. "The author imagines, that the scribblers of the prevailing [political] party, which he always opposed, will libel him after his death; but that others will remember him with gratitude, who consider the service he had done to Ireland, under the name of M.B. Drapier." [Swift's note refers to the character that Swift constructed in his Drapier's Letters (1724–25) to encourage Irish resistance to the imposition of a new coin, called "Wood's halfpence." He believed that this coin would hurt the Irish economy. See lines 407–08.]
4. Delicate; thus demanding careful diagnosis and treatment.
5. Mrs. Howard, later the countess of Suffolk, was the mistress of the Prince of Wales (later crowned as George II) and the lady of the bed-chamber for the Princess of Wales (who became Queen Caroline in 1727). She "professed much friendship for the Dean" [Swift's note]. In the spleen: in low spirits (ironic, as "laughing" in the next line indicates).
6. According to Swift, the princess commanded him "a dozen times" to visit her; he finally did so on "the advice of friends," and then, in return, he "taxed" (asked) the princess for a present worth ten pounds. She promised him some medals, but they were not ready when he returned to Ireland, and later, "she forgot them, or thought them too dear"

185 I promised him, I own; but when?
I only was the Princess then;
But now, as consort of the King,
You know, 'tis quite a different thing."
Now Chartres,[7] at Sir Robert's levee,
190 Tells with a sneer the tidings heavy:
"Why, is he dead without his shoes?"[8]
Cries Bob,[9] "I'm sorry for the news:
Oh, were the wretch but living still,
And in his place my good friend Will![1]
195 Or had a miter° on his head, bishop's hat
Provided Bolingbroke[2] were dead!"
Now Curll his shop from rubbish drains.[3]
Three genuine tomes of Swift's remains!
And then, to make them pass° the glibber,° sell / better
200 Revised by Tibbalds, Moore, and Cibber.[4]
He'll treat me as he does my betters,
Publish my will, my life, my letters;
Revive the libels born to die,
Which Pope must bear, as well as I.
205 Here shift the scene, to represent
How those I love my death lament.
Poor Pope will grieve a month, and Gay
A week, and Arbuthnot a day.
St. John himself will scarce forbear° refrain
210 To bite his pen, and drop a tear.
The rest will give a shrug, and cry,
"I'm sorry—but we all must die!"
Indifference clad in wisdom's guise
All fortitude of mind supplies:

(expensive). Swift's note continues: "The Dean, being in Ireland, sent Mrs. Howard a piece of Indian plaid made in that kingdom [Ireland]: which the Queen [on] seeing[,] took from her, and wore it herself and sent to the Dean for as much as would clothe herself and her children, desiring he would send charge of it. He did the former. It cost thirty-five pounds, but he said he would have nothing except the medals. He was the summer following in England, was treated as usual, and she being then Queen, the Dean was promised a settlement in England, but returned as he went, and, instead of favor or medals, hath been ever since under her Majesty's displeasure."

7. Francis Charteris was "a most infamous, vile scoundrel, grown from a foot-boy, or worse, to a prodigious fortune" [Swift's note]. Charteris was convicted of rape and then pardoned by Robert Walpole in 1730 after "sacrificing a great part of his fortune," according to Swift. A "levee," or rising, is a morning audience held in an important person's bedroom.

8. I.e., did he die in his bed rather than in the violent fashion that Swift imagines Walpole preferring?

9. "Sir Robert Walpole, Chief Minister of State, treated the Dean, in 1726, with great distinction, invited him to dinner . . . with the Dean's friends chosen on purpose; appointed an hour to talk with him of Ireland, to which kingdom and people the Dean found him no great friend. . . . The Dean would see him no more [and Walpole, in turn] would never see him again" [Swift's note].

1. "Mr. William Pulteney, from being Mr. Walpole's intimate friend, detesting his Administration, opposed his measures, and joined with my Lord Bolingbroke, to represent his [Walpole's] conduct in an excellent paper, called Craftsman, which is still continued" [Swift's note].

2. "Henry St. John, Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, Secretary of State to Queen Anne of blessed memory [i.e., Anne Stuart, who reigned before George I]. He is reckoned the most universal genius in Europe; Walpole dreading his abilities, treated him most injuriously, working with King George, who forgot his promise of restoring the said Lord, upon the restless importunity [pleading] of Walpole" [Swift's note].

3. "Edmund Curll hath been the most infamous bookseller of any age or country: his character in part may be found in Mr. Pope's Dunciad. He [Curll] published three volumes all charged on [attributed to] the Dean, who never writ three pages of them: he hath used many of the Dean's friends in almost as vile a manner" [Swift's note].

4. "Three stupid verse writers in London, the last to the shame of the court, and the highest disgrace to wit and learning, was made Laureate" [Swift's note]. Lewis Theobald (1688–1744), James Moore Smythe (1702–1734), and Colley Cibber (1671–1757) were all men of letters satirized in Pope's Dunciad.

215 For how can stony bowels melt
In those who never pity felt?[5]
When we are lashed, they kiss the rod,[6]
Resigning to the will of God.
The fools, my juniors by a year,
220 Are tortured with suspense and fear;
Who wisely thought my age a screen,
When death approached, to stand between:
The screen removed, their hearts are trembling;
They mourn for me without dissembling.
225 My female friends, whose tender hearts
Have better learned to act their parts,
Receive the news in doleful dumps:
"The Dean is dead (and what is trumps?)
Then, Lord have mercy on his soul!
230 (Ladies, I'll venture for the vole.)[7]
Six deans, they say, must bear the pall.
(I wish I knew what king to call.)
Madam, your husband will attend
The funeral of so good a friend?"
235 "No, madam, 'tis a shocking sight;
And he's engaged tomorrow night:
My Lady Club would take it ill,
If he should fail her at quadrille.
He loved the Dean—(I lead a heart)
240 But dearest friends; they say, must part.
His time was come; he ran his race;
We hope he's in a better place."
Why do we grieve that friends should die?
No loss more easy to supply.
245 One year is past; a different scene!
No further mention of the Dean,
Who now, alas! no more is missed,
Than if he never did exist.
Where's now this favorite of Apollo?[8]
250 Departed—and his works must follow,
Must undergo the common fate;
His kind of wit is out of date.
Some country squire to Lintot[9] goes,
Inquires for Swift in verse and prose.
255 Says Lintot, "I have heard the name;
He died a year ago."—"The same."
He searches all the shop in vain.
"Sir, you may find them in Duck Lane.[1]
I sent them, with a load of books,
260 Last Monday to the pastry-cook's[2]

5. I.e., how can hard-heartedness dissolve in persons who have never felt pity?
6. Humbly accept chastisement; kissing a monarch's scepter was a gesture of submission to authority.
7. I.e., the female speaker will bid for all the tricks in the popular card game quadrille.
8. Greek and Roman sun god and patron of poets.
9. Bernard Lintot, the London publisher of some of Pope's and Gay's works.
1. "A place in London where old [i.e., secondhand and remaindered] books are sold" [Swift's note].
2. I.e., to be used as wastepaper for wrapping parcels and lining baking dishes.

To fancy they could live a year!
I find you're but a stranger here.
The Dean was famous in his time,
And had a kind of knack at rhyme.
265 His way of writing now is past:
The town has got a better taste.
I keep no antiquated stuff;
But spick and span I have enough.
Pray do but give me leave to show 'em:
270 Here's Colley Cibber's birthday poem.[3]
This ode you never yet have seen.
By Stephen Duck[4] upon the Queen.
Then here's a letter finely penned.
Against the Craftsman[5] and his friend;
275 It clearly shows that all reflection
On ministers is disaffection.
Next, here's Sir Robert's vindication,[6]
And Mr. Henley's last oration.[7]
The hawkers° have not got them yet: street sellers
280 Your honor please to buy a set?
"Here's Woolston's tracts,[8] the twelfth edition;
'Tis read by every politician:
The country members,° when in town, members of Parliament
To all their boroughs° send them down; districts
285 You never met a thing so smart;
The courtiers have them all by heart,
Those maids of honor (who can read)
Are taught to use them for their creed
The reverend author's good intention
290 Has been rewarded with a pension.
He does an honor to his gown,
By brayely running priestcraft down;
He shows, as sure as God's in Gloucester,[9]
That Jesus was a grand impostor;
295 That all his miracles were cheats,
Performed as jugglers do their feats:
The Church had never such a writer;
A shame he has not got a miter!"° bishop's hat
Suppose me dead; and then suppose

3. Cibber, appointed poet laureate in 1730 for political rather than artistic reasons, fulfilled the laureate's duty of writing a poem every year for the monarch's birthday.
4. Agricultural laborer (1705–1756), known as the "thresher poet"; his poetry brought him the notice and patronage of Queen Caroline. Swift mocked him in On Stephen Duck, the Thresher, and Favorite Poet, A Quibbling Epigram (1730).
5. A periodical written in opposition to Walpole from 1726 onwards; the title defines Walpole as a man of "craft" in the sense of "deception"; see Swift's note to line 194.
6. "Walpole hires a set of party scribblers, who do nothing else but write in his defense" [Swift's note].
7. The Rev. John Henley (1692–1756), "lacking both merit and luck to get preferment [advancement] in the established Church" of England, set up a pulpit, or "oratory," of his own, where, "at set times, he delivereth strange speeches, compiled by himself and his associates. . . . He is an absolute dunce, but generally reputed crazy" [Swift's note].
8. "Woolston was a clergyman, but for want of bread, hath in several treatises, in the most blasphemous manner, attempted to turn our Savior and his miracles into ridicule. He is much caressed by many great courtiers, and by all the infidels, and his books read generally by the Court ladies" [Swift's note]. Swift is probably referring to Thomas Woolston (1670–1733), a freethinker who gained notoriety with his Discourses on the Miracles of our Savior.
9. Before the Reformation, Gloucestershire had been rich in monasteries, and hence was proverbially God's home.

300 A club assembled at the Rose;[1]
Where, from discourse of this and that
I grow the subject of their chat.
And while they toss my name about,
With favor some, and some without,
305 One, quite indifferent in the cause,
My character impartial° draws: impartially, without bias
"The Dean, if we believe report,
Was never ill received at court.
As for his works in verse and prose,
310 I own myself no judge of those;
Nor can I tell what critics thought 'em,
But this I know, all people bought 'em,
As with a moral view designed
To cure the vices of mankind.
315 "His vein, ironically grave,
Exposed the fool and lashed the knave,
To steal a hint was never known,
But what he writ was all his own.[2]
"He never thought an honor done him,
320 Because a duke was proud to own him,
Would rather slip aside and choose
To talk with wits in dirty shoes;
Despised the fools with stars and garters,[3]
So often seen caressing Chartres.[4]
325 He never courted men in station,
Nor persons held in admiration;
Of no man's greatness was afraid,
Because he sought for no man's aid.
Though trusted long in great affairs,
330 He gave himself no haughty airs;
Without regarding private ends,
Spent all his credit for his friends;
And only chose the wise and, good;
No flatterers, no allies in blood;
335 But succored° virtue in distress, aided
And seldom failed of good success;
As numbers in their hearts must own° acknowledge
Who, but for him, had been unknown.
"With princes kept a due decorum,
340 But never stood in awe before 'em.[5]
He followed David's lesson just:
In princes never put thy trust:[6]

1. A fashionable tavern popular with playgoers because it was near the Drury Lane Theater.
2. An ironic line, since Swift praises his own originality with a line stolen from Sir John Denham's elegy for another poet, Abraham Cowley (1618–1667; see pp. 470–72): "To him no author was unknown / Yet what he wrote was all his own."
3. Stars and garters were symbols of knighthood and other high honor. Garters were worn by the members of the chivalric order called the Knights of the Garter, membership in which allowed a man to put Sir before his name.
4. See the note to line 189.
5. Two early copies of Swift's poem insert the following lines after line 340, presumably from manuscripts containing some of Swift's corrections to the much revised text (see note 6, p. 577): "And to her majesty, God bless her, / Would speak as free as to her dresser, / She thought it his peculiar whim, / Nor took it ill as come from him." The reference is to Queen Caroline and Lady Suffolk, her "dresser."
6. Cf. Psalm 146.3. David, the second king of Israel, is the biblical Psalmist.

And would you make him truly sour,
Provoke him with a slave in power.
345 The Irish senate if you named,
With what impatience he declaimed!
Fair Liberty was all his cry.
For her he stood prepared to die;
For her he boldly stood alone;
350 For her he oft exposed his own.
Two kingdoms, just as faction led,
Had set a price upon his head,
But not a traitor could be found,
To sell him for six hundred pound.[7]
355 "Had he but spared his tongue and pen,
He might have rose like other men;
But power was never in his thought,
And wealth he valued not a groat:[8]
Ingratitude he often found,
360 And pitied those who meant the wound;
But kept the tenor° of his mind, usual course
To merit well of human kind:
Nor made a sacrifice of those
Who still° were true, to please his foes. always 365 He labored many a fruitless hour,
To reconcile his friends in power;
Saw mischief by a faction brewing,
While they pursued each other's ruin.
But finding vain was all his care,
370 He left the court in mere° despair.[9] complete
"And, oh! how short are human schemes!
Here ended all our golden dreams.
What St. John's skill in state affairs,
What Ormonde's[1] valor, Oxford's cares,
375 To save their sinking country lent,
Was all destroyed by one event.[2]
Too soon that precious life was ended,
On which alone our weal° depended well-being
When up a dangerous faction starts,[3]

7. Two "proclamations," one from the queen in 1713, one from Lord Carteret, a member of the queen's party, in 1724, offered rewards of £300 to anyone who could "discover the author" of, respectively, The Public Spirit of the Whigs and The Drapier's Fourth Letter [for the latter, see note to line 168]; in neither case "was the Dean discovered" [Swift's note].
8. English coin from 1351 until 1662; the equivalent of four pence.
9. In the last months of Queen Anne's life, her Tory "Ministry fell to variance [into dispute]. . . . [Simon] Harcourt the Chancellor, and Lord Bolingbroke the Secretary, were discontented with the Treasurer [Robert Harley, earl of] Oxford, for his too much mildness to the Whig Party. . . . The Dean, who was the only person who endeavored to reconcile them, found it impossible, and thereupon returned to his Deanery in Dublin, where for many years he was worried by the new people in power" [Swift's note].
1. James Butler, duke of Ormonde, who succeeded to the command of the English armies on the Continent when the duke of Marlborough was stripped of his offices by Anne, in 1711. He went into exile in 1714 and was active in Jacobite political intrigues, i.e., efforts to return the Stuart monarchy to the throne. For Bolingbroke and Oxford, see previous note.
2. "In the height of the quarrel between the ministers, the Queen [Anne] died" [Swift's note].
3. After Anne's death, the opposing party, the Whigs, came to power, "which they exercised with the utmost rage and revenge" [Swift's note]. Swift feared for his own safety and considered emigrating to one of the Channel Islands.

380 With wrath and vengeance in their hearts;
By solemn League and Covenant bound,[4]
To ruin, slaughter, and confound;
To turn religion to a fable,
And make the government a Babel;
385 Pervert the laws, disgrace the gown,
Corrupt the senate, rob the crown;
To sacrifice old England's glory,
And make her infamous in story:
When such a tempest shook the land,
390 How could unguarded Virtue stand?
With horror, grief, despair, the Dean
Beheld the dire destructive scene:
His friends in exile, or the Tower,[5]
Himself within the frown of power,
395 Pursued by base envenomed pens,[6]
Far to the land of slaves and fens;[7]
A servile race in folly nursed,
Who truckle° most, when treated worst. cringe obsequiously
"By innocence and resolution,
400 He bore continual persecution;
While numbers to preferment rose,
Whose merits were to be his foes;
When even his own familiar friends,
Intent upon their private ends,
405 Like renegadoes now he feels,
Against him lifting up their heels.[8]
"The Dean did, by his pen, defeat
An infamous destructive cheat;[9]
Taught fools their interest how to know,
410 And gave them arms to ward° the blow. ward off
Envy has owned it was his doing,
To save that hapless land from ruin;
While they who at the steerage[1] stood,
And reaped the profit, sought his blood.
415 "To save them from their evil fate,
In him was held a crime of state.
A wicked monster on the bench,[2]
Whose fury blood could never quench;
As vile and profligate a villain,

4. A reference to the establishment of Scottish Presbyterianism, in 1643; as an Anglican, Swift deplored this development.
5. Bolingbroke was in exile; the Whigs sent Oxford to the Tower of London, where suspected traitors were imprisoned.
6. "Upon the Queen's death, the Dean returned to live in Dublin. . . . Numberless libels were writ against him England, as a Jacobite; he was insulted in the street" [Swift's note].
7. Ireland; fens: wetlands.
8. Cf. Psalm 41.9: "Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me."
9. A reference to the scheme to introduce Wood's copper halfpence into Ireland in 1723–24. See note to line 168.
1. The helm for steering a ship or, metaphorically, public affairs in Ireland.
2. William Whitshed, lord chief justice of the King's Bench of Ireland. In 1720, when the jury refused to find Swift's anonymous pamphlet Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufacture wicked and seditious, Whitshed sent them back nine times hoping to force them to another verdict. Swift further notes that Whitshed "sat as a Judge afterwards on the trial of the printer of the Drapier's Fourth Letter [by Swift; see note to line 168] but the Jury, against all he could say or swear, threw out the bill."

420 As modern Scroggs, or old Tresilian;[3]
Who long all justice had discarded,
Nor feared he God, nor man regarded;[4]
Vowed on the Dean his rage to vent,
And make him of his zeal repent:
425 But Heaven his innocence defends,
The grateful people stand his friends;
Not strains of law, nor judge's frown,
Nor topics° brought to please the crown, charges
Nor witness hired, nor jury picked,
430 Prevail to bring him in convict.
"In exile,[5] with a steady heart,
He spent his life's declining part;
Where folly, pride, and faction sway,
Remote from St. John, Pope, and Gay.
435 "His friendships there, to few confined,
Were always of the middling kind;[6]
No fools of rank, a mongrel breed,
Who fain would pass for lords indeed:
Where titles give no right or power,
440 And peerage is a withered flower;[7]
He would have held it a disgrace,
If such a wretch had known his face.
On rural squires, that kingdom's bane,
He vented oft his wrath in vain;
445 Biennial squires[8] to market brought:
Who sell their souls, and votes for naught;
The nation stripped, go joyful back,
To rob the church, their tenants rack,° torture by excessive rent
Go snacks with rogues and rapparees;[9]
450 And keep the peace[1] to pick up fees;
In every job to have a share,
A jail or barrack to repair;
And turn the tax for public roads,
Commodious to their own abodes.[2]
455 "Perhaps I may allow the Dean
Had too much satire in his vein;
And seemed determined not to starve it,

3. Sir William "Scroggs was Chief Justice under King Charles the Second: his judgment always varied in State trials, according to directions from the [royal] Court." Scroggs was impeached for his misdemeanors in office in 1680. Sir Robert "Tresilian was a wicked Judge, hanged above three hundred years ago [impeached in 1381 and hanged in 1387]" [Swift's note].
4. Cf. Luke 18.2: "There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man."
5. "In Ireland, which he had reason to call a place of exile; to which country nothing could have driven him, but the Queen's death, who had determined to fix him to England" [Swift's note].
6. "The Dean was not acquainted with one single Lord spiritual or temporal. He only conversed with private gentlemen of the clergy or laity, and but a small number of either" [Swift's note; not entirely true].
7. "The peers of Ireland lost a great part of their jurisdiction by one single Act [of 1720] and tamely submitted to this infamous mark of slavery without the least resentment, or remonstrance" [Swift's note].
8. "The Parliament . . . in Ireland meet but once in two years; and after giving five times more than they can afford, return home to reimburse themselves by all country jobs and oppression, of which some few only are here mentioned" [Swift's note].
9. "The highwaymen in Ireland are . . . usually called rapparees, which was a name given to those Irish soldiers who in small parties used . . . to plunder the Protestants" [Swift's note].
1. Act as magistrates.
2. Make the new public turnpike roads more convenient for themselves by having them cross near their homes.

Because no age could more deserve it.
Yet malice never was his aim;
460 He lashed the vice, but spared the name;[3]
No individual could resent,
Where thousands equally were meant;
His satire points at no defect,
But what all mortals may correct;
465 For he abhorred that senseless tribe
Who call it humor when they gibe:
He spared a hump, or crooked nose,
Whose owners set not up for beaux.
True genuine dullness moved his pity,
470 Unless it offered to be witty.
Those who their ignorance confessed,
He ne'er offended with a jest;
But laughed to hear an idiot quote
A verse from Horace[4] learned by rote.
475 "He knew an hundred pleasant stories,
With all the turns of Whigs and Tories:
Was cheerful to his dying day;
And friends would let him have his way.
"He gave the little wealth he had
480 To build a house for fools and mad;[5]
And showed by one satiric touch,
No nation wanted it so much.
That kingdom he hath left his debtor,
I wish it soon may have a better."

ISAAC WATTS
1674–1748

The Day of Judgment

An Ode Attempted in English Sapphic[1]

When the fierce north wind with his airy forces
Rears up the Baltic to a foaming fury,
And the red lightning with a storm of hail comes
Rushing amain° down, violently

5 How the poor sailors stand amazed and tremble,
While the hoarse thunder, like a bloody trumpet,

3. An ironic disclaimer, as this poem shows.
4. Roman poet and satirist (65–8 B.C.E.).
5. Swift's will left a substantial sum for the construction of a mental hospital, the first in Ireland, which was opened in 1757 as St. Patrick's Hospital.
1. A poetic form consisting of quatrains utilizing a meter derived from the ancient Greek poet Sappho.

Roars a loud onset° to the gaping waters, assault
Quick to devour them!

Such shall the noise be and the wild disorder,
10 (If things eternal may be like these earthly)
Such the dire terror, when the great Archangel
Shakes the creation,

Tears the strong pillars of the vault of heaven,
Breaks up old marble, the repose of princes;
15 See the graves open, and the bones arising,
Flames all around 'em!

Hark, the shrill outcries of the guilty wretches!
Lively bright horror and amazing anguish
Stare through their eyelids, while the living worm lies[2]
20 Gnawing within them.

Thoughts like old vultures prey upon their heart-strings,
And the smart° twinges,° when the eye beholds the sharp / pains
Lofty Judge frowning, and a flood of vengeance
Rolling afore him.

25 Hopeless immortals! how they scream and shiver,
While devils push them to the pit wide-yawning
Hideous and gloomy, to receive them headlong
Down to the center.[3]

Stop here, my fancy: (all away ye horrid
30 Doleful° ideas); come, arise to Jesus; gloomy
How He sits God-like! and the saints around him
Throned, yet adoring!

Oh may I sit there when he comes triumphant
Dooming the nations! then ascend to glory
35 While our hosannas[4] all along the passage
Shout the Redeemer.

1706

A Prospect of Heaven Makes Death Easy

There is a land of pure delight
Where saints immortal reign;
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain.

2. In Mark 9.44, Christ describes hell as a place "where their worm dieth not."
3. At the Last Judgment, Christ will judge "all the nations," separating the believers from the unbelievers, casting the unbelievers into hell ("the pit"), and inviting believers to inherit the kingdom of heaven (Matthew 25.31–41).
4. Expressions of great praise.

5 There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers;
Death like a narrow sea divides
This heavenly land from ours.

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
10 Stand dressed in living green:
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.[5]

But timorous° mortals start° and shrink — fearful / recoil
To cross this narrow sea,
15 And linger shivering on the brink,
And fear to launch away.

Oh could we make our doubts remove,° — withdraw
These gloomy doubts that rise,
And see the Canaan that we love,
20 With unbeclouded eyes;

Could we but climb where Moses stood
And view the landscape o'er,[6]
Not Jordan's stream, nor death's cold flood,
Should fright us from the shore.

1707

Our God, Our Help[7]

Our God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal home:

5 Under the shadow of thy throne
Thy saints have dwelt secure;
Sufficient is thine arm alone,
And our defense is sure.

Before the hills in order stood
10 Or earth received her frame,° — shape, structure
From everlasting thou art God,
To endless years the same.

Thy word commands our flesh to dust,
"Return, ye sons of men";[8]

5. Canaan was the land, "flowing with milk and honey" (Joshua 5.6), promised to the Israelites after their forty years of wandering in the wilderness. To reach it they had to cross the Jordan River.
6. Moses was allowed to ascend Mt. Nebo to see the promised land, but was not allowed to enter Canaan because of his sins (Deuteronomy 34.1–4).
7. Originally titled "Man Frail and God Eternal," this hymn derives from Psalm 90.
8. From Psalm 90.3; God's curse after the sin of Adam and Eve: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it was thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Genesis 3.19).

15 All nations rose from earth at first,
And turn to earth again.

A thousand ages in thy sight
Are like an evening gone;
Short as the watch[9] that ends the night
20 Before the rising sun.

The busy tribes of flesh and blood,
With all their lives and cares,
Are carried downwards by thy flood,
And lost in following years.

25 Time, like an ever-rolling stream,
Bears all its sons away;
They fly forgotten, as a dream
Dies at the opening day.

Like flowery fields the nations stand,
30 Pleased with the morning light;
The flowers beneath the mower's hand
Lie withering e'er 'tis night.

Our God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
35 Be thou our guard while troubles last,
And our eternal home.

Psalm 58

Warning to Magistrates[1]

Judges, who rule the world by laws,
Will ye despise the righteous cause,
When th'injur'd poor before you stands?
Dare ye condemn the righteous poor,
5 And let rich sinners 'scape secure,
While gold and greatness bribe your hands?

Have ye forgot or never knew
That God will judge the judges too?
High in the Heavens his justice reigns;
10 Yet you invade the rights of God,
And send your bold decrees abroad
To bind the conscience in your chains.

9. One of the three, four, or five periods into which the night was divided.
1. Cf. the versions of this Psalm and the next one by Mary Sidney (pp. 225–26), from The Massachusetts Bay Psalm Book (pp. 391–93), and by Christopher Smart (pp. 684–86). All of Watts's versions of the Psalms have short, italicized narrative titles.

A poisoned arrow is your tongue,
The arrow sharp, the poison strong,
15 And death attends where e'er it wounds:
You hear no counsels, cries or tears;
So the deaf adder stops her ears
Against the power of charming sounds.

Break out their teeth, eternal God,
20 Those teeth of lions dyed in blood;
And crush the serpents in the dust:
As empty chaff,[2] when whirlwinds rise,
Before the sweeping tempest flies,
So let their hopes and names be lost.

25 Th'Almighty thunders from the sky,
Their grandeur melts, their titles die,
As hills of snow dissolve and run,
Or snails that perish in their slime,
Or births that come before their time,
30 Vain births, that never see the sun.

Thus shall the vengeance of the Lord
Safety and joy to saints afford;
And all that hear shall join and say,
"Sure there's a God that rules on high,
35 "A God that hears his children cry,
"And will their sufferings well repay."

Psalm 114

Miracles Attending Israel's Journey

When Isr'el, freed from Pharaoh's hand,
Left the proud tyrant and his land,[3]
The tribes with cheerful homage own° — acknowledge
Their king; and Judah was his throne.[4]

5 Across the deep their journey lay;
The deep° divides to make them way. — Red Sea
Jordan[5] beheld their march, and led,
With backward current, to his head.

The mountains shook like frighted sheep,
10 Like lambs the little hillocks leap;

2. The husks of the grain separated by threshing or winnowing.
3. I.e., Egypt.
4. Originally (Genesis 29) the name of the fourth son of Jacob and Leah, Judah (which comes from the Hebrew word for praise) came to designate the southern portion of the Israelites' land.
5. River in Palestine that empties into the Dead Sea. For the river's miraculous turning back, see Joshua 3; for the Red Sea's splitting, see Exodus 14.

Not Sinai[6] on her base could stand,
Conscious of sov'reign pow'r at hand.

What pow'r could make the deep divide?
Make Jordan backward roll his tide?
15 Why did ye leap, ye little hills?
And whence the fright that Sinai feels?

Let ev'ry mountain, ev'ry flood,
Retire and know th' approaching God,
The King of Isr'el: see him here!
20 Tremble, thou earth, adore and fear.

He thunders, and all nature mourns;
The rock to standing pools he turns,
Flints spring with fountains at his word,
And fires and seas confess the Lord.

JOHN GAY
1685–1732

Songs from The Beggar's Opera[1]

Act I, Scene viii, Air X—"Thomas, I Cannot,"[2] etc.

Polly. I like a ship in storms was tossed,
Yet afraid to put into land,
For seized in the port the vessel's lost
Whose treasure is contraband.° smuggled goods
5 The waves are laid,
My duty's° paid; tax on imports
O joy beyond expression!
Thus safe ashore
I ask no more;
10 My all is in my possession.

6. Mt. Sinai, the mountain in a desert region south and west of modern-day Israel from which God, according to Exodus 20.1–20, gave the Ten Commandments to Moses. For the miraculous events associated with Sinai during the Israelites' journey out of Egypt, see Exodus 19.16–20.

1. The Beggar's Opera (1728) was the first ballad opera, a type of play in which the action, usually comic, is conveyed in prose interspersed with songs set to traditional or contemporary melodies (each set of lyrics here is sung to a preexisting tune). This opera is a satire of corrupt government, and its comic but realistic characters are the underclass of London. Polly, the daughter of Peacham (an informer and receiver of stolen goods), marries the handsome highwayman, Macheath. Peacham informs against Macheath (both to collect the reward and to rid himself of an unwanted son-in-law). Lucy Lockit, the prison warder's daughter, whom Macheath had previously seduced and promised to marry, effects his escape. Macheath is recaptured and sentenced to hang, but through an absurd twist the play ends happily.
Because all the songs from The Beggar's Opera were published in 1728, we do not print the date for each.

2. A popular song, the tune to which these words are sung; Polly, having secretly married Macheath, has been first violently chided, then forgiven, by her parents.

Act I, Scene ix, Air XI—"A Soldier and a Sailor"[3]

A fox may steal your hens, sir,
A whore your health and pence,° sir, money
Your daughter rob your chest, sir,
Your wife may steal your rest, sir,
5 A thief your goods and plate.
But this is all for picking,° pilfering, petty thievery
With rest, pence, chest and chicken;
It ever was decreed, sir,
If lawyer's hand is fee'd, sir,
10 He steals your whole estate.

Act I, Scene xiii, Air XVI—"Over the Hills, and Far Away"[4]

Mac. Were I laid on Greenland's coast,
And in my arms embraced my lass,
Warm amidst eternal frost,
Too soon the half-year's night would pass.
5 Polly. Were I sold on Indian soil,
Soon as the burning day was closed,
I could mock the sultry toil
When on my charmer's breast reposed.
Mac. And I would love you all the day,
10 Polly. Every night would kiss and play,
Mac. If with me you'd fondly stray
Polly. Over the hills, and far away.

Act II, Scene iv, Air IV—Cotillion[5]

Youth's the season made for joys,
Love is then our duty:
She alone who that employs,
Well deserves her beauty.
5 Let's be gay
While we may,
Beauty's a flower despised in decay.

Chorus. Youth's the season, etc.

Let us drink and sport to-day,
10 Ours is not to-morrow:
Love with youth flies swift away,
Age is naught but sorrow.
Dance and sing,
Time's on the wing,
15 Life never knows the return of spring.

Chorus. Let us drink, etc.

3. Sung by Polly's father, Peacham; Polly's parents worry that Macheath may have several wives, so that if he were to die, her inheritance of his property would come into dispute.
4. Polly fears that Macheath will be deported to a penal settlement; here, they sing about their desire not to be separated.
5. A dance of French origin; Macheath dances and sports with a group of women in a tavern.

Act II, Scene xv, Air XXII—"The Lass of Patie's Mill"[6]

Lucy. I like the fox shall grieve,
Whose mate hath left her side;
Whom hounds, from morn to eve,
Chase o'er the country wide.

5 Where can my lover hide?
Where cheat the wary pack?
If love be not his guide,
He never will come back.

Act III, Scene xiii, Air XXVII—"Green Sleeves"[7]

Since laws were made, for every degree,
To curb vice in others, as well as me,
I wonder we han't better company
Upon Tyburn tree.[8]
5 But gold from law can take out the sting;
And if rich men, like us, were to swing,
'Twould thin the land, such numbers to string
Upon Tyburn tree.

ALEXANDER POPE
1688–1744

From An Essay on Criticism

Part II

Of all the causes which conspire to blind
Man's erring judgment, and misguide the mind,
What the weak head with strongest bias rules,
Is pride, the never-failing vice of fools.
205 Whatever Nature has in worth denied,
She gives in large recruits° of needful pride; supplies
For as in bodies, thus in souls, we find
What wants° in blood and spirits swelled with wind: lacks
Pride, where wit fails, steps in to our defense,
210 And fills up all the mighty void of sense.
If once right reason drives that cloud away,
Truth breaks upon us with resistless day.
Trust not yourself: but your defects to know,
Make use of every friend—and every foe.

6. Lucy has agreed to help Macheath escape, and he has promised to send for her when it is safe.
7. Macheath, recaptured and condemned to hang, sits in his jail cell, drinking and singing.
8. The gallows; Tyburn was a place of public execution in Middlesex until 1783.

215 A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.[1]
There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again.
Fired at first sight with what the Muse imparts,
220 In fearless youth we tempt° the heights of arts, attempt
While from the bounded level of our mind
Short views we take, nor see the lengths behind;
But more advanced, behold with strange surprise
New distant scenes of endless science rise!
225 So pleased at first the towering Alps we try,
Mount o'er the vales,° and seem to tread the sky, valleys
The eternal snows appear already past,
And the first clouds and mountains seem the last;
But, those attained, we tremble to survey
230 The growing labors of the lengthened way,
The increasing prospect tires our wandering eyes,
Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arise!
A perfect judge will read each work of wit
With the same spirit that its author writ:
235 Survey the whole, nor seek slight faults to find
Where Nature moves, and rapture warms the mind;
Nor lose, for that malignant dull delight,
The generous pleasure to be charmed with wit.
But in such lays as neither ebb nor flow,
240 Correctly cold, and regularly low,
That, shunning faults, one quiet tenor keep,
We cannot blame indeed—but we may sleep.
In wit, as nature, what affects our hearts
Is not the exactness of peculiar° parts; particular
245 'Tis not a lip, or eye, we beauty call,
But the joint force and full result of all.
Thus when we view some well-proportioned dome
(The world's just wonder, and even thine, O Rome![2]),
No single parts unequally surprise,
250 All comes united to the admiring eyes:
No monstrous height, or breadth, or length appear;
The whole at once is bold and regular.
Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see,
Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be.
255 In every work regard the writer's end,
Since none can compass more than they intend;
And if the means be just, the conduct true,
Applause, in spite of trivial faults, is due.
As men of breeding, sometimes men of wit,
260 To avoid great errors must the less commit,
Neglect the rules each verbal critic lays,
For not to know some trifles is a praise.

1. The spring in Pieria on Mt. Olympus, sacred to the Muses (in Greek mythology, nine sister goddesses who inspired song, poetry, and the arts and sciences).

2. Refers either to the dome of St. Peter's, i.e., the wonder in (Catholic) Rome; or to the dome of St. Paul's, in London, i.e., a wonder to Rome.

Most critics, fond of some subservient art,
Still make the whole depend upon a part:
265 They talk of principles, but notions prize,
And all to one loved folly sacrifice.
Once on a time La Mancha's knight,[3] they say,
A certain bard encountering on the way,
Discoursed in terms as just, with looks as sage,
270 As e'er could Dennis,[4] of the Grecian stage;
Concluding all were desperate sots and fools
Who durst depart from Aristotle's rules.[5]
Our author, happy in a judge so nice,° overrefined
Produced his play, and begged the knight's advice;
275 Made him observe the subject and the plot,
The manners, passions, unities; what not?
All which exact to rule were brought about,
Were but a combat in the lists° left out. arena
"What! leave the combat out?" exclaims the knight.
280 "Yes, or we must renounce the Stagirite."[6]
"Not so, by Heaven!" he answers in a rage,
"Knights, squires, and steeds must enter on the stage."
"So vast a throng the stage can ne'er contain."
"Then build a new, or act it in a plain."
285 Thus critics of less judgment than caprice,
Curious,° not knowing, not exact, but nice, laboriously careful
Form short ideas, and offend in arts
(As most in manners), by a love to parts.
Some to conceit[7] alone their taste confine,
290 And glittering thoughts struck out at every line;
Pleased with a work where nothing's just or fit,
One glaring chaos and wild heap of wit.
Poets, like painters, thus unskilled to trace
The naked nature and the living grace,
295 With gold and jewels cover every part,
And hide with ornaments their want of art.
True wit is Nature to advantage dressed,
What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed;
Something whose truth convinced at sight we find,
300 That gives us back the image of our mind.
As shades more sweetly recommend the light,
So modest plainness sets off sprightly wit;
For works may have more wit than does them good,
As bodies perish through excess of blood.
305 Others for language all their care express,
And value books, as women men, for dress.
Their praise is still°—the style is excellent; continually
The sense they humbly take upon contènt.° mere acquiescence

3. Don Quixote, hero of Cervantes's novel; but this story comes from a spurious sequel to it, by Don Alonzo Fernandez de Avellaneda.
4. John Dennis (1657–1734), an English critic.
5. Refers to the description of the purpose and forms of tragic drama contained in Aristotle's Poetics.
6. I.e., Aristotle, a native of Stagira. One of his principles was that tragic drama should maintain unity of time and place.
7. Pointed wit, ingenuity and extravagance, or affectation in the use of figures, especially similes and metaphors.

Words are like leaves; and where they most abound,
310 Much fruit of sense beneath is rarely found.
False eloquence, like the prismatic glass,
Its gaudy colors spreads on every place;
The face of Nature we no more survey,
All glares alike, without distinction gay.
315 But true expression, like the unchanging sun,
Clears and improves whate'er it shines upon;
It gilds all objects, but it alters none.
Expression is the dress of thought, and still Appears more decent as more suitable.
320 A vile conceit in pompous words expressed
Is like a clown° in regal purple dressed: peasant
For different styles with different subjects sort,
As several garbs with country, town, and court.
Some by old words to fame have made pretense,
325 Ancients in phrase, mere moderns in their sense.
Such labored nothings, in so strange a style,
Amaze the unlearned, and make the learned smile;
Unlucky as Fungoso[8] in the play,
These sparks with awkward vanity display
330 What the fine gentleman wore yesterday;
And but so mimic ancient wits at best,
As apes our grandsires in their doublets[9] dressed.
In words as fashions the same rule will hold,
Alike fantastic if too new or old:
335 Be not the first by whom the new are tried,
Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.
But most by numbers° judge a poet's song, versification
And smooth or rough with them is right or wrong.
In the bright Muse though thousand charms conspire,
340 Her voice is all these tuneful fools admire,
Who haunt Parnassus[1] but to please their ear,
Not mend their minds; as some to church repair,
Not for the doctrine, but the music there.
These equal syllables alone require,
345 Though oft the ear the open vowels tire,
While expletives[2] their feeble aid do join,
And ten low words oft creep in one dull line:
While they ring round the same unvaried chimes,
With sure returns of still expected rhymes;
350 Where'er you find "the cooling western breeze,"
In the next line, it "whispers through the trees";
If crystal streams "with pleasing murmurs creep,"
The reader's threatened (not in vain) with "sleep";
Then, at the last and only couplet fraught
355 With some unmeaning thing they call a thought,
A needless Alexandrine[3] ends the song
That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.

8. A character in Ben Jonson's comedy Every Man out of His Humor (1599).
9. Jackets in a style popular in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.
1. The mountain in Greece sacred to the Muses.
2. Words added to fill out lines—for example, "do" in this line.
3. A line in iambic hexameter—for example, the next line.

Leave such to tune their own dull rhymes, and know
What's roundly smooth or languishingly slow;
360 And praise the easy vigor of a line
Where Denham's strength and Waller's sweetness join.[4]
True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,
As those move easiest who have learned to dance.
'Tis not enough no harshness gives offense,
365 The sound must seem an echo to the sense.
Soft is the strain when Zephyr° gently blows, the west wind
And the smooth stream in smoother numbers flows;
But when loud surges lash the sounding shore,
The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar.
370 When Ajax[5] strives some rock's vast weight to throw,
The line too labors, and the words move slow;
Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o'er the unbending corn, and skims along the main.
Hear how Timotheus'[6] varied lays surprise,
375 And bid alternate passions fall and rise!
While at each change the son of Libyan Jove[7]
Now burns with glory, and then melts with love;
Now his fierce eyes with sparkling fury glow,
Now sighs steal out, and tears begin to flow:
380 Persians and Greeks like turns of nature[8] found
And the world's victor stood subdued by sound!
The power of music all our hearts allow,
And what Timotheus was is Dryden now.
Avoid extremes; and shun the fault of such 385 Who still are pleased too little or too much.
At every trifle scorn to take offense:
That always shows great pride, or little sense.
Those heads, as stomachs, are not sure the best,
Which nauseate° all, and nothing can digest. vomit
390 Yet let not each gay turn thy rapture move;
For fools admire,° but men of sense approve:[9] wonder
As things seem large which we through mists descry,° perceive
Dullness is ever apt to magnify.
Some foreign writers, some our own despise;
395 The ancients only, or the moderns prize.
Thus wit, like faith, by each man is applied
To one small sect, and all are damned beside.
Meanly they seek the blessing to confine,
And force that sun but on a part to shine,
400 Which not alone the southern wit sublimes,° raises, purifies
But ripens spirits in cold northern climes;
Which from the first has shone on ages past,
Enlights the present, and shall warm the last;

4. John Dryden (1631–1700; see pp. 500–526), whom Pope echoes here, considered Sir John Denham (1615–1669) and Edmund Waller (1606–1687; see pp. 393–94) the principal shapers of the closed pentameter couplet. He distinguished between Denham's "strength" and Waller's "sweetness."

5. The strongest, though not the most intelligent, of the Greek warriors in the war with Troy. He is contrasted with Camilla, a swift-footed messenger of the moon goddess, Diana.

6. The musician in Dryden's "Alexander's Feast."

7. The . . . Jove: Alexander the Great.

8. Comparable alternations of feelings.

9. I.e., only after due deliberation.

Though each may feel increases and decays,
405 And see now clearer and now darker days.
Regard not then if wit be old or new,
But blame the false and value still the true.
Some ne'er advance a judgment of their own,
But catch the spreading notion of the town;
410 They reason and conclude by precedent,
And own° stale nonsense which they ne'er invent. claim as theirs
Some judge of authors' names, not works, and then
Nor praise nor blame the writings, but the men.
Of all this servile herd the worst is he
415 That in proud dullness joins with quality,
A constant critic at the great man's board,° table
To fetch and carry nonsense for my lord.
What woeful stuff this madrigal would be
In some starved hackney° sonneteer or me! for-hire
420 But let a lord once own° the happy lines, acknowledge as his
How the wit brightens! how the style refines!
Before his sacred name flies every fault,
And each exalted stanza teems with thought!
The vulgar thus through imitation err;
425 As oft the learn'd by being singular;° peculiar
So much they scorn the crowd, that if the throng
By chance go right, they purposely go wrong.
So schismatics[1] the plain believers quit,
And are but damned for having too much wit.
430 Some praise at morning what they blame at night,
But always think the last opinion right.
A Muse by these is like a mistress used,
This hour she's idolized, the next abused;
While their weak heads like towns unfortified,
435 'Twixt sense and nonsense daily change their side.
Ask them the cause; they're wiser still, they say;
And still tomorrow's wiser than today.
We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons, no doubt, will think us so.
440 Once school divines[2] this zealous isle o'erspread;
Who knew most sentences[3] was deepest read.
Faith, Gospel, all seemed made to be disputed,
And none had sense enough to be confuted.
Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain
445 Amidst their kindred cobwebs in Duck Lane.[4]
If faith itself has different dresses worn,
What wonder modes in wit should take their turn?
Oft, leaving what is natural and fit,
The current folly proves the ready wit;
450 And authors think their reputation safe,
Which lives as long as fools are pleased to laugh.

1. Those who divide the church on points of theology.
2. Scholastic philosophers such as the Scotists and Thomists (followers of the medieval theologians Duns Scotus and St. Thomas Aquinas) mentioned below.
3. Alludes to Peter Lombard's Book of Sentences, a twelfth-century theological work.
4. A place in London where secondhand and remaindered books were sold.

Some valuing those of their own side or mind,
Still make themselves the measure of mankind:
Fondly° we think we honor merit then, foolishly
455 When we but praise ourselves in other men.
Parties in wit attend on those of state,
And public faction doubles private hate.
Pride, Malice, Folly against Dryden rose,
In various shapes of parsons, critics, beaux;
460 But sense survived, when merry jests were past;
For rising merit will buoy up at last.
Might he return and bless once more our eyes,
New Blackmores and new Milbourns must arise.[5]
Nay, should great Homer lift his awful head,
465 Zoilus[6] again would start up from the dead.
Envy will merit, as its shade,° pursue, ghost
But like a shadow, proves the substance true;
For envied wit, like Sol° eclipsed, makes known the sun
The opposing body's grossness, not its own.
470 When first that sun too powerful beams displays,
It draws up vapors which obscure its rays;
But even those clouds at last adorn its way,
Reflect new glories, and augment the day.
Be thou the first true merit to befriend;
475 His praise is lost who stays till all commend.
Short is the date, alas! of modern rhymes,
And 'tis but just to let them live betimes.° early
No longer now that golden age appears,
When patriarch wits survived a thousand years:
480 Now length of fame (our second life) is lost,
And bare threescore is all even that can boast;
Our sons their fathers' failing language see,
And such as Chaucer is shall Dryden be.
So when the faithful pencil has designed
485 Some bright idea of the master's mind,
Where a new world leaps out at his command,
And ready Nature waits upon his hand;
When the ripe colors soften and unite,
And sweetly melt into just shade and light;
490 When mellowing years their full perfection give,
And each bold figure just begins to live,
The treacherous colors the fair art betray,
And all the bright creation fades away!
Unhappy wit, like most mistaken° things, misunderstood
495 Atones not for that envy which it brings.
In youth alone its empty praise we boast,
But soon the short-lived vanity is lost;
Like some fair flower the early spring supplies,
That gaily blooms, but even in blooming dies,
500 What is this wit, which must our cares employ?

5. Sir Richard Blackmore (1650–1729), physician and poet, had attacked Dryden for the immorality of his plays; the Rev. Luke Milbourne (1649–1720) had attacked his translation of Virgil.
6. A Greek critic of the fourth century B.C.E., who wrote a book of carping criticism of Homer.

The owner's wife, that other men enjoy;
Then most our trouble still when most admired,
And still the more we give, the more required;
Whose fame with pains we guard, but lose with ease,
505 Sure some to vex, but never all to please;
'Tis what the vicious fear, the virtuous shun,
By fools 'tis hated, and by knaves undone!
If wit so much from ignorance undergo,
Ah, let not learning too commence its foe!
510 Of old those met rewards who could excel,
And such were praised who but endeavored well;
Though triumphs were to generals only due,
Crowns were reserved to grace the soldiers too.
Now they who reach Parnassus' lofty crown
515 Employ their pains to spurn some others down;
And while self-love each jealous writer rules,
Contending wits become the sport of fools;
But still the worst with most regret commend,
For each ill author is as bad a friend.
520 To what base ends, and by what abject ways,
Are morals urged through sacred° lust of praise! accursed
Ah, ne'er so dire a thirst of glory boast,
Nor in the critic let the man be lost!
Good nature and good sense must ever join;
525 To err is human, to forgive divine.
But if in the noble minds some dregs remain
Nor yet purged off, spleen and sour disdain,
Discharge that rage on more provoking crimes,
Nor fear a dearth in these flagitious° times. shameful, wicked
530 No pardon vile obscenity should find,
Though wit and art conspire to move your mind;
But dullness with obscenity must prove
As shameful sure as impotence in love.
In the fat age of pleasure, wealth, and ease
535 Sprung the rank weed, and thrived with large increase:
When love was all an easy monarch's[7] care,
Seldom at council, never in a war;
Jilts° ruled the state, and statesmen farces writ; king's mistresses
Nay, wits had pensions, and young lords had wit;
540 The fair sat panting at a courtier's play,
And not a mask[8] went unimproved away;
The modest fan was lifted up no more,
And virgins smiled at what they blushed before.
The following license of a foreign reign[9]
545 Did all the dregs of bold Socinus[1] drain;
Then unbelieving priests reformed the nation,
And taught more pleasant methods of salvation;
Where Heaven's free subjects might their rights dispute,

7. Charles II, king of England from 1660 to 1685. The following lines describe the corruption of morals and letters under this recently dead monarch.
8. A woman in a mask, as at a masquerade.
9. That of William III, king of England from 1689 to 1702. He was born in Holland.
1. The name of two sixteenth-century Italian theologians who denied the divinity of Jesus.

Lest God himself should seem too absolute;
550 Pulpits their sacred satire learned to spare,
And Vice admired to find a flatterer there!
Encouraged thus, wit's Titans[2] braved the skies,
And the press groaned with licensed blasphemies.
These monsters, critics! with your darts engage,
555 Here point your thunder, and exhaust your rage!
Yet shun their fault, who, scandalously nice,° overrefined
Will needs mistake[3] an author into vice;
All seems infected that the infected spy,
As all looks yellow to the jaundiced eye.

The Rape of the Lock

An Heroi-Comical Poem in Five Cantos[4]

Nolueram, Belinda, tuos violare capillos; sed juvat hoc precibus me tribuisse tuis.[5]

—MARTIAL

CANTO I

What dire offense from amorous causes springs,
What mighty contests rise from trivial things,
I sing—This verse to Caryll, Muse! is due:
This, even Belinda may vouchsafe to view:
5 Slight is the subject, but not so the praise,
If she inspire, and he approve my lays.° songs
Say what strange motive, Goddess! could compel
A well-bred lord to assault a gentle belle?
Oh, say what stranger cause, yet unexplored,
10 Could make a gentle belle reject a lord?
In tasks so bold can little men engage,
And in soft bosoms dwells such mighty rage?
Sol° through white curtains shot a timorous ray, the sun
And oped those eyes that must eclipse the day.[6]
15 Now lapdogs give themselves the rousing shake,
And sleepless lovers just at twelve awake:
Thrice rung the bell, the slipper knocked the ground,[7]

2. Primordial giants, whose rule over Earth was broken by the Olympian gods.
3. I.e., give a wrong meaning to (an author's writings).
4. Based on an actual incident. A young man, Lord Petre, had sportively cut off a lock of a Miss Arabella Fermor's hair. She and her family were angered by the prank, and Pope's friend John Caryll (line 3), a relative of Lord Petre's, asked the poet to turn the incident into jest, so that good relations (and possibly negotiations toward a marriage between the principals) might be resumed. Pope responded by treating the incident in a mock epic, or "heroi-comical poem." The epic conventions first encountered are the immediate statement of the topic, which the poet says he will "sing" as if in oral recitation, and the request to the Muse (line 7) to grant him the necessary insight. In Greek mythology, the Muses were nine sister goddesses who presided over poetry, song, and the arts and sciences.
5. I did not want, Belinda, to violate your locks, but it pleases me to have paid this tribute to your prayers (Latin); from the ancient Roman poet Marcus Valerius Martialis. Miss Fermor did not in fact request the poem.
6. The eyes of lovely young women—though Belinda is still asleep.
7. These are two ways of summoning servants.

And the pressed watch returned a silver sound.[8]
Belinda still her downy pillow pressed,
20 Her guardian Sylph[9] prolonged the balmy rest:
'Twas he had summoned to her silent bed
The morning dream that hovered o'er her head.
A youth more glittering than a birthnight beau[1]
(That even in slumber caused her cheek to glow)
25 Seemed to her ear his winning lips to lay,
And thus in whispers said, or seemed to say:
"Fairest of mortals, thou distinguished care° object of care
Of thousand bright inhabitants of air!
If e'er one vision touched thy infant thought,
30 Of all the nurse and all the priest have taught,
Of airy elves by moonlight shadows seen,
The silver token, and the circled green,[2]
Or virgins visited by angel powers,
With golden crowns and wreaths of heavenly flowers,
35 Hear and believe! thy own importance know,
Nor bound thy narrow views to things below.
Some secret truths, from learned pride concealed,
To maids alone and children are revealed:
What though no credit doubting wits may give?
40 The fair and innocent shall still believe.
Know, then, unnumbered spirits round thee fly,
The light militia of the lower sky:
These, though unseen, are ever on the wing,
Hang o'er the box, and hover round the Ring.[3]
45 Think what an equipage thou hast in air,
And view with scorn two pages and a chair.° sedan chair
As now your own, our beings were of old,
And once enclosed in woman's beauteous mold;
Thence, by a soft transition, we repair
50 From earthly vehicles[4] to these of air.
Think not, when woman's transient breath is fled,
That all her vanities at once are dead:
Succeeding vanities she still regards,
And though she plays no more, o'erlooks the cards.
55 Her joy in gilded chariots,° when alive, carriages
And love of ombre,[5] after death survive.
For when the Fair in all their pride expire,
To their first elements their souls retire:[6]

8. In a darkened bed, one discovered the approximate time by a watch that chimed the hour and quarter-hour when the stem was pressed.
9. Air spirit. He accounts for himself in the lines below.
1. Courtier dressed for a royal birthday celebration.
2. The silver token is the coin left by a fairy or elf, and the circled green is a ring of bright green grass, supposed dancing circle of fairies.
3. The box is a theater box; the Ring, the circular carriage course in Hyde Park.
4. Mediums of existence, with a side glance at the fondness of young women for riding in carriages.
5. A popular card game, pronounced omber. See note 9, p. 611.
6. Namely, to fire, water, earth, and air, the four elements of the old cosmology and the several habitats (in the Rosicrucian myths upon which Pope embroiders) of four different kinds of "spirit." Envisaging these spirits as the transmigrated souls of different kinds of women, Pope causes termagants (scolds) to become fire spirits, or Salamanders (line 60); irresolute women to become water spirits, or Nymphs (line 62); prudes, or women who delight in rejection and negation, to become earth spirits, or Gnomes (line 63); and coquettes to become air spirits, or Sylphs (line 65). Since "nymph" could designate either a water spirit or (in literary usage) a young lady, Pope permits his water

The sprites of fiery termagants in flame
60 Mount up, and take a Salamander's name.
Soft yielding minds to water glide away,
And sip, with Nymphs, their elemental tea.
The graver prude sinks downward to a Gnome,
In search of mischief still on earth to roam.
65 The light coquettes in Sylphs aloft repair,
And sport and flutter in the fields of air.
"Know further yet; whoever fair and chaste
Rejects mankind, is by some Sylph embraced:
For spirits, freed from mortal laws, with ease
70 Assume what sexes and what shapes they please.[7]
What guards the purity of melting maids,
In courtly balls, and midnight masquerades,
Safe from the treacherous friend, the daring spark,
The glance by day, the whisper in the dark,
75 When kind occasion prompts their warm desires,
When music softens, and when dancing fires?
'Tis but their Sylph, the wise Celestials know,
Though Honor is the word with men below.
"Some nymphs there are, too conscious of their face,
80 For life predestined to the Gnomes' embrace.
These swell their prospects and exalt their pride,
When offers are disdained, and love denied:
Then gay ideas crowd the vacant brain,
While peers, and dukes, and all their sweeping train,
85 And garters, stars, and coronets[8] appear,
And in soft sounds, 'your Grace' salutes their ear.
'Tis these that early taint the female soul,
Instruct the eyes of young coquettes to roll,
Teach infant cheeks a bidden blush to know,
90 And little hearts to flutter at a beau.
"Oft, when the world° imagine women stray, fashionable people
The Sylphs through mystic mazes guide their way,
Through all the giddy circle they pursue,
And old impertinence° expel by new. trifle
95 What tender maid but must a victim fall
To one man's treat, but for another's ball?
When Florio speaks what virgin could withstand,
If gentle Damon[9] did not squeeze her hand?
With varying vanities, from every part,
100 They shift the moving toyshop of their heart;
Where wigs with wigs, with sword-knots sword-knots strive,[1]
Beaux banish beaux, and coaches coaches drive.
This erring mortals levity may call;
Oh, blind to truth! the Sylphs contrive it all.
105 "Of these am I, who thy protection claim,
A watchful sprite, and Ariel is my name.
Late, as I ranged the crystal wilds of air,

spirits to claim tea (pronounced tay) as their native element (line 62) and to keep their former company at tea parties.
7. Like Milton's angels (Paradise Lost 1.423 ff.).
8. Insignia of rank and court status.
9. Like Florio, a conventional poetic name.
1. Sword knots are ribbons tied to hilts. The verbal repetition and the tangled syntax recall descriptions of the throng and press of battle appearing in English translations of classical epic.

In the clear mirror of thy ruling star
I saw, alas! some dread event impend,
110 Ere to the main[2] this morning sun descend,
But Heaven reveals not what, or how, or where:
Warned by the Sylph, O pious maid, beware!
This to disclose is all thy guardian can:
Beware of all, but most beware of Man!"
115 He said; when Shock,[3] who thought she slept too long,
Leaped up, and waked his mistress with his tongue.
'Twas then, Belinda, if report say true,
Thy eyes first opened on a billet-doux;[4]
Wounds, charms, and ardors were no sooner read,
120 But all the vision vanished from thy head.
And now, unveiled, the toilet stands displayed,
Each silver vase in mystic order laid.
First, robed in white, the nymph intent adores,
With head uncovered, the cosmetic powers.
125 A heavenly image in the glass[5] appears;
To that she bends, to that her eyes she rears.
The inferior priestess, at her altar's side,
Trembling begins the sacred rites of pride.
Unnumbered treasures ope at once, and here
130 The various offerings of the world appear;
From each she nicely culls with curious toil,
And decks the goddess with the glittering spoil.
This casket India's glowing gems unlocks,
And all Arabia[6] breathes from yonder box.
135 The tortoise here and elephant unite,
Transformed to combs, the speckled and the white.
Here files of pins extend their shining rows,
Puffs, powders, patches, Bibles, billet-doux.
Now awful° Beauty put on all its arms; awe-inspiring
140 The fair each moment rises in her charms,
Repairs her smiles, awakens every grace,
And calls forth all the wonders of her face;
Sees by degrees a purer blush arise,
And keener lightnings quicken in her eyes.
145 The busy Sylphs surround their darling care,
These set the head, and those divide the hair,
Some fold the sleeve, whilst others plait the gown;
And Betty's praised for labors not her own.

CANTO II

Not with more glories, in the ethereal plain,° sky
The sun first rises o'er the purpled main,° sea
Than, issuing forth, the rival of his beams[7]
Launched on the bosom of the silver Thames.

2. Broad expanse of land or sea.
3. A name for lapdogs (like "Poll" for parrots; see 4.164 [p. 618]); they looked like little "shocks" of hair.
4. A love letter. The affected language of the fashionable love letter is exhibited in the next line.
5. The mirror. Her image is the object of veneration, the "goddess" named later. Belinda presides over the appropriate rites. Betty, her maid, is the "inferior priestess."
6. (Source of) perfumes.
7. I.e., Belinda. She is en route to Hampton Court, a royal palace some twelve miles up the river Thames from London.

5 Fair nymphs and well-dressed youths around her shone,
But every eye was fixed on her alone.
On her white breast a sparkling cross she wore,
Which Jews might kiss, and infidels adore.
Her lively looks a sprightly mind disclose,
10 Quick as her eyes, and as unfixed as those:
Favors to none, to all she smiles extends;
Oft she rejects, but never once offends.
Bright as the sun, her eyes the gazers strike,
And, like the sun, they shine on all alike.
15 Yet graceful ease, and sweetness void of pride,
Might hide her faults, if belles had faults to hide:
If to her share some female errors fall,
Look on her face, and you'll forget 'em all.
This nymph, to the destruction of mankind,
20 Nourished two locks which graceful hung behind
In equal curls, and well conspired to deck
With shining ringlets the smooth ivory neck.
Love in these labyrinths his slaves detains,
And mighty hearts are held in slender chains.
25 With hairy springes° we the birds betray, snares
Slight lines of hair surprise the finny prey,
Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare,
And beauty draws us with a single hair.
The adventurous Baron the bright locks admired,
30 He saw, he wished, and to the prize aspired.
Resolved to win, he meditates the way,
By force to ravish, or by fraud betray;
For when success a lover's toil attends,
Few ask if fraud or force attained his ends.
35 For this, ere Phoebus[8] rose, he had implored
Propitious Heaven, and every power adored,
But chiefly Love—to Love an altar built,
Of twelve vast French romances, neatly gilt.
There lay three garters, half a pair of gloves,
40 And all the trophies of his former loves.
With tender billet-doux he lights the pyre,
And breathes three amorous sighs to raise the fire.
Then prostrate falls, and begs with ardent eyes
Soon to obtain, and long possess the prize:
45 The powers gave ear, and granted half his prayer,
The rest the winds dispersed in empty air.
But now secure the painted vessel glides,
The sunbeams trembling on the floating tides,
While melting music steals upon the sky,
50 And softened sounds along the waters die.
Smooth flow the waves, the zephyrs° gently play, west winds
Belinda smiled, and all the world was gay.
All but the Sylph—with careful thoughts oppressed,
The impending woe sat heavy on his breast.
55 He summons straight his denizens° of air; inhabitants

8. Apollo, Greek and Roman god of the sun.

The lucid squadrons round the sails repair:° assemble
Soft o'er the shrouds aërial whispers breathe
That seemed but zephyrs to the train beneath.
Some to the sun their insect-wings unfold,
60 Waft on the breeze, or sink in clouds of gold.
Transparent forms too fine for mortal sight,
Their fluid bodies half dissolved in light,
Loose to the wind their airy garments flew,
Thin glittering textures of the filmy dew,[9]
65 Dipped in the richest tincture of the skies,
Where light disports in ever-mingling dyes,
While every beam new transient colors flings,
Colors that change whene'er they wave their wings.
Amid the circle, on the gilded mast,
70 Superior by the head was Ariel placed;
His purple pinions opening to the sun,
He raised his azure wand, and thus begun:
"Ye Sylphs and Sylphids, to your chief give ear!
Fays, Fairies, Genii, Elves, and Daemons, hear!
75 Ye know the spheres and various tasks assigned
By laws eternal to the aërial kind.
Some in the fields of purest ether play,
And bask and whiten in the blaze of day.
Some guide the course of wandering orbs on high,
80 Or roll the planets through the boundless sky.
Some less refined, beneath the moon's pale light
Pursue the stars that shoot athwart the night,
Or suck the mists in grosser air below,
Or dip their pinions in the painted bow,° rainbow
85 Or brew fierce tempests on the wintry main,
Or o'er the glebe° distill the kindly rain. farmland
Others on earth o'er human race preside,
Watch all their ways, and all their actions guide:
Of these the chief the care of nations own,
90 And guard with arms divine the British Throne.
"Our humbler province is to tend the Fair,
Not a less pleasing, though less glorious care:
To save the powder from too rude a gale,
Nor let the imprisoned essences exhale;
95 To draw fresh colors from the vernal flowers;
To steal from rainbows e'er they drop in showers
A brighter wash;° to curl their waving hairs, cosmetic lotion
Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs;
Nay oft, in dreams invention we bestow,
100 To change a flounce, or add a furbelow.° ornamental pleat
"This day black omens threat the brightest fair,
That e'er deserved a watchful spirit's care;
Some dire disaster, or° by force or slight, whether
But what, or where, the Fates have wrapped in night:
105 Whether the nymph shall break Diana's law,[1]
Or some frail china jar receive a flaw,

9. The supposed material of spider webs.

1. Diana was the goddess of chastity.

Or stain her honor or her new brocade,
Forget her prayers, or miss a masquerade,
Or lose her heart, or necklace, at a ball;
110 Or whether Heaven has doomed that Shock[2] must fall.
Haste, then, ye spirits! to your charge repair:
The fluttering fan be Zephyretta's care;
The drops° to thee, Brillante, we consign; earrings
And, Momentilla, let the watch be thine;
115 Do thou, Crispissa,[3] tend her favorite Lock;
Ariel himself shall be the guard of Shock.
"To fifty chosen Sylphs, of special note,
We trust the important charge, the petticoat;
Oft have we known that sevenfold fence to fail,
120 Though stiff with hoops, and armed with ribs of whale.
Form a strong line about the silver bound,
And guard the wide circumference around.
"Whatever spirit, careless of his charge,
His post neglects, or leaves the fair at large,
125 Shall feel sharp vengeance soon o'ertake his sins,
Be stopped in vials, or transfixed with pins,
Or plunged in lakes of bitter washes lie,
Or wedged whole ages in a bodkin's° eye; large needle's
Gums and pomatums[4] shall his flight restrain,
130 While clogged he beats his silken wings in vain,
Or alum styptics with contracting power
Shrink his thin essence like a riveled° flower: shriveled
Or, as Ixion[5] fixed, the wretch shall feel
The giddy motion of the whirling mill,° cocoa mill
135 In fumes of burning chocolate shall glow,
And tremble at the sea that froths below!"
He spoke; the spirits from the sails descend;
Some, orb in orb, around the nymph extend;
Some thread the mazy ringlets of her hair;
140 Some hang upon the pendants of her ear:
With beating hearts the dire event they wait,
Anxious, and trembling for the birth of Fate.

CANTO III

Close by those meads,° forever crowned with flowers, meadows
Where Thames with pride surveys his rising towers,
There stands a structure of majestic frame,[6]
Which from the neighboring Hampton takes its name.
5 Here Britain's statesmen oft the fall foredoom
Of foreign tyrants and of nymphs at home;
Here thou, great Anna![7] whom three realms obey,
Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea.
Hither the heroes and the nymphs resort,
10 To taste awhile the pleasures of a court;

2. See note to 1.115 (p. 607).
3. To "crisp" is to curl (hair).
4. Scented, apple-based ointments applied to the face and hair.
5. In Greek mythology, a king punished by being bound eternally to a turning wheel.
6. Hampton Court (see note 7, p. 607).
7. Anne, then queen of England.

In various talk the instructive hours they passed,
Who gave the ball, or paid the visit last;
One speaks the glory of the British Queen,
And one describes a charming Indian screen;
15 A third interprets motions, looks, and eyes;
At every word a reputation dies.
Snuff,[8] or the fan, supply each pause of chat,
With singing, laughing, ogling, and all that.
Meanwhile, declining from the noon of day,
20 The sun obliquely shoots his burning ray;
The hungry judges soon the sentence sign,
And wretches hang that jurymen may dine;
The merchant from the Exchange° returns in peace, stock market
And the long labors of the toilet cease.
25 Belinda now, whom thirst of fame invites,
Burns to encounter two adventurous knights,
At ombre[9] singly to decide their doom,
And swells her breast with conquests yet to come.
Straight the three bands prepare in arms° to join, combat
30 Each band the number of the sacred nine.
Soon as she spreads her hand, the aërial guard
Descend, and sit on each important card:
First Ariel perched upon a Matadore,
Then each according to the rank they bore;
35 For Sylphs, yet mindful of their ancient race,
Are, as when women, wondrous fond of place.
Behold, four Kings in majesty revered,
With hoary° whiskers and a forky beard; gray or white
And four fair Queens whose hands sustain a flower,
40 The expressive emblem of their softer power;
Four Knaves in garbs succinct,[1] a trusty band,
Caps on their heads, and halberts[2] in their hand;
And parti°-colored troops, a shining train, variously
Draw forth to combat on the velvet plain.
45 The skillful nymph reviews her force with care;
"Let Spades be trumps!" she said, and trumps they were Now move to war her sable° Matadores, black
In show like leaders of the swarthy Moors.
Spadillio first, unconquerable lord!

8. Pulverized tobacco to be inhaled through the nostrils, chewed, or placed against the gums.
9. This game is like three-handed bridge with some features of poker added. From a deck lacking 8s, 9s, and 10s, nine cards are dealt to each player (line 30) and the rest put in a central pool on the green velvet cloth (line 44) that provides the playing surface. A declarer, called the Ombre (hombre, Spanish for man), commits himself to taking more tricks than either of his opponents individually; hence Belinda's encountering two knights "singly." The declarer, followed by the other players, then selects discards and replenishes his hand with cards drawn sight unseen from the pool (line 45). He proceeds to name his trumps (line 46). The three principal trumps, called Matadors (line 47), always include the black aces. When spades are declared, the Matadors are, in order of value, the ace of spades (Spadille, line 49), the deuce of spades (Manille, line 51), and the ace of clubs (Basto, line 53). The remaining spades fill out the trump suit. In the game here described, Belinda leads out her high trumps (lines 49–56), but the suit breaks badly (line 54); the Baron retains the queen (line 67), with which he presently trumps her king of clubs (line 69). He then leads high diamonds until she is on the verge of a set (Codille, line 92). But she makes her bid at the last trick (line 94), taking his ace of hearts with her king (line 95), this being, in ombre, the highest card in the heart suit.
1. Hemmed up short, not flowing.
2. Weapons combining pike and ax on a single shaft.

50 Led off two captive trumps, and swept the board.
As many more Manillio forced to yield,
And marched a victor from the verdant° field. green
Him Basto followed, but his fate more hard
Gained but one trump and one plebeian card.
55 With his broad saber next, a chief in years,
The hoary Majesty of Spades appears,
Puts forth one manly leg, to sight revealed,
The rest his many-colored robe concealed.
The rebel Knave,° who dares his prince engage, jack
60 Proves the just victim of his royal rage.
Even mighty Pam,[3] that kings and queens o'erthrew
And mowed down armies in the fights of loo,
Sad chance of war! now destitute of aid,
Falls undistinguished by the victor Spade.
65 Thus far both armies to Belinda yield;
Now to the Baron fate inclines the field.
His warlike amazon her host invades,
The imperial consort of the crown of Spades.
The Club's black tyrant first her victim died,
70 Spite of his haughty mien° and barbarous pride. expression
What boots the regal circle on his head,
His giant limbs, in state unwieldy spread?
That long behind he trails his pompous robe.
And of all monarchs only grasps the globe?
75 The Baron now his Diamonds pours apace;
The embroidered King who shows but half his face,
And his refulgent Queen, with powers combined
Of broken troops an easy conquest find.
Clubs, Diamonds, Hearts, in wild disorder seen,
80 With throngs promiscuous strew the level green.
Thus when dispersed a routed army runs,
Of Asia's troops, and Afric's sable sons,
With like confusion different nations fly,
Of various habit,° and of various dye,° dress / color
85 The pierced battalions disunited fall
In heaps on heaps; one fate o'erwhelms them all.
The Knave of Diamonds tries his wily arts,
And wins (oh, shameful chance!) the Queen of Hearts.
At this, the blood the virgin's cheek forsook,
90 A livid paleness spreads o'er all her look;
She sees, and trembles at the approaching ill,
Just in the jaws of ruin, and Codille,
And now (as oft in some distempered state)
On one nice° trick depends the general fate. subtle; particular
95 An Ace of Hearts steps forth: the King unseen
Lurked in her hand, and mourned his captive Queen.
He springs to vengeance with an eager pace,
And falls like thunder on the prostrate Ace.
The nymph exulting fills with shouts the sky,
100 The walls, the woods, and long canals[4] reply.

3. The jack of clubs, paramount trump in the game of loo.

4. Passages between avenues of trees.

O thoughtless mortals! ever blind to fate,
Too soon dejected, and too soon elate:
Sudden these honors shall be snatched away,
And cursed forever this victorious day.
105 For lo! the board° with cups and spoons is crowned, table
The berries crackle, and the mill turns round;[5]
On shining altars of Japan[6] they raise
The silver lamp; the fiery spirits blaze:
From silver spouts the grateful liquors glide,
110 While China's earth[7] receives the smoking tide.
At once they gratify their scent and taste,
And frequent cups prolong the rich repast.
Straight hover round the fair her airy band;
Some, as she sipped, the fuming liquor fanned,
115 Some o'er her lap their careful plumes displayed,
Trembling, and conscious of the rich brocade.
Coffee (which makes the politician wise,
And see through all things with his half-shut eyes)
Sent up in vapors to the Baron's brain
120 New stratagems, the radiant Lock to gain.
Ah, cease, rash youth! desist ere 'tis too late,
Fear the just Gods, and think of Scylla's fate![8]
Changed to a bird, and sent to flit in air,
She dearly pays for Nisus' injured hair!
125 But when to mischief mortals bend their will,
How soon they find fit instruments of ill!
Just then, Clarissa drew with tempting grace
A two-edged weapon from her shining case:
So ladies in romance assist their knight,
130 Present the spear, and arm him for the fight.
He takes the gift with reverence, and extends
The little engine on his fingers' ends;
This just behind Belinda's neck he spread,
As o'er the fragrant steams she bends her head.
135 Swift to the Lock a thousand sprites° repair, spirits
A thousand wings, by turns, blow back the hair,
And thrice they twitched the diamond in her ear,
Thrice she looked back, and thrice the foe drew near.
Just in that instant, anxious Ariel sought
140 The close recesses of the virgin's thought;
As on the nosegay° in her breast reclined, posy
He watched the ideas rising in her mind,
Sudden he viewed, in spite of all her art,
An earthly lover lurking at her heart.
145 Amazed, confused, he found his power expired,[9]
Resigned to fate, and with a sigh retired.
The Peer now spreads the glittering forfex° wide, scissors
To enclose the Lock; now joins it, to divide.

5. As coffee beans are roasted and ground.
6. Lacquered tables.
7. Ceramic cups.
8. In Greek mythology, Scylla cut from the head of her father, Nisus, the lock of hair on which his life depended and gave it to her lover, Minos of Crete, who was besieging Nisus's city. For this she was turned into a seabird relentlessly pursued by an eagle.
9. Belinda, being strongly attracted to the baron (line 144), can no longer merely flirt. She hence passes beyond Ariel's control.

Even then, before the fatal engine closed,
150 A wretched Sylph too fondly interposed;
Fate urged the shears, and cut the Sylph in twain
(But airy substance soon unites again):[1]
The meeting points the sacred hair dissever
From the fair head, forever, and forever!
155 Then flashed the living lightning from her eyes,
And screams of horror rend the affrighted skies.
Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast,
When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last;
Or when rich china vessels fallen from high,
160 In glittering dust and painted fragments lie!
"Let wreaths of triumph now my temples twine,"
The victor cried, "the glorious prize is mine!
While fish in streams, or birds delight in air,
Or in a coach and six the British Fair,
165 As long as Atalantis[2] shall be read,
Or the small pillow grace a lady's bed,
While visits shall be paid on solemn days,
When numerous wax-lights in bright order blaze,[3]
While nymphs take treats, or assignations give,
170 So long my honor, name, and praise shall live!
What Time would spare, from Steel receives its date,° termination
And monuments, like men, submit to fate!
Steel could the labor of the Gods destroy,
And strike to dust the imperial towers of Troy;[4]
175 Steel could the works of mortal pride confound,
And hew triumphal arches to the ground.
What wonder then, fair nymph! thy hairs should feel,
The conquering force of unresisted Steel?"

CANTO IV

But anxious cares the pensive nymph oppressed,
And secret passions labored in her breast.
Not youthful kings in battle seized alive,
Not scornful virgins who their charms survive,
5 Not ardent lovers robbed of all their bliss,
Not ancient ladies when refused a kiss,
Not tyrants fierce that unrepenting die,
Not Cynthia when her manteau's° pinned awry, robe is
E'er felt such rage, resentment, and despair,
10 As thou, sad virgin! for thy ravished hair.
For, that sad moment, when the Sylphs withdrew
And Ariel weeping from Belinda flew,
Umbriel,[5] a dusky, melancholy sprite° spirit

1. Like Milton's angels (Paradise Lost 6.329–31); cf. 1.70 (p. 606).
2. Delarivière Manley's New Atalantis (1709), a set of memoirs that, under thin disguise, recounted actual scandals.
3. I.e., attending the formal evening visits of the previous line.
4. Ancient city-state that, according to Greek mythology, was built by the gods Apollo and Poseidon and destroyed by the Greeks at the end of the Trojan War.
5. Suggesting umbra, shadow; and umber, brown. The final el of this name is a further reminiscence of Milton's angels: Gabriel, Abdiel, Zophiel. (Cf. 1.70 [p. 606] and 3.152 [above].)

As ever sullied the fair face of light,
15 Down to the central earth, his proper scene,
Repaired to search the gloomy Cave of Spleen.[6]
Swift on his sooty pinions flits the Gnome,
And in a vapor reached the dismal dome.
No cheerful breeze this sullen region knows,
20 The dreaded east is all the wind that blows.
Here in a grotto, sheltered close from air,
And screened in shades from day's detested glare,
She sighs forever on her pensive bed,
Pain at her side, and Megrim° at her head. migraine
25 Two handmaids wait° the throne: alike in place, attend
But differing far in figure and in face.
Here stood Ill-Nature like an ancient maid,
Her wrinkled form in black and white arrayed;
With store of prayers for mornings, nights, and noons,
30 Her hand is filled; her bosom with lampoons.° slanders
There Affectation, with a sickly mien,° appearance
Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen,
Practiced to lisp, and hang the head aside,
Faints into airs, and languishes with pride,
35 On the rich quilt sinks with becoming woe,
Wrapped in a gown, for sickness and for show.
The fair ones feel such maladies as these,
When each new nightdress gives a new disease.
A constant vapor o'er the palace flies,
40 Strange phantoms rising as the mists arise;
Dreadful as hermit's dreams in haunted shades,
Or bright as visions of expiring maids.
Now glaring fiends, and snakes on rolling spires,° coils
Pale specters, gaping tombs, and purple fires;
45 Now lakes of liquid gold, Elysian scenes,
And crystal domes, and angels in machines.[7]
Unnumbered throngs on every side are seen
Of bodies changed to various forms by Spleen.
Here living teapots stand, one arm held out,
50 One bent; the handle this, and that the spout:
A pipkin[8] there, like Homer's tripod, walks;
Here sighs a jar, and there a goose pie talks;
Men prove with child, as powerful fancy works,
And maids, turned bottles, call aloud for corks.
55 Safe passed the Gnome through this fantastic band,
A branch of healing spleenwort[9] in his hand.
Then thus addressed the Power: "Hail, wayward Queen!

6. This journey is formally equivalent to Odysseus's and Aeneas's visits to the underworld. "Spleen" refers to the human organ, the supposed seat of melancholy; hence to melancholy itself. Believed to be induced by misty weather such as the east wind brings (lines 18–20), the condition was also called the "vapors." In its severer manifestations, it tended toward madness; in its milder forms, it issued in peevishness and suspicion. See the poems on "spleen" in this anthology by Anne Finch (p. 558) and Matthew Green (p. 645).

7. These images are 1) the hallucinations of insane melancholy and 2) parodies of stage properties and effects.

8. An earthen pot; it walks like the three-legged stools that Vulcan made for the gods in Iliad 18.

9. A kind of fern, purgative of spleen; suggesting the golden bough that Aeneas bore as a passport to Hades in Aeneid 6.

Who rule the sex to fifty from fifteen:
Parent of vapors and of female wit,
60 Who give the hysteric or poetic fit,
On various tempers act by various ways,
Make some take physic,° others scribble plays; medicine
Who cause the proud their visits to delay,
And send the godly in a pet° to pray. fit of anger
65 A nymph there is that all thy power disdains,
And thousands more in equal mirth maintains.
But oh! if e'er thy Gnome could spoil a grace,
Or raise a pimple on a beauteous face,
Like citron-waters° matrons' cheeks inflame, lemon brandy
70 Or change complexions at a losing game;
If e'er with airy horns I planted heads,[1]
Or rumpled petticoats, or tumbled beds,
Or caused suspicion when no soul was rude,
Or discomposed the headdress of a prude,
75 Or e'er to costive° lapdog gave disease, constipated
Which not the tears of brightest eyes could ease,
Hear me, and touch Belinda with chagrin:° annoyance
That single act gives half the world the spleen."
The Goddess with a discontented air
80 Seems to reject him though she grants his prayer.
A wondrous bag with both her hands she binds,
Like that where once Ulysses held the winds;[2]
There she collects the force of female lungs,
Sighs, sobs, and passions, and the war of tongues.
85 A vial next she fills with fainting fears,
Soft sorrows, melting griefs, and flowing tears.
The Gnome rejoicing bears her gifts away,
Spreads his black wings, and slowly mounts to day.
Sunk in Thalestris'[3] arms the nymph he found,
90 Her eyes dejected and her hair unbound.
Full o'er their heads the swelling bag he rent,
And all the Furies issued at the vent.
Belinda burns with more than mortal ire,
And fierce Thalestris fans the rising fire.
95 "O wretched maid!" she spreads her hands, and cried
(While Hampton's[4] echoes, "Wretched maid!" replied),
"Was it for this you took such constant care
The bodkin,° comb, and essence° to prepare? hairpin / perfume
For this your locks in paper durance bound,
100 For this with torturing irons wreathed around?
For this with fillets° strained your tender head, bands
And bravely bore the double loads of lead?[5]
Gods! shall the ravisher display your hair,
While the fops envy, and the ladies stare!
105 Honor forbid! at whose unrivaled shrine

1. I.e., made men imagine they were being cuckolded.
2. Aeolus, the wind god, enabled Odysseus (Ulysses) so to contain all adverse winds in Odyssey 10.
3. The name of an Amazon; hence a fierce, combative woman.
4. Hampton Court's (see note 7, p. 607).
5. The means by which Belinda's locks were fashioned into a ringlet: lead strips held her curl papers in place.

Ease, pleasure, virtue, all, our sex resign.
Methinks already I your tears survey,
Already hear the horrid things they say,
Already see you a degraded toast,
110 And all your honor in a whisper lost!
How shall I, then, your helpless fame defend?
'Twill then be infamy to seem your friend!
And shall this prize, the inestimable prize,
Exposed through crystal to the gazing eyes,
115 And heightened by the diamond's circling rays,
On that rapacious hand forever blaze?
Sooner shall grass in Hyde Park Circus[6] grow,
And wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow;[7]
Sooner let earth, air, sea, to chaos fall,
120 Men, monkeys, lapdogs, parrots, perish all!"
She said; then raging to Sir Plume repairs,
And bids her beau demand the precious hairs
(Sir Plume of amber snuffbox justly vain,
And the nice° conduct° of a clouded cane). precise / handling
125 With earnest eyes, and round unthinking face,
He first the snuffbox[8] opened, then the case,
And thus broke out—"My Lord, why, what the devil!
Zounds!° damn the lock! 'fore Gad, you must be civil! God's wounds
Plague on't! 'tis past a jest—nay prithee, pox!
130 Give her the hair"—he spoke, and rapped his box.
"It grieves me much," replied the Peer again,
"Who speaks so well should ever speak in vain.
But by this Lock, this sacred Lock I swear
(Which never more shall join its parted hair;
135 Which never more its honors shall renew,
Clipped from the lovely head where late it grew),
That while my nostrils draw the vital air,
This hand, which won it, shall forever wear."
He spoke, and speaking, in proud triumph spread
140 The long-contended honors° of her head. ornaments
But Umbriel, hateful Gnome, forbears not so;
He breaks the vial whence the sorrows flow.
Then see! the nymph in beauteous grief appears,
Her eyes half languishing, half drowned in tears;
145 On her heaved bosom hung her drooping head,
Which with a sigh she raised, and thus she said:
"Forever cursed be this detested day,
Which snatched my best, my favorite curl away!
Happy! ah, ten times happy had I been,
150 If Hampton Court these eyes had never seen!
Yet am not I the first mistaken maid,
By love of courts to numerous ills betrayed.
Oh, had I rather unadmired remained
In some lone isle, or distant northern land;

6. The fashionable carriage course (the "Ring" of 1.44).
7. I.e., the sound of the church bells of St. Mary Le Bow, in the unfashionable commercial section of London.
8. See note 8, p. 611.

155 Where the gilt chariot never marks the way,
Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste bohea!° fine tea
There kept my charms concealed from mortal eye,
Like roses that in deserts bloom and die.
What moved my mind with youthful lords to roam?
160 Oh, had I stayed, and said my prayers at home!
'Twas this the morning omens seemed to tell,
Thrice from my trembling hand the patch box[9] fell;
The tottering china shook without a wind,
Nay, Poll sat mute, and Shock was most unkind!
165 A Sylph too warned me of the threats of fate,
In mystic visions, now believed too late!
See the poor remnants of these slighted hairs!
My hands shall rend what e'en thy rapine spares.
These in two sable ringlets taught to break,
170 Once gave new beauties to the snowy neck;
The sister lock now sits uncouth, alone,
And in its fellow's fate foresees its own;
Uncurled it hands, the fatal shears demands,
And tempts once more thy sacrilegious hands.
175 Oh, hadst thou, cruel! been content to seize Hairs less in sight, or any hairs but these!"

CANTO V

She said: the pitying audience melt in tears.
But Fate and Jove° had stopped the Baron's ears. chief Roman god
In vain Thalestris with reproach assails,
For who can move when fair Belinda fails?
5 Not half so fixed the Trojan could remain,
While Anna begged and Dido raged in vain.[1]
Then grave Clarissa graceful waved her fan;
Silence ensued, and thus the nymph began:
"Say why are beauties praised and honored most,
10 The wise man's passion, and the vain man's toast?
Why decked with all that land and sea afford,
Why angels called, and angel-like adored?
Why round our coaches crowd the white-gloved beaux,
Why bows the side box[2] from its inmost rows?
15 How vain are all these glories, all our pains,
Unless good sense preserve what beauty gains;
That men may say when we the front box grace,
'Behold the first in virtue as in face!'
Oh! if to dance all night, and dress all day,
20 Charmed the smallpox, or chased old age away,
Who would not scorn what housewife's cares produce,
Or who would learn one earthly thing of use?
To patch, nay ogle, might become a saint,
Nor could it sure be such a sin to paint.° apply cosmetics
25 But since, alas! frail beauty must decay,

9. A box for ornamental patches of court plaster worn to accent the face.
1. Aeneas was determined to leave Carthage for Italy, though the enamored queen Dido raved and her sister Anna pleaded with him to stay.
2. I.e., at the theater.

Curled or uncurled, since locks will turn to gray;
Since painted, or not painted, all shall fade,
And she who scorns a man must die a maid;
What then remains but well our power to use,
30 And keep good humor still whate'er we lose?
And trust me, dear, good humor can prevail
When airs, and flights, and screams, and scolding fail.
Beauties in vain their pretty eyes may roll;
Charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul."[3]
35 So spoke the dame, but no applause ensued;
Belinda frowned, Thalestris called her prude.
"To arms, to arms!" the fierce virago cries,
And swift as lightning to the combat flies.
All side in parties, and begin the attack;
40 Fans clap, silks rustle, and tough whalebones crack;
Heroes' and heroines' shouts confusedly rise,
And bass and treble voices strike the skies.
No common weapons in their hands are found,
Like Gods they fight, nor dread a mortal wound.
45 So when bold Homer makes the Gods engage,
And heavenly breasts with human passions rage;
'Gainst Pallas, Mars; Latona, Hermes arms;[4]
And all Olympus rings with loud alarms:
Jove's thunder roars, heaven trembles all around,
50 Blue Neptune[5] storms, the bellowing deeps resound:
Earth shakes her nodding towers, the ground gives way,
And the pale ghosts start at the flash of day!
Triumphant Umbriel on a sconce's° height — mounted candlestick
Clapped his glad wings, and sat to view the fight:
55 Propped on the bodkin spears, the sprites° survey — spirits
The growing combat, or assist the fray.
While through the press enraged Thalestris flies,
And scatters death around from both her eyes,
A beau and witling° perished in the throng, — one of little wit
60 One died in metaphor, and one in song.
"O cruel nymph! a living death I bear,"
Cried Dapperwit, and sunk beside his chair.
A mournful glance Sir Fopling upwards cast,
"Those eyes are made so killing"—was his last.
65 Thus on Maeander's[6] flowery margin lies
The expiring swan, and as he sings he dies.[7]
When bold Sir Plume had drawn Clarissa down,
Chloe stepped in, and killed him with a frown;
She smiled to see the doughty hero slain,
70 But, at her smile, the beau revived again.
Now Jove suspends his golden scales in air,[8]

3. Clarissa's address parallels—indeed, closely parodies Pope's 1709 translation of—a speech in Iliad 12, wherein Sarpedon tells Glaucus that, as leaders of the army, they must justify their privilege by extraordinary prowess.
4. Mars arms against Pallas, and Hermes against Latona, in Iliad 20. The tangled syntax is supposed to mirror the press of battle.
5. Neptune is the Roman god of the sea.
6. A river in Asia Minor noted for its wandering course.
7. The swan was said to sing only before its death.
8. He so weighs the fortunes of war in classical epic.

Weighs the men's wits against the lady's hair;
The doubtful beam long nods from side to side;
At length the wits mount up, the hairs subside.
75 See, fierce Belinda on the Baron flies,
With more than usual lightning in her eyes;
Nor feared the chief the unequal fight to try,
Who sought no more than on his foe to die.[9]
But this bold lord with manly strength endued,
80 She with one finger and a thumb subdued:
Just where the breath of life his nostrils drew,
A charge of snuff the wily virgin threw;
The Gnomes direct, to every atom just,
The pungent grains of titillating dust.
85 Sudden, with starting tears each eye o'erflows,
And the high dome re-echoes to his nose.
"Now meet thy fate," incensed Belinda cried,
And drew a deadly bodkin[1] from her side.
(The same, his ancient personage to deck,
90 Her great-great-grandsire wore about his neck,
In three seal rings; which after, melted down,
Formed a vast buckle for his widow's gown:
Her infant grandame's whistle next it grew,
The bells she jingled, and the whistle blew;
95 Then in a bodkin graced her mother's hairs,
Which long she wore, and now Belinda wears.)
"Boast not my fall," he cried, "insulting foe!
Thou by some other shalt be laid as low.
Nor think to die dejects my lofty mind:
100 All that I dread is leaving you behind!
Rather than so, ah, let me still survive,
And burn in Cupid's flames—but burn alive."
"Restore the Lock!" she cries; and all around
"Restore the Lock!" the vaulted roofs rebound.
105 Not fierce Othello in so loud a strain
Roared for the handkerchief that caused his pain.[2]
But see how oft ambitious aims are crossed,
And chiefs contend till all the prize is lost!
The lock, obtained with guilt, and kept with pain,
110 In every place is sought, but sought in vain:
With such a prize no mortal must be blessed,
So Heaven decrees! with Heaven who can contest?
Some thought it mounted to the lunar sphere,
Since all things lost on earth are treasured there.
115 There heroes' wits are kept in ponderous vases,
And beaux' in snuffboxes and tweezer cases.
There broken vows and deathbed alms are found,
And lovers' hearts with ends of riband bound,
The courtier's promises, and sick man's prayers,
120 The smiles of harlots, and the tears of heirs,

9. I.e., to experience sexual bliss.
1. Here an ornamental hairpin. Its history suggests that of Agamemnon's scepter in Iliad 2. "Seal rings" (line 91) are for impressing seals on letters and legal documents.
2. In Othello 3.4.

Cages for gnats, and chains to yoke a flea,
Dried butterflies, and tomes of casuistry.[3]
But trust the Muse—she saw it upward rise,
Though marked by none but quick, poetic eyes
125 (So Rome's great founder to the heavens withdrew,
To Proculus alone confessed in view);[4]
A sudden star, it shot through liquid° air, clear
And drew behind a radiant trail of hair.
Not Berenice's locks first rose so bright,[5]
130 The heavens bespangling with disheveled light.
The Sylphs behold it kindling as it flies,
And pleased pursue its progress through the skies.
This the beau monde shall from the Mall[6] survey,
And hail with music its propitious ray.
135 This the blest lover shall for Venus[7] take,
And send up vows from Rosamonda's Lake.
This Partridge soon shall view in cloudless skies,
When next he looks through Galileo's eyes;[8]
And hence the egregious wizard shall foredoom
140 The fate of Louis, and the fall of Rome.
Then cease, bright nymph! to mourn thy ravished hair,
Which adds new glory to the shining sphere!
Not all the tresses that fair head can boast,
Shall draw such envy as the Lock you lost.
145 For, after all the murders of your eye,
When, after millions slain, yourself shall die:
When those fair suns shall set, as set they must,
And all those tresses shall be laid in dust,
This Lock the Muse shall consecrate to fame,
150 And 'midst the stars inscribe Belinda's name.

Epistle to Miss Blount[9]

On Her Leaving the Town, after the Coronation

As some fond virgin, whom her mother's care
Drags from the town to wholesome country air,
Just when she learns to roll a melting eye,
And hear a spark,° yet think no danger nigh; beau, gallant
5 From the dear man unwilling she must sever,
Yet takes one kiss before she parts forever:

3. Books of seemingly solid but false reasoning.
4. According to Livy's Early History of Rome, the empire's "founder" and first king, Romulus, vanished in a storm cloud. A senator, Proculus, calmed the citizenry by claiming that Romulus descended from heaven, assured him of Rome's invincibility, then reascended.
5. The locks that the ancient Egyptian queen Berenice dedicated to her husband's safe return were turned into a constellation.
6. A fashionable walk that, like Rosamonda's Lake (line 136), was in St. James's Park.
7. Greek goddess of love and beauty.
8. Galileo's eyes: the telescope. Partridge: John Partridge, a London astrologer who predicted calamities for the enemies of England and Protestantism. Some of Pope's contemporaries had satirized Partridge's annually published predictions in 1708.
9. Teresa Blount, sister of Pope's lifelong friend Martha Blount. The "coronation" was that of George I (1714).

Thus from the world fair Zephalinda[1] flew,
Saw others happy, and with sighs withdrew;
Not that their pleasures caused her discontent;
10 She sighed not that they stayed, but that she went.
  She went to plain-work,° and to purling[2] brooks, needlework
Old-fashioned halls, dull aunts, and croaking rooks:[3]
She went from opera, park, assembly, play,
To morning walks, and prayers three hours a day;
15 To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,° fine tea
To muse, and spill her solitary tea,
Or o'er cold coffee trifle with the spoon,
Count the slow clock, and dine exact at noon;[4]
Divert her eyes with pictures in the fire,
20 Hum half a tune, tell stories to the squire;
Up to her godly garret after seven,
There starve and pray, for that's the way to heaven.
  Some squire, perhaps, you take delight to rack,° torture
Whose game is whist, whose treat a toast in sack;° wine, sherry
25 Who visits with a gun, presents you birds,
Then gives a smacking buss,° and cries—"No words!" kiss
Or with his hounds comes hollowing from the stable,
Makes love with nods and knees beneath a table;
Whose laughs are hearty, though his jests are coarse,
30 And loves you best of all things—but his horse.
  In some fair evening, on your elbow laid,
You dream of triumphs in the rural shade;
In pensive thought recall the fancied scene,
See coronations rise on every green:
35 Before you pass the imaginary sights
Of lords and earls and dukes and gartered knights,
While the spread fan o'ershades your closing eyes;
Then gives one flirt,[5] and all the vision flies.
Thus vanish scepters, coronets, and balls,
40 And leave you in lone woods, or empty walls!
  So when your slave,[6] at some dear idle time
(Not plagued with headaches or the want of rhyme)
Stands in the streets, abstracted from the crew,
And while he seems to study, thinks of you;
45 Just when his fancy points[7] your sprightly eyes,
Or sees the blush of soft Parthenia[8] rise,
Gay[9] pats my shoulder, and you vanish quite;
Streets, chairs,° and coxcombs[1] rush upon my sight; sedan chairs
Vexed to be still in town, I knit my brow,
50 Look sour, and hum a tune—as you may now.

1717

1. A fanciful name adopted by Miss Blount.
2. Gently rippling.
3. Crowlike birds.
4. While fashionable Londoners dined at three or four o'clock, the old-fashioned and rustic might have dined at noon.
5. I.e., suddenly opens and closes her fan.
6. I.e., the speaker, Pope.
7. Focuses or zeroes in on.
8. Martha Blount.
9. The poet John Gay (1685–1732; see pp. 594–96), Pope's friend.

From An Essay on Man, in Four Epistles[2]

TO HENRY ST. JOHN, LORD BOLINGBROKE[3]

From Epistle 1. Of the Nature and State of Man, with Respect to the Universe

Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things
To low ambition, and the pride of kings.
Let us (since life can little more supply
Than just to look about us and to die)
5 Expatiate° free o'er all this scene of man; range; expound
A mighty maze! but not without a plan;
A wild, where weeds and flowers promiscuous shoot,
Or garden, tempting with forbidden fruit.
Together let us beat this ample field,
10 Try what the open, what the covert yield;
The latent° tracts,° the giddy heights, explore hidden / areas
Of all who blindly creep, or sightless soar;
Eye Nature's walks, shoot folly as it flies,
And catch the manners living as they rise;
15 Laugh where we must, be candid° where we can; kindly, frank
But vindicate the ways of God to man.

1. Say first, of God above, or man below,
What can we reason, but from what we know?
Of man, what see we but his station here,
20 From which to reason, or to which refer?
Through worlds unnumbered though the God be known,
'Tis ours to trace him only in our own.
He, who through vast immensity can pierce,
See worlds on worlds compose one universe,
25 Observe how system into system runs,
What other planets circle other suns,
What varied being peoples every star,
May tell why Heaven has made us as we are.
But of this frame the bearings, and the ties,
30 The strong connections, nice dependencies,
Gradations just, has thy pervading soul
Looked through? or can a part contain the whole?

2. In this ambitious poem (from which we include the first four parts of epistle 1), Pope employs what he calls an "epistolary way of writing" to describe humanity's place in the "universal system." Explicitly taking up (and revising) Milton's ambition to "justify the ways of God to men" (Paradise Lost 1.26; see p. 422), Pope states in a prefatory address to the reader that he will initially consider "man in the abstract, his Nature and his State, since, to prove any moral duty, to enforce any moral precept, or to examine the perfection or imperfection of any creature whatsoever, it is necessary first to know what condition and relation it is placed in, and what is the proper end and purpose of its being." Pope tells the reader that he chooses verse over prose because verse comes naturally to him and is more striking and memorable than prose.

3. English statesman (1678–1751), secretary of state in the Tory ministry of 1710–14; now out of political office. He became close friends with Pope after settling near him at Dawley farm. St. John was pronounced sín-jun—a fact important for scanning the poem's first line.

Is the great chain, that draws all to agree,
And drawn supports, upheld by God, or thee?[4]

35 2. Presumptuous man! the reason wouldst thou find,
Why formed so weak, so little, and so blind?
First, if thou canst, the harder reason guess,
Why formed no weaker, blinder, and no less!
Ask of thy mother earth, why oaks are made
40 Taller or stronger than the weeds they shade?
Or ask of yonder argent° fields above, silvery
Why Jove's satellites[5] are less than Jove?
Of systems possible, if 'tis confessed
That Wisdom Infinite must form the best,
45 Where all must full or not coherent be,
And all that rises, rise in due degree;
Then, in the scale of reasoning life, 'tis plain,
There must be, somewhere, such a rank as man:
And all the question (wrangle e'er so long)
50 Is only this, if God has placed him wrong?
Respecting man, whatever wrong we call,
May, must be right, as relative to all.[6]
In human works, though labored on with pain,
A thousand movements scarce one purpose gain;
55 In God's, one single can its end produce;
Yet serves to second too some other use.
So man, who here seems principal alone,
Perhaps acts second to some sphere unknown,
Touches some wheel, or verges to some goal;
60 'Tis but a part we see, and not a whole.
When the proud steed shall know why man restrains
His fiery course, or drives him o'er the plains;
When the dull ox, why now he breaks the clod,° earth
Is now a victim, and now Egypt's god:
65 Then shall man's pride and dullness comprehend
His actions', passions', being's use and end;
Why doing, suffering, checked, impelled; and why
This hour a slave, the next a deity.
Then say not man's imperfect, Heaven in fault;
70 Say rather, man's as perfect as he ought;° ought to be
His knowledge measured to his state and place,
His time a moment, and a point his space.
If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
What matter, soon or late, or here or there?[7]
75 The blest today is as completely so,
As who° began a thousand years ago. whoever

4. The Great Chain of Being is a visual metaphor for a divinely inspired hierarchy that ranks all forms of life from highest to lowest.
5. The planets. Jove (Jupiter) was the chief god of Roman mythology.
6. I.e., what seems wrong in relation to humankind may, indeed must, be right relative to the other parts of the Chain of Being.
7. Lines 73–74 are compressed in syntax and in thought. A possible paraphrase: If perfection is defined as a condition of completeness measured by specific time and place, then variations of time and place do not affect this ideal.

3. Heaven from all creatures hides the book of Fate,
All but the page prescribed, their present state:
From brutes what men, from men what spirits know:
80 Or who could suffer being here below?
The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed today,
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?
Pleased to the last, he crops the flowery food,
And licks the hand just raised to shed his blood.
85 O blindness to the future! kindly given,
That each may fill the circle marked by Heaven:
Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall,
Atoms or systems° into ruin hurled. solar systems
90 And now a bubble burst, and now a world.
Hope humbly then; with trembling pinions soar;
Wait the great teacher Death, and God adore!
What future bliss, he gives not thee to know,
But gives that hope to be thy blessing now.
95 Hope springs eternal in the human breast:
Man never is, but always to be blest:
The soul, uneasy and confined from home,
Rests and expatiates in a life to come.
Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
100 Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind;
His soul proud Science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk, or milky way;
Yet simple Nature to his hope has given,
Behind the cloud-topped hill, an humbler heaven;
105 Some safer world in depth of woods embraced,
Some happier island in the watery waste,
Where slaves once more their native land behold,
No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold!
To be, contents his natural desire,
110 He asks no angel's wing, no seraph's° fire; high-ranking angel's
But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
His faithful dog shall bear him company.

4. Go, wiser thou! and, in thy scale of sense,
Weigh thy opinion against Providence;
115 Call imperfection what thou fancy'st such,
Say, here he gives too little, there too much;
Destroy all creatures for thy sport or gust,° taste
Yet cry, if man's unhappy, God's unjust;
If man alone engross not Heav'n's high care,
120 Alone made perfect here, immortal there:
Snatch from his hand the balance and the rod,
Rejudge his justice, be the God of God!
In pride, in reasoning pride, our error lies;
All quit their sphere, and rush into the skies.
125 Pride still is aiming at the blest abodes,
Men would be angels, angels would be gods.
Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell,

Aspiring to be angels, men rebel:
And who but wishes to invert the laws
130 Of order, sins against the Eternal Cause.

Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot[8]

P. Shut, shut the door, good John![9] (fatigued, I said),
Tie up the knocker, say I'm sick, I'm dead.
The Dog Star[1] rages! nay 'tis past a doubt
All Bedlam, or Parnassus,[2] is let out:
5 Fire in each eye, and papers in each hand,
They rave, recite, and madden round the land.
What walls can guard me, or what shades can hide?
They pierce my thickets, through my grot[3] they glide,
By land, by water, they renew the charge,
10 They stop the chariot,° and they board the barge.[4] carriage
No place is sacred, not the church is free;
Even Sunday shines no Sabbath day to me:
Then from the Mint[5] walks forth the man of rhyme,
Happy to catch me just at dinner time.
15 Is there a parson, much bemused in beer,
A maudlin poetess, a rhyming peer,
A clerk foredoomed his father's soul to cross,
Who pens a stanza when he should engross?[6]
Is there who,° locked from ink and paper, scrawls one who 20 With desperate charcoal round his darkened walls?
All fly to Twit'nam,° and in humble strain Twickenham
Apply to me to keep them mad or vain.
Arthur,[7] whose giddy son neglects the laws,
Imputes to me and my damned works the cause:
25 Poor Cornus[8] sees his frantic wife elope,
And curses wit, and poetry, and Pope.
Friend to my life (which did not you prolong,
The world had wanted many an idle song)
What drop or nostrum° can this plague remove? drug

8. John Arbuthnot (1667–1735), former physician to Queen Anne, was Pope's physician, and friend and literary collaborator of Pope, Swift, and Gay. (See Swift's "Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift, D.S.P.D," esp. lines 53–58 [p. 579].) He had asked Pope to moderate his attacks on his personal and literary enemies and was hence a logical person to whom to address an apology for writing satire.
9. John Serle, Pope's servant.
1. The summer star Sirius, attendant upon crazing heat. In ancient Rome, late summer was a season for public recitations of poetry.
2. Mt. Parnassus, the haunt of the Muses (in Greek mythology, nine sister goddesses who presided over poetry, song, and the arts and sciences). Bedlam: London's Bethlehem Hospital for the insane.
3. Pope's "grotto," one entrance to the grounds of his villa at Twickenham.
4. Pope often traveled from Twickenham to London by water.
5. A sanctuary for debtors. They emerged on Sunday, being everywhere immune from arrest on that day.
6. Prepare legal documents.
7. Arthur Moore, whose son, the playwright James Moore Smythe, had plagiarized some lines from Pope.
8. From cornu, Latin for horn; hence a cuckold.

30 Or which must end me, a fool's wrath or love?
A dire dilemma! either way I'm sped,° ruined
If foes, they write, if friends, they read me dead.
Seized and tied down to judge, how wretched I!
Who can't be silent, and who will not lie.
35 To laugh were want° of goodness and of grace, a lack
And to be grave exceeds all power of face.
I sit with sad° civility, I read sober
With honest anguish and an aching head,
And drop at last, but in unwilling ears,
40 This saving counsel, "Keep your piece nine years."[9]
"Nine years!" cries he, who high in Drury Lane,[1]
Lulled by soft zephyrs° through the broken pane, winds
Rhymes ere he wakes, and prints before term° ends, the publishing season
Obliged by hunger and request of friends:
45 "The piece, you think, is incorrect? why, take it,
I'm all submission, what you'd have it, make it."
Three things another's modest wishes bound,
My friendship, and a prologue, and ten pound.
Pitholeon[2] sends to me: "You know his Grace,
50 I want a patron; ask him for a place."
Pitholeon libeled me—"but here's a letter
Informs you, sir, 'twas when he knew no better.
Dare you refuse him? Curll[3] invites to dine,
He'll write a Journal, or he'll turn divine."[4]
55 Bless me! a packet.—" 'Tis a stranger sues,
A virgin tragedy, an orphan Muse."
If I dislike it, "Furies, death, and rage!"
If I approve, "Commend it to the stage."
There (thank my stars) my whole commission ends,
60 The players and I are, luckily, no friends.
Fired that the house° reject him, " 'Sdeath, I'll print it, playhouse
And shame the fools—Your interest, sir, with Lintot!"[5]
Lintot, dull rogue, will think your price too much.
"Not, sir, if you revise it, and retouch."
65 All my demurs but double his attacks;
At last he whispers, "Do; and we go snacks."° shares
Glad of a quarrel, straight I clap the door,
"Sir, let me see your works and you no more."
'Tis sung, when Midas' ears began to spring
70 (Midas, a sacred person and a king),
His very minister who spied them first
(Some say his queen) was forced to speak, or burst.[6]

9. Horace, Ars Poetica (lines 386–89).
1. The theater district, where the speaker lives in a garret.
2. "A foolish poet of Rhodes, who pretended much to Greek" [Pope's note]. He stands for Leonard Welsted, translator of Longinus and an enemy of Pope's.
3. Edmund Curll, an unscrupulous publisher, derided in Pope's Dunciad.
4. Referring to attacks on Pope in The London Journal and (perhaps) to Welsted's theological writing.
5. Bernard Lintot, an early publisher of Pope.
6. According to Greek mythology, King Midas, preferring Pan's music to Apollo's, was given ass's ears by the affronted god. His barber (in Chaucer's version of the tale, his wife) discovered the ears and, fairly bursting with the secret, whispered it into a hole in the ground. Here, Pope suggests that Prime Minister Walpole and Queen Caroline know that George II is an ass.

And is not mine, my friend, a sorer case,
When every coxcomb perks them in my face?
75 A. Good friend, forbear! you deal in dangerous things.
I'd never name queens, ministers, or kings;
Keep close to ears, and those let asses prick;
'Tis nothing—— P. Nothing? if they bite and kick?
Out with it, Dunciad! let the secret pass,
80 That secret to each fool, that he's an ass:
The truth once told (and wherefore should we lie?)
The queen of Midas slept, and so may I.
You think this cruel? take it for a rule,
No creature smarts° so little as a fool. hurts
85 Let peals of laughter, Codrus![7] round thee break,
Thou unconcerned canst hear the mighty crack.
Pit, box, and gallery in convulsions hurled,
Thou stand'st unshook amidst a bursting world.
Who shames a scribbler? break one cobweb through,
90 He spins the slight, self-pleasing thread anew:
Destroy his fib or sophistry,[8] in vain;
The creature's at his dirty work again,
Throned in the center of his thin designs,
Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines.
95 Whom have I hurt? has poet yet or peer
Lost the arched eyebrow or Parnassian[9] sneer?
And has not Colley[1] still his lord and whore?
His butchers Henley? his freemasons Moore?[2]
Does not one table Bavius still admit?
100 Still to one bishop Philips seem a wit?
Still Sappho—— A. Hold! for God's sake—you'll offend.
No names—be calm—learn prudence of a friend.
I too could write, and I am twice as tall;
But foes like these!—— P. One flatterer's worse than all.
105 Of all mad creatures, if the learn'd are right,
It is the slaver° kills, and not the bite. spittle
A fool quite angry is quite innocent:
Alas! 'tis ten times worse when they repent.
One dedicates in high heroic prose,
110 And ridicules beyond a hundred foes;
One from all Grub Street[3] will my fame defend,
And, more abusive, calls himself my friend.
This prints my letters,[4] that expects a bribe,
And others roar aloud, "Subscribe, subscribe!"[5]
115 There are, who to my person pay their court:
I cough like Horace, and, though lean, am short;

7. Ancient Roman poet ridiculed by Virgil and Juvenal.
8. Seemingly solid but flawed reasoning.
9. Pertaining to poetry and the Muses.
1. Colley Cibber, poet laureate.
2. John Henley (known as "Orator" Henley) was an independent preacher with a mass following. James Moore Smythe was a member of the Masonic order. Bavius (line 99) was a bad poet referred to by Virgil. The bishop of Armagh employed Ambrose Philips (line 100; called "Namby-Pamby" by the wits) as his secretary. "Sappho" (line 101) is the poet Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (1689–1762; see pp. 639–45).
3. The traditional haunt of hack writers.
4. As Curll had done without permission.
5. Pay for copies in advance of publication.

Ammon's great son[6] one shoulder had too high,
Such Ovid's nose, and "Sir! you have an eye—"
Go on, obliging creatures, make me see
120 All that disgraced my betters met in me.
Say for my comfort, languishing in bed,
"Just so immortal Maro° held his head": Virgil
And when I die, be sure you let me know
Great Homer died three thousand years ago.
125 Why did I write? what sin to me unknown
Dipped me in ink, my parents', or my own?
As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame,
I lisped in numbers,° for the numbers came. verses
I left no calling for this idle trade,
130 No duty broke, no father disobeyed.
The Muse but served to ease some friend, not wife,
To help me through this long disease, my life,
To second, Arbuthnot! thy art and care,
And teach the being° you preserved, to bear.° life / endure
135 A. But why then publish? P. Granville the polite,[7]
And knowing Walsh, would tell me I could write;
Well-natured Garth inflamed with early praise,
And Congreve loved, and Swift endured my lays;
The courtly Talbot, Somers, Sheffield, read;
140 Even mitered Rochester[8] would nod the head,
And St. John's[9] self (great Dryden's friends before)
With open arms received one poet more.
Happy my studies, when by these approved!
Happier their author, when by these beloved!
145 From these the world will judge of men and books,
Not from the Bùrnets, Òldmixons, and Cookes.[1]
Soft were my numbers; who could take offense
While pure description held the place of sense?
Like gentle Fanny's[2] was my flowery theme,
150 A painted mistress, or a purling° stream. murmuring
Yet then did Gildon[3] draw his venal quill;
I wished the man a dinner, and sat still.
Yet then did Dennis[4] rave in furious fret;
I never answered, I was not in debt.
155 If want° provoked, or madness made them print, lack
I waged no war with Bedlam or the Mint.[5]
Did some more sober critic come abroad?
If wrong, I smiled; if right, I kissed° the rod.° accepted / punishment
Pains, reading, study are their just pretense,

6. Alexander the Great was called the son, or descendant, of the supreme Libyan god, Ammon.
7. There follow the names of poets and men of letters, Pope's early friends. They were literary elder statesmen, chiefly, who had befriended John Dryden (1631–1700; see pp. 500–526) in his later years.
8. The bishop of Rochester (the miter being a bishop's hat).
9. Pronounced sín-jin's.
1. Thomas Burnet, John Oldmixon, and Arthur Cooke had all attacked Pope or his works.
2. Lord Hervey, satirized as Sporus in lines 305 ff.
3. Charles Gildon, a critic who had, as Pope believed, written against him "venally," to curry favor with the essayist and poet Joseph Addison.
4. John Dennis, who wrote a furious condemnation of Pope's Essay on Criticism.
5. See note 2 to line 4 and note 5 to line 13 above.

160 And all they want is spirit, taste, and sense.
Commas and points they set exactly right,
And 'twere a sin to rob them of their mite.° small coin
Yet ne'er one sprig of laurel graced these ribalds,
From slashing Bentley down to piddling Tibbalds.[6]
165 Each wight° who reads not, and but scans and spells, man
Each word-catcher that lives on syllables,
Even such small critics some regard may claim,
Preserved in Milton's or in Shakespeare's name.
Pretty! in amber to observe the forms
170 Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms!
The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how the devil they got there.
Were others angry? I excused them too;
Well might they rage; I gave them but their due.
175 A man's true merit 'tis not hard to find;
But each man's secret standard in his mind,
That casting weight[7] pride adds to emptiness,
This, who can gratify? for who can guess?
The bard whom pilfered pastorals renown,
180 Who turns a Persian tale for half a crown,[8]
Just writes to make his barrenness appear,
And strains from hard-bound brains eight lines a year:
He, who still wanting, though he lives on theft,
Steals much, spends little, yet has nothing left;
185 And he who now to sense, now nonsense leaning,
Means not, but blunders round about a meaning:
And he whose fustian's° so sublimely bad, pretentious writing's
It is not poetry, but prose run mad:
All these, my modest satire bade translate,
190 And owned that nine such poets made a Tate.[9]
How did they fume, and stamp, and roar, and chafe!
And swear, not Addison[1] himself was safe.
Peace to all such! but were there one whose fires
True Genius kindles, and fair Fame inspires;
195 Blessed with each talent and each art to please,
And born to write, converse, and live with ease:
Should such a man, too fond to rule alone,
Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne;[2]
View him with scornful, yet with jealous eyes,
200 And hate for arts that caused himself to rise;
Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And without sneering, teach the rest to sneer;
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,

6. Richard Bentley, a classical scholar, had edited Paradise Lost with undue license on the grounds that Milton was blind and never saw his text. Lewis Theobald, no wit but a closer scholar than Pope, had exposed the faults of Pope's edition of Shakespeare in a subsequent edition of his own. Laurel: classical symbol of poetic achievement Ribalds: rascals.
7. Weight tipping the scales.
8. Ambrose Philips (named in line 100), who had competed with the youthful Pope as a pastoral poet; author of Persian Tales.
9. Nahum Tate, successor to Dryden as poet laureate. This line adapts the adage that it takes nine tailors to make a man.
1. Joseph Addison, coauthor of The Tatler and The Spectator, and arbiter of polite taste.
2. The Ottoman emperors, Europeans believed, regularly killed their principal kinsmen upon ascending the throne.

Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike;
205 Alike reserved to blame or to commend,
A timorous foe, and a suspicious friend;
Dreading even fools; by flatterers besieged,
And so obliging that he ne'er obliged;
Like Cato, give his little senate laws,[3]
210 And sit attentive to his own applause;
While wits and Templars° every sentence raise, law students
And wonder with a foolish face of praise—
Who but must laugh, if such a man there be?
Who would not weep, if Atticus[4] were he?
215 What though my name stood rubric° on the walls? in red letters
Or plastered posts, with claps,° in capitals? posters
Or smoking forth, a hundred hawkers' load,
On wings of winds came flying all abroad?
I sought no homage from the race that write;
220 I kept, like Asian monarchs, from their sight:
Poems I heeded (now berhymed so long)
No more than thou, great George![5] a birthday song.
I ne'er with wits or witlings° passed my days ones of little wit
To spread about the itch of verse and praise;
225 Nor like a puppy daggled° through the town dragged about
To fetch and carry sing-song up and down;
Nor at rehearsals sweat, and mouthed, and cried,
With handkerchief and orange at my side;
But sick of fops, and poetry, and prate,
230 To Bufo left the whole Castalian state.[6]
Proud as Apollo on his forkèd hill,[7]
Sat full-blown Bufo, puffed by every quill;
Fed with soft dedication all day long,
Horace and he went hand in hand in song.
235 His library (where busts of poets dead
And a true Pindar[8] stood without a head)
Received of wits an undistinguished race,
Who first his judgment asked, and then a place:
Much they extolled his pictures, much his seat,° estate
240 And flattered every day, and some days eat:° ate
Till grown more frugal in his riper days,
He paid some bards with port, and some with praise;
To some a dry° rehearsal was assigned, without performance
And others (harder still) he paid in kind.[9]
245 Dryden alone (what wonder?) came not nigh;
Dryden alone escaped this judging eye:
But still the great have kindness in reserve;

3. Addison, author of the immensely popular tragedy Cato (1713), presided over an admiring company of political and literary partisans at Button's Coffee House. Pope's prologue to Cato includes the line "While Cato gives his little senate laws."
4. A wealthy, wise man of letters (109–32 B.C.E.) and a friend of Cicero; here, a pseudonym for Addison.
5. George II.
6. Pope leaves Bufo the whole republic of letters, named from the spring Castalia, which was sacred to Apollo (Greek and Roman god of poetry) and the Muses. Bufo (Latin for toad), perhaps a composite of Lord Halifax and "Bubo," Bubb Dodington, represents a type of tasteless patron of the arts.
7. The twin peaks of Parnassus, one sacred to Apollo and the other sacred to Dionysus (Greek god of wine).
8. Ancient Greek poet famous for his odes and lyrics.
9. I.e., he read them his poetry in turn.

He helped to bury whom he helped to starve.
May some choice patron bless each gray goose quill!° quill pen
250 May every Bavius have his Bufo still![1]
So when a statesman wants a day's defense,
Or Envy holds a whole week's war with Sense,
Or simple Pride for flattery makes demands,
May dunce by dunce be whistled off my hands!
255 Blessed be the great! for those they take away,
And those they left me—for they left me Gay;[2]
Left me to see neglected genius bloom,
Neglected die, and tell it on his tomb;
Of all thy blameless life the sole return
260 My verse, and Queensberry weeping o'er thy urn!
Oh, let me live my own, and die so too!
("To live and die is all I have to do")[3]
Maintain a poet's dignity and ease,
And see what friends, and read what books I please;
265 Above a patron, though I condescend
Some times to call a minister my friend.
I was not born for courts or great affairs;
I pay my debts, believe, and say my prayers,
Can sleep without a poem in my head,
270 Nor know if Dennis be alive or dead.
Why am I asked what next shall see the light?
Heavens! was I born for nothing but to write?
Has life no joys for me? or (to be grave)
Have I no friend to serve, no soul to save?
275 "I found him close with Swift"—"Indeed? no doubt,"
Cries prating Balbus, "something will come out."
'Tis all in vain, deny it as I will.
"No, such a genius never can lie still,"
And then for mine obligingly mistakes
280 The first lampoon Sir Will or Bubo[4] makes.
Poor guiltless I! and can I choose but smile,
When every coxcomb knows me by my style?
Cursed be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one worthy man my foe,
285 Give Virtue scandal, Innocence a fear,
Or from the soft-eyed virgin steal a tear!
But he who hurts a harmless neighbor's peace,
Insults fallen worth, or Beauty in distress,
Who loves a lie, lame Slander helps about,
290 Who writes a libel, or who copies out:
That fop whose pride affects a patron's name,
Yet absent, wounds an author's honest fame;
Who can your merit selfishly approve,

1. For Bavius, see note 2 to line 98; for Bufo, note 6 to line 230.
2. John Gay (1685–1732; see pp. 594–96), author of The Beggar's Opera, associate of Pope and Swift; befriended (line 260) by the duke and duchess of Queensberry.
3. Quotation from Denham's poem "Of Prudence."
4. Sir William Yonge or Bubb Dodington. Both were Pope's political adversaries as well as, in some degree, silly men.

And show the sense of it without the love;
295 Who has the vanity to call you friend,
Yet wants the honor, injured, to defend;
Who tells whate'er you think, whate'er you say,
And, if he lie not, must at least betray:
Who to the dean and silver bell can swear,
300 And sees at Cannons what was never there:[5]
Who reads but with a lust to misapply,
Make satire a lampoon, and fiction, lie:
A lash like mine no honest man shall dread,
But all such babbling blockheads in his stead.
305 Let Sporus[6] tremble—— A. What? that thing of silk,
Sporus, that mere white curd of ass's milk?
Satire or sense, alas! can Sporus feel?
Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel?
P. Yet let me flap this bug with gilded wings,
310 This painted child of dirt, that stinks and stings;
Whose buzz the witty and the fair annoys,
Yet wit ne'er tastes, and beauty ne'er enjoys;
So well-bred spaniels civilly delight
In mumbling of the game they dare not bite.
315 Eternal smiles his emptiness betray,
As shallow streams run dimpling all the way.
Whether in florid impotence he speaks,
And, as the prompter breathes, the puppet squeaks;
Or at the ear of Eve,[7] familiar toad,
320 Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad,
In puns, or politics, or tales, or lies,
Or spite, or smut, or rhymes, or blasphemies.
His wit all seesaw between that and this,
Now high, now low, now master up, now miss,
325 And he himself one vile antithesis.
Amphibious thing! that acting either part,
The trifling head or the corrupted heart,
Fop at the toilet, flatterer at the board,
Now trips° a lady, and now struts a lord. walks like
330 Eve's tempter thus the rabbins° have expressed, Hebrew scholars
A cherub's face, a reptile all the rest;
Beauty that shocks you, parts° that none will trust, talents
Wit that can creep, and pride that licks the dust.
Not Fortune's worshiper, nor Fashion's fool,
335 Not Lucre's° madman, nor Ambition's tool, Money's
Not proud, nor servile, be one poet's praise,
That if he pleased, he pleased by manly ways:
That flattery, even to kings, he held a shame,
And thought a lie in verse or prose the same:

5. In his Epistle to Burlington, Pope satirized "Timon's Villa," an estate where a silver bell and an obsequious dean invite worshipers to an overstuffed chapel. Mischief-makers had unjustly identified this estate with Cannons, the ostentatious home of Pope's well-wisher the duke of Chandos.
6. Roman eunuch, object of Nero's sexual desires; in the poem, Lord Hervey, a foppish and effeminate courtier who was Pope's personal, political, and literary enemy. He attested his frailty by drinking ass's milk as a tonic.
7. Like Satan in Eden (Paradise Lost 4.790 ff.). Hervey was Queen Caroline's confidant; the word "familiar" suggests a demonic ministrant.

340 That not in fancy's maze he wandered long,
But stooped[8] to truth, and moralized his song:
That not for fame, but Virtue's better end,
He stood the furious foe, the timid friend,
The damning critic, half approving wit,
345 The coxcomb hit, or fearing to be hit;
Laughed at the loss of friends he never had,
The dull, the proud, the wicked, and the mad;
The distant threats of vengeance on his head,
The blow unfelt, the tear he never shed;
350 The tale revived, the lie so oft o'erthrown,
The imputed trash, and dullness not his own;
The morals blackened when the writings 'scape,
The libeled person, and the pictured shape;[9]
Abuse on all he loved, or loved him, spread,
355 A friend in exile, or a father dead;
The whisper,[1] that to greatness still too near,
Perhaps yet vibrates on his sovereign's ear—
Welcome for thee, fair Virtue! all the past!
For thee, fair Virtue! welcome even the last!
360 A. But why insult the poor, affront the great?
P. A knave's a knave to me in every state:
Alike my scorn, if he succeed or fail,
Sporus at court, or Japhet[2] in a jail,
A hireling scribbler, or a hireling peer,
365 Knight of the post[3] corrupt, or of the shire,
If on a pillory, or near a throne,
He gain his prince's ear, or lose his own.
Yet soft by nature, more a dupe than wit,
Sappho can tell you how this man was bit:° deceived
370 This dreaded satirist Dennis will confess
Foe to his pride, but friend to his distress:[4]
So humble, he has knocked at Tibbald's door,
Has drunk with Cibber, nay, has rhymed for Moore.
Full ten years slandered, did he once reply?
375 Three thousand suns went down on Welsted's lie.[5]
To please a mistress one[6] aspersed° his life; maligned
He lashed him not, but let her be his wife.
Let Budgell charge low Grub Street on his quill,
And write whate'er he pleased, except his will;[7]
380 Let the two Curlls, of town and court,[8] abuse
His father, mother, body, soul, and muse.
Yet why? that father held it for a rule,
It was a sin to call our neighbor fool;
That harmless mother thought no wife a whore:

8. Swooped down, perceiving prey (a term from falconry).
9. Cartoons were drawn of Pope's hunched posture.
1. Hervey's whisper to Queen Caroline.
2. Japhet Crook, a forger; his ears were cropped for his crime (line 367). For Sporus, see note 6 to line 305.
3. Knight of the post: professional witness.
4. Pope contributed to a benefit performance for the aging Dennis.
5. Welsted had accused Pope of causing the death of a female admirer.
6. The statesman William Windham.
7. Eustace Budgell (perhaps falsely) attributed to Pope a squib in the Grub-Street Journal charging that Budgell had forged a will.
8. The publisher Edmund Curll and Lord Hervey.

385 Hear this, and spare his family, James Moore![9]
Unspotted names, and memorable long,
If there be force in virtue, or in song.
  Of gentle blood (part shed in honor's cause,
While yet in Britain honor had applause)
390 Each parent sprung—— A. What fortune, pray?—— P. Their own,
And better got than Bestia's[1] from the throne.
Born to no pride, inheriting no strife,
Nor marrying discord in a noble wife,
Stranger to civil and religious rage,
395 The good man walked innoxious° through his age. harmless
No courts he saw, no suits would ever try,
Nor dared an oath, nor hazarded a lie.[2]
Unlearned, he knew no schoolman's subtle art,
No language but the language of the heart.
400 By nature honest, by experience wise,
Healthy by temperance, and by exercise;
His life, though long, to sickness passed unknown,
His death was instant, and without a groan.
Oh, grant me thus to live, and thus to die!
405 Who sprung from kings shall know less joy than I.
  O friend! may each domestic bliss be thine!
Be no unpleasing melancholy mine:
Me, let the tender office long engage,
To rock the cradle of reposing Age,
410 With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,[3]
Make Languor smile, and smooth the bed of Death,
Explore the thought, explain the asking eye,
And keep a while one parent from the sky!
On cares like these if length of days attend,
415 May Heaven, to bless those days, preserve my friend,
Preserve him social, cheerful, and serene,
And just as rich as when he served a Queen![4]
A. Whether that blessing be denied or given,
Thus far was right—the rest belongs to Heaven.

The Universal Prayer

Father of all! in every age,
  In every clime adored,
By saint, by savage, and by sage,
  Jehovah, Jove, or Lord!

9. See lines 23 and 373.
1. A Roman consul who was bribed to arrange a dishonorable peace; here, probably, the duke of Marlborough.
2. He did not take the special oath required of Catholics wanting to enter public life or the professions, nor did he evade by falsehood the restrictions on Catholics.
3. Pope was nursing his sick mother when, in 1731, he wrote these lines (she died in 1733).
4. Arbuthnot, who had sought no professional profit as physician to Queen Anne, continued to earn the same income after her death.

5 Thou Great First Cause,[5] least understood:
Who all my sense confined
To know but this—that thou art good,
And that myself am blind:

Yet gave me, in this dark estate,
10 To see the good from ill;
And binding Nature fast in fate,
Left free the human will.

What conscience dictates to be done,
Or warns me not to do,
15 This, teach me more than Hell to shun,
That, more than Heaven pursue.[6]

What blessings thy free bounty gives,
Let me not cast away;
For God is paid when man receives,
20 To enjoy is to obey.

Yet not to earth's contracted span,
Thy goodness let me bound,
Or think thee Lord alone of man,
When thousand worlds are round:

25 Let not this weak, unknowing hand
Presume thy bolts[7] to throw,
And deal damnation round the land,
On each I judge thy foe.

If I am right, thy grace impart,
30 Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, oh teach my heart
To find that better way.

Save me alike from foolish pride,
Or impious discontent,
35 At aught thy wisdom has denied,
Or aught thy goodness lent.

Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to others show,
40 That mercy show to me.

5. God considered as the first principle, creator of all creatures, cause of all truth and goodness.
6. I.e., teach me to refine my conscience here on Earth instead of concerning myself overmuch with the afterlife.
7. The weapons, thunderbolts, of Zeus, chief Greek god.

Mean though I am, not wholly so
Since quickened by thy breath;
Oh lead me wheresoe'er I go,
Through this day's life or death.

45 This day, be bread and peace[8] my lot:
All else beneath the sun,
Thou know'st if best bestowed or not,
And let thy will be done.

To thee, whose temple is all space,
50 Whose altar, earth, sea, skies!
One chorus let all being raise!
All Nature's incense rise!

ca. 1715 1738

Impromptu

To Lady Winchelsea,
Occasioned by four Satirical Verses on Women Wits,
In The Rape of the Lock[9]

In vain you boast poetic names of yore,
And cite those Sapphos we admire no more:[1]
Fate doomed the fall of every female wit;
But doomed it then, when first Ardelia[2] writ.
5 Of all examples by the world confessed,
I knew Ardelia could not quote the best;
Who, like her mistress on Britannia's throne,
Fights and subdues in quarrels not her own.[3]
To write their praise you but in vain essay;
10 Even while you write, you take that praise away.
Light to the stars the sun does thus restore,
But shines himself till they are seen no more.

ca. 1715 1741

8. Perhaps an allusion to the Lord's Prayer: "Give us this day our daily bread . . ."
9. Ostensibly written casually, without premeditation ("impromptu"), this poem to Anne Finch, countess of Winchilsea (1661–1720), replies to some verses she had sent Pope in response to The Rape of the Lock 4.59–62 (see p. 616). Since these lines, from the "Cave of Spleen" episode, are directed specifically against female poets, and Anne Finch wrote a poem titled "The Spleen" (p. 558), she was probably right in reading Pope's verses as containing a comic slur directed at her. Her initial response to Pope has not survived, but her witty "Answer" to this "Impromptu" was printed in 1717 (p. 565). In a letter to a male friend written in 1713, Pope complained that the experience of hearing Lady Winchilsea read her poetry at a dinner party gave him a headache—an ailment that in the Rape he associates only with women. For another view of spleen—an ailment similar to depression—see the selection from Matthew Green's poem on that subject (p. 645).
1. Applies to all female poets the name of the ancient Greek poet.
2. The name under which Anne Finch sometimes wrote.
3. An allusion to Queen Anne (reigned 1702–14), who involved England in wars (of the Spanish Succession) that Pope viewed as irrelevant to the national interest.

From The Dunciad

[The Triumph of Dulness][4]

In vain, in vain,—the all-composing hour
Resistless° falls: the Muse obeys the power. irresistibly
She[5] comes! she comes! the sable° throne behold black
630 Of Night primeval, and of Chaos old![6]
Before her, Fancy's gilded clouds decay,
And all its varying rainbows die away.
Wit shoots in vain its momentary fires,
The meteor drops, and in a flash expires.
635 As one by one, at dread Medea's strain,
The sickening stars fade off the ethereal plain;[7]
As Argus' eyes by Hermes' wand oppressed,
Closed one by one to everlasting rest;[8]
Thus at her felt approach, and secret might,
640 Art after Art goes out, and all is night.
See skulking Truth to her old cavern fled,[9]
Mountains of casuistry[1] heaped o'er her head!
Philosophy, that leaned on Heaven before,
Shrinks to her second cause,[2] and is no more.
645 Physic° of Metaphysic begs defense, natural science
And Metaphysic calls for aid on Sense!
See Mystery° to Mathematics fly! mystical knowledge
In vain! they gaze, turn giddy, rave, and die.
Religion blushing veils her sacred fires,
650 And unawares Morality expires.
Nor public flame, nor private, dares to shine;
Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine!
Lo! thy dread empire, Chaos is restored;
Light dies before thy uncreating word:[3]
655 Thy hand, great Anarch! lets the curtain fall;
And universal darkness buries all.

1721–25 1747

4. Dunciad (B) 4.627–56.
5. Dulness, the center of a mock-apocalyptic vision in which the light of the arts and sciences is extinguished.
6. Milton, in Paradise Lost 1.543, describes the elements separating heaven and hell as "Chaos and old Night," or disorder and darkness, the first materials of the cosmos.
7. In Seneca's Medea, the stars obey the curse of Medea, a magician and avenger.
8. Hermes, the Greek gods' messenger, charmed the hundred-eyed watchman, Argus, to sleep and then killed him.
9. "Alluding to the saying of Democritus, that Truth lay at the bottom of a deep well" [Pope's note].
1. Discourse about "cases of conscience"; also, overly complex reasoning.
2. In classical philosophy, God is defined as the first cause of all things. Under the sway of Dulness, a materialistic explanation (or "second cause") is substituted.
3. As opposed to God's first creating words in Genesis, "Let there be light."

The Small-Pox

FLAVIA[1]

The wretched Flavia, on her couch reclined,
Thus breathed the anguish of a wounded mind.
A glass° reversed in her right hand she bore, mirror
For now she shunned the face she sought before.
5 "How am I changed! alas! how am I grown
A frightful spectre, to myself unknown!
Where's my complexion? where the radiant bloom,
That promised happiness for years to come?
Then,° with what pleasure I this face surveyed! in the past
10 To look once more, my visits oft delayed!
Charmed with the view, a fresher red would rise,
And a new life shot sparkling from my eyes!
Ah! faithless glass, my wonted° bloom restore! accustomed
Alas! I rave, that bloom is now no more!
15 "The greatest good the gods on men bestow,
Ev'n youth itself, to me is useless now.
There was a time (oh! that I could forget!)
When opera-tickets poured before my feet;
And at the Ring[2] where brightest beauties shine,
20 The earliest cherries of the spring were mine.
Witness, O Lillie, and thou, Motteux, tell,
How much japan[3] these eyes have made you sell.
With what contempt ye saw me oft despise
The humble offer of the raffled prize;
25 For at each raffle still the prize I bore,
With scorn rejected, or with triumph wore.
Now beauty's fled, and presents are no more.
"For me the patriot has the House[4] forsook,
And left debates to catch a passing look;
30 For me the soldier has soft verses writ;
For me the beau° has aimed to be a wit. suitor
For me the wit to nonsense was betrayed;
The gamester has for me his dun° delayed demand for payment

1. Eclogues are traditionally sophisticated, medium-length pastoral poems; see, e.g., Edmund Spenser's "Aprill" (p. 159). In this poem, as in her other five "town" eclogues, Montagu revises the genre, satirizing Londoners' manners and morals through characters given classical (Greek and Roman) names. Here, focusing on "Flavia," Montagu examines a disease that had killed her brother and ten-year-old nephew; she had suffered from it in 1715, but without being badly scarred. She later had her son inoculated for smallpox in Turkey and became a vocal advocate of inoculation when she returned to England in 1718. She wrote various letters and an essay attacking physicians who opposed inoculation and the "fools" who believed in them.
2. A fashionable area in Hyde Park.
3. Japanese work with painted and varnished design; Charles Lillie and Peter Motteux were men of letters who also dealt in Asian goods.
4. I.e., the House of Commons, the lower house of the English Parliament.

And overseen° the card I would have paid.[5] overlooked
35 The bold and haughty by success made vain,
Awed by my eyes, has trembled to complain:
The bashful squire, touched with a wish unknown,
Has dared to speak with spirit not his own:
Fired by one wish, all did alike adore;
40 Now beauty's fled, and lovers are no more.
"As round the room I turn my weeping eyes,
New unaffected scenes of sorrow rise.
Far from my sight that killing picture bear,
The face disfigure, or the canvas tear![6]
45 That picture, which with pride I used to show,
The lost resemblance but upbraids me now.
And thou, my toilette, where I oft have sat,
While hours unheeded passed in deep debate,
How curls should fall, or where a patch[7] to place;
50 If blue or scarlet best became my face;
Now on some happier nymph° your aid bestow; girl
On fairer heads, ye useless jewels, glow!
No borrowed lustre can my charms restore,
Beauty is fled, and dress is now no more.
55 "Ye meaner beauties, I permit you shine;
Go, triumph in the hearts that once were mine;
But, midst your triumphs with confusion know,
'Tis to my ruin all your charms ye owe.
Would pitying heaven restore my wonted° mien,° usual / appearance
60 Ye still might move unthought of and unseen:
But oh, how vain, how wretched is the boast
Of beauty faded, and of empire lost!
What now is left but weeping to deplore
My beauty fled, and empire now no more?
65 "Ye cruel chemists,° what withheld your aid? druggists
Could no pomatums[8] save a trembling maid?
How false and trifling is that art you boast;
No art can give me back my beauty lost!
In tears, surrounded by my friends I lay,
70 Masked o'er, and trembling at the light of day;
Mirmillo[9] came my fortune to deplore
(A golden-headed cane well carved he bore):
Cordials, he cried, my spirits must restore!
Beauty is fled, and spirit is no more!
75 Galen the grave, officious Squirt was there,
With fruitless grief and unavailing care:
Machaon too, the great Machaon, known
By his red cloak and his superior frown;
And why, he cried, this grief and this despair?

5. I.e., underwritten her next bet.
6. The painting is "killing" to her present sense of self because it shows her face as it used to be, unblemished; in anger, she wishes to "disfigure" the painting as the disease has disfigured her.
7. A small piece of silk or court plaster worn on the face to heighten the complexion and attract attention.
8. Scented, apple-based ointments applied to the face and hair.
9. A "Mirmillo," or mermillo, was a type of Roman gladiator typically represented in statues as armed with helmet, oval shield, and a short sword held in front of him. This name, like "Galen," "Squirt," and "Machaon" in the next lines, is a mock-heroic allusion to a contemporary medical expert.

80 You shall again be well, again be fair;
Believe my oath (with that an oath he swore);
False was his oath! my beauty is no more.
"Cease, hapless maid, no more thy tale pursue,
Forsake mankind, and bid the world adieu.
85 Monarchs and beauties rule with equal sway,
All strive to serve, and glory to obey:
Alike unpitied when deposed they grow,
Men mock the idol of their former vow.
"Adieu, ye parks—in some obscure recess,
90 Where gentle streams will weep at my distress,
Where no false friend will in my grief take part,
And mourn my ruin with a joyful heart;
There let me live in some deserted place,
There hide in shades this lost inglorious face.

The Lover: A Ballad

At length, by so much importunity pressed,
Take, Molly,[1] at once, the inside of my breast;
This stupid indifference so often you blame
Is not owing to nature, to fear, or to shame;
5 I am not as cold as a Virgin in lead,[2]
Nor is Sunday's sermon so strong in my head;
I know but too well how time flies along,
That we live but few years and yet fewer are young.

But I hate to be cheated, and never will buy
10 Long years of repentance for moments of joy.
Oh was there a man (but where shall I find Good sense and good nature so equally joined?)
Would value his pleasure, contribute to mine,
Not meanly would boast, nor would lewdly design,° plot
15 Not over severe, yet not stupidly vain,
For I would have the power though not give the pain;

No pedant yet learnèd, not rakehelly° gay like a libertine
Or laughing because he has nothing to say,
To all my whole sex obliging and free,
20 Yet never be fond of any but me;
In public preserve the decorum that's just,
And show in his eyes he is true to his trust,

1. Molly Skerrett, a friend of Montagu, was the mistress of the English statesman Sir Robert Walpole.

2. I.e., an image of the Virgin Mary, either as a leaden statue or as a stained-glass window framed in lead.

Then rarely approach, and respectfully bow,
Yet not fulsomely pert, nor yet foppishly low.

25 But when the long hours of public are past
And we meet with champagne and a chicken at last,
May every fond pleasure that hour endear,
Be banished afar both discretion and fear,
Forgetting or scorning the airs of the crowd
30 He may cease to be formal, and I to be proud,
Till lost in the joy we confess that we live,
And he may be rude, and yet I may forgive.

And that my delight may be solidly fixed,
Let the friend and the lover be handsomely mixed,
35 In whose tender bosom my soul might confide,
Whose kindness can sooth me, whose counsel could guide.
From such a dear lover as here I describe
No danger should fright me, no millions should bribe;
But till this astonishing creature I know,
40 As I long have lived chaste, I will keep myself so.

I never will share with the wanton coquette,
Or be caught by a vain affectation of wit.
The toasters and songsters may try all their art
But never shall enter the pass of my heart.
45 I loathe the lewd rake, the dressed fopling despise;
Before such pursuers the nice° virgin flies; fastidious
And as Ovid has sweetly in parables told
We harden like trees, and like rivers are cold.[3]

A Receipt to Cure the Vapors[4]

I

Why will Delia thus retire,
And idly languish life away?
While the sighing crowd admire,
'Tis too soon for hartshorn tea:[5]

II

5 All those dismal looks and fretting
Cannot Damon's life restore;

3. In Ovid's Metamorphoses, two nymphs (minor nature goddesses) escape from gods: Daphne, fleeing from Apollo, is turned into a laurel; Arethusa, fleeing from Alpheus, becomes a fountain.
4. This poem was apparently written to Lady Anne Irwin, widowed eight or nine years previously and addressed here under the stereotypical name Delia. (Damon, line 6, is also a conventional poetic name.) Receipt: formula of a remedy for a disease. Vapors: a disorder supposed to be caused by exhalations within the organs of the body and characterized by depression, hypochondria, hysteria, and other nervous disorders. Synonymous with the malaise of "spleen," analyzed by Anne Finch (see p. 558) and Matthew Green (p. 645).
5. A medicinal tea made from ammonia.

Long ago the worms have eat him,
You can never see him more.

III

Once again consult your toilette,[6]
10 In the glass° your face review: mirror
So much weeping soon will spoil it,
And no spring your charms renew.

IV

I, like you, was born a woman,
Well I know what vapors mean:
15 The disease, alas! is common;
Single, we have all the spleen.[7]

V

All the morals that they tell us,
Never cured the sorrow yet:
Chuse, among the pretty fellows,
20 One of honor, youth, and wit.

VI

Prithee hear him every morning
At the least an hour or two;
Once again at night returning—
I believe the dose will do.

Epistle from Mrs. Yonge to Her Husband[8]

Think not this paper comes with vain pretense
To move your pity, or to mourn th' offense.
Too well I know that hard obdurate heart;
No softening mercy there will take my part,
5 Nor can a woman's arguments prevail,

6. I.e., consider your manner of dressing.
7. I.e., we alone (i.e., women only) are affected by vapors; or, alternatively, women are affected by vapors when they are "single" (i.e., without the company of a man).
8. In 1724, the notorious libertine William Yonge, separated from his wife, Mary, discovered that she (like him) had committed adultery. He sued her lover, Colonel Norton, for damages and collected £1,500. Later that year, according to the law of the time, he petitioned the Houses of Parliament for a divorce. The case was tried in public, Mrs. Yonge's love letters were read aloud, and two men testified that they had found her and Norton "together in naked bed." Yonge was granted the divorce, his wife's dowry, and the greater part of her fortune.
Though the "Epistle" is obviously based on this sensational affair, it is also a work of imagination. Like Alexander Pope's "Eloisa to Abelard"—to which Pope called Montagu's attention—it takes the form of a heroic epistle, the passionate outcry of an abandoned woman. The poet, entering into the feelings of Mrs. Yonge, justifies her conduct with reasons of both the heart and the head. The objects of her attack include the institution of marriage, which binds wives in "eternal chains"; the double standard of morality, which requires chastity from women but not men; the hypocrisy of society, which condemns the very behavior it secretly lusts after; and the craven greed and cruelty of the husband. But eighteenth-century women seldom dared speak like this in public, and the "Epistle" was not published until the 1970s.

When even your patron's wise example fails.[9]
But this last privilege I still retain;
Th' oppressed and injured always may complain.
  Too, too severely laws of honor bind
10 The weak submissive sex of womankind.
If sighs have gained or force compelled our hand,
Deceived by art, or urged by stern command,
Whatever motive binds the fatal tie,
The judging world expects our constancy.
15   Just heaven! (for sure in heaven does justice reign,
Though tricks below that sacred name profane)
To you appealing I submit my cause,
Nor fear a judgment from impartial laws.
All bargains but° conditional° are made; only / conditionally
20 The purchase void, the creditor unpaid;
Defrauded servants are from service free;
A wounded slave regains his liberty.
For wives ill used no remedy remains,
To daily racks condemned, and to eternal chains.
25   From whence is this unjust distinction grown?
Are we not formed with passions like your own?
Nature with equal fire our souls endued,
Our minds as haughty, and as warm our blood;
O'er the wide world your pleasures you pursue,
30 The change is justified by something new;
But we must sigh in silence—and be true.
Our sex's weakness you expose and blame
(Of every prattling fop the common theme),
Yet from this weakness you suppose is due
35 Sublimer virtue than your Cato[1] knew.
Had heaven designed us trials so severe,
It would have formed our tempers then to bear.
  And I have borne (oh what have I not borne!)
The pang of jealousy, the insults of scorn.
40 Wearied at length, I from your sight remove,
And place my future hopes in secret love.
In the gay bloom of glowing youth retired,
I quit the woman's joy to be admired,
With that small pension your hard heart allows,
45 Renounce your fortune, and release your vows.
To custom (though unjust) so much is due;
I hide my frailty from the public view.
My conscience clear, yet sensible of shame,
My life I hazard, to preserve my fame.
50 And I prefer this low inglorious state
To vile dependence on the thing I hate—
But you pursue me to this last retreat.
Dragged into light, my tender crime is shown
And every circumstance of fondness known.
55 Beneath the shelter of the law you stand,

9. Sir Robert Walpole, Yonge's friend at court, was rumored to tolerate his own wife's infidelities.
1. The asceticism and self-discipline of the ancient Roman statesman Cato had been emphasized in Addison's famous tragedy Cato (1713).

And urge my ruin with a cruel hand,
While to my fault thus rigidly severe,
Tamely submissive to the man you fear.[2]
This wretched outcast, this abandoned wife,
60 Has yet this joy to sweeten shameful life:
By your mean° conduct, infamously loose, vulgar
You are at once my accuser and excuse.
Let me be damned by the censorious prude
(Stupidly dull, or spiritually lewd),
65 My hapless case will surely pity find
From every just and reasonable mind.
When to the final sentence I submit,
The lips condemn me, but their souls acquit.
No more my husband, to your pleasures go,
70 The sweets of your recovered freedom know.
Go: court the brittle friendship of the great,
Smile at his board,° or at his levee[3] wait; dining table
And when dismissed, to madam's toilet fly,[4]
More than her chambermaids, or glasses,° lie, mirrors
75 Tell her how young she looks, how heavenly fair,
Admire the lilies and the roses there.
Your high ambition may be gratified,
Some cousin of her own be made your bride,
And you the father of a glorious race
80 Endowed with Ch——l's strength and Low——r's face.[5]

MATTHEW GREEN
1696–1737

From The Spleen[1]

An Epistle to Mr. Cuthbert Jackson

This motley piece to you I send,
Who always were a faithful friend;
Who, if disputes should happen hence,
Can best explain the author's sense;
5 And, anxious for the public weal,
Do, what I sing, so often feel.[2]

2. I.e., Walpole. Montagu suggests that the whole political establishment of England takes sides against Mrs. Yonge.
3. Morning reception of visitors.
4. It was fashionable for women like Lady Walpole to receive visitors during the last stages of dressing (their "toilet").
5. General Churchill was rumored to have had an affair with Lady Walpole; Anthony Lowther was a notorious gallant. The author implies that Yonge's next wife may be as untrue as his first. Mrs. Yonge remarried immediately after her divorce; five years later, Yonge (whose divorce had made him rich) married the daughter of a baron.

1. The effects of "the spleen" were believed to be depression, hypochondria, ill-temper, melancholy, and a variety of other nervous disorders. Green wrote this poem supposedly in reply to a friend who asked him how he coped with this malady. Although he cites causes and treatments for the disorder, Green uses the subject to write a satire on religion, politics, and contemporary social practices. Cf. Anne Finch, "The Spleen" (p. 558).
2. Green claims to suffer from "what I sing," i.e., "spleen," as a result of his concern for the "public weal," i.e., the public welfare, a reference to his

The want of method pray excuse,
Allowing for a vapored Muse;[3]
Nor to a narrow path confined,
10 Hedge in by rules a roving mind.

The child is genuine, you may trace
Throughout the sire's transmitted° face. inherited
Nothing is stolen: my Muse, though mean,° lowly, poor
Draws from the spring she finds within;
15 Nor vainly° buys what Gildon[4] sells, in vain
Poetic buckets for dry wells.

School-helps I want,[5] to climb on high,
Where all the ancient treasures lie,
And there unseen commit a theft
20 On wealth in Greek exchequers° left. treasuries
Then where? from whom? what can I steal,
Who only with the moderns deal?
This were attempting to put on
Raiment from naked bodies won:[6]
25 They safely sing before a thief,
They cannot give who want relief;
Some few excepted, names well known,
And justly laureled[7] with renown,
Whose stamp of genius marks their ware,
30 And theft detects: of theft beware;
From More so lashed,[8] example fit,
Shun petty larceny in wit.

First know, my friend, I do not mean
To write a treatise on the spleen;
35 Nor to prescribe when nerves convulse;
Nor mend th' alarum watch, your pulse.
If I am right, your question lay,
What course I take to drive away
The day-mare[9] Spleen, by whose false pleas
40 Men prove mere suicides in ease;[1]
And how I do myself demean° manage
In stormy world to live serene.

When by its magic lantern[2] Spleen
With frightful figures spreads life's scene,

job as a clerk in a Custom House (the office responsible for levying taxes on imported and exported goods) in London.
3. The Muses were the nine Greek sister goddesses supposed to be the sources of inspiration for the arts. Vapored: i.e., afflicted with the vapors, a disorder supposed to be caused by exhalations within the organs of the body and characterized by symptoms similar to those of spleen.
4. Charles Gildon (1665–1724), author of The Complete Art of English Poetry.
5. Lack; Green claims to not have a classical education, a claim somewhat belied by the many learned allusions in the poem.
6. Perhaps a reference to two lines from Edward Howard's epic poem British Princes (1669): "A painted vest Prince Vortiger had on, / Which from a naked Pict his grandsire won."
7. The laurel was a symbol of poetic achievement.
8. In The Dunciad 2.50, Alexander Pope (1688–1744) "lashed," i.e., castigated, the playwright James Moore Smythe (1702–1734) for having plagiarized.
9. Similar to a nightmare, but occurring during wakefulness; a term coined by Green.
1. Without hesitation; or, at leisure. Mere: unassisted (legal).
2. An optical instrument by means of which a magnified image of a picture on glass is thrown upon a white screen or wall in a darkened room.

45 And threat'ning prospects° urged my fears, expectations
A stranger to the luck of heirs;[3]
Reason, some quiet to restore,
Showed part was substance, shadow more;
With Spleen's dead weight though heavy grown,
50 In life's rough tide I sunk not down,
But swam, 'till Fortune threw a rope,
Buoyant on bladders[4] fill'd with hope.

I always choose the plainest food
To mend viscidity° of blood. glutinousness
55 Hail! water-gruel,° healing power, thin porridge
Of easy access to the poor;
Thy help love's confessors implore,
And doctors secretly adore;
To thee, I fly, by thee dilute—
60 Through veins my blood doth quicker shoot,[5]
And by swift current throws off clean
Prolific particles of Spleen.

I never sick by drinking grow,
Nor keep myself a cup too low,° sad, gloomy
65 And seldom Cloe's lodgings haunt,
Thrifty of spirits, which I want.[6]

Hunting I reckon very good
To brace the nerves, and stir the blood:
But after no field-honors° itch, honors won in the hunt
70 Achieved by leaping hedge and ditch,
While Spleen lies soft relaxed in bed,
Or o'er coal fires inclines the head,
Hygeia's sons[7] with hound and horn,
And jovial cry awake the morn.

* * *

To cure the mind's wrong bias, Spleen,
90 Some recommend the bowling-green;[8]
Some, hilly walks; all, exercise;
Fling but a stone, the giant dies;[9]
Laugh and be well. Monkeys have been
Extreme good doctors for the Spleen;
95 And kitten, if the humor hit,[1]
Has harlequinned° away the fit. conjured away

* * *

3. I.e., he has no hope of an inheritance.
4. Animals' bladders, inflated and used as flotation devices.
5. "Blood" is the noun acted on by the past participle, "dilute": i.e., "blood," diluted by the gruel, "doth quicker shoot" through the veins.
6. I.e., economical of liveliness or energy, which I lack. C[h]loe: a conventional poetic name for a young woman.
7. Healthy men (Hygeia being the Greek goddess of health).
8. The lawn on which bowls, a popular English game, is played.
9. The metaphor alludes to 1 Samuel 17, in which a young David kills the Philistine giant, Goliath, with a stone from his sling.
1. I.e., if it affects the disposition.

125 If spleen-fogs rise at close of day,
I clear my evening with a play,
Or to some concert take my way.
The company, the shine of lights,
The scenes of humor, music's flights,
130 Adjust and set the soul to rights.

Life's moving pictures, well-wrought plays,
To others' grief attention raise:
Here, while the tragic fictions glow,
We borrow joy by pitying woe;
135 There gaily comic scenes delight,
And hold true mirrors to our sight.
Virtue, in charming dress arrayed,
Calling the passions to her aid,
When moral scenes just actions join,
140 Takes shape, and shows her face divine.

* * *

Sometimes I dress, with women sit,
And chat away the gloomy fit;
Quit the stiff garb of serious sense,
185 And wear a gay impertinence,° indifference
Nor think nor speak with any pains,
But lay on fancy's neck the reins;
Talk of unusual swell of waist
In maid of honor[2] loosely laced,
190 And beauty borr'wing Spanish red,[3]
And loving pair with sep'rate bed,
And jewels pawned for loss of game,
And then redeemed by loss of fame;
Of Kitty (aunt left in the lurch
195 By grave pretence to go to church)
Perceived in hack° with lover fine, rented carriage
Like Will and Mary on the coin:[4]
And thus in modish° manner we, fashionable
In aid of sugar, sweeten tea.

200 Permit, ye fair,° your idol form, beautiful woman
Which e'en the coldest heart can warm,
May with its beauties grace my line,
While I bow down before its shrine,
And your thronged altars with my lays° songs
205 Perfume, and get by giving praise.
With speech so sweet, so sweet a mien,° appearance
You excommunicate the Spleen.

2. An unmarried woman, usually of noble birth, who attends upon a queen or princess.
3. A cosmetic that added reddish color to the cheeks.
4. William and Mary were joint rulers of England from 1689 until her death, in 1694. During their reign, coins were minted that bore the likenesses of their two heads in profile.

From The Seasons

From Winter

The keener tempests come: and, fuming dun° — dark; murky
From all the livid east or piercing north,
225 Thick clouds ascend, in whose capacious womb
A vapory deluge lies, to snow congealed.
Heavy they roll their fleecy world along,
And the sky saddens with the gathered storm.
Through the hushed air the whitening shower descends,
230 At first thin-wavering; till at last the flakes
Fall broad and wide and fast, dimming the day
With a continual flow. The cherished fields
Put on their winter robe of purest white.
'Tis brightness all; save where the new snow melts
235 Along the mazy current. Low the woods
Bow their hoar° head; and, ere the languid sun — frozen, icy
Faint from the west emits his evening ray,
Earth's universal face, deep-hid and chill,
Is one wild dazzling waste that buries wide
240 The works of man. Drooping, the laborer-ox
Stands covered o'er with snow, and then demands
The fruit of all his toil. The fowls of heaven,
Tamed by the cruel season, crowd around
The winnowing store,[1] and claim the little boon
245 Which Providence assigns them. One alone,
The redbreast, sacred to the household gods,
Wisely regardful of the embroiling sky,
In joyless fields and thorny thickets leaves
His shivering mates, and pays to trusted man
250 His annual visit. Half afraid, he first
Against the window beats; then brisk alights
On the warm hearth; then, hopping o'er the floor,
Eyes all the smiling family askance,
And pecks, and starts, and wonders where he is—
255 Till, more familiar grown, the table crumbs
Attract his slender feet. The foodless wilds
Pour forth their brown inhabitants. The hare,
Though timorous of heart, and hard beset
By death in various forms, dark snares, and dogs,
260 And more unpitying men, the garden seeks,
Urged on by fearless want. The bleating kind[2]
Eye the bleak heaven, and next the glistening earth,
With looks of dumb despair; then, sad-dispersed,
Dig for the withered herb through heaps of snow.

1. Place where the harvest has been threshed. 2. Sheep.

265 Now, shepherds, to your helpless charge be kind;
Baffle the raging year, and fill their pens
With food at will; lodge them below the storm,
And watch them strict, for, from the bellowing east,
In this dire season, oft the whirlwind's wing
270 Sweeps up the burden of whole wintry plains
In one wide weft,° and o'er the hapless flocks, web
Hid in the hollow of two neighboring hills,
The billowy tempest whelms,° till, upward urged, pours
The valley to a shining mountain swells,
275 Tipped with a wreath high-curling in the sky.
As thus the snows arise, and, foul and fierce,
All Winter drives along the darkened air,
In his own loose-revolving° fields the swain° giddily turning / rustic
Disastered stands; sees other hills ascend,
280 Of unknown joyless brow, and other scenes,
Of horrid prospect, shag° the trackless plain; make shaggy
Nor finds the river nor the forest, hid
Beneath the formless wild, but wanders on
From hill to dale, still more and more astray,
285 Impatient flouncing through the drifted heaps,
Stung with the thoughts of home—the thoughts of home
Rush on his nerves and call their vigor forth
In many a vain attempt. How sinks his soul!
What black despair, what horror fills his heart,
290 When, for the dusky spot which fancy feigned
His tufted° cottage rising through the snow, tree-surrounded
He meets the roughness of the middle waste,
Far from the track and blest abode of man,
While round him night resistless closes fast,
295 And every tempest, howling o'er his head,
Renders the savage wilderness more wild.
Then throng the busy shapes into his mind
Of covered pits, unfathomably deep,
A dire descent! beyond the power of frost;
300 Of faithless bogs; of precipices huge,
Smoothed up with snow; and (what is land unknown,
What water) of the still unfrozen spring,
In the loose marsh or solitary lake,
Where the fresh fountain from the bottom boils.
305 These check his fearful steps; and down he sinks
Beneath the shelter of the shapeless drift,
Thinking o'er all the bitterness of death,
Mixed with the tender anguish nature shoots
Through the wrung bosom of the dying man—
310 His wife, his children, and his friends unseen.
In vain for him the officious° wife prepares dutiful
The fire fair-blazing and the vestment warm;
In vain his little children, peeping out
Into the mingling storm, demand their sire
315 With tears of artless innocence. Alas!
Nor wife nor children more shall he behold,

Nor friends, nor sacred home. On every nerve
The deadly winter seizes, shuts up sense,
And, o'er his inmost vitals creeping cold,
320 Lays him along the snows a stiffened corse,° corpse
Stretched out and bleaching in the northern blast.
Ah! little think the gay licentious proud,
Whom pleasure, power, and affluence surround—
They who their thoughtless hours in giddy mirth,
325 And wanton, often cruel, riot° waste— revelry
Ah! little think they, while they dance along,
How many feel, this very moment, death
And all the sad variety of pain;
How many sink in the devouring flood,
330 Or more devouring flame; how many bleed,
By shameful variance° betwixt man and man; quarreling
How many pine in want,° and dungeon glooms, lack Shut from the common air and common use
Of their own limbs; how many drink the cup
335 Of baleful grief, or eat the bitter bread
Of misery; sore pierced by wintry winds,
How many shrink into the sordid hut
Of cheerless poverty; how many shake
With all the fiercer tortures of the mind,
340 Unbounded passion, madness, guilt, remorse—
Whence, tumbled headlong from the height of life,
They furnish matter for the Tragic Muse;[3]
Even in the vale,° where wisdom loves to dwell, valley
With friendship, peace, and contemplation joined,
345 How many, racked with honest passions, droop
In deep retired distress; how many stand
Around the death-bed of their dearest friends,
And point° the parting anguish! Thought fond man accentuate
Of these, and all the thousand nameless ills
350 That one incessant struggle render life,[4]
One scene of toil, of suffering, and of fate,
Vice in his high career would stand appalled,
And heedless rambling Impulse learn to think;
The conscious° heart of Charity would warm, sympathetic
355 And her wide wish Benevolence dilate° diffuse
The social tear would rise, the social sigh;
And into clear perfection, gradual° bliss, progressive
Refining still, the social passions work.

1726

3. Melpomene, Muse of tragedy, one of the nine sister goddesses in Greek mythology who inspired the arts.

4. I.e., if foolish human beings thought of these, and of all the thousand nameless ills that render life one incessant struggle.

HYMNS[1]

[My God! I Know, I Feel Thee Mine[2]]

My God! I know, I feel thee mine,
  And will not quit my claim
Till all I have is lost in thine,
  And all renewed I am.

5 I hold thee with a trembling hand,
  But will not let thee go
Till steadfastly by faith I stand,
  And all thy goodness know.

When shall I see the welcome hour
10   That plants my God in me!
Spirit of health, and life, and power,
  And perfect liberty!

Jesu, thine all-victorious love
  Shed in my heart abroad!
15 Then shall my feet no longer rove,
  Rooted and fixed in God.

Love only can the conquest win,
  The strength of sin subdue
(Mine own unconquerable sin),
20   And form my soul anew.

Love can bow down the stubborn neck,
  The stone to flesh convert;

1. Many tenets of the Methodist movement, founded by John Wesley (1703–1791) in 1739, are expressed by the hymns of his brother, Charles. Some Methodists believed in the assurance of salvation (rejecting the Calvinist doctrine of predestination) and acquired their name by advocating methodical study and devotion as a means of attaining Christian perfection. Charles Wesley wrote more than six thousand hymns and helped popularize hymn singing in English at worship services. The hymns selected below were first printed in different editions of the Wesleys' Hymns and Sacred Prayers; we follow the text of the 1780 Hymnbook.

2. The subtext for this hymn is Romans 4.13: "For the promise that he should be the heir of the world was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith."

Soften, and melt, and pierce, and break
An adamantine° heart. unyielding, hard

25 Oh, that in me the sacred fire
Might now begin to glow,
Burn up the dross of base desire,
And make the mountains flow!

Oh, that it now from heaven might fall,
30 And all my sins consume!
Come, Holy Ghost, for thee I call,
Spirit of burning, come!

Refining fire, go through my heart,
Illuminate my soul;
35 Scatter thy life through every part,
And sanctify the whole.

10

Sorrow and sin shall then expire,
While, entered into rest,
I only live my God t'admire—
40 My God forever blest.

11

No longer then my heart shall mourn,
While purified by grace
I only for his glory burn,
And always see his face.

12

45 My steadfast soul, from falling free,
Shall then no longer move;
But Christ be all the world to me,
And all my heart be love.

1740

[Come on, My Partners in Distress]

Come on, my partners in distress,
My comrades through the wilderness,[3]
Who still your bodies feel;

3. Where the Israelites wandered for forty years; also, the place where Christ was tempted, thus a place of suffering, testing, wandering, used here as a metaphor for earthly life.

Awhile forget your griefs and fears,
5 And look beyond this vale of tears
To that celestial hill.[4]

Beyond the bounds of time and space
Look forward to that heavenly place,
The saints' secure abode;
10 On faith's strong eagle pinions rise,
And force your passage to the skies,
And scale the mount of God.

Who suffer with our Master[5] here,
We shall before his face appear,
15 And by his side sit down;
To patient faith the prize is sure,
And all that to the end endure
The cross, shall wear the crown.[6]

Thrice blessed bliss-inspiring hope!
20 It lifts the fainting spirits up,
It brings to life the dead;
Our conflicts here shall soon be past,
And you and I ascend at last
Triumphant with our head.[7]

25 That great mysterious Deity
We soon with open face shall see;
The beatific sight[8]
Shall fill heaven's sounding courts with praise,
And wide diffuse the golden blaze
30 Of everlasting light.

The Father shining on his throne,
The glorious, co-eternal Son,
The Spirit, one and seven,[9]
Conspire our rapture to complete,
35 And lo! we fall before his feet,
And silence heightens heaven.

4. The heavenly Jerusalem is thought to be located on a hill, Mt. Sion. Vale of tears: this world, regarded as a place of trouble, sorrow, misery, or weeping.
5. I.e., Christ.
6. The New Testament promises a "crown of life" to the faithful Christian (James 1.12).
7. I.e., Christ; "the head of every man is Christ" (1 Corinthians 11.3).
8. A sight of the glories of heaven, especially that first granted to a disembodied spirit.
9. The "seven spirits of God" are referred to in Revelation 1.4, 3.1, 4.5, 5.6.

In hope of that ecstatic pause,
Jesu, we now sustain the cross,
And at thy footstool fall,
40 Till thou our hidden life reveal,
Till thou our ravished spirits fill,
And God is all in all.

SAMUEL JOHNSON
1709–1784

Prologue Spoken by Mr. Garrick[1]

At the Opening of the Theater Royal, Drury Lane, 1747

When Learning's triumph o'er her barbarous foes
First reared the stage, immortal Shakespeare rose;
Each change of many-colored life he drew,
Exhausted worlds, and then imagined new:
5 Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign,
And panting Time toiled after him in vain.
His powerful strokes presiding Truth impressed,
And unresisted Passion stormed the breast.
Then Jonson[2] came, instructed from the school
10 To please in method and invent by rule;
His studious patience and laborious art
By regular approach essayed the heart;
Cold Approbation gave the lingering bays,[3]
For those who durst not censure, scarce could praise.
15 A mortal born, he met the general doom,
But left, like Egypt's kings, a lasting tomb.
The wits of Charles[4] found easier ways to fame,
Nor wished for Jonson's art, or Shakespeare's flame;
Themselves they studied; as they felt, they writ;
20 Intrigue was plot, obscenity was wit.
Vice always found a sympathetic friend;
They pleased their age, and did not aim to mend.° amend it
Yet bards like these aspired to lasting praise,
And proudly hoped to pimp° in future days. bid for reward
25 Their cause was general, their supports were strong,
Their slaves were willing, and their reign was long:
Till Shame regained the post that Sense betrayed,
And Virtue called Oblivion to her aid.
Then, crushed by rules, and weakened as refined,
30 For years the power of Tragedy declined;

1. David Garrick (1717–1779), English actor and theater manager.
2. Ben Jonson (1572–1637), poet and playwright.
3. Laurel, given in recognition of poetic achievement.
4. The comic playwrights of the Restoration.

From bard to bard the frigid caution crept,
Till Declamation roared while Passion slept;
Yet still did Virtue deign the stage to tread;
Philosophy remained though Nature fled;
35 But forced at length her ancient reign to quit,
She saw great Faustus[5] lay the ghost of Wit;
Exulting Folly hailed the joyous day,
And Pantomime and Song confirmed her sway.
But who the coming changes can presage,
40 And mark the future periods of the stage?
Perhaps if skill could distant times explore,
New Behns, new Durfeys,[6] yet remain in store;
Perhaps where Lear has raved, and Hamlet died,
On flying cars new sorcerers may ride;
45 Perhaps (for who can guess the effects of chance?)
Here Hunt may box, or Mahomet may dance.[7]
Hard is his lot that, here by fortune placed,
Must watch the wild vicissitudes of taste;
With every meteor of caprice must play,
50 And chase the new-blown bubbles of the day.
Ah! let not censure term our fate our choice,
The stage but echoes back the public voice;
The drama's laws, the drama's patrons give,
For we that live to please, must please to live.
55 Then prompt no more the follies you decry,
As tyrants doom their tools of guilt to die;
'Tis yours this night to bid the reign commence
Of rescued Nature and reviving Sense;
To chase the charms of Sound, the pomp of Show,
60 For useful Mirth and salutary Woe;
Bid scenic Virtue form the rising age,
And Truth diffuse her radiance from the stage.

The Vanity of Human Wishes

In Imitation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal[8]

Let Observation, with extensive view,
Survey mankind, from China to Peru;
Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
5 Then say how hope and fear, desire and hate
O'erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
Where wavering man, betrayed by venturous pride
To tread the dreary paths without a guide,

5. Magician of German legend, here as treated in current farce and pantomime.
6. Playwrights like Aphra Behn (1640?–1689), admired by some but also attacked for her racy plays, and Thomas D'Urfey (1653–1723), playwright and poetaster who was a standing joke among the wits.
7. Referring to two then-popular figures, a pugilist and a tightrope dancer.
8. Ancient Roman poet and satirist.

As treacherous phantoms in the mist delude,
10 Shuns fancied ills, or chases airy good;
How rarely Reason guides the stubborn choice,
Rules the bold hand, or prompts the suppliant voice;
How nations sink, by darling schemes oppressed,
When Vengeance listens to the fool's request.[9]
15 Fate wings with every wish the afflictive dart,
Each gift of nature, and each grace of art;[1]
With fatal heat impetuous courage glows,
With fatal sweetness elocution flows,
Impeachment stops the speaker's powerful breath,
20 And restless fire precipitates on death.[2]
But scarce observed, the knowing and the bold
Fall in the general massacre of gold;
Wide-wasting pest! that rages unconfined,
And crowds with crimes the records of mankind;
25 For gold his sword the hireling ruffian draws,
For gold the hireling judge distorts the laws;
Wealth heaped on wealth, nor truth nor safety buys,
The dangers gather as the treasures rise.
Let History tell where rival kings command,
30 And dubious title shakes the madded land,
When statutes glean the refuse of the sword,
How much more safe the vassal than the lord,
Low skulks the hind° beneath the rage of power, peasant
And leaves the wealthy traitor in the Tower,[3]
35 Untouched his cottage, and his slumbers sound,
Though Confiscation's vultures hover round.
The needy traveler, serene and gay,
Walks the wild heath, and sings his toil away.
Does envy seize thee? crush the upbraiding joy,
40 Increase his riches and his peace destroy;
New fears in dire vicissitude invade,
The rustling brake° alarms, and quivering shade, thicket
Nor light nor darkness bring his pain relief,
One shows the plunder, and one hides the thief.
45 Yet still one general cry the skies assails,
And gain and grandeur load the tainted gales;
Few know the toiling statesman's fear or care,
The insidious rival and the gaping heir.
Once more, Democritus,[4] arise on earth,
50 With cheerful wisdom and instructive mirth,
See motley life in modern trappings dressed,
And feed with varied fools the eternal jest:
Thou who couldst laugh where Want enchained Caprice,
Toil crushed Conceit, and man was of a piece;
55 Where Wealth unloved without a mourner died;

9. I.e., when vengeance hangs over a nation, ready to descend on it if the proposals of political fools prevail.
1. The sense of this couplet is that men can be hurried toward misery by their desires and even by their talents and accomplishments.
2. Perhaps, i.e., impetuous energy hastens men to their death.
3. Tower of London (a prison).
4. Greek philosopher of the late fifth century B.C.E., a fatalist who exalted cheerfulness and derided all immoderate pretensions.

And scarce a sycophant was fed by Pride;
Where ne'er was known the form of mock debate,
Or seen a new-made mayor's unwieldy state;° pomp
Where change of favorites made no change of laws,
60 And senates heard before they judged a cause;
How wouldst thou shake at Britain's modish tribe,
Dart the quick taunt, and edge the piercing gibe?
Attentive truth and nature to descry,
And pierce each scene with philosophic eye,
65 To thee were solemn toys or empty show
The robes of pleasures and the veils of woe:
All aid the farce, and all thy mirth maintain,
Whose joys are causeless, or whose griefs are vain.
Such was the scorn that filled the sage's mind,
70 Renewed at every glance on human kind;
How just that scorn ere yet thy voice declare,
Search every state, and canvass every prayer.
Unnumbered suppliants crowd Preferment's gate,
Athirst for wealth, and burning to be great;
75 Delusive Fortune hears the incessant call,
They mount, they shine, evaporate, and fall.
On every stage the foes of peace attend,
Hate dogs their flight, and Insult mocks their end.
Love ends with hope, the sinking statesman's door
80 Pours in the morning worshiper no more;[5]
For growing names the weekly scribbler lies,
To growing wealth the dedicator flies;
From every room descends the painted face,
That hung the bright palladium[6] of the place;
85 And smoked in kitchens, or in auctions sold,
To better features yields the frame of gold;
For now no more we trace in every line
Heroic worth, benevolence divine:
The form distorted justifies the fall,
90 And Detestation rids the indignant wall.
But will not Britain hear the last appeal,
Sign her foes' doom, or guard her favorites' zeal?
Through Freedom's sons no more remonstrance rings,
Degrading nobles and controlling kings;
95 Our supple tribes repress their patriot throats,
And ask no questions but the price of votes,
With weekly libels and septennial ale.[7]
Their wish is full° to riot and to rail. satisfied
In full-blown dignity, see Wolsey[8] stand,
100 Law in his voice, and fortune in his hand:
To him the church, the realm, their powers consign,
Through him the rays of regal bounty shine;

5. Important personages received petitions and official calls in the morning.
6. An image of Pallas (Athena, Greek goddess of wisdom) that supposedly preserved Troy from capture as long as it remained in the city; hence a safeguard.
7. I.e., public attacks in the weekly press and ale distributed at the parliamentary elections held every seventh year.
8. Thomas Cardinal Wolsey (ca. 1475–1530), lord chancellor under Henry VIII.

Turned by his nod the stream of honor flows,
His smile alone security bestows:
105 Still to new heights his restless wishes tower,
Claim leads to claim, and power advances power;
Till conquest unresisted ceased to please,
And rights submitted, left him none to seize.
At length his sovereign frowns—the train of state[9]
110 Mark the keen glance, and watch the sign to hate.
Where'er he turns, he meets a stranger's eye,
His suppliants scorn him, and his followers fly;
At once is lost the pride of awful state,
The golden canopy, the glittering plate,
115 The regal palace, the luxurious board,° table
The liveried army, and the menial lord.
With age, with cares, with maladies oppressed,
He seeks the refuge of monastic rest.
Grief aids disease, remembered folly stings,
120 And his last sighs reproach the faith of kings.
Speak thou, whose thoughts at humble peace repine,° complain
Shall Wolsey's wealth, with Wolsey's end be thine?
Or liv'st thou now, with safer pride content,
The wisest justice on the banks of Trent?[1]
125 For why did Wolsey, near the steeps of fate,
On weak foundations raise the enormous weight?
Why but to sink beneath misfortune's blow,
With louder ruin to the gulfs below?
What gave great Villiers[2] to the assassin's knife,
130 And fixed disease on Harley's closing life?
What murdered Wentworth, and what exiled Hyde,
By kings protected and to kings allied?
What but their wish indulged in courts to shine,
And power too great to keep or to resign?
135 When first the college rolls receive his name,
The young enthusiast quits his ease for fame;
Resistless burns the fever of renown
Caught from the strong contagion of the gown:[3]
O'er Bodley's dome his future labors spread,
140 And Bacon's mansion trembles o'er his head.[4]
Are these thy views? proceed, illustrious youth,
And Virtue guard thee to the throne of Truth!
Yet should thy soul indulge the generous heat,
Till captive Science yields her last retreat;

9. I.e., followers of the king.
1. A river flowing through the English Midlands.
2. George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, court favorite of James I and Charles I; assassinated in 1628. Robert Harley (line 130), earl of Oxford, a member of the Tory ministry under Queen Anne, was subsequently imprisoned and suffered a decline. Thomas Wentworth (line 131), earl of Strafford, advisor to Charles I, was executed in 1641, under the Long Parliament. Edward Hyde (line 131), earl of Clarendon, who was Charles II's lord chancellor and whose daughter married into the royal family, was impeached and exiled in 1667.
3. Academic gown, put on upon entering the university, with allusion to the shirt of Nessus, the flaming robe that clung to the mythical Greek hero Hercules and drove him to his death.
4. "There is a tradition, that the study of friar Bacon [i.e., the thirteenth-century scientist and philosopher Roger Bacon], built on an arch over the bridge, will fall, when a man greater than Bacon shall pass under it" [Johnson's note]. Bodley's dome: the Bodleian Library, Oxford (Latin for domus, house).

145 Should Reason guide thee with her brightest ray,
And pour on misty Doubt resistless day;
Should no false kindness lure to loose delight,
Nor praise relax, nor difficulty fright;
Should tempting Novelty thy cell refrain,° pass by, avoid
150 And Sloth effuse her opiate fumes in vain;
Should Beauty blunt on fops her fatal dart,
Nor claim the triumph of a lettered heart;
Should no disease thy torpid veins invade,
Nor Melancholy's phantoms haunt thy shade;
155 Yet hope not life from grief or danger free,
Nor think the doom of man reversed for thee:
Deign on the passing world to turn thine eyes,
And pause a while from letters, to be wise;
There mark what ills the scholar's life assail,
160 Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.
See nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
To buried merit raise the tardy bust.
If dreams yet flatter, once again attend,
Hear Lydiat's life, and Galileo's end.[5]
165 Nor deem, when Learning her last prize bestows,
The glittering eminence exempt from foes;
See when the vulgar 'scapes, despised or awed,
Rebellion's vengeful talons seize on Laud.[6]
From meaner minds though smaller fines content,
170 The plundered palace, or sequestered[7] rent;
Marked out by dangerous parts he meets the shock,
And fatal Learning leads him to the block:
Around his tomb let Art and Genius weep,
But hear his death, ye blockheads, hear and sleep.[8]
175 The festal blazes, the triumphal show,
The ravished standard, and the captive foe,
The senate's thanks, the gàzette's[9] pompous tale,
With force resistless o'er the brave prevail.
Such bribes the rapid Greek[1] o'er Asia whirled,
180 For such the steady Romans shook the world;
For such in distant lands the Britons shine,
And stain with blood the Danube or the Rhine;
This power has praise that virtue scarce can warm,[2]
Till fame supplies the universal charm.
185 Yet Reason frowns on War's unequal game,
Where wasted nations raise a single name,
And mortgaged states their grandsires' wreaths regret
From age to age in everlasting debt;
Wreaths which at last the dear-bought right convey

5. Galileo (1564–1642), the Italian astronomer, was imprisoned for heresy by the Inquisition; he died blind. Thomas Lydiat (1572–1646), the Oxford mathematician and don, endured lifelong poverty because of his Royalist sympathies.
6. William Laud (1573–1645), archbishop of Canterbury under Charles I; executed in 1645, under the Long Parliament, for his devotion to episcopacy.
7. Confiscated by the state.
8. Rest secure, i.e., since you lack Laud's learning and gifts.
9. Newspaper's or official report's.
1. I.e., Alexander the Great.
2. I.e., praise has a power (to activate the brave) that an abstract love of virtue can scarcely begin to kindle.

190 To rust on medals, or on stones decay.
On what foundation stands the warrior's pride,
How just his hopes, let Swedish Charles[3] decide;
A frame of adamant, a soul of fire,
No dangers fright him, and no labors tire;
195 O'er love, o'er fear, extends his wide domain,
Unconquered lord of pleasure and of pain;
No joys to him pacific scepters yield,
War sounds the trump, he rushes to the field;
Behold surrounding kings their powers combine,
200 And one capitulate, and one resign;[4]
Peace courts his hand, but spreads her charms in vain;
"Think nothing gained," he cries, "till naught remain,
On Moscow's walls till Gothic° standards fly, Teutonic
And all be mine beneath the polar sky."
205 The march begins in military state,
And nations on his eye suspended wait;
Stern Famine guards the solitary coast,
And Winter barricades the realms of Frost;
He comes, nor want nor cold his course delay—
210 Hide, blushing Glory, hide Pultowa's day:
The vanquished hero leaves his broken bands,
And shows his miseries in distant lands;
Condemned a needy supplicant to wait,
While ladies interpose, and slaves debate.
215 But did not Chance at length her error mend?
Did no subverted empire mark his end?
Did rival monarchs give the fatal wound?
Or hostile millions press him to the ground?
His fall was destined to a barren strand,
220 A petty fortress, and a dubious hand;
He left the name at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral, or adorn a tale.
All times their scenes of pompous woes afford,
From Persia's tyrant to Bavaria's lord.[5]
225 In gay hostility, and barbarous pride,
With half mankind embattled at his side,
Great Xerxes comes to seize the certain prey,
And starves exhausted regions in his way;
Attendant Flattery counts his myriads o'er,
230 Till counted myriads soothe his pride no more;
Fresh praise is tried till madness fires his mind,
The waves he lashes, and enchains the wind;
New powers are claimed, new powers are still bestowed,
Till rude resistance lops the spreading god;
235 The daring Greeks deride the martial show,

3. King Charles XII (1682–1718) of Sweden. Defeated by the Russians at Pultowa in 1709, and escaping as "a needy supplicant" (line 213), he sought an alliance with the Turkish Sultan. He was killed in an attack on "a petty fortress" (line 220), Fredrikshald, in Norway.
4. Frederick IV of Denmark capitulated to Charles in 1700, and Augustus II of Poland resigned his throne to Charles in 1704.
5. Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, who successfully aspired to the crown of the Holy Roman Empire but was deposed in a few years through the political skill of Maria Theresa ("fair Austria," line 245). Persia's tyrant: Xerxes, emperor whose forces the Greeks defeated by sea at Salamis in 480 B.C.E. and later, on land, at Plataea.

And heap their valleys with the gaudy foe;
The insulted sea with humbler thought he gains,
A single skiff to speed his flight remains;
The encumbered oar scarce leaves the dreaded coast
240 Through purple° billows and a floating host. blood-stained
The bold Bavarian, in a luckless hour,
Tries the dread summits of Caesarean° power, imperial
With unexpected legions bursts away,
And sees defenseless realms receive his sway;
245 Short sway! fair Austria spreads her mournful charms,
The queen, the beauty, sets the world in arms;
From hill to hill the beacon's rousing blaze
Spreads wide the hope of plunder and of praise;
The fierce Croatian, and the wild Hussar,[6]
250 With all the sons of ravage crowd the war;
The baffled prince, in honor's flattering bloom,
Of hasty greatness finds the fatal doom;
His foes' derision, and his subjects' blame,
And steals to death from anguish and from shame.
255 Enlarge my life with multitude of days!
In health, in sickness, thus the suppliant prays;
Hides from himself his state, and shuns to know,
That life protracted is protracted woe.
Time hovers o'er, impatient to destroy,
260 And shuts up all the passages of joy;
In vain their gifts the bounteous seasons pour,
The fruit autumnal, and the vernal flower;
With listless eyes the dotard views the store,
He views, and wonders that they please no more;
265 Now pall the tasteless meats, and joyless wines,
And Luxury with sighs her slave resigns.
Approach, ye minstrels, try the soothing strain,
Diffuse the tuneful lenitives° of pain: relievers
No sounds, alas! would touch the impervious ear,
270 Though dancing mountains witnessed Orpheus[7] near;
Nor lute nor lyre his feeble powers attend,
Nor sweeter music of a virtuous friend,
But everlasting dictates crowd his tongue,
Perversely grave, or positively wrong.
275 The still returning tale, and lingering jest,
Perplex the fawning niece and pampered guest,
While growing hopes scarce awe the gathering sneer,
And scarce a legacy can bribe to hear;
The watchful guests still hint the last offense;
280 The daughter's petulance, the son's expense,
Improve° his heady rage with treacherous skill, play upon
And mold his passions till they make his will.
Unnumbered maladies his joints invade,
Lay siege to life and press the dire blockade;
285 But unextinguished avarice still remains,

6. Hungarian cavalryman.
7. In Greek mythology, a poet and musician whose playing could move even trees and hills.

And dreaded losses aggravate his pains;
He turns, with anxious heart and crippled hands,
His bonds of debt, and mortgages of lands;
Or views his coffers with suspicious eyes,
290 Unlocks his gold, and counts it till he dies.
But grant, the virtues of a temperate prime
Bless with an age exempt from scorn or crime;
An age that melts with unperceived decay,
And glides in modest innocence away;
295 Whose peaceful day Benevolence endears,
Whose night congratulating Conscience cheers;
The general favorite as the general friend:
Such age there is, and who shall wish its end?
Yet even on this her load Misfortune flings,
300 To press the weary minutes' flagging wings;
New sorrow rises as the day returns,
A sister sickens, or a daughter mourns.
Now kindred Merit fills the sable° bier, black
Now lacerated Friendship claims a tear;
305 Year chases year, decay pursues decay,
Still drops some joy from withering life away;
New forms arise, and different views engage,
Superfluous lags the veteran[8] on the stage,
Till pitying Nature signs the last release,
310 And bids afflicted Worth retire to peace.
But few there are whom hours like these await,
Who set unclouded in the gulfs of Fate.
From Lydia's monarch[9] should the search descend,
By Solon cautioned to regard his end,
315 In life's last scene what prodigies surprise,
Fears of the brave, and follies of the wise!
From Marlborough's eyes the streams of dotage flow,
And Swift expires a driveler and a show.[1]
The teeming mother, anxious for her race,
320 Begs for each birth the fortune of a face:
Yet Vane could tell what ills from beauty spring;
And Sedley[2] cursed the form that pleased a king.
Ye nymphs of rosy lips and radiant eyes,
Whom Pleasure keeps too busy to be wise,
325 Whom Joys with soft varieties invite,
By day the frolic, and the dance by night;
Who frown with vanity, who smile with art,
And ask the latest fashion of the heart;
What care, what rules your heedless charms shall save,
330 Each nymph your rival, and each youth your slave?
Against your fame with Fondness Hate combines,
The rival batters, and the lover mines.° undermines

8. I.e., an aged person.
9. Croesus (d. ca. 549 B.C.E.), a very rich king who boasted of his happiness, and who was advised by the Athenian lawmaker Solon to regard no man as securely happy. He was later deposed.
1. Both the military hero John Churchill, duke of Marlborough, and the writer Jonathan Swift (1667–1745; see pp. 568–89) declined into senility.
2. Catherine Sedley, mistress of James II. Anne Vane, mistress of Frederick, prince of Wales, died at thirty-one.

With distant voice neglected Virtue calls,
Less heard and less, the faint remonstrance falls;
335 Tired with contempt, she quits the slippery reign,
And Pride and Prudence take her seat in vain.
In crowd at once, where none the pass defend,
The harmless freedom, and the private friend.
The guardians yield, by force superior plied:
340 To Interest, Prudence; and to Flattery, Pride.
Now Beauty falls betrayed, despised, distressed,
And hissing Infamy proclaims the rest.
Where then shall Hope and Fear their objects find?
Must dull Suspense corrupt the stagnant mind?
345 Must helpless man, in ignorance sedate,
Roll darkling down the torrent of his fate?
Must no dislike alarm, no wishes rise,
No cries invoke the mercies of the skies?
Inquirer, cease; petitions yet remain,
350 Which Heaven may hear, nor deem religion vain.
Still raise for good the supplicating voice,
But leave to Heaven the measure and the choice.
Safe in His power, whose eyes discern afar
The secret ambush of a specious prayer.
355 Implore His aid, in His decisions rest,
Secure, whate'er He gives, He gives the best.
Yet when the sense of sacred presence fires,
And strong devotion to the skies aspires,
Pour forth thy fervors for a healthful mind,
360 Obedient passions, and a will resigned;
For love, which scarce collective man can fill;
For patience sovereign o'er transmuted ill;[3]
For faith, that panting for a happier seat,
Counts death kind Nature's signal of retreat:
365 These goods for man the laws of Heaven ordain,
These goods He grants, who grants the power to gain;
With these celestial Wisdom calms the mind,
And makes the happiness she does not find.

On the Death of Dr. Robert Levet[4]

Condemned to Hope's delusive mine,
As on we toil from day to day,
By sudden blasts, or slow decline,
Our social comforts drop away.

3. I.e., a capacity for love such that all humankind together can hardly engage it fully; and for patience, which, by asserting sovereignty over ills, changes their nature.

4. An unlicensed physician, who practiced among the poor and who had long lived in Johnson's house. He was uncouth in appearance and stiff in manner.

5 Well tried through many a varying year,
See Levet to the grave descend;
Officious,° innocent, sincere, dutiful
Of every friendless name the friend.

Yet still he fills Affection's eye,
10 Obscurely wise, and coarsely kind;
Nor, lettered Arrogance, deny
Thy praise to merit unrefined.

When fainting Nature called for aid,
And hovering Death prepared the blow,
15 His vigorous remedy displayed
The power of art without the show.

In Misery's darkest cavern known,
His useful care was ever nigh,
Where hopeless Anguish poured his groan,
20 And lonely Want retired to die.

No summons mocked by chill delay,
No petty gain disdained by pride,
The modest wants of every day
The toil of every day supplied.

25 His virtues walked their narrow round,
Nor made a pause, nor left a void;
And sure the Eternal Master found
The single talent[5] well employed.

The busy day, the peaceful night,
30 Unfelt, uncounted, glided by;
His frame was firm, his powers were bright,
Though now his eightieth year was nigh.

Then with no throbbing fiery pain,
No cold gradations of decay,
35 Death broke at once the vital chain,
And freed his soul the nearest way.

1783

5. An allusion to the parable of the talents, in which Christ suggests that salvation will be granted to those who use well their abilities, however small (Matthew 25.14–30).

THOMAS GRAY
1716–1771

Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College

Ἄνθρωπος· ἱκανὴ πρόφασις εἰς τὸ δυστυχεῖν.[1]
—MENANDER

Ye distant spires, ye antique towers,
That crown the watery glade,
Where grateful Science° still adores — learning
Her Henry's holy shade;[2]
5 And ye, that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights[3] the expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead° survey, — meadow
Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among Wanders the hoary° Thames along — aged
10 His silver-winding way.

Ah happy hills, ah pleasing shade,
Ah fields beloved in vain,
Where once my careless childhood strayed,
A stranger yet to pain!
15 I feel the gales, that from ye blow,
A momentary bliss bestow,
As waving fresh their gladsome wing,
My weary soul they seem to soothe,
And, redolent of joy and youth,
20 To breathe a second spring.

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margent° green — marginal
The paths of pleasure trace,
25 Who foremost now delight to cleave
With pliant arm thy glassy wave?
The captive linnet which enthrall?° — imprison
What idle progeny succeed[4]
To chase the rolling circle's° speed, — hoop's
30 Or urge the flying ball?

While some on earnest business bent
Their murmuring labors ply
'Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint
To sweeten liberty:
35 Some bold adventurers disdain
The limits of their little reign,
And unknown regions dare descry:° — discover

1. I am a man, and that is reason enough for being miserable (Greek); from the dramatist Menander (342–292 B.C.E.).
2. Henry VI, founder of Eton.
3. On the opposite side of the river Thames from Eton; most of the "height" belongs to the castle.
4. Follow the example of the preceding generation.

Still as they run they look behind,
They hear a voice in every wind,
40 And snatch a fearful joy.

Gay hope is theirs by fancy fed,
Less pleasing when possessed;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast:
45 Theirs buxom° health of rosy hue, zestful, jolly
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively cheer of vigor born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
50 That fly the approach of morn.

Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play!
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond today.
55 Yet see how all around 'em wait
The ministers of human fate,
And black Misfortune's baleful train!
Ah, show them where in ambush stand
To seize their prey the murderous band!
60 Ah, tell them they are men!

These shall the fury Passions tear,
The vultures of the mind,
Disdainful Anger, pallid Fear,
And Shame that skulks behind;
65 Or pining Love shall waste their youth,
Or Jealousy with rankling tooth,
That inly gnaws the secret heart,
And Envy wan, and faded Care,
Grim-visaged comfortless Despair,
70 And Sorrow's piercing dart.

Ambition this[5] shall tempt to rise,
Then whirl the wretch from high,
To bitter Scorn a sacrifice,
And grinning Infamy.
75 The stings of Falsehood those[6] shall try,
And hard Unkindness' altered eye,
That mocks the tear it forced to flow;
And keen Remorse with blood defiled,
And moody Madness laughing wild
80 Amid severest woe.

Lo, in the vale of years beneath[7]
A grisly troop are seen,

5. I.e., one of them.
6. I.e., others.
7. A pointed variation on the common description of life as a "vale of tears."

The painful family of Death,
  More hideous than their queen:
85 This racks the joints, this fires the veins,
That every laboring sinew strains,
  Those in the deeper vitals rage:
Lo, Poverty, to fill the band,
That numbs the soul with icy hand,
90   And slow-consuming Age.

To each his sufferings: all are men,
  Condemned alike to groan;
The tender for another's pain,
  The unfeeling for his own.
95 Yet ah! why should they know their fate?
Since sorrow never comes too late,
  And happiness too swiftly flies.
Thought would destroy their paradise.
No more; where ignorance is bliss,
100   'Tis folly to be wise.

Ode

On the Death of a Favorite Cat, Drowned in a Tub of Goldfishes

'Twas on a lofty vase's side,
Where China's gayest art had dyed
  The azure flowers that blow;° bloom
Demurest of the tabby kind,
5 The pensive Selima reclined,
  Gazed on the lake below.

Her conscious tail her joy declared;
The fair round face, the snowy beard,
  The velvet of her paws,
10 Her coat, that with the tortoise vies,
Her ears of jet,° and emerald eyes, black
  She saw; and purred applause.

Still had she gazed; but 'midst the tide
Two angel forms were seen to glide,
15   The genii° of the stream: guardian spirits
Their scaly armor's Tyrian hue
Through richest purple to the view
  Betrayed a golden gleam.[8]

The hapless nymph with wonder saw:
20 A whisker first and then a claw,

8. "Tyrian" and (in classical reference) "purple" cover a considerable spectrum, including crimson. The fish are seen, through red highlights, as golden.

With many an ardent wish,
She stretched in vain to reach the prize.
What female heart can gold despise?
What cat's averse to fish?

25 Presumptuous maid! with looks intent
Again she stretched, again she bent,
Nor knew the gulf between.
(Malignant Fate sat by and smiled)
The slippery verge her feet beguiled,
30 She tumbled headlong in.

Eight times emerging from the flood
She mewed to every watery god,
Some speedy aid to send.
No dolphin came, no Nereid stirred;
35 Nor cruel Tom, nor Susan heard;[9]
A favorite has no friend!

From hence, ye beauties, undeceived,
Know, one false step is ne'er retrieved,
And be with caution bold.
40 Not all that tempts your wandering eyes
And heedless hearts, is lawful prize;
Nor all that glisters, gold.

Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard

The curfew° tolls the knell of parting day, evening bell
The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

5 Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds;

Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tower
10 The moping owl does to the moon complain
Of such, as wandering near her secret bower,
Molest her ancient solitary reign.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a moldering heap,

9. In Greek mythology, a dolphin saved the singer Arion when he was cast overboard. A Nereid is a sea nymph; both meanings of "nymph," water spirit and maiden, are at play in line 19, where the "nymph" is the personified cat. Tom and Susan are conventional names for servants.

15 Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
  The rude° forefathers of the hamlet sleep. rustic

The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
  The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed,
The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn,° hunting horn
20 No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
  Or busy housewife ply her evening care;
No children run to lisp their sire's return,
  Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

25 Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
  Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe° has broke; soil
How jocund did they drive their team afield!
  How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!

Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
30 Their homely joys, and destiny obscure;
Nor Grandeur hear with a disdainful smile
  The short and simple annals of the poor.

The boast of heraldry,[1] the pomp of power,
  And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
35 Awaits alike the inevitable hour.
  The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Nor you, ye proud, impute to these the fault,
  If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies[2] raise,
Where through the long-drawn aisle and fretted° vault ornamented
40 The pealing anthem swells the note of praise.

Can storied urn[3] or animated° bust lifelike
  Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can Honor's voice provoke° the silent dust, call forth
  Or Flattery soothe the dull cold ear of Death?

45 Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
  Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
Hands that the rod of empire might have swayed,
  Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre.

But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
50 Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll;
Chill Penury repressed their noble rage,
  And froze the genial current of the soul.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
  The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear:

1. I.e., noble family.
2. Memorials to military heroes; typically, statuary representations of arms captured in battle.
3. Funeral urn with descriptive epitaph.

55 Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

Some village Hampden,[4] that with dauntless breast
The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest,
60 Some Cromwell[5] guiltless of his country's blood.

The applause of listening senates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their history in a nation's eyes,

65 Their lot forbade: nor circumscribed alone
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confined;
Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
And shut the gates of mercy on mankind,

The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
70 To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame,
Or heap the shrine of Luxury and Pride
With incense kindled at the Muse's[6] flame.

Far from the madding[7] crowd's ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
75 Along the cool sequestered vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

Yet even these bones from insult to protect
Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture decked,
80 Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.

Their name, their years, spelt by the unlettered Muse,
The place of fame and elegy supply:
And many a holy text around she strews,
That teach the rustic moralist to die.

85 For who to dumb Forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing anxious being e'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing lingering look behind?

On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
90 Some pious drops the closing eye requires;
Even from the tomb the voice of Nature cries,
Even in our ashes live their wonted° fires. usual

4. John Hampden (1594–1643), leader of the opposition to Charles I in the controversy over ship money; killed in battle in the civil wars.
5. Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), general and statesman; lord protector of England 1653–58.
6. One of the nine Greek sister goddesses who inspired the arts.
7. I.e., either maddening or acting madly.

For thee, who mindful of the unhonored dead
  Dost in these lines their artless tale relate;
95 If chance, by lonely contemplation led,
  Some kindred spirit shall inquire thy fate,

Haply some hoary°-headed swain° may say, gray or white / rustic
  "Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
Brushing with hasty steps the dews away
100 To meet the sun upon the upland lawn.

"There at the foot of yonder nodding beech
  That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
  And pore upon the brook that babbles by.

105 "Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn,
  Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
Now drooping, woeful wan, like one forlorn,
  Or crazed with care, or crossed in hopeless love.

"One morn I missed him on the customed hill,
110 Along the heath and near his favorite tree;
Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
  Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;

"The next with dirges due in sad array
  Slow through the churchway path we saw him borne.
115 Approach and read (for thou canst read) the lay,° song
  Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn."

The Epitaph

Here rests his head upon the lap of Earth
  A youth to Fortune and to Fame unknown.
Fair Science° frowned not on his humble birth, learning
120 And Melancholy marked him for her own.

Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere,
  Heaven did a recompense as largely send:
He gave to Misery all he had, a tear,
  He gained from Heaven ('twas all he wished) a friend.

125 No farther seek his merits to disclose,
  Or draw his frailties from their dread abode
(There they alike in trembling hope repose),
  The bosom of his Father and his God.

Sonnet

On the Death of Mr. Richard West[8]

In vain to me the smiling mornings shine,
  And reddening Phoebus° lifts his golden fire; the sun
The birds in vain their amorous descant join,° harmonize
  Or cheerful fields resume their green attire;
5 These ears, alas! for other notes repine,
  A different object do these eyes require;° ask for
My lonely anguish melts no heart but mine,
  And in my breast the imperfect joys expire.
Yet morning smiles the busy race to cheer,
10 And newborn pleasure brings to happier men;
The fields to all their wonted° tribute bear; usual
  To warm their little loves the birds complain:[9]
I fruitless mourn to him that cannot hear,
  And weep the more, because I weep in vain.

WILLIAM COLLINS
1721–1759

Ode Written in the Beginning of the Year 1746[1]

How sleep the brave who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mold,° earth
5 She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
10 To bless the turf that wraps their clay,
And Freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!

1746

8. A friend of Gray since preparatory school, who died at twenty-six.
9. I.e., sing of their unfulfilled desire. "Little loves" puns on its Italian translation, amoretti, the title of Edmund Spenser's sonnet sequence (see p. 190).
1. This poem celebrates Englishmen who fell resisting the pretender to the throne (Bonnie Prince Charlie, the grandson of James II) in 1745.

Ode on the Poetical Character

Strophe[2]

As once, if not with light regard,
I read aright that gifted bard
(Him whose school above the rest
His loveliest Elfin Queen has blest).[3]
5 One, only one, unrivaled fair,
Might hope the magic girdle[4] wear,
At solemn tourney° hung on high, tournament
The wish of each love-darting eye;
Lo! to each other nymph in turn applied,
10 As if, in air unseen, some hovering hand,
Some chaste and angel-friend to virgin-fame,
With whispered spell had burst the starting band,
It left unblest her loathed dishonored side;
Happier, hopeless fair, if never
15 Her baffled hand with vain endeavor
Had touched that fatal zone to her denied!
Young Fancy thus, to me divinest name,
To whom, prepared and bathed in Heaven
The cest of amplest power is given;
20 To few the godlike gift assigns,
To gird their blest, prophetic loins,
And gaze her visions wild, and feel unmixed her flame!

Epode

The band, as fairy legends say,
Was wove on that creating day,
25 When He, who called with thought to birth
Yon tented sky, this laughing earth,
And dressed with springs, and forests tall,
And poured the main° engirting all, sea
Long by the loved Enthusiast[5] wooed,
30 Himself in some diviner mood,
Retiring, sate with her alone,
And placed her on his sapphire throne;
The whiles, the vaulted shrine around,
Seraphic° wires were heard to sound, angelic
35 Now sublimest triumph° swelling, trumpet
Now on love and mercy dwelling;
And she, from out the veiling cloud,
Breathed her magic notes aloud:
And thou, thou rich-haired Youth of Morn,[6]

2. Initial segment of the Greek choral ode, delivered with the chorus in motion; normally followed by the antistrophe, with the chorus in reverse motion, and then by the epode, with the chorus standing still.
3. Edmund Spenser (1552–1599; see pp. 159–205), whose followers ("school") have exalted his Faerie Queene above his other poems.
4. A belt, "band" (line 12), "zone" (line 16), or "cest" (line 19) described in Faerie Queene 4.5: it "gave the virtue of chaste love and wifehood to all that did it bear." "Peerless was she thought" that wore it.
5. Literally, one inspired by God; i.e., Fancy.
6. Apollo, the sun, Greek and Roman god of poetry.

40 And all thy subject life was born!
The dangerous Passions kept aloof,
Far from the sainted growing woof;[7]
But near it sate ecstatic Wonder,
Listening the deep applauding thunder;
45 And Truth, in sunny vest arrayed,
By whose the tarsel's° eyes were made; male falcon's
All the shadowy tribes of Mind,
In braided dance their murmurs joined,
And all the bright uncounted Powers
50 Who feed on Heaven's ambrosial flowers.
Where is the bard, whose soul can now
Its high presuming hopes avow?
Where he who thinks, with rapture blind,
This hallow'd work for him designed?

Antistrophe

55 High on some cliff, to Heaven up-piled,
Of rude access, of prospect wild,
Where, tangled round the jealous steep,
Strange shades o'erbrow the valleys deep,
And holy Genii° guard the rock, guardian spirits
60 Its glooms embrown, its springs unlock,
While on its rich ambitious head,
An Eden, like his° own, lies spread; Milton's
I view that oak, the fancied glades among,
By which as Milton lay, his evening ear,
65 From many a cloud that dropped ethereal dew,
Nigh sphered in Heaven its native strains could hear;
On which that ancient trump[8] he reached was hung;
Thither oft, his glory greeting,
From Waller's[9] myrtle shades retreating,
70 With many a vow from Hope's aspiring tongue,
My trembling feet his guiding steps pursue;
In vain—such bliss to one alone,
Of all the sons of soul was known,
And Heaven, and Fancy, kindred powers,
75 Have now o'erturned the inspiring bowers,[1]
Or curtained close such scene from every future view.

1746

Ode to Evening

If aught of oaten stop,[2] or pastoral song,
May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy modest ear,

7. The fabric of the girdle (line 6).
8. Milton's epic or sublime trumpet. The line echoes "Il Penseroso," lines 59–60 ("While Cynthia checks her Dragon yoke, / Gently o'er th'accustomed Oke"), and "Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity," line 156 ("The wakefull trump").
9. Edmund Waller (1607–1687; see pp. 393–94). The myrtle, sacred to Venus, Roman goddess of love and beauty, is an emblem of love.
1. Leafy coverts or arbors; also, poetically, idealized abodes.
2. I.e., if any modulation of a (shepherd's) reed.

Like thy own solemn springs,
Thy springs and dying gales,
5 O nymph° reserved, while now the bright-haired sun — maiden
Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
With brede° ethereal wove, — braid
O'erhang his wavy bed:
Now air is hushed, save where the weak-eyed bat,
10 With short shrill shriek flits by on leathern wing,
Or where the beetle winds
His small but sullen horn,
As oft he rises 'midst the twilight path,
Against the pilgrim° borne in heedless hum: — wayfarer
15 Now teach me, maid composed,
To breathe some softened strain,
Whose numbers, stealing through thy darkening vale,[3]
May not unseemly with its stillness suit,
As, musing slow, I hail
20 Thy genial loved return!
For when thy folding-star[4] arising shows
His paly° circlet, at his warning lamp — pale
The fragrant Hours, and elves
Who slept in flowers the day,
25 And many a nymph who wreaths her brows with sedge,
And sheds the freshening dew, and, lovelier still,
The pensive Pleasures sweet,
Prepare thy shadowy car.° — carriage
Then lead, calm votaress,° where some sheety lake — devotee
30 Cheers the lone heath, or some time-hallowed pile
Or upland fallows[5] gray
Reflect its last cool gleam.
But when chill blustering winds, or driving rain,
Forbid my willing feet, be mine the hut
35 That from the mountain's side
Views wilds, and swelling floods,
And hamlets° brown, and dim-discovered spires, — villages
And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all
Thy dewy fingers draw
40 The gradual dusky veil.
While Spring shall pour his showers, as oft he wont,° — is accustomed
And bathe thy breathing tresses, meekest Eve;
While Summer loves to sport
Beneath thy lingering light;
45 While sallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves;
Or Winter, yelling through the troublous air,
Affrights thy shrinking train,
And rudely rends thy robes;
So long, sure-found beneath the sylvan shed,[6]
50 Shall Fancy, Friendship, Science, rose-lipped Health,

3. Valley. Numbers: measures.
4. The evening star, which, when it becomes visible, tells the shepherd to drive his flock to the sheepfold.
5. I.e., ploughed land. Cf. Milton, "L'Allegro," line 71 (p. 403).
6. I.e., secure beneath the shelter of the forest.

Thy gentlest influence own,
And hymn thy favorite name!

The Flowers of the Forest[1]

I've heard the lilting[2] at our yowe°-milking, ewe
Lasses a-lilting before the dawn o' day;
But now they are moaning on ilka° green loaning:[3] each
"The Flowers of the Forest are a' wede away."[4]

5 At buchts,° in the morning, nae° blythe lads are scorning;° sheepfolds / no teasing
The lasses are lonely, and dowie,° and wae;° sad / wretched
Nae daffin',° nae gabbin', but sighing and sabbing:° foolish playing sobbing
Ilk° ane° lifts her leglen,° and hies her away. each / one / milk pail

In hairst,° at the shearing, nae youths now are jeering, harvest
10 The bandsters[5] are lyart,° and runkled° and gray; silvery / rumpled
At fair or at preaching, nae wooing, nae fleeching:° flattering
The Flowers of the Forest are a' wede away.

At e'en, in the gloaming,° nae swankies[6] are roaming twilight
'Bout stacks[7] wi' the lasses at bogle° to play, hide-and-seek 15 But ilk ane sits drearie, lamenting her dearie:
The Flowers of the Forest are a' wede away.

Dule° and wae° for the order sent our lads to the Border; grief / woe
The English, for ance,° by guile wan° the day; once / won
The Flowers of the Forest, that foucht aye the foremost,
20 The prime o' our land, are cauld° in the clay. cold

We'll hear nae mair° lilting at our yowe-milking, more
Women and bairns° are heartless and wae; children
Sighing and moaning on ilka green loaning:
"The Flowers of the Forest are a' wede away."

1769

1. This poem is a ballad on the battle of Flodden, an English victory over the Scots in 1513. James IV of Scotland, in alliance with France, had invaded the north of England. At Flodden, in Northumberland, James's army occupied a strong position and outnumbered the English troops, but James proved an incompetent, though brave, general. More than ten thousand Scots were killed at Flodden, James among them. Elliot set the words of the ballad to an old Scottish air, from which she takes her first and fourth lines; cf. Pete Seeger, "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?" (p. 1853).
2. Sweet and cheerful singing.
3. Uncultivated ground used for milking.
4. Carried off, especially by death.
5. Those who bind sheaves behind the reaper.
6. Strapping young men.
7. Large piles of dried peat erected outdoors as a fuel store.

CHRISTOPHER SMART
1722–1771

From Jubilate Agno[1]

For I will consider my Cat Jeoffry.
For he is the servant of the Living God, duly and daily serving him.
For at the first glance of the glory of God in the East he worships in his way.
700 For is this done by wreathing his body seven times round with elegant quickness.
For then he leaps up to catch the musk,[2] which is the blessing of God upon his prayer.
For he rolls upon prank[3] to work it in.
For having done duty and received blessing he begins to consider himself.
For this he performs in ten degrees.
705 For first he looks upon his forepaws to see if they are clean.
For secondly he kicks up behind to clear away there.
For thirdly he works it upon stretch with the forepaws extended.
For fourthly he sharpens his paws by wood.
For fifthly he washes himself.
710 For sixthly he rolls upon wash.
For seventhly he fleas himself, that he may not be interrupted upon the beat.[4]
For eighthly he rubs himself against a post.
For ninthly he looks up for his instructions.
For tenthly he goes in quest of food.
715 For having considered God and himself he will consider his neighbor.
For if he meets another cat he will kiss her in kindness.
For when he takes his prey he plays with it to give it a chance.
For one mouse in seven escapes by his dallying.
For when his day's work is done his business more properly begins.
720 For he keeps the Lord's watch in the night against the adversary.
For he counteracts the powers of darkness by his electrical skin and glaring eyes.
For he counteracts the Devil, who is death, by brisking about the life.
For in his morning orisons he loves the sun and the sun loves him.
For he is of the tribe of Tiger.
725 For the Cherub Cat is a term of the Angel Tiger.[5]
For he has the subtlety and hissing of a serpent, which in goodness
he suppresses.
For he will not do destruction if he is well-fed, neither will he spit without provocation.

1. Rejoice in the Lamb (Latin); i.e., in Jesus, the Lamb of God. Smart wrote this poem while confined for insanity. Its form derives from the biblical Psalms.
2. His own or another animal's scent, or perhaps a plant odor.
3. I.e., in display or jest.
4. Upon his daily round, possibly of hunting.
5. Smart apparently thinks of Jeoffry as an immature or diminutive phase of a larger creature—cherubs being by artistic convention small and childlike angels.

For he purrs in thankfulness when God tells him he's a good Cat.
For he is an instrument for the children to learn benevolence upon.
730 For every house is incomplete without him, and a blessing is lacking in the spirit.
For the Lord commanded Moses concerning the cats at the departure of the Children of Israel from Egypt.
For every family had one cat at least in the bag.[6]
For the English Cats are the best in Europe.
For he is the cleanest in the use of his forepaws of any quadruped.
735 For the dexterity of his defense is an instance of the love of God to him exceedingly.
For he is the quickest to his mark of any creature.
For he is tenacious of his point.
For he is a mixture of gravity and waggery.
For he knows that God is his Saviour.
740 For there is nothing sweeter than his peace when at rest.
For there is nothing brisker than his life when in motion.
For he is of the Lord's poor, and so indeed is he called by benevolence perpetually—Poor Jeoffry! poor Jeoffry! the rat has bit thy throat.
For I bless the name of the Lord Jesus that Jeoffry is better.
For the divine spirit comes about his body to sustain it in complete cat.
745 For his tongue is exceeding pure so that it has in purity what it wants in music.
For he is docile and can learn certain things.
For he can sit up with gravity, which is patience upon approbation.
For he can fetch and carry, which is patience in employment.
For he can jump over a stick, which is patience upon proof positive.
750 For he can spraggle upon waggle[7] at the word of command.
For he can jump from an eminence into his master's bosom.
For he can catch the cork and toss it again.
For he is hated by the hypocrite and miser.
For the former is afraid of detection.
755 For the latter refuses the charge.
For he camels his back to bear the first notion of business.
For he is good to think on, if a man would express himself neatly.
For he made a great figure in Egypt for his signal services.
For he killed the Icneumon rat, very pernicious by land.[8]
760 For his ears are so acute that they sting again.
For from this proceeds the passing quickness of his attention.
For by stroking of him I have found out electricity.
For I perceived God's light about him both wax and fire.
For the electrical fire is the spiritual substance which God sends from heaven to sustain the bodies both of man and beast.
765 For God has blessed him in the variety of his movements.
For, though he cannot fly, he is an excellent clamberer.
For his motions upon the face of the earth are more than any other quadruped.

6. The Israelites took with them silver and gold ornaments and raiment, as well as flocks and herds (Exodus 11.2 and 12.32, 35). Smart adds the cats.

7. He can sprawl at the waggle of a finger.

8. The Ichneumon resembles a weasel; the ancient Egyptians venerated and domesticated it.

For he can tread to all the measures[9] upon the music.
For he can swim for life.
770 For he can creep.

From A Song to David[1]

David the son of Jesse said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel, said, "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and His Word was in my tongue."

—2 Samuel 23.1, 2

O Thou, that sit'st upon a throne, [Invocation][2]
With harp of high majestic tone,
To praise the King of kings;
And voice of heav'n-ascending swell,
5 Which, while its deeper notes excel,
Clear, as a clarion,° rings: trumpet

To bless each valley, grove and coast,
And charm the cherubs[3] to the post
Of gratitude in throngs;
10 To keep the days on Zion's mount,[4]
And send the year to his account,
With dances and with songs:[5]

O Servant of God's holiest charge,
The minister of praise at large,
15 Which thou may'st now receive;[6]
From thy blessed mansion hail and hear,
From topmost eminence appear
To this the wreath I weave.[7]

9. He can dance in a rhythmic or stately manner.
1. The second king of Israel. In an advertisement for the first edition (printed in Poems on Several Occasions, 1763), Smart called this work "A Poem composed in a Spirit of affection and thankfulness to the great Author of the Book of Gratitude, which is the Psalms of David the King." Smart's main sources for the poem were the Bible and Patrick Delaney's An Historical Account of the Life and Reign of David King of Israel (1740).
2. In the first edition, Smart prefaced the poem with a summary, here reprinted as a series of marginal glosses. The invocation is a poetic convention in which the poet requests divine inspiration and assistance to write his poem. Smart here calls on David.
3. One of the nine orders of angels.
4. Mt. Zion, one of the hills of Jerusalem; here, perhaps, the Israelites, the Christian Church, the heavenly Jerusalem, or a place of worship.
5. David's task, to "keep the days," is both to observe the religious rites and festivals and to record the Israelites' history, to "send the year to his [God's] account," i.e., to his reckoning, for his sake, or to his credit. (One of Smart's own projects was to compose a complete cycle of hymns for the major occasions in the calendar of the Anglican Church.)
6. I.e., David, whose responsibility is praise of God, will now receive the praise of the poet.
7. Smart compares his poem to a wreath; the laurel wreath was a symbol of poetic achievement.

Great, valiant, pious, good, and clean,
20 Sublime, contemplative, serene,
Strong, constant, pleasant, wise![8]
Bright effluence° of exceeding grace;
Best man!—the swiftness and the race,
The peril, and the prize!

From Samuel's horn[9] and God's renown,
Which is the people's voice;
From all the host° from rear to van,°
Applauded and embraced the man—
30 The man of God's own choice.

Valiant—the word, and up he rose—
The fight—he triumphed o'er the foes,
Whom God's just laws abhor;°
And armed in gallant faith he took

The weapons of the war,

Pious—magnificent and grand;
'Twas he the famous temple planned:
(The seraph in his soul)[2]
40 Foremost to give the Lord his dues,
Foremost to bless the welcome news,
And foremost to condole.

Good—from Jehudah's genuine vein,
From God's best nature good in grain,[3]
45 His aspect and his heart;
To pity, to forgive, to save,
Witness En-gedi's conscious cave,[4]
And Shimei's blunted dart.[5]

8. The next twelve stanzas will give an example from David's life of each of these twelve virtues. (In "Jubilate Agno," Smart associates these virtues with the twelve tribes of Israel.)
9. God sent Samuel to Bethlehem to choose David, a then-unknown shepherd-boy, to be the next king of Israel: "Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren: and the spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward" (1 Samuel 16.13).
1. The Philistine giant, Goliath, whom David killed using his sling and a stone from a brook.
2. David received the "pattern," or plan, for the temple "by the Spirit" (1 Chronicles 28.12); the "seraph" seems to be Delaney's invention. David wanted to build the temple himself, but the prophet Nathan said that God would not allow him to do so and that David's son, Solomon, would do it. "Welcome news" (line 41) is the Davidic Covenant, God's promise that David's line would be established kings of Israel.
3. In background and substance; David came from the tribe of Judah (of which Jehudah is a variation).
4. Before David became king of Israel, Saul, the reigning king, pursued him with an army in an attempt to kill him. One day, in the wilderness of Engedi, Saul wandered alone into a cave where David and his men were hiding. Although his men urged him to kill Saul, David refused (1 Samuel 24).
5. Shimei, a relative of Saul, cursed and threw stones at David, but David refused to kill him (2 Samuel 16, 19).

Clean—if perpetual prayer be pure,
50 And love, which could itself inure° accustom
To fasting and to fear—
Clean in his gestures, hands, and feet,
To smite the lyre, the dance complete,
To play the sword and spear.

10

55 Sublime—invention ever young,
Of vast conception, towering tongue,
To God the external theme;
Notes from yon exaltations caught,
Unrivaled royalty of thought,
60 O'er meaner strains supreme.

11

Contemplative—on God to fix
His musings, and above the six
The sabbath-day he blessed;
'Twas then his thoughts self-conquest pruned,
65 And heavenly melancholy tuned,
To bless and bear the rest.

12

Serene—to sow the seeds of peace,
Remembering, when he watched the fleece,
How sweetly Kidron[6] purled°— murmured
70 To further knowledge, silence vice,
And plant perpetual paradise
When God had calmed the world.

13

Strong—in the Lord, who could defy
Satan, and all his powers that lie
75 In sempiternal° night; everlasting
And hell, and horror, and despair
Were as the lion and the bear[7]
To his undaunted might.

14

Constant—in love to God The Truth,
80 Age, manhood, infancy, and youth—
To Jonathan his friend

6. A brook that borders the district of Jerusalem. As a youth, David tended his father's flocks near this brook.

7. In 1 Samuel 17, David credits God with helping him kill a lion and a bear that were ravaging his flock.

Constant, beyond the verge of death;
And Ziba, and Mephibosheth
His endless fame attend.[8]

15

85 Pleasant—and various as the year;
Man, soul, and angel, without peer,
Priest, champion, sage and boy;
In armor, or in ephod° clad, priestly vestment
His pomp, his piety was glad;
90 Majestic was his joy.

16

Wise—in recovery from his fall,[9]
Whence rose his eminence o'er all,
Of all the most reviled;
The light of Israel in his ways,
95 Wise are his precepts, prayer and praise,
And counsel to his child.[1]

17

His muse,[2] bright angel of his verse, [He consecrates his genius for consolation and edification]
Gives balm for all the thorns that pierce,
For all the pangs that rage
100 Blessed light, still gaining on the gloom,
The more than Michal of his bloom,
The Abishag of his age.[3]

18

He sung of god—the mighty source [The subjects he made choice of—the Supreme Being;]
Of all things—the stupendous force
105 Of which all strength depends;
From whose right arm, beneath whose eyes,
All period,[4] power, and enterprise
Commences, reigns, and ends.

8. During the time that Saul was trying to kill him, David became fast friends with Saul's son Jonathan. David made a covenant with Jonathan, promising to extend his kindness to Jonathan's house, even after Jonathan's death (1 Samuel 20.15). David honored this covenant many years later when he restored Saul's land to Jonathan's son, Mephibosheth, and invited him to eat at David's own table (2 Samuel 9). The stewardship of the land was awarded to Ziba (a servant of Saul) and his family.
9. David's "fall" resulted from his lust for Bathsheba and his arranging to have her husband, Uriah, killed in battle. David repented of his sin and asked God's forgiveness (Psalm 51). Delaney emphasizes David's repentance and insists that his greatness rose out of his recovery from sin.
1. According to 1 Kings 2 and 1 Chronicles 22, just before his death David gave advice to Solomon, his son and successor, counseling him to keep the commandments of God and to build the temple. Delaney notes that David left precepts for his son in the Psalms and Proverbs.
2. Source of inspiration.
3. Michal was David's first wife; Abishag, a young woman who nursed him in his old age.
4. Possibly meaning accomplishments, achievements; or, set amount of time (during which one has power).

Psalm 58[5]

Ye congregation of the tribes,[6]
  On justice do you set your mind;
And are ye free from guile and bribes
  Ye judges of mankind?

5 Nay, ye of frail and mortal mould
  Imagine mischief in your heart;
Your suffrages[7] and selves are sold
  Unto the general mart.

Men of unrighteous seed betray
10   Perverseness from their mother's womb;[8]
As soon as they can run astray,
  Against the truth presume.

They are with foul infection stained,
  Ev'n with the serpent's taint impure;
15 Their ears to blest persuasion chained,
  And locked against her lure.[9]

Though Christ himself the pipe should tune,
  They will not to the measure tread,[1]
Nor will they with his grief commune° sympathize
20   Though tears of blood he shed.

Lord, humanize their scoff and scorn,
  And their malevolence defeat;
Of water and the spirit born[2]
  Let grace their change complete.

25 Let them with pious ardor burn,
  And make thy holy church their choice;
To thee with all their passions turn,
  And in thy light rejoice.

As quick as lightning to its mark,
30   So let thy gracious angel speed;

5. Cf. the versions of this Psalm and the next one by Mary Sidney (pp. 225–26), from The Massachusetts Bay Psalm Book (pp. 391–93), and by Isaac Watts (pp. 592–94).
6. "Congregation," a common Protestant term for members of a church, here refers to the collective body of the Israelites; there were twelve tribes of Israel.
7. Intercessory prayers; petitions to god; supplications; also, in the Church of England, various versicles and their responses in morning and evening prayer and in the Litany.
8. The doctrine of original sin holds that children are born sinful, but Smart seems here to allude to the Calvinist idea that some people are predestined to damnation.
9. Cf. the King James Bible's image (in Psalm 58) of an adder that "stoppeth up her ear" so that the charmer cannot charm her.
1. "To tread a measure" is to dance in a rhythmic or stately manner.
2. Jesus uses these terms in the Christian Scriptures: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God" (John 3.5); but in the Hebrew Scriptures, God, in forming a new covenant with the people of Israel, says, "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you" (Ezekiel 36.25–26).

And take their spirits in thine ark[3]
To their eternal mead.° reward

The righteous shall exult the more
As he such powerful mercy sees,
35 Such wrecks and ruins safe on shore,
Such tortured souls at ease.

So that a man shall say, no doubt,
The penitent has his reward;
There is a God to bear him out,
40 And he is Christ our Lord.

Psalm 114

When Israel came from Egypt's coast,
And Goshen's[4] marshy plains,
And Jacob with his joyful host
From servitude and chains;

5 Then was it seen how much the Jews
Were holy in his sight,
And God did Israel's kingdom choose
To manifest his might.

The sea beheld it, and with dread
10 Retreated to make way;
And Jordan° to his fountain head river in Palestine
Ran backwards in dismay.

The mountains, like the rams that bound,
Exulted on their base;
15 Like lambs the little hills around
Skipt lightly from their place.

What is the cause, thou mighty sea,
That thou thyself should shun;
And Jordan, what is come to thee,
20 That thou should backward run?

Ye mountains that ye leaped so high
From off the solid rock,
Ye hills that ye should gambols° try, leaps, dances
Like firstlings of the flock?

3. The ark of the Covenant contained "the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb, when the Lord made a covenant with the children of Israel, when they came out of the land of Egypt" (1 Kings 8.9); thus it symbolizes God's promise to guide and protect the Israelites.
4. The Hebrew word refers to the fertile land allotted to the Israelites during their exile in Egypt; metaphorically, Goshen is a place of plenty and light.

25 Earth, from the center to the sod
His fearful presence hail
The presence of Jeshurun's[5] God,
In whom our arms prevail.

Who beds of rocks in pools to stand
30 Can by his word compel,
And from the veiny flint command
The fountain and the well.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH
ca. 1730–1774

When Lovely Woman Stoops to Folly

When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds too late that men betray,
What charm can soothe her melancholy,
What art can wash her guilt away?

5 The only art her guilt to cover,
To hide her shame from every eye,
To give repentance to her love,
And wring his bosom—is to die.

The Deserted Village

Sweet Auburn![1] loveliest village of the plain,
Where health and plenty cheered the laboring swain,° rustic
Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting summer's lingering blooms delayed:
5 Dear lovely bowers[2] of innocence and ease,
Seats of my youth, when every sport could please,
How often have I loitered o'er thy green,
Where humble happiness endeared each scene;
How often have I paused on every charm,
10 The sheltered cot,° the cultivated farm, cottage
The never-failing brook, the busy mill,
The decent church that topped the neighboring hill,
The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,

5. A poetic title for Israel, meaning "the dear upright people."
1. Apparently a fictional, ideal village; there is much debate about its exact prototype.
2. Leafy coverts or arbors; also, poetically, idealized abodes.

For talking age and whispering lovers made;
15 How often have I blessed the coming day,° holiday
When toil remitting lent its turn to play,
And all the village train, from labor free,
Led up their sports beneath the spreading tree,
While many a pastime circled in the shade,
20 The young contending as the old surveyed;
And many a gambol frolicked o'er the ground,
And sleights of art and feats of strength went round;
And still as each repeated pleasure tired,
Succeeding sports the mirthful band inspired;
25 The dancing pair that simply sought renown,
By holding out to tire each other down;
The swain mistrustless of his smutted face,
While secret laughter tittered round the place;
The bashful virgin's sidelong looks of love,
30 The matron's glance that would those looks reprove:
These were thy charms, sweet village! sports like these,
With sweet succession, taught even toil to please;
These round thy bowers their cheerful influence shed,
These were thy charms—But all these charms are fled.
35 Sweet smiling village, loveliest of the lawn,
Thy sports are fled, and all thy charms withdrawn;
Amidst thy bowers the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green:
One only master grasps the whole domain,
40 And half a tillage[3] stints thy smiling plain;
No more thy glassy brook reflects the day,
But choked with sedges, works its weedy way;
Along thy glades, a solitary guest,
The hollow-sounding bittern[4] guards its nest;
45 Amidst thy desert walks the lapwing flies,
And tires their echoes with unvaried cries.
Sunk are thy bowers, in shapeless ruin all,
And the long grass o'ertops the moldering wall,
And, trembling, shrinking from the spoiler's hand,
50 Far, far away thy children leave the land.
Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;[5]
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
55 But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed, can never be supplied.
A time there was, ere England's griefs began,
When every rood[6] of ground maintained its man;
For him light labor spread her wholesome store,
60 Just gave what life required, but gave no more:

3. I.e., only half the land is cultivated under the new monopoly; or, the land was being plowed and was left unfinished when ownership changed. The significant landowners were displacing less prosperous freeholders and at the same time appropriating land formerly held in common.
4. Marsh bird with a booming call.
5. In the opening dedication to the English painter Sir Joshua Reynolds (1723–1792), Goldsmith writes, "I . . . continue to think those luxuries prejudicial to states, by which so many vices are introduced, and so many kingdoms have been undone."
6. A measure of land, varying by locality.

His best companions, innocence and health;
And his best riches, ignorance of wealth.
But times are altered; Trade's unfeeling train
Usurp the land and dispossess the swain;
65 Along the lawn, where scattered hamlets rose,
Unwieldy wealth, and cumbrous pomp repose;
And every want to opulence allied,
And every pang that folly pays to pride.
These gentle hours that plenty bade to bloom,
70 Those calm desires that asked but little room,
Those healthful sports that graced the peaceful scene,
Lived in each look, and brightened all the green;
These far departing seek a kinder shore,
And rural mirth and manners are no more.
75 Sweet Auburn! parent of the blissful hour,
Thy glades forlorn confess the tyrant's power.
Here, as I take my solitary rounds,
Amidst thy tangling walks, and ruined grounds,
And, many a year elapsed, return to view
80 Where once the cottage stood, the hawthorn grew,
Remembrance wakes with all her busy train,
Swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain.
In all my wanderings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
85 I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper° at the close, candle
And keep the flame from wasting by repose.
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
90 Amidst the swains to show my book-learned skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And, as an hare whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
95 I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return—and die at home at last.
O blest retirement, friend to life's decline,
Retreats from care that never must be mine,
How happy he who crowns in shades like these 100 A youth of labor with an age of ease;
Who quits a world where strong temptations try,
And, since 'tis hard to combat, learns to fly!
For him no wretches, born to work and weep,
Explore the mine, or tempt the dangerous deep;
105 No surly porter stands in guilty state
To spurn imploring famine from the gate;
But on he moves to meet his latter end,
Angels around befriending virtue's friend;
Bends to the grave with unperceived decay,
110 While Resignation gently slopes the way;
And, all his prospects brightening to the last,
His Heaven commences ere the world be passed!

Sweet was the sound when oft at evening's close,
Up yonder hill the village murmur rose;
115 There, as I passed with careless steps and slow,
The mingling notes came softened from below;
The swain responsive as the milkmaid sung,
The sober herd that lowed to meet their young,
The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
120 The playful children just let loose from school;
The watchdog's voice that bayed the whispering wind,
And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant° mind; carefree
These all in sweet confusion sought the shade,
And filled each pause the nightingale had made.
125 But now the sounds of population fail,
No cheerful murmurs fluctuate in the gale,
No busy steps the grass-grown footway tread,
For all the bloomy flush of life is fled.
All but yon widowed, solitary thing
130 That feebly bends beside the plashy° spring; marshy
She, wretched matron, forced, in age, for bread,
To strip the brook with mantling° cresses spread, covering
To pick her wintry faggot° from the thorn, firewood
To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn;
135 She only left of all the harmless train,
The sad historian of the pensive plain.
Near yonder copse,° where once the garden smiled, grove
And still where many a garden flower grows wild,
There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
140 The village preacher's modest mansion[7] rose.
A man he was, to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a year;
Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
Nor e'er had changed, nor wished to change his place;
145 Unpracticed he to fawn, or seek for power,
By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour;
Far other aims his heart had learned to prize,
More skilled to raise the wretched than to rise.
His house was known to all the vagrant train,
150 He chid their wanderings, but relieved their pain;
The long-remembered beggar was his guest,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
The ruined spendthrift, now no longer proud,
Claimed kindred there, and had his claims allowed;
155 The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay,
Sate by his fire, and talked the night away;
Wept o'er his wounds, or tales of sorrow done,
Shouldered his crutch, and showed how fields were won.
Pleased with his guests, the good man learned to glow,
160 And quite forgot their vices in their woe;
Careless their merits, or their faults to scan,
His pity gave ere charity began.

7. There seem to have been no conventional mansions in Goldsmith's village; see lines 195 and 238, and cf. George Crabbe, "The Parish Register," line 19 (p. 724).

Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And even his failings leaned to Virtue's side;
165 But in his duty prompt at every call,
He watched and wept, he prayed and felt, for all.
And, as a bird each fond endearment tries,
To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
He tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
170 Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.
Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
And sorrow, guilt, and pain, by turns dismayed,
The reverend champion stood. At his control,
Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
175 Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,
And his last faltering accents whispered praise.
At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorned the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevailed with double sway,
180 And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray.
The service past, around the pious man,
With steady zeal each honest rustic ran;
Even children followed with endearing wile,
And plucked his gown, to share the good man's smile.
185 His ready smile a parent's warmth expressed,
Their welfare pleased him, and their cares distressed;
To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given,
But all his serious thoughts had rest in Heaven.
As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
190 Swells from the vale,° and midway leaves the storm, valley
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.
Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the way,
With blossomed furze° unprofitably gay, a wild shrub
195 There, in his noisy mansion, skilled to rule,
The village master taught his little school;
A man severe he was, and stern to view,
I knew him well, and every truant knew;
Well had the boding° tremblers learned to trace anxious
200 The day's disasters in his morning face;
Full well they laughed with counterfeited glee,
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
Full well the busy whisper circling round,
Conveyed the dismal tidings when he frowned;
205 Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was in fault;[8]
The village all declared how much he knew;
'Twas certain he could write, and cipher too;
Lands he could measure, terms and tides presage,[9]
210 And even the story ran that he could gauge.

8. Pronounced like fought.
9. He could calculate (for example) when rents were due, the dates of feasts and seasons in the church year, and the sea tides. "Tides" here literally means "times." To "gauge" (line 210) is to calculate the fluid content of casks and other vessels.

In arguing too, the parson owned his skill,[1]
For even though vanquished, he could argue still;
While words of learned length, and thundering sound,
Amazed the gazing rustics ranged around;
215 And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew,
That one small head could carry all he knew.
 But past is all his fame. The very spot
Where many a time he triumphed, is forgot.
Near yonder thorn, that lifts its head on high,
220 Where once the signpost caught the passing eye,
Low lies that house where nut-brown draughts inspired,[2]
Where graybeard Mirth and smiling Toil retired,
Where village statesmen talked with looks profound,
And news much older than their ale went round.
225 Imagination fondly stoops to trace
The parlor splendors of that festive place:
The whitewashed wall, the nicely sanded floor,
The varnished clock that clicked behind the door;
The chest contrived a double debt to pay,
230 A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day;
The pictures placed for ornament and use,
The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose;° a board game
The hearth, except when winter chilled the day,
With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel gay,
235 While broken teacups, wisely kept for show,
Ranged o'er the chimney, glistened in a row.
 Vain transitory splendors! Could not all
Reprieve the tottering mansion from its fall!
Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart
240 An hour's importance to the poor man's heart;
Thither no more the peasant shall repair
To sweet oblivion of his daily care;
No more the farmer's news, the barber's tale,
No more the woodman's ballad shall prevail;
245 No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,
Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear;
The host himself no longer shall be found
Careful to see the mantling bliss[3] go round;
Nor the coy maid, half willing to be pressed,
250 Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest.
 Yes! let the rich deride, the proud disdain,
These simple blessings of the lowly train,
To me more dear, congenial to my heart,
One native charm, than all the gloss of art;
255 Spontaneous joys, where nature has its play,
The soul adopts, and owns their first-born sway;
Lightly they frolic o'er the vacant mind,

1. I.e., admitted his (the schoolmaster's) skill.
2. I.e., the public house where ale inspired the customers. Cf. Crabbe's "The Parish Register," which transfers Goldsmith's "twelve good rules" (line 232), rules of conduct often posted in taverns, to the cottage of the "industrious swain," and which describes the pub as a place of crime and corruption.
3. The ale covering itself with foam.

Unenvied, unmolested, unconfined.
But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,
260 With all the freaks of wanton wealth arrayed,
In these, ere triflers half their wish obtain,
The toiling pleasure sickens into pain;
And, even while fashion's brightest arts decoy,
The heart distrusting asks if this be joy.
265 Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen, who survey
The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,
'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand
Between a splendid and an happy land.
Proud swells the tide with loads of freighted ore,
270 And shouting Folly hails them from her shore;
Hoards, even beyond the miser's wish abound,
And rich men flock from all the world around.
Yet count our gains. This wealth is but a name
That leaves our useful products still the same.
275 Not so the loss. The man of wealth and pride,
Takes up a space that many poor supplied;
Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,
Space for his horses, equipage, and hounds;
The robe that wraps his limbs in silken sloth
280 Has robbed the neighboring fields of half their growth;
His seat, where solitary sports are seen,
Indignant spurns the cottage from the green;
Around the world each needful product flies,
For all the luxuries the world supplies:
285 While thus the land adorned for pleasure, all
In barren splendor feebly waits the fall.
As some fair female unadorned and plain,
Secure to please while youth confirms her reign,
Slights every borrowed charm that dress supplies,
290 Nor shares with art the triumph of her eyes;
But when those charms are past, for charms are frail,
When time advances, and when lovers fail,
She then shines forth, solicitous to bless,
In all the glaring impotence of dress:
295 Thus fares the land, by luxury betrayed;
In nature's simplest charms at first arrayed;
But verging to decline, its splendors rise,
Its vistas strike, its palaces surprise;
While scourged by famine from the smiling land,
300 The mournful peasant leads his humble band;
And while he sinks without one arm to save,
The country blooms—a garden, and a grave.
Where then, ah where, shall Poverty reside,
To 'scape the pressure of contiguous Pride?
305 If to some common's fenceless limits strayed,
He drives his flock to pick the scanty blade,
Those fenceless fields the sons of wealth divide,
And even the bare-worn common is denied.[4]

4. Refers to the enclosure and appropriation of common land.

If to the city sped—What waits him there?
310 To see profusion that he must not share;
To see ten thousand baneful arts combined
To pamper luxury, and thin mankind;
To see those joys the sons of pleasure know,
Extorted from his fellow creature's woe.
315 Here, while the courtier glitters in brocade,
There the pale artist° plies the sickly trade; artisan
Here, while the proud their long-drawn pomps display,
There the black gibbet° glooms beside the way. gallows
The dome where Pleasure holds her midnight reign,
320 Here, richly decked, admits the gorgeous train;
Tumultuous grandeur crowds the blazing square,
The rattling chariots clash, the torches glare.
Sure scenes like these no troubles e'er annoy!
Sure these denote one universal joy!
325 Are these thy serious thoughts?—Ah, turn thine eyes
Where the poor houseless shivering female lies.
She once, perhaps, in village plenty blest,
Has wept at tales of innocence distressed;
Her modest looks the cottage might adorn,
330 Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn;
Now lost to all; her friends, her virtue fled,
Near her betrayer's door she lays her head,
And pinched with cold, and shrinking from the shower,
With heavy heart deplores that luckless hour,
335 When idly first, ambitious of the town,
She left her wheel and robes of country brown.
Do thine, sweet Auburn, thine, the loveliest train,
Do thy fair tribes participate her pain?
Even now, perhaps, by cold and hunger led,
340 At proud men's doors they ask a little bread!
Ah, no. To distant climes, a dreary scene,
Where half the convex world intrudes between,
Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,
Where wild Altama[5] murmurs to their woe.
345 Far different there from all that charmed before,
The various terrors of that horrid shore;
Those blazing suns that dart a downward ray,
And fiercely shed intolerable day;
Those matted woods where birds forget to sing,
350 But silent bats in drowsy clusters cling,
Those poisonous fields with rank luxuriance crowned,
Where the dark scorpion gathers death around;
Where at each step the stranger fears to wake
The rattling terrors of the vengeful snake;
355 Where crouching tigers° wait their hapless prey, pumas
And savage men, more murderous still than they;
While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
Mingling the ravaged landscape with the skies.
Far different these from every former scene,

5. Altamaha, a river in Georgia (North America).

360 The cooling brook, the grassy-vested green,
The breezy covert of the warbling grove,
That only sheltered thefts of harmless love.
  Good Heaven! what sorrows gloomed that parting day,
That called them from their native walks away;
365 When the poor exiles, every pleasure past,
Hung round their bowers, and fondly looked their last,
And took a long farewell, and wished in vain
For seats like these beyond the western main;
And shuddering still to face the distant deep,
370 Returned and wept, and still returned to weep.
The good old sire the first prepared to go
To new-found worlds, and wept for other's woe;
But for himself, in conscious virtue brave,
He only wished for worlds beyond the grave.
375 His lovely daughter, lovelier in her tears,
The fond companion of his helpless years,
Silent went next, neglectful of her charms,
And left a lover's for a father's arms.
With louder plaints° the mother spoke her woes, lamentations
380 And blessed the cot where every pleasure rose;
And kissed her thoughtless babes with many a tear,
And clasped them close in sorrow doubly dear;
Whilst her fond husband strove to lend relief
In all the silent manliness of grief.
385 O luxury! Thou cursed by Heaven's decree,
How ill exchanged are things like these for thee!
How do thy potions, with insidious joy,
Diffuse their pleasures only to destroy!
Kingdoms, by thee, to sickly greatness grown,
390 Boast of a florid vigor not their own.
At every draught more large and large they grow,
A bloated mass of rank unwieldy woe;
Till sapped their strength, and every part unsound,
Down, down they sink, and spread a ruin round.
395 Even now the devastation is begun,
And half the business of destruction done;
Even now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
I see the rural Virtues leave the land.
Down where yon anchoring vessel spreads the sail,
400 That idly waiting flaps with every gale,
Downward they move, a melancholy band,
Pass from the shore, and darken all the strand.
Contented Toil, and hospitable Care,
And kind connubial Tenderness are there;
405 And Piety, with wishes placed above,
And steady Loyalty, and faithful Love:
And thou, sweet Poetry, thou loveliest maid,
Still first to fly where sensual joys invade;
Unfit in these degenerate times of shame,
410 To catch the heart, or strike for honest fame;
Dear charming Nymph, neglected and decried,

My shame in crowds, my solitary pride;
Thou source of all my bliss, and all my woe,
That found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so;
415 Thou guide by which the nobler arts excel,
Thou nurse of every virtue, fare thee well.
Farewell, and O! where'er thy voice be tried,
On Torno's cliffs, or Pambamarca's side,[6]
Whether where equinoctial° fervors glow, tropical
420 Or winter wraps the polar world in snow,
Still let thy voice, prevailing over time,
Redress the rigors of the inclement clime;
Aid slighted truth, with thy persuasive strain
Teach erring man to spurn the rage of gain;
425 Teach him that states of native strength possessed,
Though very poor, may still be very blest;
That Trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,
As ocean sweeps the labored mole° away; breakwater
While self-dependent power can time defy,
430 As rocks resist the billows and the sky.[7]

WILLIAM COWPER
1731–1800

From Olney Hymns[1]

Light Shining out of Darkness

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

5 Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never failing skill,
He treasures up his bright designs,
And works his sovereign will.

Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take,
10 The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his grace;

6. I.e., on the cliffs overlooking the river Torne, in Sweden, or the side of Mt. Pambamarca, in Ecuador.
7. The last four lines are by Samuel Johnson (1709–1784; see pp. 655–65).
1. Cowper lived in Olney, Buckinghamshire, from 1767 until 1786.

15 Behind a frowning providence,
He hides a smiling face.

His purposes will ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour;
The bud may have a bitter taste,
20 But sweet will be the flower.

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain.

Epitaph on a Hare

Here lies, whom hound did ne'er pursue,
Nor swifter greyhound follow,
Whose foot ne'er tainted° morning dew, left a scent on
Nor ear heard huntsman's hallo',

5 Old Tiney, surliest of his kind,
Who, nursed with tender care,
And to domestic bounds confined,
Was still a wild jack-hare.

Though duly from my hand he took
10 His pittance every night,
He did it with a jealous look,
And, when he could, would bite.

His diet was of wheaten bread,
And milk, and oats, and straw,
15 Thistles, or lettuces instead,
With sand to scour his maw.

On twigs of hawthorn he regaled,° feasted
On pippins'° russet peel; apples'
And, when his juicy salads failed,
20 Sliced carrot pleased him well.

A Turkey carpet was his lawn,[2]
Whereon he loved to bound,
To skip and gambol like a fawn,
And swing his rump around.

25 His frisking was at evening hours,
For then he lost his fear;

2. Cowper exercised his hares on his parlor carpet of Turkey red.

But most before approaching showers,
Or when a storm drew near.

Eight years and five round-rolling moons
30 He thus saw steal away,
Dozing out all his idle noons,
And every night at play.

I kept him for his humor's sake,
For he would oft beguile
35 My heart of thoughts that made it ache,
And force me to a smile.

But now, beneath this walnut-shade
He finds his long, last home,
And waits in snug concealment laid,
40 Till gentler Puss shall come.

He,[3] still more agèd, feels the shocks
From which no care can save,
And, partner once of Tiney's box,
Must soon partake his grave.

From The Task[4]

From Book IV: The Winter Evening

* * *

Just when our drawing-rooms begin to blaze
With lights, by clear reflection multiplied
From many a mirror, in which he of Gath,
270 Goliath,[5] might have seen his giant bulk
Whole without stooping, towering crest and all,
My pleasures too begin. But me perhaps
The glowing hearth may satisfy awhile
With faint illumination, that uplifts
275 The shadow to the ceiling, there by fits
Dancing uncouthly to the quivering flame.
Not undelightful is an hour to me
So spent in parlour twilight; such a gloom
Suits well the thoughtful or unthinking mind,
280 The mind contemplative, with some new theme
Pregnant, or indisposed alike to all.
Laugh ye, who boast your more mercurial powers
That never feel a stupor, know no pause,

3. Puss, the longest-lived of Cowper's three hares.
4. So called because, when he complained of the lack of a poetic topic, a friend, Lady Austen, set him the task of writing about the parlor sofa. The completed work ran to six books and ranged over diverse subjects.
5. The giant slain by David (1 Samuel 17.19–51).

Nor need one; I am conscious,° and confess, conscious of 285 Fearless, a soul that does not always think.
Me oft has fancy ludicrous and wild
Soothed with a waking dream of houses, towers,
Trees, churches, and stranger visages expressed
In the red cinders, while with poring eye
290 I gazed, myself creating what I saw.[6]
Nor less amused have I quiescent watched
The sooty films that play upon the bars° fireplace grate
Pendulous, and foreboding in the view
Of superstition, prophesying still,
295 Though still deceived, some stranger's near approach
'Tis thus the understanding takes repose
In indolent vacuity of thought,
And sleeps and is refreshed. Meanwhile the face
Conceals the mood lethargic with a mask
300 Of deep deliberation, as° the man as if
Were tasked to his full strength, absorbed and lost.
Thus oft reclined at ease, I lose an hour
At evening, till at length the freezing blast
That sweeps the bolted shutter, summons home
305 The recollected powers, and, snapping short
The glassy threads with which the fancy weaves
Her brittle toys, restores me to myself.
How calm is my recess! and how the frost
Raging abroad, and the rough wind, endear
310 The silence and the warmth enjoyed within!
I saw the woods and fields at close of day
A variegated show; the meadows green
Though faded, and the lands, where lately waved
The golden harvest, of a mellow brown,
315 Upturned so lately by the forceful share;° plough
I saw far off the weedy fallows° smile dormant land
With verdure not unprofitable, grazed
By flocks fast feeding, and selecting each
His favorite herb; while all the leafless groves
320 That skirt th' horizon wore a sable° hue, black
Scarce noticed in the kindred dusk of eve.
Tomorrow brings a change, a total change,
Which even now, though silently perform'd
And slowly, and by most unfelt, the face
325 Of universal nature undergoes.
Fast falls a fleecy shower; the downy flakes,
Descending and with never-ceasing lapse° gentle downward glide
Softly alighting upon all below,
Assimilate all objects. Earth receives
330 Gladly the thickening mantle, and the green
And tender blade that feared the chilling blast,
Escapes unhurt beneath so warm a veil.

6. Cf. lines 291–310 with Coleridge, "Frost at Midnight" (p. 810).

From Book VI: The Winter Walk at Noon

The groans of nature in this nether world,
730 Which Heaven has heard for ages, have an end.
Foretold by prophets, and by poets sung,
Whose fire was kindled at the prophets' lamp,
The time of rest, the promised Sabbath, comes.[7]
Six thousand years[8] of sorrow have well-nigh
735 Fulfilled their tardy and disastrous course
Over a sinful world; and what remains
Of this tempestuous state of human things
Is merely as the working of a sea
Before a calm, that rocks itself to rest:
740 For He, whose car° the winds are, and the clouds — chariot
The dust that waits upon his sultry march,
When sin hath moved him, and his wrath is hot,
Shall visit earth in mercy; shall descend,
Propitious, in his chariot paved with love;
745 And what his storms have blasted and defaced
For man's revolt shall with a smile repair.
Sweet is the harp of prophecy; too sweet
Not to be wronged by a mere mortal touch:
Nor can the wonders it records be sung
750 To meaner music, and not suffer loss.
But, when a poet, or when one like me,
Happy to rove among poetic flowers,
Though poor in skill to rear them, lights at last
On some fair theme, some theme divinely fair,
755 Such is the impulse and the spur he feels
To give it praise proportioned to its worth,
That not t' attempt it, arduous as he deems
The labor, were a task more arduous still.
Oh scenes surpassing fable, and yet true,
760 Scenes of accomplished bliss! which who can see,
Though but in distant prospect, and not feel
His soul refreshed with foretaste of the joy?
Rivers of gladness water all the earth,
And clothe all climes with beauty; the reproach
765 Of barrenness is past. The fruitful field
Laughs with abundance; and the land, once lean,
Or fertile only in its own disgrace,
Exults to see its thistly curse repealed.
The various seasons woven into one,
770 And that one season an eternal spring,
The garden fears no blight, and needs no fence,
For there is none to covet, all are full.
The lion, and the libbard,° and the bear — leopard

7. An allusion to the end of the world and the second coming of Christ, when God will make "a new heaven and a new earth" (Revelation 21.1). Lines 759–817 are Cowper's visionary description of this "promised Sabbath."
8. The creation of the world was traditionally believed to have taken place four thousand years before the birth of Christ.

Graze with the fearless flocks; all bask at noon
775 Together, or all gambol in the shade
Of the same grove, and drink one common stream.
Antipathies are none. No foe to man
Lurks in the serpent now: the mother sees,
And smiles to see, her infant's playful hand
780 Stretched forth to dally with the crested worm,° serpent
To stroke his azure neck, or to receive
The lambent° homage of his arrowy tongue. flickering
All creatures worship man, and all mankind
One Lord, one Father. Error has no place:
785 That creeping pestilence is driven away;
The breath of heaven has chased it. In the heart
No passion touches a discordant string,
But all is harmony and love. Disease
Is not: the pure and uncontaminate blood
790 Holds its due course, nor fears the frost of age.
One song employs all nations; and all cry,
"Worthy the Lamb, for he was slain for us!"
The dwellers in the vales° and on the rocks valleys
Shout to each other, and the mountain tops
795 From distant mountains catch the flying joy;
Till, nation after nation taught the strain,
Earth rolls the rapturous hosanna[9] round.
Behold the measure of the promise filled;
See Salem[1] built, the labor of a God!
800 Bright as a sun the sacred city shines;
All kingdoms and all princes of the earth
Flock to that light; the glory of all lands
Flows into her; unbounded is her joy,
And endless her increase. Thy rams are there,
805 Nebaioth, and the flocks of Kedar there;[2]
The looms of Ormus, and the mines of Ind,
And Saba's spicy groves, pay tribute there.[3]
Praise is in all her gates: upon her walls,
And in her streets, and in her spacious courts,
810 Is heard salvation. Eastern Java there
Kneels with the native of the farthest west;
And Ethiopia spreads abroad the hand,
And worships. Her report has traveled forth
Into all lands. From every clime they come
815 To see thy beauty and to share thy joy,
O Sion![4] an assembly such as earth
Saw never, such as heaven stoops down to see.

9. Expression of great praise.
1. Jerusalem; not only the terrestrial city but the New Jerusalem or Holy City, God's perfect and eternal order of the future. See Revelation 31.2: "And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven."
2. "Nebaioth and Kedar, the sons of Ishmael and progenitors of the Arabs, in the prophetic Scripture here alluded to may be reasonably considered as representatives of the Gentiles at large" [Cowper's note]. By "the prophetic Scripture here alluded to" Cowper means Isaiah 60.3–7, in which God promises a blessed future to Jerusalem: "And the Gentiles shall come to thy light. . . . All the flocks of Keder shall be gathered together unto thee, the rams of Nebaioth shall minister unto thee."
3. Ormus (or Hormuz, an island in the Persian Gulf), India, and Saba (Sheba, a country in Arabia) were renowned for their wealth.
4. Often, as here, equivalent to Jerusalem.

Thus heaven-ward all things tend. For all were once
Perfect, and all must be at length restored.
820 So God has greatly purposed; who would else
In his dishonored works himself endure
Dishonor, and be wronged without redress.
Haste, then, and wheel away a shattered world,
Ye slow-revolving seasons! we would see
825 (A sight to which our eyes are strangers yet)
A world that does not dread and hate his laws,
And suffer for its crime; would learn how fair
The creature is that God pronounces good,
How pleasant in itself what pleases him.
830 Here every drop of honey hides a sting,
Worms wind themselves into our sweetest flowers;
And even the joy that haply° some poor heart luckily
Derives from heaven, pure as the fountain is,
Is sullied in the stream, taking a taint
835 From touch of human lips, at best impure.
Oh for a world in principle as chaste
As this is gross and selfish! over which
Custom and prejudice shall bear no sway,
That govern all things here, shouldering aside
840 The meek and modest truth, and forcing her
To seek a refuge from the tongue of strife
In nooks obscure, far from the ways of men;
Where violence shall never lift the sword,
Nor cunning justify the proud man's wrong,
845 Leaving the poor no remedy but tears;
Where he that fills an office shall esteem
Th' occasion it presents of doing good
More than the perquisite;° where law shall speak profits
Seldom, and never but as wisdom prompts
850 And equity; not jealous more to guard
A worthless form, than to decide aright;
Where fashion shall not sanctify abuse,
Nor smooth good breeding (supplemental grace)
With lean performance ape the work of love!
855 Come then, and, added to thy many crowns,
Receive yet one, the crown of all the earth,
Thou who alone art worthy! It was thine
By ancient covenant, ere nature's birth;
And thou hast made it thine by purchase since,
860 And overpaid its value with thy blood.
Thy saints proclaim thee king; and in their hearts
Thy title is engraven with a pen
Dipped in the fountain of eternal love.
Thy saints proclaim thee king; and thy delay
865 Gives courage to their foes, who, could they see
The dawn of thy last advent, long desired,
Would creep into the bowels of the hills,
And flee for safety to the falling rocks.
The very spirit of the world is tired

870 Of its own taunting question, asked so long,
"Where is the promise of your Lord's approach?"
The infidel has shot his bolts° away, arrows
Till, his exhausted quiver yielding none,
He gleans the blunted shafts that have recoiled,
875 And aims them at the shield of truth again.
The veil is rent, rent too by priestly hands,
That hides divinity from mortal eyes;[5]
And all the mysteries to faith proposed,
Insulted and traduced, are cast aside,
880 As useless, to the moles and to the bats.
They now are deemed the faithful, and are praised,
Who, constant only in rejecting thee,
Deny thy Godhead with a martyr's zeal,
And quit their office for their error's sake.
885 Blind, and in love with darkness! yet even these Worthy, compared with sycophants, who knee
Thy name adoring, and then preach thee man!
So fares thy church. But how thy church may fare
The world takes little thought. Who will may preach,
890 And what they will. All pastors are alike
To wandering sheep, resolved to follow none.
Two gods divide them all—Pleasure and Gain:
For these they live, they sacrifice to these,
And in their service wage perpetual war
895 With conscience and with thee. Lust in their hearts,
And mischief in their hands, they roam the earth
To prey upon each other: stubborn, fierce,
High-minded, foaming out their own disgrace.
Thy prophets speak of such; and, noting down
900 The features of the last degenerate times,
Exhibit every lineament of these.
Come then, and, added to thy many crowns,
Receive yet one, as radiant as the rest,
Due to thy last and most effectual work,
905 Thy word fulfilled, the conquest of a world!

The Castaway

Obscurest night involved° the sky, engulfed
The Atlantic billows roared,
When such a destined wretch as I,
Washed headlong from on board,

5. The veil of the Temple in Jerusalem divided the inner sanctuary from the rest of the Temple. For Christians, rending of the veil represented gaining direct access to God, notably through Christ's death. "And Jesus cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost. And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom" (Mark 15.37–8).

5 Of friends, of hope, of all bereft,
His floating home forever left.

No braver chief could Albion boast
  Than he with whom he went,[6]
Nor ever ship left Albion's coast,
10   With warmer wishes sent.
He loved them both, but both in vain,
Nor him beheld, nor her again.

Not long beneath the whelming brine,
  Expert to swim, he lay;
15 Nor soon he felt his strength decline,
  Or courage die away;
But waged with death a lasting strife,
Supported by despair of life.

He shouted; nor his friends had failed
20   To check the vessel's course,
But so the furious blast prevailed,
  That, pitiless perforce,
They left their outcast mate behind,
And scudded still before the wind.

25 Some succor yet they could afford;
  And, such as storms allow,
The cask, the coop, the floated cord,
  Delayed not to bestow.
But he (they knew) nor ship, nor shore,
30 Whate'er they gave, should visit more.

Nor, cruel as it seemed, could he
  Their haste himself condemn,
Aware that flight, in such a sea,
  Alone could rescue them;
35 Yet bitter felt it still to die
Deserted, and his friends so nigh.

He long survives, who lives an hour
  In ocean, self-upheld;
And so long he, with unspent power,
40   His destiny repelled;
And ever, as the minutes flew,
Entreated help, or cried, "Adieu!"

At length, his transient respite past,
  His comrades, who before
45 Had heard his voice in every blast,
  Could catch the sound no more.

6. Namely, George, Lord Anson (1697–1762), who told the castaway's story in his memoir, Voyage Round the World (1748).

For then, by toil subdued, he drank
The stifling wave, and then he sank.

No poet wept him; but the page
50 Of narrative sincere,
That tells his name, his worth, his age,
Is wet with Anson's tear.
And tears by bards or heroes shed
Alike immortalize the dead.

55 I therefore purpose not, or dream,
Descanting° on his fate, singing
To give the melancholy theme
A more enduring date:
But misery still delights to trace
60 Its semblance in another's case.

No voice divine the storm allayed,
No light propitious shone,
When, snatched from all effectual aid,
We perished, each alone;
65 But I beneath a rougher sea,
And whelmed in deeper gulfs than he.

Lines Written during a Period of Insanity

Hatred and vengeance, my eternal portion,
Scarce can endure delay of execution,
Wait, with impatient readiness, to seize my
Soul in a moment.

5 Damned below Judas:[7] more abhorred than he was,
Who for a few pence sold his holy Master.
Twice betrayed Jesus me, the last delinquent,
Deems the profanest.[8]

Man disavows, and Deity disowns me:
10 Hell might afford my miseries a shelter;
Therefore hell keeps her ever hungry mouths all
Bolted against me.

Hard lot! encompassed with a thousand dangers;
Weary, faint, trembling with a thousand terrors;
15 I'm called, if vanquished, to receive a sentence
Worse than Abiram's.[9]

7. Judas betrayed Jesus to the chief priests for money (Matthew 26.14–16).
8. I.e., Jesus, betrayed by me as well as by Judas, deems me the most profane.
9. Abirim, rebelling against the authority of Moses and Aaron, was swallowed up with his fellow dissidents in a cleft of the earth. They "went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them" (Numbers 16.33).

Him the vindictive rod of angry justice
Sent quick and howling to the center headlong;
I, fed with judgment, in a fleshly tomb, am
20 Buried above ground.

ANNA LAETITIA BARBAULD
1743–1825

The Rights of Woman[1]

Yes, injured Woman! rise, assert thy right!
Woman! too long degraded, scorned, oppressed;
O born to rule in partial° Law's despite,° biased / contempt
Resume thy native empire o'er the breast!

5 Go forth arrayed in panoply[2] divine;
That angel pureness which admits no stain;
Go, bid proud Man his boasted rule resign,
And kiss the golden scepter of thy reign.

Go, gird thyself with grace; collect thy store
10 Of bright artillery glancing° from afar; gleaming
Soft melting tones thy thundering cannon's roar,
Blushes and fears thy magazine[3] of war.

Thy rights are empire: urge no meaner° claim,— humbler
Felt, not defined, and if debated, lost;
15 Like sacred mysteries, which withheld from fame,
Shunning discussion, are revered the most.

Try all that wit and art suggest to bend
Of thy imperial foe the stubborn knee;
Make treacherous Man thy subject, not thy friend;
20 Thou mayst command, but never canst be free.

Awe the licentious, and restrain the rude;
Soften the sullen, clear the cloudy brow:
Be, more than princes' gifts, thy favors sued;°— sought
She hazards all, who will the least allow.

25 But hope not, courted idol of mankind,
On this proud eminence secure to stay;
Subduing and subdued, thou soon shalt find
Thy coldness soften, and thy pride give way.

1. Until the last two stanzas, a seemingly positive response to Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), a radical look at the place of women in society.

2. Complete armor; Ephesians 6.11: "Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil."

3. Storage place for weapons or ammunition.

Then, then, abandon each ambitious thought,
30 Conquest or rule thy heart shall feebly move,
In Nature's school, by her soft maxims taught,
That separate rights are lost in mutual love.

To the Poor

Child of distress, who meet'st the bitter scorn
Of fellow-men to happier prospects born,
Doomed Art and Nature's various stores to see
Flow in full cups of joy—and not for thee;
5 Who seest the rich, to heaven and fate resigned,
Bear thy afflictions with a patient mind;
Whose bursting heart disdains unjust control,
Who feel'st oppression's iron in thy soul,
Who dragg'st the load of faint and feeble years,
10 Whose bread is anguish, and whose water tears;
Bear, bear thy wrongs—fulfill thy destined hour,
Bend thy meek neck beneath the foot of Power;
But when thou feel'st the great deliverer nigh,
And thy freed spirit mounting seeks the sky,
15 Let no vain fears thy parting hour molest,
No whispered terrors shake thy quiet breast:
Think not their threats can work thy future woe,
Nor deem the Lord above like lords below;—
Safe in the bosom of that love repose
20 By whom the sun gives light, the ocean flows;
Prepare to meet a Father undismayed,
Nor fear the God whom priests and kings have made.

Life

Animula, vagula, blandula.[4]

Life! I know not what thou art,
But know that thou and I must part;
And when, or how, or where we met,
I own° to me's a secret yet. acknowledge
5 But this I know, when thou art fled,
Where'er they lay these limbs, this head,
No clod so valueless shall be,
As all that then remains of me.

4. Charming little soul, hastening away (Latin); the first line of a poem supposedly composed by the Roman emperor Hadrian (76–138 C.E.) on his deathbed, quoted from Aelius Spartianus, Life of Hadrian 25.

O whither, whither dost thou fly,
10 Where bend unseen thy trackless course,
And in this strange divorce,
Ah tell where I must seek this compound I?

To the vast ocean of empyreal° flame, celestial
From whence thy essence came,
15 Dost thou thy flight pursue, when freed
From matter's base encumbering weed?
Or dost thou, hid from sight,
Wait, like some spell-bound knight,
Through blank oblivious years th' appointed hour,
20 To break thy trance and reassume thy power?
Yet canst thou without thought or feeling be?
O say what art thou, when no more thou 'rt thee?

Life! we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
25 'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 't will cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not Good night, but in some brighter clime
30 Bid me Good morning.

HANNAH MORE
1745–1833

Inscription in a Beautiful Retreat Called Fairy Bower[1]

Airy spirits, you who love
Cooling bower, or shady grove;
Streams that murmur as they flow,
Zephyrs[2] bland that softly blow;

5 Babbling echo,[3] or the tale
Of the lovelorn Nightingale;[4]

1. A leafy covert or arbor; also, poetically, an idealized abode.
2. Gentle breezes from the west.
3. In Greek mythology, Echo was a nymph whose chatter distracted Hera, the queen of the gods, while Zeus, Hera's husband, consorted with other nymphs and mortal women. Hera punished her by depriving her of speech, save to repeat the words of others. Later, Echo pined for the youth Narcissus, who spurned her love, until nothing was left of her but her voice.
4. The nightingale is known for its sweet, nocturnal song; there are several classical myths about nightingales. Ovid tells the story of Philomela: she was raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, who then tore out her tongue so that she could not speak. She wove the story into a tapestry and sent it to her sister, who rescued her. She was later changed into a nightingale while in flight from Tereus; Philomela was "lovelorn" only in the ironic sense of being victimized by another's passion.

Hither, airy spirits, come,
This is your peculiar° home. own

If you love a verdant° glade, green
10 If you love a noon-tide shade,
Hither, Sylphs[5] and Fairies, fly,
Unobserved of earthly eye.

Come, and wander every night,
By the moonbeam's glimmering light;
15 And again at early day
Brush the silver dews away.

Mark where first the daisies blow,° bloom
Where the bluest violets grow;
Where the sweetest linnet° sings, a songbird
20 Where the earliest cowslip° springs; a wildflower

Where the largest acorn lies,
Precious in a Fairy's eyes:
Sylphs, though unconfined to place,
Love to fill an acorn's space.

25 Come, and mark within what bush
Builds the blackbird or the thrush;
Great his joy who first espies,
Greater his who spares the prize.

Come, and watch the hallowed bower,
30 Chase the insect from the flower;
Little offices like these,
Gentle souls and Fairies please.

Mortals! formed of grosser clay,
From our haunts keep far away;
35 Or, if you should dare appear,
See that you from vice are clear.

Folly's minion,° Fashion's fool, darling
Mad ambition's restless tool!
Slave of passion, slave of power,
40 Fly, ah fly! this tranquil bower!

Son of avarice,° soul of frost, greed
Wretch! of Heaven abhorred the most,
Learn to pity others' wants,° needs
Or avoid these hallowed haunts.

5. Spirits supposed to inhabit the air.

45 Eye, unconscious of a tear,
When affliction's train appear;
Heart that never heaved a sigh,
For another, come not nigh.

But, ye darling sons of Heaven,
50 Giving freely what was given,
You, whose liberal hands dispense
The blessings of benevolence:

You, who wipe the tearful eye,
You, who stop the rising sigh;
55 You, whose souls have understood
The luxury of doing good,

Come, ye happy virtuous few,
Open is my bower to you;
You, these mossy banks may press;
60 You, each guardian Fay° shall bless. fairy

From The Slave Trade

Strange power of song![6] the strain that warms the heart
Seems the same inspiration to impart;
Touched by the extrinsic° energy alone, external
We think the flame which melts us is our own;
5 Deceived, for genius we mistake delight,
Charmed as we read, we fancy we can write.[7]
Though not to me, sweet Bard, thy powers belong,
The cause I plead shall sanctify my song.
The Muse[8] awakes no artificial fire,
10 For Truth rejects what Fancy would inspire:
Here Art would weave her gayest flowers in vain,
The bright invention Nature would disdain.
For no fictitious ills these numbers° flow, verses
But living anguish, and substantial woe;
15 No individual griefs my bosom melt,
For millions feel what Oronoko felt:
Fired by no single wrongs, the countless host
I mourn, by rapine° dragged from Afric's coast. seizure
Perish the illiberal[9] thought which would debase

6. The "song" refers to Thomas Southerne's Oroonoko: A Tragedy (1696), a stage adaptation of Aphra Behn's Oroonoko, or the Royal Slave, (1688). Both the novel and the play critiqued some aspects of the slave trade. The title character is an African prince, sold into slavery in Surinam, who leads a slave revolt and is eventually executed. Southerne is the "sweet Bard" referred to in line 7 below.

7. I.e., we mistake the pleasure we receive from reading for genius of our own, leading us to think we can write.

8. One of the nine Greek sister goddesses believed to be the source of inspiration for the arts.

9. Not generous in respect of the rights or liberties of others, narrow-minded or bigoted.

20 The native genius of the sable° race! dark-complexioned
Perish the proud philosophy, which sought
To rob them of the powers of equal thought![1]
Does then the immortal principle within
Change with the casual color of a skin?
25 Does matter° govern spirit? or is mind body
Degraded by the form to which 'tis joined?
No; they have heads to think, and hearts to feel,
And souls to act, with firm, though erring zeal;[2]
For they have keen affections, kind desires,
30 Love strong as death, and active patriot fires;
All the rude energy, the fervid flame,
Of high-souled passion, and ingenuous[3] shame:
Strong, but luxuriant virtues boldly shoot
From the wild vigor of a savage root.
35 Nor weak their sense of honor's proud control,
For pride is virtue in a Pagan soul;
A sense of worth, a conscience° of desert,° consciousness / worth
A high, unbroken haughtiness of heart;
That self-same stuff which erst° proud empires swayed, formerly
40 Of which the conquerors of the world were made.
Capricious fate of men! that very pride
In Afric scourged, in Rome was deified.
No Muse, O Qua-shi![4] shall thy deeds relate,
No statue snatch thee from oblivious fate!
45 For thou wast born where never gentle Muse
On Valor's grave the flowers of Genius strews;
And thou wast born where no recording page
Plucks the fair deed from Time's devouring rage.
Had Fortune placed thee on some happier coast,
50 Where polished[5] Pagans' souls heroic boast,
To thee, who soughtest a voluntary grave,
The uninjured honors of thy name to save,
Whose generous arm thy barbarous Master spared,[6]
Altars had smoked, and temples had been reared.
55 Whenever to Afric's shores I turn my eyes,
Horrors of deepest, deadliest guilt arise;
I see, by more than Fancy's mirror[7] shewn,
The burning village, and the blazing town:
See the dire victim torn from social life,
60 The shrieking babe, the agonizing wife!
She, wretch forlorn! is dragged by hostile hands,
To distant tyrants sold, in distant lands!
Transmitted[8] miseries, and successive chains,

1. Perhaps an allusion to Aristotle's theory (in the Politics 1.5) that some are "naturally" born as slaves or inferior persons.
2. Erring because not Christian.
3. Noble, freeborn. The slaves feel shame because they are "ingenuous."
4. A slave in Bermuda who killed himself rather than undergo punishment by the master with whom he had been brought up as a playfellow.
5. Made more refined or elegant by the stories told about them.
6. When his master tried to punish him, Quashi resisted. In the ensuing struggle, Quashi gained the upper hand and drew a knife, but used it to kill himself rather than the master.
7. Fictions generated by imagination; perhaps referring to Southerne's play or other theatrical or literary works.
8. Passed by inheritance.

The sole sad heritage her child obtains!
65 Even this last wretched boon° their foes deny, request
To weep together, or together die.
By felon hands, by one relentless stroke,
See the fond links of feeling Nature broke!
The fibers twisting round a parent's heart,
70 Torn from their grasp, and bleeding as they part.

CHARLOTTE SMITH
1749–1806

Written in the Church Yard at Middleton in Sussex

Pressed by the moon, mute arbitress of tides,
While the loud equinox its power combines,
The sea no more its swelling surge confines,
But o'er the shrinking land sublimely rides.
5 The wild blast, rising from the western cave,
Drives the huge billows from their heaving bed,
Tears from their grassy tombs the village dead,
And breaks the silent sabbath of the grave!
With shells and sea-weed mingled, on the shore
10 Lo! their bones whiten in the frequent wave;
But vain to them the winds and waters rave;
They hear the warring elements no more:
While I am doomed—by life's long storm oppressed,
To gaze with envy on their gloomy rest.

1789

To the Shade of Burns[1]

Mute is thy wild harp, now, O Bard sublime!
Who, amid Scotia's° mountain solitude, Scotland's
Great Nature taught to "build the lofty rhyme,"[2]
And even beneath the daily pressure, rude,° harsh
5 Of laboring Poverty,[3] thy generous blood,
Fired with the love of freedom—Not subdued
Wert thou by thy low fortune: But a time
Like this we live in, when the abject chime
Of echoing Parasite is best approved,[4]

1. This sonnet was written upon the death of the Scottish poet Robert Burns (1759–1796; see pp. 747–60).
2. Cf. Milton, "Lycidas," line 11 (p. 410).
3. Burns was the son of an unsuccessful farmer; his own health was broken by efforts to earn a living at farming.
4. I.e., in our time (unlike Burns's), public taste favors "low," unoriginal (parasitical) poetry.

10 Was not for thee—Indignantly is fled
Thy noble Spirit; and no longer moved
By all the ills o'er which thine heart has bled,
Associate worthy of the illustrious dead,
Enjoys with them "the Liberty it loved."[5]

1796 1797

Written near a Port on a Dark Evening

Huge vapors brood above the clifted shore,
Night on the Ocean settles, dark and mute,
Save where is heard the repercussive roar
Of drowsy billows,° on the rugged foot waves
5 Of rocks remote; or still more distant tone
Of seamen in the anchored bark° that tell ship
The watch relieved; or one deep voice alone
Singing the hour, and bidding "Strike the bell."
All is black shadow, but the lucid line
10 Marked by the light surf on the level sand,
Or where afar the ship-lights faintly shine
Like wandering fairy fires,[6] that oft on land
Mislead the Pilgrim—Such the dubious ray
That wavering Reason lends, in life's long darkling way.

1797

Written in October

The blasts of Autumn as they scatter round
The faded foliage of another year,
And muttering many a sad and solemn sound,
Drive the pale fragments o'er the stubble sere,° dry; withered
5 Are well attuned to my dejected mood;
(Ah! better far than airs that breathe of Spring!)
While the high rooks, that hoarsely clamoring
Seek in black phalanx[7] the half-leafless wood,
I rather hear, than that enraptured lay° song
10 Harmonious, and of Love and Pleasure born,
Which from the golden furze,[8] or flowering thorn
Awakes the Shepherd in the ides° of May; fifteenth
Nature delights me most when most she mourns,
For never more to me the Spring of Hope returns!

1797

5. Cf. Alexander Pope, "Epitaph on Sir William Trumbull," lines 11–12: "Such this man was, who now, from earth remov'd, / At length enjoys that Liberty he lov'd."
6. The will-o'-the-wisp was said to draw travelers astray by holding a false light before them; the phenomenon of nocturnal light is caused by the combustion of marsh gas.
7. A flock of rooks (a species of crow that nests in a colony and hence looks like a phalanx).
8. A spiny evergreen shrub with yellow flowers.

Nepenthe[9]

Oh! for imperial Polydamna's art,
Which to bright Helen was in Egypt taught,
To mix with magic power the oblivious draught[1]
Of force to staunch the bleeding of the heart,
5 And to Care's wan and hollow cheek impart
The smile of happy youth, uncursed with thought.
Potent indeed the charm that could appease
Affection's ceaseless anguish, doomed to weep
O'er the cold grave; or yield even transient ease
10 By soothing busy Memory to sleep!
—Around me those who surely must have tried
Some charm of equal power, I daily see,
But still to me Oblivion is denied,
There's no Nepenthe, now, on earth for me.

1797

Stanzas

Ah! think'st thou, Laura,[2] then, that wealth
Should make me thus my youth, and health,
And freedom and repose resign?—
Ah, no!—I toil to gain by stealth
5 One look, one tender glance of thine.

Born where huge hills on hills are piled,
In Caledonia's[3] distant wild,
Unbounded Liberty was mine:
But thou upon my hopes hast smiled,
10 And bade me be a slave of thine!

Amid these gloomy haunts of gain,
Of weary hours I not complain,
While Hope forbids me to repine,° complain
And whispering tells me I obtain
15 Pity from that soft heart of thine.

9. A drink or drug supposed to bring forgetfulness of trouble or grief, used by Helen (in Homer, Odyssey 4.219–32) to quell the lament over the apparently lost Odysseus. In a note to this poem, Smith cites lines from Alexander Pope's "Odyssey," which describes Helen's mixing the potion and her acquisition of the drug from "Thone's imperial wife," i.e., Polydamna, the Egyptian woman from whom she learned the art of herbs.
1. A potion or drink producing forgetfulness.
2. This poem originally appeared in Smith's The Young Philosopher: A Novel (1798), in which it is written by the character Glenmorris to Laura, his future wife.
3. Caledonia is the Roman name for the northern part of Britain; hence, used poetically for Scotland.

Tho' far capricious Fortune flies,
Yet Love will bless the sacrifice,
And all his purer joys combine;
While I my little world comprise
20 In that fair form, and fairer soul of thine.

1798

Ode to Death

Friend of the wretched! wherefore° should the eye — why
Of blank Despair, whence tears have ceased to flow,
Be turned from thee?—Ah! wherefore fears to die
He, who compelled each poignant grief to know,
5 Drains to its lowest dregs the cup of woe?

Would Cowardice postpone thy calm embrace,
To linger out long years in torturing pain?
Or not prefer thee to the ills that chase
Him, who too much impoverished to obtain
10 From British Themis[4] right, implores her aid in vain!

Sharp goading Indigence° who would not fly, — poverty
That urges toil the exhausted strength above?
Or shun the once fond friend's averted eye?
Or who to thy asylum not remove,
15 To lose the wasting pain of unrequited love?

Can then the wounded wretch who must deplore
What most she loved, to thy cold arms consigned,
Who hears the voice that soothed her soul no more,[5]
Fear thee, O Death!—Or hug the chains that bind
20 To joyless, cheerless life, her sick, reluctant mind?

Oh! Misery's Cure; who e'er in pale dismay
Has watched the angel form they could not save,
And seen their dearest blessing tore away,
May well the terrors of thy triumph brave,
25 Nor pause in fearful dread before the opening grave!

1797, 1800

4. The British judicial system. Smith spent many years embroiled in the legal system, trying to settle her father-in-law's will in order to allow her children to claim their shares in his estate.

5. Smith refers to the death of her daughter, Anna Augusta de Foville, who died while giving birth in 1795.

From Beachy Head[6]

On thy stupendous summit, rock sublime!
That o'er the channel reared, half way at sea
The mariner at early morning hails,[7]
I would recline; while Fancy should go forth,
5 And represent the strange and awful hour
Of vast concussion;[8] when the Omnipotent
Stretched forth his arm, and rent the solid hills,
Bidding the impetuous main flood rush between
The rifted shores, and from the continent
10 Eternally divided this green isle.
Imperial lord of the high southern coast!
From thy projecting head-land I would mark
Far in the east the shades of night disperse,
Melting and thinned, as from the dark blue wave
15 Emerging, brilliant rays of arrowy light
Dart from the horizon; when the glorious sun
Just lifts above it his resplendent orb.
Advances now, with feathery silver touched,
The rippling tide of flood; glisten the sands,
20 While, inmates of the chalky clefts that scar
Thy sides precipitous, with shrill harsh cry,
Their white wings glancing in the level beam,
The terns, and gulls, and tarrocks, seek their food,[9]
And thy rough hollows echo to the voice
25 Of the gray choughs,[1] and ever restless daws,
With clamor, not unlike the chiding hounds,
While the lone shepherd, and his baying dog,
Drive to thy turfy crest his bleating flock.

The high meridian of the day is past,
30 And Ocean now, reflecting the calm Heaven,
Is of cerulean hue; and murmurs low
The tide of ebb, upon the level sands.
The sloop, her angular canvas shifting still,
Catches the light and variable airs
35 That but a little crisp the summer sea,
Dimpling its tranquil surface.

6. This long poem (732 lines) appeared in Smith's last volume of poetry, Beachy Head and Other Poems, published after her death. The notes below are Smith's, printed originally as endnotes.
7. "In crossing the Channel from the coast of France, Beachy-Head is the first land made."
8. "Alluding to an idea that this Island was once joined to the continent of Europe, and torn from it by some convulsion of Nature. I confess I never could trace the resemblance between the two countries. Yet the cliffs about Dieppe, resemble the chalk cliffs on the southern coast. But Normandy has no likeness whatever to the part of England opposite to it."
9. "Terns. Sterna hirundo, or Sea Swallow. Gulls. Larus canus. Tarrocks. Larus tridactylus."
1. "Gray choughs. Corvus Graculus, Cornish Choughs, or, as these birds are called by the Sussex people, Saddle-backed Crows, build in great numbers on this coast."

PHILIP FRENEAU
1752–1832

The Indian Burying Ground

In spite of all the learned have said,
I still my opinion keep;
The posture, that we give the dead,
Points out the soul's eternal sleep.

5 Not so the ancients of these lands—
The Indian, when from life released,
Again is seated[1] with his friends,
And shares again the joyous feast.

His imaged birds, and painted bowl,
10 And venison, for a journey dressed,[2]
Bespeak the nature of the soul,
Activity, that knows no rest.

His bow, for action ready bent,
And arrows, with a head of stone,
15 Can only mean that life is spent,
And not the old ideas gone.

Thou, stranger, that shalt come this way,
No fraud upon the dead commit—
Observe the swelling turf, and say
20 They do not lie, but here they sit.

Here still a lofty rock remains,
On which the curious eye may trace
(Now wasted, half, by wearing rains)
The fancies of a ruder race.

25 Here still an aged elm aspires,
Beneath whose far-projecting shade
(And which the shepherd still admires)
The children of the forest played!

There oft a restless Indian queen
30 (Pale Shebah,[3] with her braided hair)
And many a barbarous form is seen
To chide the man that lingers there.

1. "The North American Indians bury their dead in a sitting posture; decorating the corpse with wampum, the images of birds, quadrupeds, etc.: And (if that of a warrior) with bows, arrows, tomahawks and other military weapons" [Freneau's note].
2. Pun on "dress": to prepare for cooking as well as to clothe.
3. Sheba, the queen who visited Solomon to judge his wisdom (1 Kings 10.1–13).

By midnight moons, o'er moistening dews;
In habit for the chase arrayed,
35 The hunter still the deer pursues,
The hunter and the deer, a shade!° soul

And long shall timorous fancy see
The painted chief, and pointed spear,
And Reason's self shall bow the knee
40 To shadows and delusions here.

To Sir Toby[4]

A Sugar Planter in the Interior Parts of Jamaica, Near the City of San Jago De La Vega (Spanish Town), 1784

"The motions of his spirit are black as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus."
—SHAKESPEARE[5]

If there exists a hell—the case is clear—
Sir Toby's slaves enjoy that portion here:
Here are no blazing brimstone lakes—'tis true;
But kindled rum too often burns as blue;
5 In which some fiend, whom nature must detest,
Steeps Toby's brand, and marks poor Cudjoe's breast.[6]
Here whips on whips excite perpetual fears,
And mingled howlings vibrate on my ears:
Here nature's plagues abound, to fret and tease,
10 Snakes, scorpions, despots, lizards, centipedes—
No art, no care escapes the busy lash;
All have their dues—and all are paid in cash—
The eternal driver keeps a steady eye
On a black herd, who would his vengeance fly,
15 But chained, imprisoned, on a burning soil,
For the mean avarice of a tyrant toil![7]
The lengthy cart-whip guards this monster's reign—
And cracks, like pistols, from the fields of cane.
Ye powers! who formed these wretched tribes, relate,
20 What had they done, to merit such a fate!
Why were they brought from Eboe's[8] sultry waste,
To see that plenty which they must not taste—

4. First published in the Daily Advertiser, February 1, 1791, titled "The Island Field Negro." We print the 1809 text.
5. The Merchant of Venice 5.1. Freneau has substituted "black" for dull Erebus: darkness; in Greek mythology, part of the underworld through which the dead passed before entering Hades.
6. Cudge or Cudjoe was a common name for a slave. "This passage has a reference to the West Indian custom (sanctioned by law) of branding a newly imported slave on the breast, with a red hot iron, as evidence of the purchaser's property" [Freneau's note].
7. Lines 13–16 were added in 1809.
8. "A small Negro kingdom near the river Senegal" [Freneau's note].

Food, which they cannot buy, and dare not steal;
Yams and potatoes—many a scanty meal!—
25 One, with a gibbet° wakes his negro's fears, gallows
One to the windmill nails him by the ears;
One keeps his slave in darkened dens, unfed,
One puts the wretch in pickle[9] ere he's dead:
This, from a tree suspends him by the thumbs,
30 That, from his table grudges even the crumbs!
O'er yond' rough hills a tribe of females go,
Each with her gourd,° her infant, and her hoe; water cup
Scorched by a sun that has no mercy here,
Driven by a devil, whom men call overseer—
35 In chains, twelve wretches to their labors haste;
Twice twelve I saw, with iron collars graced!—
Are such the fruits that spring from vast domains?
Is wealth, thus got, Sir Toby, worth your pains!—
Who would your wealth on terms, like these, possess,
40 Where all we see is pregnant with distress—
Angola's[1] natives scourged by ruffian hands,
And toil's hard product shipped to foreign lands.
Talk not of blossoms, and your endless spring;
What joy, what smile, can scenes of misery bring?—
45 Though Nature, here, has every blessing spread,
Poor is the laborer—and how meanly fed!—
Here Stygian[2] paintings light and shade renew,
Pictures of hell, that Virgil's[3] pencil drew:
Here, surly Charons make their annual trip,
50 And ghosts arrive in every Guinea ship,[4]
To find what beasts these western isles afford,
Plutonian[5] scourges, and despotic lords:—
Here, they, of stuff determined to be free,
Must climb the rude cliffs of the Liguanee;[6]
55 Beyond the clouds, in sculking haste repair,
And hardly safe from brother traitors[7] there.—

1784 1791, 1809

9. I.e., rubs salt or salt and vinegar on the slave's back after a flogging.
1. West African Portuguese colony's.
2. Hellish; alluding to the river Styx, which, in Greek mythology, souls must cross to enter Hades. They were ferried across to the underworld by Charon.
3. "See Aeneid, Book 6th.—and Fenelon's Telemachus, Book 18" [Freneau's note]. The Trojan hero Aeneas descends to the underworld in the sixth book of the epic by the Latin poet Virgil (70–19 B.C.E.). The French theologian François de Salignac de la Mothe-Fénelon (1651–1715) wrote Télémaque (1699), a didactic romance concerning the son of the hero Ulysses as he searches for his father.
4. Slave ships from West Africa.
5. Hellish; Pluto was the Roman name for the god of the underworld.
6. "The mountains northward of the kingdom" [Freneau's note].
7. "Alluding to the Independent negroes in the blue mountains, who, for a stipulated reward, deliver up every fugitive that falls into their hands, to the English Government" [Freneau's note].

PHILLIS WHEATLEY
ca. 1753–1784

A Farewell to America. To Mrs. S. W.[1]

I

Adieu, New-England's smiling meads,° — meadows
  Adieu, the flow'ry plain:
I leave thine op'ning charms, O spring,
  And tempt the roaring main.° — sea

II

5 In vain for me the flow'rets rise,
  And boast their gaudy pride,
While here beneath the northern skies
  I mourn for health denied.[2]

III

Celestial maid of rosy hue,[3]
10   O let me feel thy reign!° — influence, dominion
I languish till thy face I view,
  Thy vanished joys regain.

IV

Susannah mourns, nor can I bear
  To see the crystal show'r,
15 Or mark the tender falling tear
  At sad departure's hour;

V

Not unregarding can I see
  Her soul with grief opprest;
But let no sighs, no groans for me,
20   Steal from her pensive breast.

VI

In vain the feathered warblers sing,
  In vain the garden blooms,
And on the bosom of the spring
  Breathes out her sweet perfumes,

VII

25 While for Britannia's distant shore
  We sweep the liquid plain,
And with astonished eyes explore
  The wide-extended main.

1. Susanna Wheatley (1709–1774), Wheatley's owner and mistress, who had afforded her an excellent education and had encouraged her writing. Wheatley departed Boston for London in May 1773.

2. Wheatley was frail and sickly for much of her life, and she went to England partly to improve her health.

3. I.e., New England (or America?).

VIII

Lo! Health appears! celestial dame!
30 Complacent and serene,
With Hebe's[4] mantle o'er her frame,
With soul-delighting mien.° appearance, expression

IX

To mark the vale° where London lies valley
With misty vapors crowned,
35 Which cloud Aurora's[5] thousand dyes,
And veil her charms around,

X

Why, Phoebus,[6] moves thy car so slow?
So slow thy rising ray?
Give us the famous town to view,
40 Thou glorious king of day!

XI

For thee, Britannia, I resign
New England's smiling fields;
To view again her charms divine,
What joy the prospect yields!

XII

45 But thou! Temptation hence away,
With all thy fatal train
Nor once seduce my soul away,
By thine enchanting strain.

XIII

Thrice happy they, whose heav'nly shield
50 Secures their souls from harms,
And fell° Temptation on the field destructive
Of all its pow'r disarms!

Boston, May 7, 1773

On Being Brought from Africa to America[7]

'Twas mercy brought me from my pagan land,
Taught my benighted[8] soul to understand
That there's a God, that there's a Savior too:

4. Hebe, the Greek goddess of youth, performed small services for the gods, including cupbearing (until replaced by Ganymede); she was considered the personification of youthful beauty. "Health" in this stanza may refer to Hygieia, the Greek goddess of health.
5. The Greek and Roman goddess of the dawn.
6. Apollo, the Greek and Roman god of the sun, who daily drove his chariot ("car"), the sun, across the sky.
7. Wheatley was brought from West Africa to Boston in July 1761, as a child of eight.
8. Overtaken by darkness; also, figuratively, involved in intellectual or moral darkness, involved in obscurity.

Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.
5 Some view our sable° race with scornful eye, black
"Their color is a diabolic dye."
Remember, Christians, Negros, black as Cain,[9]
May be refined, and join th' angelic train.

To S. M.,[1] a Young African Painter, on Seeing His Works

To show the lab'ring bosom's deep intent,
And thought in living characters to paint,
When first thy pencil did those beauties give,
And breathing figures learnt from thee to live,
5 How did those prospects give my soul delight,
A new creation rushing on my sight?
Still,° wond'rous youth! each noble path pursue, always
On deathless glories fix thine ardent view:
Still may the painter's and the poet's fire
10 To aid thy pencil, and thy verse conspire!
And may the charms of each seraphic[2] theme
Conduct thy footsteps to immortal fame!
High to the blissful wonders of the skies
Elate thy soul, and raise thy wishful eyes.
15 Thrice happy, when exalted to survey
That splendid city, crowned with endless day,
Whose twice six gates on radiant hinges ring:
Celestial Salem[3] blooms in endless spring.
Calm and serene thy moments glide along,
20 And may the muse[4] inspire each future song!
Still, with the sweets of contemplation blessed,
May peace with balmy wings your soul invest!
But when these shades[5] of time are chased away,
And darkness ends in everlasting day,
25 On what seraphic pinions[6] shall we move,
And view the landscapes in the realms above?
There shall thy tongue in heav'nly murmurs flow,
And there my muse with heav'nly transport glow:
No more to tell of Damon's[7] tender sighs,
30 Or rising radiance of Aurora's[8] eyes,

9. The son of Adam and Eve, Cain killed his brother, Abel, and God punished him with this curse: "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee its strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth" (Genesis 4.12).

1. Scipio Moorhead, the slave of a Boston clergyman, John Moorhead.

2. Resembling a seraph (a member of one of the nine orders of angels) either in beauty or in fervor of exalted devotion.

3. The heavenly Jerusalem.

4. Imagined source of poetic power.

5. Souls of the dead in the classical underworld.

6. Wings; from the Latin, pennae, feathers, and therefore with a pun on the associated meaning, pens (originally made from quills).

7. According to one version of the Greek legend, Damon was a friend of Pythias, who had been condemned to death by the tyrant Dionysius. Damon stood pledge for Pythias as the latter left to settle his affairs. When Pythias returned, Dionysius was so impressed by the actions of both men that he pardoned Pythias.

8. The Greek and Roman goddess of the dawn's.

For nobler themes demand a nobler strain,
And purer language on th' ethereal plain.
Cease, gentle muse! the solemn gloom of night
Now seals the fair creation from my sight.

1773

On Imagination

Thy various works, imperial queen, we see,
How bright their forms! how deck'd with pomp by thee!
Thy wond'rous acts in beauteous order stand,
And all attest how potent is thine hand.

5 From Helicon's[9] refulgent° heights attend, bright, shining
Ye sacred choir, and my attempts befriend:
To tell her glories with a faithful tongue,
Ye blooming Graces,[1] triumph in my song.

Now here, now there, the roving Fancy flies,
10 Till some loved object strikes her wand'ring eyes,
Whose silken fetters° all the senses bind, shackles
And soft captivity involves the mind.

Imagination! who can sing thy force?
Or who describe the swiftness of thy course?
15 Soaring through air to find the bright abode,
Th' empyreal° place of the thund'ring God, heavenly
We on thy pinions[2] can surpass the wind,
And leave the rolling universe behind:
From star to star the mental optics rove,
20 Measure the skies, and range the realms above.
There in one view we grasp the mighty whole,
Or with new worlds amaze th' unbounded soul.

Though Winter frowns to Fancy's raptured eyes
The fields may flourish, and gay scenes arise;
25 The frozen deeps may break their iron bands,
And bid their waters murmur o'er the sands.
Fair Flora[3] may resume her fragrant reign,
And with her flow'ry riches deck the plain;
Sylvanus[4] may diffuse his honors round,
30 And all the forest may with leaves be crowned:
Show'rs may descend, and dews their gems disclose,
And nectar sparkle on the blooming rose.

9. A mountain in Greece that was sacred to the Muses (nine sister goddesses who presided over poetry, song, and the arts and sciences) and thus figures poetic inspiration.
1. In Greek mythology, three sister goddesses who gave charm and beauty. Her: i.e., imagination's.
2. Wings; from the Latin, pennae, feathers, and therefore with a pun on the associated meaning, pens (originally made from quills).
3. Roman goddess of flowers.
4. Roman god of the woods.

Such is thy pow'r, nor are thine orders vain,
O thou the leader of the mental train:
35 In full perfection all thy works are wrought,
And thine the sceptre o'er the realms of thought.
Before thy throne the subject-passions bow,
Of subject-passions sov'reign ruler Thou,
At thy command joy rushes on the heart,
40 And through the glowing veins the spirits dart.

Fancy might now her silken pinions try
To rise from earth, and sweep th' expanse on high;
From Tithon's bed now might Aurora[5] rise,
Her cheeks all glowing with celestial dies,° colors
45 While a pure stream of light o'erflows the skies.
The monarch of the day° I might behold, sun
And all the mountains tipt with radiant gold,
But I reluctant leave the pleasing views,
Which Fancy dresses to delight the Muse;
50 Winter austere forbids me to aspire,
And northern tempests damp the rising fire;[6]
They chill the tides of Fancy's flowing sea,
Cease then, my song, cease the unequal lay.[7]

GEORGE CRABBE
1754–1832

From The Parish Register[1]

Part I

BAPTISMS

Tum porro puer (ut sævis projectus ab undis, Navita) nudus humi jacet infans indigus omni
Vitali auxilio, . . .
Vagituque locum lugubri complet, ut æquum est,
Cui tantum in vitâ restat transire malorum.[2]

5. Greek and Roman goddess of the dawn, represented as rising with rosy fingers from the bed of her aged lover, Tithonus.
6. Wheatley here alludes to and revises Milton's famous lines to his Muse (his source of inspiration) expressing his fear that he is too old, or was born in a time and place too inhospitable to poetry, to accomplish his poetic aims; without the Muse's help, "an age too late" or a climate too northern or "cold" may "damp" (depress) his "intended wing" (Paradise Lost 9.44–45; see p. 426).
7. A "lay" is a short narrative or lyric poem, but the term harks back, specifically, to the late medieval lais—tales of magic and romance—written in England and Northern France. Wheatley's adjective "unequal" is ambiguous, referring perhaps (with ironic modesty?) to her short poem's inability to compete with Milton's epic. She has, however, echoed Milton's acknowledgment of his inability to write without the help of a power greater than (unequal to) his own.
1. Crabbe's poem is modeled on the parish registers in which baptisms, marriages, and deaths were recorded. The following section, although titled "Baptisms," serves as an introduction to the whole poem.
2. From Lucretius, De Rerum Natura (Latin, On the Nature of Things) 5.222–24, 225–27: "Then the child, like a sailor thrown forth by the cruel waves, lies naked on the ground, speechless, needing all kinds of vital support . . . and he fills the surrounding air with sad cries—as is appropriate, given that so much trouble awaits in life."

The year revolves, and I again explore
The simple Annals of my Parish poor;
What Infant-members in my flock appear,
What Pairs I blessed in the departed year;
5 And who, of Old or Young, or Nymphs or Swains,[3]
Are lost to Life, its pleasures and its pains.
No Muse I ask, before my view to bring
The humble actions of the swains I sing.—
How passed the youthful, how the old their days;
10 Who sank in sloth, and who aspired to praise;
Their tempers, manners, morals, customs, arts,
What parts they had, and how they employed their parts;
By what elated, soothed, seduced, depressed,
Full well I know—these Records give the rest.
15 Is there a place, save one the poet sees,
A land of love, of liberty and ease;
Where labor wearies not, nor cares suppress
Th' eternal flow of rustic happiness;
Where no proud mansion frowns in awful state,
20 Or keeps the sunshine from the cottage-gate;
Where young and old, intent on pleasure, throng,
And half man's life is holiday and song?
Vain search for scenes like these! no view appears;
By sighs unruffled or unstained by tears;
25 Since vice the world subdued and waters drowned,
Auburn[4] and Eden can no more be found.
Hence good and evil mixed, but man has skill
And power to part them, when he feels the will!
Toil, care, and patience bless th' abstemious° few, not self-indulgent
30 Fear, shame, and want the thoughtless herd pursue.
Behold the Cot!° where thrives th' industrious swain, cottage
Source of his pride, his pleasure, and his gain;
Screened from the winter's wind, the sun's last ray
Smiles on the window and prolongs the day;
35 Projecting thatch the woodbine's branches stop,
And turn their blossoms to the casement's top:
All need requires is in that cot contained,
And much that taste untaught and unrestrained
Surveys delighted; there she loves to trace,
40 In one gay picture, all the royal race;
Around the walls are heroes, lovers, kings;
The print that shows them and the verse that sings.
Here the last Lewis on his throne is seen,
And there he stands imprisoned, and his Queen;[5]
45 To these the mother takes her child, and shows
What grateful duty to his God he owes;
Who gives to him a happy home, where he Lives and enjoys his freedom with the free;

3. Poetic diction for "or beautiful young women or young men."
4. The fictive village invoked by Oliver Goldsmith in "The Deserted Village" (see p. 686). The opening section of Crabbe's poem argues explicitly against Goldsmith's views of village life.
5. Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette of France, who were guillotined in 1793.

When kings and queens, dethroned, insulted, tried,
50 Are all these blessings of the poor denied.
   There is King Charles, and all his Golden Rules,[6]
Who proved Misfortune's was the best of schools:
And there his Son,[7] who, tried by years of pain,
Proved that misfortunes may be sent in vain.
55   The Magic-mill that grinds the gran'nams young,[8]
Close at the side of kind Godiva hung;[9]
She, of her favorite place the pride and joy,
Of charms at once most lavish and most coy,
By wanton act the purest fame could raise,
60 And give the boldest deed the chastest praise.
   There stands the stoutest Ox in England fed;[1]
There fights the boldest Jew, Whitechapel bred;[2]
And here Saint Monday's worthy votaries live,
In all the joys that ale and skittles[3] give.
65   Now lo! on Egypt's coast that hostile fleet,
By nations dreaded and by NELSON beat;[4]
And here shall soon another triumph come,
A deed of glory in a day of gloom;
Distressing glory! grievous boon of fate!
70 The proudest conquest, at the dearest rate.[5]
   On shelf of deal° beside the cuckoo-clock,   pine or fir wood
Of cottage-reading rests the chosen stock;
Learning we lack, not books, but have a kind
For all our wants, a meat for every mind:
75 The tale for wonder and the joke for whim,
The half-sung sermon and the half-groaned hymn.
   No need of classing; each within its place,
The feeling finger in the dark can trace;
"First from the corner, farthest from the wall,"
80 Such all the rules, and they suffice for all.
   There pious works for Sunday's use are found;
Companions for that Bible newly bound;
That Bible, bought by sixpence weekly saved,
Has choicest prints by famous hands engraved;
85 Has choicest notes by many a famous head,
Such as to doubt, have rustic readers led;
Have made them stop to reason why? and how?
And, where they once agreed, to cavil now.
Oh! rather give me commentators plain,
90 Who with no deep researches vex the brain;
Who from the dark and doubtful love to run,
And hold their glimmering tapers to the sun;

6. British King Charles I was thought to have authored twelve popular maxims shortly before he was executed, in 1649.
7. Charles II (reigned 1660–85).
8. A popular contemporary print depicting the Guildford Mill, comically imagined to grind old women into young ones.
9. An eleventh-century noblewoman reputed to have ridden naked through the streets of Coventry to dissuade her husband from imposing heavy taxes on the citizens.
1. A Lancashire ox famous for its size.
2. The boxer Daniel Mendoza.
3. An English bowling game. "Saint Monday's . . . votaries" are working people devoted to taking Monday (as well as Sunday) as "holy days."
4. At the Battle of the Nile (1798).
5. I.e., the Battle of Trafalgar (1805), in which Admiral Horatio Nelson died.

Who simple truth with nine-fold reasons back,
And guard the point no enemies attack.
95 Bunyan's famed Pilgrim rests that shelf upon,
A genius rare but rude was honest John;[6]
Not one who, early by the Muse beguiled,
Drank from her well the waters undefiled;[7]
Not one who slowly gained the hill sublime,[8]
100 Then often sipped and little at a time;
But one who dabbled in the sacred springs,
And drank them muddy, mixed with baser things.
Here to interpret dreams we read the rules,
Science our own! and never taught in schools;
105 In moles and specks we Fortune's gifts discern,
And Fate's fixed will from Nature's wanderings learn.
Of Hermit Quarll we read, in island rare,[9]
Far from mankind and seeming far from care;
Safe from all want, and sound in every limb;
110 Yes! there was he, and there was care with him.
Unbound and heaped, these valued tomes beside,
Lay humbler works, the pedlar's pack supplied;
Yet these, long since, have all acquired a name;
The Wandering Jew[1] has found his way to fame;
115 And fame, denied to many a labored song,
Crowns Thumb the Great, and Hickathrift the strong.
There too is he, by wizard-power upheld,
Jack,[2] by whose arm the giant-brood were quelled:
His shoes of swiftness on his feet he placed;
120 His coat of darkness on his loins he braced;
His sword of sharpness in his hand he took,
And off the heads of doughty° giants stroke: mighty
Their glaring eyes beheld no mortal near;
No sound of feet alarmed the drowsy ear;
125 No English blood their pagan sense could smell,
But heads dropt headlong, wondering why they fell.
These are the peasant's joy, when placed at ease,
Half his delighted offspring mount his knees.
To every cot° the lord's indulgent mind cottage
130 Has a small space for garden-ground assigned;
Here—till return of morn dismissed the farm—
The careful peasant plies the sinewy arm,
Warmed as he works, and casts his look around
On every foot of that improving ground:

6. John Bunyan (1628–1688), English preacher and author of Pilgrim's Progress (1678).
7. A phrase applied by Spenser (Faerie Queene 5.2.32) to Chaucer, and by Samuel Johnson (in the preface to his Dictionary) to Spenser and others.
8. Perhaps Milton, who contrasted his "slow-endeavoring art" to Shakespeare's "easy numbers" ("On Shakespeare") and who stressed the idea of temperance throughout Paradise Lost.
9. Attributed to Edward Dorrington, The Hermit, or Unparalleled Sufferings and Surprising Adventures of Philip Quarll tells the story of a Robinson Crusoe–like hero. First published in 1727, it was often adapted for children.
1. A proverbial figure condemned to a life of eternal wandering as punishment for his cruelty to Christ.
2. Jack the Giant Killer; like Tom Thumb and Tom Hickathrift, a folk hero.

135 It is his own he sees; his master's eye
Peers not about, some secret fault to spy;
Nor voice severe is there, nor censure known;—
Hope, profit, pleasure,—they are all his own.
Here grow the humble cives,° and, hard by them, chives
140 The leek with crown globose° and reedy stem; globular
High climb his pulse° in many an even row, peas, beans
Deep strike the ponderous roots in soil below;
And herbs of potent smell and pungent taste,
Give a warm relish to the night's repast.
145 Apples and cherries grafted by his hand,
And clustered nuts for neighboring market stand.
Nor thus concludes his labor; near the cot,
The reed-fence rises round some favorite spot;
Where rich carnations, pinks with purple eyes,
150 Proud hyacinths, the least some florist's prize,
Tulips tall-stemmed and pounced auriculas° rise. primroses
Here on a Sunday-eve, when service ends,
Meet and rejoice a family of friends;
All speak aloud, are happy and are free,
155 And glad they seem, and gaily they agree.
What, though fastidious ears may shun the speech,
Where all are talkers, and where none can teach;
Where still the welcome and the words are old,
And the same stories are for ever told;
160 Yet theirs is joy that, bursting from the heart,
Prompts the glad tongue these nothings to impart;
That forms these tones of gladness we despise,
That lifts their steps, that sparkles in their eyes;
That talks or laughs or runs or shouts or plays,
165 And speaks in all their looks and all their ways.
Fair scenes of peace! ye might detain us long,
But vice and misery now demand the song;
And turn our view from dwellings simply neat,
To this infected row, we term our Street.
170 Here, in cabal,° a disputatious crew illegal assembly
Each evening meet; the sot, the cheat, the shrew:
Riots are nightly heard:—the curse, the cries
Of beaten wife, perverse in her replies;
While shrieking children hold each threatening hand,
175 And sometimes life, and sometimes food demand:
Boys, in their first-stolen rags, to swear begin,
And girls, who heed not dress, are skilled in gin:
Snarers° and smugglers here their gains divide; poachers
Ensnaring females here their victims hide;
180 And here is one, the Sibyl[3] of the Row,
Who knows all secrets, or affects to know.
Seeking their fate, to her the simple run,
To her the guilty, theirs awhile to shun;

3. Name given by the Greeks and Romans to certain women who prophesied and claimed divine inspiration.

Mistress of worthless arts, depraved in will,
185 Her care unblest and unrepaid her skill,
Slave to the tribe, to whose command she stoops,
And poorer than the poorest maid she dupes.
  Between the road-way and the walls, offence
Invades all eyes and strikes on every sense:
190 There lie, obscene, at every open door,
Heaps from the hearth and sweepings from the floor,
And day by day the mingled masses grow,
As sinks are disembogued° and kennels flow. drained
  There hungry dogs from hungry children steal;
195 There pigs and chickens quarrel for a meal;
There dropsied infants wail without redress,
And all is want and wo and wretchedness:
Yet should these boys, with bodies bronzed and bare,
High-swollen and hard, outlive that lack of care—
200 Forced on some farm, the unexerted strength,
Though loth to action, is compelled at length,
When warmed by health, as serpents in the spring,
Aside their slough of indolence they fling.
  Yet, ere they go, a greater evil comes—
205 See! crowded beds in those contiguous rooms;
Beds but ill parted, by a paltry screen
Of papered lath or curtain dropt between;
Daughters and sons to yon compartments creep,
And parents here beside their children sleep:
210 Ye who have power, these thoughtless people part,
Nor let the ear be first to taint the heart.
  Come! search within, nor sight nor smell regard;
The true physician walks the foulest ward.
See! on the floor, what frousy° patches rest! dirty, messy
215 What nauseous fragments on yon fractured chest!
What downy dust beneath yon window-seat!
And round these posts that serve this bed for feet;
This bed where all those tattered garments lie,
Worn by each sex, and now perforce thrown by!
220 See! as we gaze, an infant lifts its head,
Left by neglect and burrowed in that bed;
The Mother-gossip has the love suppressed
An infant's cry once wakened in her breast;
And daily prattles, as her round she takes,
225 (With strong resentment) of the want she makes.
  Whence all these woes?—From want of virtuous will,
Of honest shame, of time-improving skill;
From want of care t' employ the vacant hour,
And want of ev'ry kind but want of power.
230 Here are no wheels for either wool or flax,
But packs of cards—made up of sundry packs;
Here is no clock, nor will they turn the glass,
And see how swift th' important moments pass;
Here are no books, but ballads on the wall,

235 Are some abusive, and indecent all;
Pistols are here, unpaired; with nets and hooks,
Of every kind, for rivers, ponds, and brooks;
An ample flask, that nightly rovers fill
With recent poison from the Dutchman's still;[4]
240 A box of tools, with wires of various size,
Frocks, wigs, and hats, for night or day disguise,
And bludgeons stout to gain or guard a prize.
To every house belongs a space of ground,
Of equal size, once fenced with paling° round; pointed stakes
245 That paling now by slothful waste destroyed,
Dead gorse and stumps of elder[5] fill the void;
Save in the center-spot, whose walls of clay
Hide sots and striplings at their drink or play:
Within, a board,[6] beneath a tiled retreat,
250 Allures the bubble° and maintains the cheat; dupe
Where heavy ale in spots like varnish shows,
Where chalky tallies yet remain in rows;
Black pipes and broken jugs the seats defile,
The walls and windows, rhymes and reck'nings vile;
255 Prints of the meanest kind disgrace the door,
And cards, in curses torn, lie fragments on the floor.
Here his poor bird th' inhuman Cocker[7] brings,
Arms his hard heel and clips his golden wings;
With spicy food th' impatient spirit feeds,
260 And shouts and curses as the battle bleeds.
Struck through the brain, deprived of both his eyes,
The vanquished bird must combat till he dies;
Must faintly peck at his victorious foe,
And reel and stagger at each feeble blow:
265 When fallen, the savage grasps his dabbled plumes,
His blood-stained arms, for other deaths assumes;
And damns the craven-fowl, that lost his stake,
And only bled and perished for his sake.
Such are our Peasants, those to whom we yield
270 Praise with relief,° the fathers of the field; welfare
And these who take from our reluctant hands,
What Burn[8] advises or the Bench° commands. judiciary
Our Farmers round, well pleased with constant gain,
Like other farmers, flourish and complain.—
275 These are our groups; our Portraits next appear,
And close our Exhibition for the year.

1807

4. I.e., with illegally imported alcohol.
5. Elderberry; like gorse, a shrub.
6. Probably a gambling table.
7. The owner of fighting cocks.
8. Richard Burn (1709–1795), English legal scholar who wrote Justice of the Peace and Ecclesiastical Law.

From The Borough

From Letter XXII, The Poor of The Borough: Peter Grimes

165 Alas! for Peter, not a helping hand,
So was he hated, could he now command.[9]
Alone he rowed his boat, alone he cast
His nets beside, or made his anchor fast;
To hold a rope or hear a curse was none—
170 He toiled and railed, he groaned and swore alone.
Thus by himself compelled to live each day,
To wait for certain hours the tide's delay;
At the same times the same dull views to see,
The bounding marsh-bank and the blighted tree;
175 The water only, when the tides were high,
When low, the mud half-covered and half-dry;
The sun-burnt tar that blisters on the planks,
And bank-side stakes in their uneven ranks;
Heaps of entangled weeds that slowly float,
180 As the tide rolls by the impeded boat.
When tides were neap° and, in the sultry day, low
Through the tall bounding mud-banks made their way,
Which on each side rose swelling, and below
The dark warm flood ran silently and slow;
185 There anchoring, Peter chose from man to hide,
There hang his head, and view the lazy tide
In its hot slimy channel slowly glide;
Where the small eels that left the deeper way
For the warm shore within the shallows play;
190 Where gaping mussels, left upon the mud,
Slope their slow passage to the fallen flood.
Here dull and hopeless he'd lie down and trace
How sidelong crabs had scrawled their crooked race,
Or sadly listen to the tuneless cry
195 Of fishing gull or clanging golden-eye;° species of wild duck
What time the sea-birds to the marsh would come,
And the loud bittern,[1] from the bulrush° home, cattail
Gave from the salt-ditch side the bellowing boom.
He nursed the feelings these dull scenes produce,
200 And loved to stop beside the opening sluice;
Where the small stream, confined in narrow bound,
Ran with a dull, unvaried, saddening sound;
Where all, presented to the eye or ear,
Oppressed the soul with misery, grief, and fear.
205 Besides these objects, there were places three,
Which Peter seemed with certain dread to see;
When he drew near them he would turn from each,

9. Grimes has fatally exploited three boys provided by the workhouses as child laborers and has been forbidden to employ any more.
1. Marsh bird with a booming call.

And loudly whistle till he passed the reach.[2]
  A change of scene to him brought no relief;
210 In town,'twas plain, men took him for a thief.
The sailors' wives would stop him in the street,
And say, "Now, Peter, thou'st no boy to beat!"
Infants at play, when they perceived him, ran,
Warning each other—"That's the wicked man!"
215 He growled an oath, and in an angry tone
Cursed the whole place and wished to be alone.
  Alone he was, the same dull scenes in view,
And still more gloomy in his sight they grew;
Though man he hated, yet employed alone
220 At bootless labor, he would swear and groan,
Cursing the shoals° that glided by the spot, schools of fish
And gulls that caught them when his arts could not.
  Cold nervous tremblings shook his sturdy frame,
And strange disease—he couldn't say the name;
225 Wild were his dreams, and oft he rose in fright,
Waked by his view of horrors in the night—
Horrors that would the sternest minds amaze,
Horrors that demons might be proud to raise;
And though he felt forsaken, grieved at heart
230 To think he lived from all mankind apart,
Yet, if a man approached, in terrors he would start.
  A winter passed since Peter saw the town,
And summer lodgers were again come down.
These, idly curious, with their glasses° spied telescopes
235 The ships in bay as anchored for the tide—
The river's craft—the bustle of the quay—
And sea-port views, which landmen love to see.
  One, up the river, had a man and boat
Seen day by day, now anchored, now afloat;
240 Fisher he seemed, yet used no net nor hook,
Of sea-fowl swimming by no heed he took,
But on the gliding waves still fixed his lazy look.
At certain stations he would view the stream,
As if he stood bewildered in a dream,
245 Or that° some power had chained him for a time, as if
To feel a curse or meditate on crime.
  This known, some curious, some in pity went,
And others questioned—"Wretch, dost thou repent?"
He heard, he trembled, and in fear resigned
250 His boat; new terror filled his restless mind;
Furious he grew, and up on the country ran,
And there they seized him—a distempered man.
Him we received, and to a parish-bed,[3]
Followed and cursed, the groaning man was led.

FROM POETICAL SKETCHES

To the Muses[1]

Whether on Ida's[2] shady brow,
  Or in the chambers of the East,
The chambers of the sun, that now
  From ancient melody have ceas'd;

5 Whether in Heav'n ye wander fair,
  Or the green corners of the earth,
Or the blue regions of the air,
  Where the melodious winds have birth;

Whether on chrystal rocks ye rove,
10 Beneath the bosom of the sea
Wand'ring in many a coral grove,
  Fair Nine, forsaking Poetry!

How have you left the ancient love
  That bards of old enjoy'd in you!
15 The languid strings do scarcely move!
  The sound is forc'd, the notes are few!

1783

Song

How sweet I roam'd from field to field,
  And tasted all the summer's pride,
'Till I the prince of love beheld,
  Who in the sunny beams did glide!

5 He shew'd me lilies for my hair,
  And blushing roses for my brow;
He led me through his gardens fair,
  Where all his golden pleasures grow.

With sweet May dews my wings were wet,
10 And Phoebus fir'd my vocal rage;[3]
He caught me in his silken net,
  And shut me in his golden cage.

1. In Greek mythology, nine sister goddesses who presided over the arts and sciences, especially poetry.
2. Mountain in Asia Minor, distant from Helicon and Parnassus, mountains in Greece sacred to the Muses.
3. Impassioned song. Phoebus is Apollo, Greek and Roman god of poetic inspiration.

He loves to sit and hear me sing,
Then, laughing, sports and plays with me;
15 Then stretches out my golden wing,
And mocks my loss of liberty.

1783

To the Evening Star[4]

Thou fair-hair'd angel of the evening,
Now, while the sun rests on the mountains, light
Thy bright torch of love; thy radiant crown
Put on, and smile upon our evening bed!
5 Smile on our loves; and, while thou drawest the Blue curtains of the sky, scatter thy silver dew
On every flower that shuts its sweet eyes
In timely sleep. Let thy west wind sleep on
The lake; speak silence with thy glimmering eyes,
10 And wash the dusk with silver. Soon, full soon,
Dost thou withdraw; then the wolf rages wide,
And the lion glares thro' the dun forest:
The fleeces of our flocks are cover'd with
Thy sacred dew: protect them with thine influence.[5]

From Songs of Innocence

Introduction

Piping down the valleys wild
Piping songs of pleasant glee
On a cloud I saw a child,
And he laughing said to me,

5 "Pipe a song about a Lamb";
So I piped with merry cheer.
"Piper pipe that song again"—
So I piped, he wept to hear.

"Drop thy pipe thy happy pipe
10 Sing thy songs of happy cheer";
So I sung the same again
While he wept with joy to hear.

4. Venus, Roman goddess of love and beauty.
5. In astrology, the effect that heavenly bodies exert on earthly things and creatures.

"Piper sit thee down and write
In a book that all may read"—
15 So he vanish'd from my sight.
And I pluck'd a hollow reed,

And I made a rural pen,
And I stain'd the water clear,
And I wrote my happy songs
20 Every child may joy to hear.

The Lamb

Little Lamb, who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?
Gave thee life & bid thee feed,
By the stream & o'er the mead;
5 Gave thee clothing of delight,
Softest clothing wooly bright;
Gave thee such a tender voice,
Making all the vales rejoice!
Little Lamb who made thee?
10 Dost thou know who made thee?

Little Lamb I'll tell thee,
Little Lamb I'll tell thee!
He° is callèd by thy name, Christ
For he calls himself a Lamb:
15 He is meek & he is mild,
He became a little child:
I a child & thou a lamb,
We are callèd by his name.
Little Lamb God bless thee.
20 Little Lamb God bless thee.

Holy Thursday [I.]

'Twas on a Holy Thursday,[6] their innocent faces clean,
The children[7] walking two & two, in red & blue & green,
Gray headed beadles[8] walkd before with wands as white as snow,
Till into the high dome of Paul's they like Thames'[9] waters flow.

6. Probably Ascension Day (the Thursday forty days after Easter).
7. The children of charity schools, here depicted in St. Paul's Cathedral, London.
8. Ushers charged with keeping order.
9. The river Thames.

5 O what a multitude they seemd, these flowers of London town!
Seated in companies they sit with radiance all their own.
The hum of multitudes was there, but multitudes of lambs,
Thousands of little boys & girls raising their innocent hands.

Now like a mighty wind they raise to heaven the voice of song,
10 Or like harmonious thunderings the seats of heaven among.
Beneath them sit the aged men, wise guardians of the poor;
Then cherish pity, lest you drive an angel from your door.

1789

The Divine Image

To Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love,
All pray in their distress:
And to these virtues of delight
Return their thankfulness.

5 For Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love,
Is God, our father dear:
And Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love,
Is Man, his child and care.

For Mercy has a human heart,
10 Pity, a human face:
And Love, the human form divine,
And Peace, the human dress.

Then every man of every clime,
That prays in his distress,
15 Prays to the human form divine,
Love, Mercy, Pity, Peace.

And all must love the human form,
In heathen, Turk, or Jew.
Where Mercy, Love, & Pity dwell,
20 There God is dwelling too.

The Little Black Boy

My mother bore me in the southern wild,
And I am black, but O! my soul is white;
White as an angel is the English child:
But I am black as if bereav'd of light.

5 My mother taught me underneath a tree,
And sitting down before the heat of day,
She took me on her lap and kissèd me,
And pointing to the east, began to say:

"Look on the rising sun: there God does live,
10 And gives his light, and gives his heat away;
And flowers and trees and beasts and men receive
Comfort in morning, joy in the noon day.

"And we are put on earth a little space,
That we may learn to bear the beams of love,
15 And these black bodies and this sun-burnt face
Is but a cloud, and like a shady grove.

"For when our souls have learn'd the heat to bear,
The cloud will vanish; we shall hear his voice,
Saying: 'Come out from the grove, my love & care,
20 And round my golden tent like lambs rejoice.' "

Thus did my mother say, and kissèd me;
And thus I say to little English boy:
When I from black and he from white cloud free,
And round the tent of God like lambs we joy,

25 I'll shade him from the heat till he can bear
To lean in joy upon our father's knee;
And then I'll stand and stroke his silver hair,
And be like him, and he will then love me.

1789

The Little Boy Lost

"Father, father, where are you going?
O do not walk so fast.
Speak, father, speak to your little boy
Or else I shall be lost."

5 The night was dark, no father was there,
The child was wet with dew.
The mire was deep, & the child did weep,
And away the vapor flew.

1789

The Little Boy Found

The little boy lost in the lonely fen,
Led by the wand'ring light,[1]
Began to cry, but God ever nigh
Appeard like his father in white.

5 He kissed the child & by the hand led
And to his mother brought,
Who in sorrow pale, thro' the lonely dale,
Her little boy weeping sought.

THE BOOK OF THEL[2]

Thel's Motto

Does the Eagle know what is in the pit?
Or wilt thou go ask the Mole?
Can Wisdom be put in a silver rod?
Or Love in a golden bowl?

5 The daughters of Mne Seraphim[3] led round their sunny flocks,
All but the youngest; she in paleness sought the secret air,
To fade away like morning beauty from her mortal day;
Down by the river of Adona[4] her soft voice is heard,
And thus her gentle lamentation falls like morning dew:

10 "O life of this our spring! why fades the lotus of the water?
Why fade these children of the spring? born but to smile & fall.
Ah! Thel is like a watry bow, and like a parting cloud,
Like a reflection in a glass, like shadows in the water,
Like dreams of infants, like a smile upon an infant's face,
15 Like the dove's voice, like transient day, like music in the air.
Ah! gentle may I lay me down, and gentle rest my head,
And gentle sleep the sleep of death and gentle hear the voice
Of him that walketh in the garden in the evening time."

The Lilly of the valley, breathing in the humble grass,
20 Answer'd the lovely maid and said: "I am a watry weed,
And I am very small, and love to dwell in lowly vales;[5]
So weak, the gilded butterfly scarce perches on my head;

1. A will-o'-the-wisp, said to draw travelers astray by holding a false light before them; the phenomenon of nocturnal light is caused by the combustion of marsh gas.
2. "Thel," like the other proper names in the poem, is Blake's invention, and its meaning can only be inferred.
3. Angels who guard Jehovah's throne. Mne: possibly a misprint for "the."
4. Probably the river Adonis in Milton's Paradise Lost 1.540–42, associated with rituals of fertility and of death and rebirth.
5. Valleys.

Yet I am visited from heaven, and he that smiles on all
Walks in the valley and each morn over me spreads his hand,
25 Saying: 'Rejoice, thou humble grass, thou new-born lilly flower,
Thou gentle maid of silent valleys and of modest brooks;
For thou shalt be clothed in light, and fed with morning manna,[6]
Till summer's heat melts thee beside the fountains and the springs
To flourish in eternal vales.' Then why should Thel complain?

30 Why should the mistress of the vales of Har utter a sigh?"

She ceasd & smild in tears, then sat down in her silver shrine.

Thel answerd: "O thou little virgin of the peaceful valley,
Giving to those that cannot crave, the voiceless, the o'ertired;
Thy breath doth nourish the innocent lamb, he smells thy milky garments,
35 He crops thy flowers, while thou sittest smiling in his face,
Wiping his mild and meekin mouth[7] from all contagious taints.
Thy wine doth purify the golden honey; thy perfume,
Which thou dost scatter on every little blade of grass that springs,
Revives the milkèd w, & tames the fire-breathing steed.
40 But Thel is like a faint cloud kindled at the rising sun:
I vanish from my pearly throne, and who shall find my place?"
"Queen of the vales," the Lilly answered, "ask the tender cloud,
And it shall tell thee why it glitters in the morning sky,
And why it scatters its bright beauty thro' the humid air.
45 Descend, O little cloud, & hover before the eyes of Thel."

The Cloud descended, and the Lilly bowd her modest head,
And went to mind her numerous charge among the verdant grass.

"Oh little Cloud," the virgin said, "I charge thee tell to me,
Why thou complainest not when in one hour thou fade away:
50 Then we shall seek thee but not find; ah, Thel is like to Thee.
I pass away, yet I complain, and no one hears my voice."

The Cloud then shew'd his golden head & his bright form emerg'd,
Hovering and glittering on the air before the face of Thel.

"O virgin, know'st thou not our steeds drink of the golden springs
55 Where Luvah[8] doth renew his horses? Look'st thou on my youth,
And fearest thou, because I vanish and am seen no more,
Nothing remains? O maid, I tell thee, when I pass away,
It is to tenfold life, to love, to peace, and raptures holy:
Unseen descending, weigh my light wings upon balmy flowers,
60 And court the fair eyed dew, to take me to her shining tent;
The weeping virgin trembling kneels before the risen sun,

6. Food (from heaven).
7. Perhaps describing a lamb's delicately wrinkling mouth.
8. In Blake's mythology, a sun god of Love (Love, Lover, Luvah).

Till we arise link'd in a golden band, and never part,
But walk united, bearing food to all our tender flowers."

"Dost thou, O little Cloud? I fear that I am not like thee;
65 For I walk through the vales of Har and smell the sweetest flowers,
But I feed not the little flowers; I hear the warbling birds,
But I feed not the warbling birds; they fly and seek their food;
But Thel delights in these no more, because I fade away,
And all shall say, 'Without a use this shining woman liv'd,
70 Or did she only live to be at death the food of worms?' "

The Cloud reclind upon his airy throne and answer'd thus:

"Then if thou are the food of worms, O virgin of the skies,
How great thy use, how great thy blessing! Every thing that lives
Lives not alone, nor for self; fear not, and I will call
75 The weak worm from its lowly bed, and thou shalt hear its voice.
Come forth, worm of the silent valley, to thy pensive queen."
The helpless worm arose, and sat upon the Lilly's leaf,
And the bright Cloud saild on, to find his partner in the vale.

Then Thel astonish'd view'd the Worm upon its dewy bed.

80 "Art thou a Worm? Image of weakness, art thou but a Worm?
I see thee like an infant wrapped in the Lilly's leaf;
Ah, weep not, little voice, thou can'st not speak, but thou can'st weep.
Is this a Worm? I see thee lay helpless & naked, weeping,
And none to answer, none to cherish thee with mother's smiles."

85 The Clod of Clay heard the Worm's voice, & raisd her pitying head;
She bow'd over the weeping infant, and her life exhal'd
In milky fondness; then on Thel she fix'd her humble eyes.

"O beauty of the vales of Har! we live not for ourselves;
Thou seest me the meanest thing, and so I am indeed.
90 My bosom of itself is cold, and of itself is dark;

But he that loves the lowly, pours his oil upon my head,
And kisses me, and binds his nuptial bands around my breast,
And says: 'Thou mother of my children, I have lovèd thee,
And I have given thee a crown that none can take away.'
95 But how this is, sweet maid, I know not, and I cannot know;
I ponder, and I cannot ponder; yet I live and love."

The daughter of beauty wip'd her pitying tears with her white veil,
And said: "Alas! I knew not this, and therefore did I weep.
That God would love a Worm, I knew, and punish the evil foot
100 That, wilful, bruis'd its helpless form; but that he cherish'd it
With milk and oil I never knew; and therefore did I weep,

And I complaind in the mild air, because I fade away,
And lay me down in thy cold bed, and leave my shining lot."

"Queen of the vales," the matron Clay answerd, "I heard thy sighs,
105 And all thy moans flew o'er my roof, but I have call'd them down.
Wilt thou, O Queen, enter my house? 'Tis given thee to enter
And to return; fear nothing, enter thy virgin feet."

The eternal gates' terrific porter lifted the northern bar:[9]
Thel enter'd in & saw the secrets of the land unknown.
110 She saw the couches of the dead, & where the fibrous roots
Of every heart on earth infixes deep its restless twists:
A land of sorrows & of tears where never smile was seen.

She wanderd in the land of clouds thro' valleys dark, listning
Dolors & lamentations; waiting oft beside a dewy grave,
115 She stood in silence, listning to the voices of the ground,
Till to her own grave plot she came, & there she sat down,
And heard this voice of sorrow breathèd from the hollow pit:

"Why cannot the Ear be closed to its own destruction?
Or the glistning Eye to the poison of a smile?
120 Why are Eyelids stord with arrows ready drawn,
Where a thousand fighting men in ambush lie?
Or an Eye of gifts & graces, show'ring fruits & coinèd gold?
Why a Tongue impress'd with honey from every wind?
Why an Ear, a whirlpool fierce to draw creations in?
125 Why a Nostril wide inhaling terror, trembling, & affright?
Why a tender curb upon the youthful burning boy?
Why a little curtain of flesh on the bed of our desire?"

The Virgin started from her seat, & with a shriek
Fled back unhinderd till she came into the vales of Har.

Hear the voice of the Bard!
Who Present, Past, & Future sees,
Whose ears have heard

9. Possibly the gate through which a soul or spirit enters the world of earthly life and death.

The Holy Word
5 That walk'd among the ancient trees;[1]

Calling the lapsèd Soul
And weeping in the evening dew;
That might controll
The starry pole,
10 And fallen fallen light renew!

"O Earth O Earth return!
Arise from out the dewy grass;
Night is worn,
And the morn
15 Rises from the slumberous mass.

"Turn away no more:
Why wilt thou turn away?
The starry floor
The watry shore
20 Is giv'n thee till the break of day."

Holy Thursday [II.]

Is this a holy thing to see,
In a rich and fruitful land,
Babes reducd to misery,
Fed with cold and usurous hand?

5 Is that trembling cry a song?
Can it be a song of joy?

1. "And Adam and Eve heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day" (Genesis 3.8).

And so many children poor?
It is a land of poverty!

And their sun does never shine,
10 And their fields are bleak & bare,
And their ways are fill'd with thorns;
It is eternal winter there.

For where-e'er the sun does shine,
And where-e'er the rain does fall,
15 Babe can never hunger there,
Nor poverty the mind appall.

1794

The Clod & the Pebble

"Love seeketh not Itself to please,
Nor for itself hath any care;
But for another gives its ease,
And builds a Heaven in Hell's despair."

5 So sang a little Clod of Clay,
Trodden with the cattle's feet;
But a Pebble of the brook,
Warbled out these meters meet:° appropriate

"Love seeketh only Self to please,
10 To bind another to its delight,
Joys in another's loss of ease,
And builds a Hell in Heaven's despite."

1794

The Sick Rose

O Rose, thou art sick.
The invisible worm
That flies in the night
In the howling storm

5 Has found out thy bed
Of crimson joy,
And his dark secret love
Does thy life destroy.

1794

A Poison Tree

I was angry with my friend:
I told my wrath, my wrath did end.
I was angry with my foe:
I told it not, my wrath did grow.

5 And I waterd it in fears,
Night & morning with my tears;
And I sunnèd it with smiles,
And with soft deceitful wiles.

And it grew both day and night,
10 Till it bore an apple bright.
And my foe beheld it shine,
And he knew that it was mine,

And into my garden stole,
When the night had veild the pole;
15 In the morning glad I see
My foe outstretchd beneath the tree.

1794

The Tyger

Tyger! Tyger! burning bright
In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

5 In what distant deeps or skies
Burnt the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand dare seize the fire?

And what shoulder, & what art,
10 Could twist the sinews of thy heart?
And when thy heart began to beat,
What dread hand? & what dread feet?

What the hammer? what the chain?
In what furnace was thy brain?
15 What the anvil? what dread grasp
Dare its deadly terrors clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears,
And water'd heaven with their tears,
Did he smile his work to see?
20 Did he who made the Lamb make thee?

Tyger! Tyger! burning bright
In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye
Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

Ah Sun-flower

Ah Sun-flower! weary of time,
Who countest the steps of the Sun,
Seeking after that sweet golden clime
Where the traveller's journey is done;

5 Where the Youth pined away with desire,
And the pale Virgin shrouded in snow,
Arise from their graves and aspire,
Where my Sun-flower wishes to go.

1794

The Garden of Love

I went to the Garden of Love,
And saw what I never had seen:
A Chapel was built in the midst,
Where I used to play on the green.

5 And the gates of this Chapel were shut,
And "Thou shalt not" writ over the door;
So I turn'd to the Garden of Love,
That so many sweet flowers bore,

And I saw it was filled with graves,
10 And tomb-stones where flowers should be:
And Priests in black gowns were walking their rounds,
And binding with briars my joys & desires.

London

I wander thro' each charter'd[2] street,
Near where the charter'd Thames does flow,
And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe.

2. Mapped out, legally defined, constricted.

5 In every cry of every man,
In every Infant's cry of fear,
In every voice, in every ban,[3]
The mind-forg'd manacles I hear.

How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
10 Every blackning Church appalls;° horrifies; casts a pall over
And the hapless Soldier's sigh
Runs in blood down Palace walls.

But most thro' midnight streets I hear
How the youthful Harlot's curse
15 Blasts the new-born Infant's tear,
And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.

FROM SONGS AND BALLADS

I Askèd a Thief

I askèd a thief to steal me a peach,
He turned up his eyes;
I ask'd a lithe lady to lie her down,
Holy & meek she cries.

5 As soon as I went
An angel came.
He wink'd at the thief
And smild at the dame—

And without one word said
10 Had a peach from the tree
And still as a maid
Enjoy'd the lady.

And Did Those Feet

And did those feet in ancient time
Walk upon England's mountains green?
And was the holy Lamb of God

The sweetest hours that e'er I spend,
Are spent amang the lasses, O!

5 There's nought but care on ev'ry han',
In ev'ry hour that passes, O:
What signifies the life o' man,
An'° 'twere na for the lasses, O. — if

Green grow the rashes, O; . . .

10 The warly° race may riches chase, worldly
An' riches still may fly them, O;
An' though at last they catch them fast,
Their hearts can ne'er enjoy them, O.

Green grow the rashes, O; . . .

15 But gie me a canny° hour at e'en, pleasant
My arms about my Dearie, O;
An' warly cares, an' warly men,
May a' gae tapsalteerie,° O! topsy-turvy

Green grow the rashes, O; . . .

20 For you sae douce,° ye sneer at this, prudent
Ye're nought but senseless asses, O:
The wisest man[1] the warl' saw,
He dearly loved the lasses, O.

Green grow the rashes, O; . . .

25 Auld Nature swears, the lovely Dears
Her noblest work she classes, O:
Her prentice han' she tried on man,
An' then she made the lasses, O.

Green grow the rashes, O; . . .

To a Mouse

On Turning Her up in Her Nest with the Plough, November, 1785

Wee, sleeket,° cow'rin, tim'rous beastie, sleek
O, what a panic's in thy breastie!
Thou need na start awa sae hasty,
Wi' bickering° brattle!° hurried / scamper
5 I wad be laith° to rin an' chase thee, loath
Wi' murd'ring pattle!° plowstaff ("paddle")

I'm truly sorry Man's dominion
Has broken Nature's social union,
An' justifies that ill opinion,
10 Which makes thee startle,

1. Solomon, king of Israel (tenth century B.C.E.), who had many wives and was proverbial for his wisdom.

At me, thy poor, earth-born companion,
An' fellow-mortal!

I doubt na, whiles,° but thou may thieve; sometimes
What then? poor beastie, thou maun° live! must 15 A daimen-icker in a thrave[2]
'S a sma' request:
I'll get a blessin wi' the lave,° rest
An' never miss't!

Thy wee bit housie, too, in ruin!
20 Its silly° wa's the win's are strewin! frail
An' naething, now, to big° a new ane, build
O' foggage° green! mosses
An' bleak December's winds ensuin,
Baith snell° an' keen! bitter

25 Thou saw the fields laid bare and wast,° waste
An' weary winter comin fast,
An' cozie here, beneath the blast,
Thou thought to dwell,
Till crash! the cruel coulter° past plowshare
30 Out thro' thy cell.

That wee bit heap o' leaves an' stibble° stubble
Has cost thee mony a weary nibble!
Now thou's turned out, for a' thy trouble,
But° house or hald,° without / home ("hold")
35 To thole° the winter's sleety dribble, endure
An' cranreuch° cauld! hoarfrost

But, Mousie, thou art no thy-lane,[3]
In proving foresight may be vain:
The best laid schemes o' mice an' men
40 Gang° aft a-gley.° go / astray
An' lea'e us nought but grief an' pain,
For promised joy!

Still, thou art blest, compared wi' me!
The present only toucheth thee:
45 But och! I backward cast my e'e,
On prospects drear!
An' forward, tho' I canna see,
I guess an' fear!

1785 1786

2. A rare ear of corn in a stook/stack of (generally twelve) sheaves.

3. No thy-lane: not alone.

Holy Willie's[4] Prayer

O Thou that in the heavens does dwell!
Wha, as it pleases best thysel,
Sends ane to heaven and ten to hell,
A' for thy glory!
5 And no for ony guid or ill
They've done before thee.

I bless and praise thy matchless might,
Whan thousands thou has left in night,
That I am here before thy sight,
10 For gifts and grace
A burning an' a shining light
To a' this place.

What was I, or my generation,
That I should get such exaltation?
15 I, wha deserv'd most just damnation,
For broken laws
Sax thousand years ere my creation,
Thro' Adam's cause!

When from my mother's womb I fell,
20 Thou might hae plunged me deep in hell,
To gnash my gooms, and weep and wail,
In burning lakes,
Where damnèd devils roar and yell
Chained to their stakes.

25 Yet I am here, a chosen sample,
To show thy grace is great and ample:
I'm here, a pillar o' thy temple,
Strong as a rock,
A guide, a ruler, and example
30 To a' thy flock.

O Lord thou kens what zeal I bear,
When drinkers drink, and swearers swear,
And singin' there, and dancin' here,
Wi' great an' sma';
35 For I am keepet by thy fear,
Free frae them a'.

But yet—O Lord—confess I must—
At times I'm fashed° wi' fleshy lust; troubled

4. William Fisher, an elder in the church at Mauchline, the seat of Burns's farm. He habitually censured other men's behavior and doctrine, but was himself rebuked for drunkenness and was suspected of stealing church funds.

And sometimes too, in warldly trust
40 Vile Self gets in;
But thou remembers we are dust,
Defiled wi' sin.

O Lord—yestreen—° thou kens—wi' Meg— last night
Thy pardon I sincerely beg!
45 O may't ne'er be a living plague,
To my dishonor!
And I'll ne'er lift a lawless leg
Again upon her.

Besides, I farther maun° allow, must
50 Wi' Lizzie's lass, three times—I trow°— believe
But Lord, that Friday I was fou° full (of liquor)
When I cam near her;
Or else, thou kens, thy servant true
Wad never steer° her. touch ("stir")

55 Maybe thou lets this fleshly thorn
Buffet thy servant e'en and morn,
Lest he o'er high and proud should turn,
That he's sae gifted;
If sae, thy hand maun e'en be borne
60 Until thou lift it.

Lord bless thy Chosen in this place,
For here thou hast a chosen race;
But God, confound their stubborn face,
And blast their name,
65 Wha bring thy elders to disgrace
And open shame.

Lord mind Gaun Hamilton's[5] deserts!
He drinks, and swears, and plays at cartes,
Yet has sae mony taking arts
70 Wi' Great an' Sma',
Frae God's ain priest the people's hearts
He steals awa'.

An when we chastened him therefore,
Thou kens how he bred sic a splore° row
75 As set the warld in a roar
O' laughin at us;
Curse thou his basket and his store,
Kail° and potatoes. cabbage

5. Gavin Hamilton, a convivial lawyer friend of Burns. Accused of Sabbath-breaking and other offenses by the elders of Mauchline Church, he was cleared by the Presbytery of Ayr (line 80) with the help of his counsel, Robert Aiken (line 85).

Lord hear my earnest cry and prayer
80 Against that Presbytery of Ayr!
Thy strong right hand, Lord, make it bare
Upon their heads!
Lord visit them, and dinna spare,
For their misdeeds!

85 O Lord my God, that glib-tongued Aiken!
My very heart and flesh are quaking
To think how I sat, sweating, shaking,
And pissed wi' dread,
While Auld, wi' hingin° lips gaed sneaking — hanging
90 And hid his head!

Lord, in thy day o' vengeance try him!
Lord visit him that did employ him!
And pass not in thy mercy by them,
Nor hear their prayer;
95 But for thy people's sake destroy them,
And dinna spare!

But Lord, remember me and mine
Wi' mercies temporal and divine!
That I for grace and gear° may shine — wealth
100 Excelled by nane!
And a' the glory shall be thine!
AMEN, AMEN!

Of A' the Airts[6]

Of a' the airts the wind can blaw,
I dearly like the west,
For there the bonie lassie lives,
The lassie I lo'e best:
5 There's wild woods grow, and rivers row,° — flow
And mony a hill between;
But day and night my fancy's flight
Is ever wi' my Jean.

I see her in the dewy flowers,
10 I see her sweet and fair;
I hear her in the tunefu' birds,
I hear her charm the air:
There's not a bonie flower that springs
By fountain, shaw,° or green, — wood

6. Written from Dumfriesshire to Burns's wife, Jean Armour, in Ayrshire, the county to the west. Airts: quarters.

15 There's not a bonie bird that sings,
But minds me o' my Jean.

Auld Lang Syne[7]

Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And never brought to mind?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And auld lang syne!

5 For auld lang syne, my jo,° — joy
For auld lang syne,
We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne.

And surely ye'll be° your pint stowp!° — pay for / pint cup
10 And surely I'll be mine!
And we'll tak a cup o' kindness yet,
For auld lang syne.

For auld lang syne, my jo, . . .

We twa hae run about the braes° — slopes
15 And pou'd the gowans° fine; — daisies
But we've wander'd many a weary fitt,
Sin auld lang syne.

For auld lang syne, my jo, . . .

We twa hae paidl'd in the burn° — stream
20 Frae morning sun till dine;° — dinner, noon
But seas between us braid° hae roar'd, — broad
Sin auld lang syne.

For auld lang syne, my jo, . . .

And there's a hand, my trusty fiere!° — friend
25 And gie's a hand o' thine!
And we'll tak a right gude-willie-waught,[8]
For auld lang syne

For auld lang syne, my jo, . . .

1788 1796

7. Old long since (Scottish), the days of long ago. 8. Good-will swig.

John Anderson My Jo

John Anderson my jo,° John, — joy
When we were first acquent;
Your locks were like the raven;
Your bonie brow was brent;[9]
5 But now your brow is beld, John,
Your locks are like the snow;
But blessings on your frosty pow,° — head
John Anderson my jo.

John Anderson my jo, John,
10 We clamb° the hill thegither; — climbed
And mony a canty° day, John, — merry
We've had wi' ane anither:
Now we maun totter down, John,
And hand in hand we'll go,
15 And sleep thegither at the foot,
John Anderson my jo.

Tam O'Shanter

Of Brownyis and of Bogillis full is this Buke.[1]
—Gavin Douglas

When chapman° billies° leave the street, — peddler / fellows
And drouthy° neebors neebors meet, — thirsty
As market-days are wearing late,
An' folk begin to tak the gate;° — road
5 While we sit bousing at the nappy,° — ale
An' getting fou° and unco° happy, — full / very
We think na on the lang Scots miles,
The mosses,° waters, slaps,° and styles, — bogs / gaps in walls
That lie between us and our hame,
10 Where sits our sulky sullen dame,
Gathering her brows like gathering storm,
Nursing her wrath to keep it warm.
This truth fand° honest Tam o' Shanter, — found
As he frae Ayr ae night did canter,
15 (Auld Ayr, wham ne'er a town surpasses
For honest men and bonie lasses).
O Tam! hadst thou but been sae wise,
As ta'en thy ain wife Kate's advice!
She tauld thee weel thou was a skellum,° — good-for-nothing
20 A blethering,° blustering, drunken blellum,° — babbling / windbag

9. Straight, steep; not rounding off into a bald pate.
1. From the prologue to the sixth book of Virgil's Aeneid, translated into Scots dialect by Gavin Douglas (1474–1522). Brownies are friendly goblins; bogles, unfriendly.

That frae November till October,
Ae market-day thou was nae sober;
That ilka° melder,° wi' the miller — every / meal-grinding
Thou sat as lang as thou had siller;° — silver
25 That every naig° was ca'd° a shoe on, — horse / driven
The smith and thee gat roaring fou on;
That at the Lord's house, even on Sunday,
Thou drank wi' Kirkton Jean[1] till Monday.
She prophesied that, late or soon,
30 Thou would be found deep drowned in Doon;
Or catched wi' warlocks° in the mirk,° — wizards / dark
By Alloway's auld haunted kirk.[2]
Ah, gentle dames! it gars° me greet° — makes / weep
To think how mony counsels sweet,
35 How mony lengthened sage advices,
The husband frae the wife despises!
But to our tale: Ae market night,
Tam had got planted unco right;
Fast by an ingle,° bleezing° finely, — fireplace / blazing
40 Wi' reaming° swats,° that drank divinely; — foaming / ale
And at his elbow, Souter° Johnny, — cobbler
His ancient, trusty, drouthy crony;
Tam lo'ed him like a vera brither;
They had been fou for weeks thegither.
45 The night drave on wi' sangs and clatter;° — talk
And aye the ale was growing better:
The landlady and Tam grew gracious,
Wi' favors, secret, sweet, and precious:
The souter tauld his queerest stories;
50 The landlord's laugh was ready chorus:
The storm without might rair° and rustle, — roar
Tam did na mind the storm a whistle.
Care, mad to see a man sae happy,
E'en drowned himsel amang the nappy;
55 As bees flee hame wi' lades° o' treasure, — loads
The minutes winged their way wi' pleasure;
Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious,
O'er a' the ills o' life victorious!
But pleasures are like poppies spread,
60 You seize the flow'r, its bloom is shed;
Or like the snow falls in the river,
A moment white—then melts for ever;
Or like the borealis race,
That flit ere you can point their place;
65 Or like the rainbow's lovely form
Evanishing amid the storm—
Nae man can tether time nor tide;
The hour approaches Tam maun° ride; — must
That hour, o' night's black arch the key-stane,° — keystone
70 That dreary hour, he mounts his beast in;

1. Mistress of a tavern.
2. The ruins of a church near Burns's home, the object of much superstitious dread.

And sic a night he taks the road in,
As ne'er poor sinner was abroad in.
The wind blew as 'twad° blawn its last; it would have
The rattling show'rs rose on the blast;
75 The speedy gleams the darkness swallowed;
Loud, deep, and lang, the thunder bellowed:
That night, a child might understand,
The Deil° had business on his hand. Devil
Weel mounted on his gray mare, Meg,
80 A better never lifted leg,
Tam skelpit° on thro' dub° and mire, hurried / puddle
Despising wind, and rain, and fire;
Whiles° holding fast his guid blue bonnet; sometimes
Whiles crooning° o'er some auld Scots sonnet;° humming / song
85 Whiles glow'ring° round wi' prudent cares, staring
Lest bogles catch him unawares.
Kirk-Alloway was drawing nigh,
Whare ghaists° and houlets° nightly cry. ghosts / owls
By this time he was cross the ford,
90 Where in the snaw the chapman smoored;° smothered
And past the birks° and meikle° stane,° birches / great / stone
Where drunken Charlie brak's neck-bane;
And thro' the whins,° and by the cairn, furze
Where hunters fand the murdered bairn;° child
95 And near the thorn, aboon° the well, above
Where Mungo's mither hanged hersel.
Before him Doon pours all his floods;
The doubling storm roars thro' the woods;
The lightnings flash from pole to pole;
100 Near and more near the thunders roll:
When, glimmering thro' the groaning trees,
Kirk-Alloway seemed in a bleeze;° blaze
Thro' ilka° bore° the beams were glancing; every / chink
And loud resounded mirth and dancing.
105 Inspiring bold John Barleycorn!
What dangers thou canst make us scorn!
Wi' tippenny,° we fear nae evil; twopenny ale
Wi' usquebae° we'll face the devil! whisky
The swats° sae reamed° in Tammie's noddle, ale / foamed
110 Fair play, he cared na deils a boddle.° farthing
But Maggie stood right sair° astonished, sorely
Till, by the heel and hand admonished,
She ventured forward on the light;
And, vow! Tam saw an unco sight!
115 Warlocks and witches in a dance;
Nae cotillon° brent° new frae France, dance / brand
But hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys,° and reels, Highland dances
Put life and mettle in their heels.
A winnock-bunker° in the east, window seat
120 There sat auld Nick, in shape o' beast;
A towzie° tyke,° black, grim, and large! tousled / dog
To gie them music was his charge:

He screwed the pipes and gart° them skirl,° made / shrill
Till roof and rafters a' did dirl.° ring
125 Coffins stood round like open presses,° closets
That shawed the dead in their last dresses;
And by some devilish cantraip° slight° weird / trick
Each in its cauld hand held a light,
By which heroic Tam was able
130 To note upon the haly table
A murderer's banes in gibbet-airns;° -irons
Twa span-lang,[3] wee, unchristened bairns;° children
A thief new-cutted frae a rape,° rope
Wi' his last gasp his gab° did gape; mouth
135 Five tomahawks, wi' blude red-rusted;
Five scymitars, wi' murder crusted;
A garter, which a babe had strangled;
A knife, a father's throat had mangled,
Whom his ain son o' life bereft,
140 The gray hairs yet stack to the heft;
Wi' mair of horrible and awfu',
Which even to name wad be unlawfu'.
As Tammie glowred,° amazed, and curious, stared
The mirth and fun grew fast and furious:
145 The piper loud and louder blew;
The dancers quick and quicker flew;
They reeled, they set, they crossed, they cleekit,° joined hands
Till ilka carlin° swat° and reekit,° old woman / sweated / steamed
And coost° her duddies° to the wark, cast off / dress
150 And linkit° at it in her sark!° tripped nimbly / shift
Now Tam, O Tam! had thae been queans,° girls
A' plump and strapping in their teens;
Their sarks, instead o' creeshie° flannen,° greasy / flannel
Been snaw-white seventeen hunder linen![4]
155 Thir° breeks o' mine, my only pair, these
That ance were plush, o' gude blue hair,
I wad hae gi'en them off my hurdies,° buttocks
For ae blink o' the bonie burdies!° maidens
But wither'd beldams,° auld and droll, old women
160 Rigwoodie° hags wad spean° a foal, scrawny / wean
Louping° and flinging on a crummock,° leaping / staff
I wonder didna turn thy stomach.
But Tam kend what was what fu' brawlie,° well
There was ae winsome wench and wawlie° buxom
165 That night enlisted in the core,° company
(Lang after kent° on Carrick shore known
For mony a beast to dead she shot,
And perished mony a bonie boat,
And shook baith meikle° corn and bear,° much / barley
170 And kept the country-side in fear).
Her cutty° sark, o' Paisley harn,° short / coarse cloth

3. Two spans long (a span is the distance from outstretched thumb to pinkie).

4. Fine linen, with seventeen hundred threads to a width.

That while a lassie she had worn,
In longitude tho' sorely scanty,
It was her best, and she was vauntie.° proud
175 Ah! little kend thy reverend grannie
That sark she coft° for her wee Nannie bought
Wi' twa pund Scots ('twas a' her riches)
Wad ever graced a dance of witches!
But here my Muse her wing maun cour;° stoop
180 Sic flights are far beyond her pow'r—
To sing how Nannie lap° and flang, leaped
(A souple jade she was, and strang),
And how Tam stood, like ane bewitched,
And thought his very een° enriched; eyes
185 Even Satan glowr'd, and fidged° fu' fain,° wriggled / happy
And hotched° and blew wi' might and main: hitched (himself)
Till first ae caper, syne° anither, then
Tam tint° his reason a' thegither, lost
And roars out, "Weel done, Cutty-sark!"
190 And in an instant all was dark!
And scarcely had he Maggie rallied,
When out the hellish legion sallied.
As bees bizz out wi' angry fyke,° fuss
When plundering herds° assail their byke;° shepherds / hive
195 As open° pussie's° mortal foes, bay / the hare's
When pop! she starts before their nose;
As eager runs the market-crowd,
When "Catch the thief!" resounds aloud;
So Maggie runs; the witches follow,
200 Wi' mony an eldritch° skriech and hollow. unearthly
Ah, Tam! ah, Tam! thou'll get thy fairin!° punishment
In hell they'll roast thee like a herrin!
In vain thy Kate awaits thy comin!
Kate soon will be a woefu' woman!
205 Now do thy speedy utmost, Meg,
And win the key-stane o' the brig;° bridge
There at them thou thy tail may toss,
A running stream they dare na cross.
But ere the key-stane she could make,
210 The fient a tail she had to shake![5]
For Nannie, far before the rest,
Hard upon noble Maggie prest,
And flew at Tam wi' furious ettle;° purpose
But little wist she Maggie's mettle.
215 Ae spring brought off her master hale,° whole
But left behind her ain gray tail:
The carlin claught° her by the rump, clutched
And left poor Maggie scarce a stump.
Now, wha this tale o' truth shall read,
220 Each man and mother's son, take heed:
Whene'er to drink you are inclined,
Or cutty-sarks run in your mind,

5. I.e., she had no tail left. Fient a: devil-a.

Think! ye may buy the joys o'er dear;
Remember Tam o' Shanter's mare.

The Banks o' Doon

Ye flowery banks o' bonie Doon,
How can ye blume sae fair;
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae fu' o' care!

5 Thou'll break my heart, thou bonie bird
That sings upon the bough;
Thou minds me o' the happy days
When my fause° luve was true. false

Thou'll break my heart, thou bonie bird,
10 That sings beside thy mate;
For sae I sat, and sae I sang,
And wist° na o' my fate. knew

Aft hae I rov'd by bonie Doon
To see the wood-bine twine,
15 And ilka° bird sang o' its love, every
And sae did I o' mine.

Wi' lightsome heart I pu'd a rose
Frae aff its thorny tree,
And my fause luver staw° the rose, stole
20 But left the thorn wi' me.

Wi' lightsome heart I pu'd a rose,
Upon a morn in June:
And sae I flourish'd on the morn,
And sae was pu'd or noon!

1791 1792

A Red Red Rose

O my luve's like a red, red rose,
That's newly sprung in June;
O my luve's like the melodie
That's sweetly played in tune.

5 As fair art thou, my bonie lass,
So deep in luve am I;

And I will luve thee still, my dear,
Till a' the seas gang dry.

Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
10 And the rocks melt wi' the sun:
O I will love thee still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.

And fare thee weel, my only luve!
And fare thee weel a while!
15 And I will come again, my luve,
Tho' it were ten thousand mile!

1796

Oh Wert Thou in the Cauld Blast

Oh wert thou in the cauld blast,
On yonder lea, on yonder lea;
My plaidie to the angry airt,° quarter (of the wind)
I'd shelter thee, I'd shelter thee:
5 Or did misfortune's bitter storms
Around thee blaw, around thee blaw,
Thy bield° should be my bosom, shelter
To share it a', to share it a'.

Or were I in the wildest waste,
10 Sae black and bare, sae black and bare,
The desart were a paradise,
If thou wert there, if thou wert there.
Or were I monarch o' the globe,
Wi' thee to reign, wi' thee to reign;
15 The brightest jewel in my crown,
Wad be my queen, wad be my queen.

JOANNA BAILLIE
1762–1851

A Mother to Her Waking Infant

Now in thy dazzling° half-oped eye, dazed
Thy curled nose and lip awry,
Thy up-hoist arms and noddling° head, nodding
And little chin with crystal spread,
5 Poor helpless thing! what do I see,
That I should sing of thee?

From thy poor tongue no accents come,
Which can but rub thy toothless gum;
Small understanding boasts thy face,
10 Thy shapeless limbs nor step nor grace;
A few short words thy feats may tell,
And yet I love thee well.

When sudden wakes the bitter shriek,
And redder swells thy little cheek;
15 When rattled keys thy woes beguile,
And through the wet eye gleams the smile,
Still for thy weakly self is spent
Thy little silly plaint.

But when thy friends are in distress,
20 Thou'lt laugh and chuckle ne'er the less;
Nor e'en with sympathy be smitten,
Though all are sad but thee and kitten;
Yet little varlet° that thou art, rascal
Thou twitchest at the heart.

25 Thy rosy cheek so soft and warm;
Thy pinky hand and dimpled arm;
Thy silken locks that scantly peep,
With gold-tipped ends, where circles deep
Around thy neck in harmless grace
30 So soft and sleekly hold their place,
Might harder hearts with kindness fill,
And gain our right good will.

Each passing clown bestows his blessing,
Thy mouth is worn with old wives' kissing:
35 E'en lighter looks the gloomy eye
Of surly sense, when thou art by;
And yet I think whoe'er they be,
They love thee not like me.

Perhaps when time shall add a few
40 Short years to thee, thou'lt love me too.
Then wilt thou through life's weary way
Become my sure and cheering stay:
Wilt care for me, and be my hold,
When I am weak and old.

45 Thou'lt listen to my lengthened tale,
And pity me when I am frail—
But see, the sweepy spinning fly
Upon the window takes thine eye.
Go to thy little senseless play—
50 Thou dost not heed my lay.° song

Song: Woo'd and Married and A'

The bride she is winsome and bonny,
Her hair it is snooded° sae sleek, bound up with a ribbon
And faithfu' and kind is her Johnny,
Yet fast fa' the tears on her cheek.
5 New pearlins° are cause of her sorrow, lace trimmings
New pearlins and plenishing° too, furnishings
The bride that has a' to borrow,
Has e'en right mickle° ado, much
Woo'd and married and a'!
10 Woo'd and married and a'!
Is na' she very weel aff
To be woo'd and married at a'?

Her mither then hastily spak,
"The lassie is glaikit° wi' pride; foolish
15 In my pouch I had never a plack° farthing
On the day when I was a bride.
E'en tak' to your wheel, and be clever,
And draw out your thread in the sun;
The gear° that is gifted,° it never goods, wealth / given
20 Will last like the gear that is won.° earned
Woo'd and married and a'!
Wi' havins° and toucher° sae sma', possessions / dowry
I think ye are very weel aff,
To be woo'd and married at a'!"

25 "Toot, toot!" quo' her gray-headed faither,
"She's less o' a bride than a bairn;° child
She's ta'en like a cout° frae the heather, colt
Wi' sense and discretion to learn.
Half husband, I trow, and half daddy,
30 As humor inconstantly leans,
The chiel° maun° be patient and steady, man / must
That yokes wi' a mate in her teens.
A kerchief sae douce° and sae neat, sedate; respectable
O'er her locks that the winds used to blaw!
35 I'm baith like to laugh and to greet,° weep
When I think o' her married at a'!"

Then out spak' the wily bridegroom;
Weel waled° were his wordies, I ween— chosen
"I'm rich, though my coffer be toom,° empty
40 Wi' the blinks o' your bonny blue een.° eyes
I'm prouder o' thee by my side,
Though thy ruffles or ribbons be few,
Than if Kate o' the Croft were my bride,
Wi' purfles° and pearlins enow. embroidered trimmings
45 Dear and dearest of ony!

Ye're woo'd and buikit[1] and a'!"
And do ye think scorn o' your Johnny,
And grieve to be married at a'?"

She turn'd, and she blush'd, and she smiled,
50 And she looket sae bashfully down;
The pride o' her heart was beguiled,
And she played wi' the sleeves o' her gown;
She twirled the tag o' her lace,
And she nippet her boddice sae blue,
55 Syne° blinket sae sweet in his face, then
And aff like a maukin° she flew. hare
Woo'd and married and a'!
Wi' Johnny to roose° her and a'! praise
She thinks hersel very weel aff,
60 To be woo'd and married at a'!

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH
1770–1850

Expostulation and Reply[1]

"Why, William, on that old gray stone,
Thus for the length of half a day,
Why, William, sit you thus alone,
And dream your time away?

5 "Where are your books?—that light bequeathed
To Beings else forlorn and blind!
Up! up! and drink the spirit breathed
From dead men to their kind.

"You look round on your Mother Earth,
10 As if she for no purpose bore you;
As if you were her first-born birth,
And none had lived before you!"

One morning thus, by Esthwaite lake,
When life was sweet, I knew not why,
15 To me my good friend Matthew spake,
And thus I made reply.

1. "Booked," i.e., officially registered as engaged in the book of the session clerk.
1. With the following, companion poem, "Expostulation and Reply" forms a dialogue between two friends, who advance somewhat exaggerated arguments about the relative merits of nature and of books.

"The eye—it cannot choose but see;
We cannot bid the ear be still;
Our bodies feel, where'er they be,
20 Against or with our will.

"Nor less I deem that there are Powers
Which of themselves our minds impress;
That we can feed this mind of ours
In a wise passiveness.

25 "Think you, 'mid all this mighty sum
Of things for ever speaking,
That nothing of itself will come,
But we must still be seeking?

"—Then ask not wherefore, here, alone,
30 Conversing[2] as I may,
I sit upon this old gray stone,
And dream my time away."

The Tables Turned

An Evening Scene on the Same Subject

Up! up! my Friend, and quit your books;
Or surely you'll grow double:
Up! up! my Friend, and clear your looks;
Why all this toil and trouble?

5 The sun, above the mountain's head,
A freshening lustre mellow
Through all the long green fields has spread,
His first sweet evening yellow.

Books! 'tis a dull and endless strife:
10 Come, hear the woodland linnet,° a songbird
How sweet his music! on my life,
There's more of wisdom in it.

And hark! how blithe the throstle° sings! song thrush
He, too, is no mean preacher:
15 Come forth into the light of things,
Let Nature be your Teacher.

She has a world of ready wealth,
Our minds and hearts to bless—
Spontaneous wisdom breathed by health,
20 Truth breathed by cheerfulness.

2. I.e., communing (with the "things for ever speaking").

One impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good,
Than all the sages can.

25 Sweet is the lore which Nature brings;
Our meddling intellect
Mis-shapes the beauteous forms of things:—
We murder to dissect.

Enough of Science and of Art;
30 Close up those barren leaves;
Come forth, and bring with you a heart
That watches and receives.

Lines

Composed a Few Miles above Tintern Abbey on Revisiting the Banks of the Wye during a Tour.[3] July 13, 1798

Five years have passed; five summers, with the length
Of five long winters! and again I hear
These waters, rolling from their mountain-springs
With a soft inland murmur. Once again
5 Do I behold these steep and lofty cliffs,
That on a wild secluded scene impress
Thoughts of more deep seclusion; and connect
The landscape with the quiet of the sky.
The day is come when I again repose
10 Here, under this dark sycamore, and view
These plots of cottage ground, these orchard tufts,
Which at this season, with their unripe fruits,
Are clad in one green hue, and lose themselves
'Mid groves and copses.° Once again I see — small woods
15 These hedgerows, hardly hedgerows, little lines
Of sportive wood run wild; these pastoral farms,
Green to the very door; and wreaths of smoke
Sent up, in silence, from among the trees!
With some uncertain notice, as might seem
20 Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods,
Or of some Hermit's cave, where by his fire
The Hermit sits alone.

These beauteous forms,
Through a long absence, have not been to me
As is a landscape to a blind man's eye;
25 But oft, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din

3. I.e., a walking trip (with his sister, Dorothy) through the Wye valley in Monmouthshire, the location of the ruins of a medieval abbey, noted for its scenery.

Of towns and cities, I have owed to them,
In hours of weariness, sensations sweet,
Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart;
And passing even into my purer mind,
30 With tranquil restoration—feelings too
Of unremembered pleasure; such, perhaps,
As have no slight or trivial influence
On that best portion of a good man's life,
His little, nameless, unremembered, acts
35 Of kindness and of love. Nor less, I trust,
To them I may have owed another gift,
Of aspect more sublime; that blessed mood,
In which the burthen° of the mystery, burden
In which the heavy and the weary weight
40 Of all this unintelligible world,
Is lightened—that serene and blessed mood,
In which the affections gently lead us on—
Until, the breath of this corporeal frame
And even the motion of our human blood
45 Almost suspended, we are laid asleep
In body, and become a living soul;
While with an eye made quiet by the power
Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,
We see into the life of things.

If this
50 Be but a vain belief, yet, oh! how oft—
In darkness and amid the many shapes
Of joyless daylight; when the fretful stir
Unprofitable, and the fever of the world,
Have hung upon the beatings of my heart—
55 How oft, in spirit, have I turned to thee,
O sylvan° Wye! thou wanderer through the woods, wooded
How often has my spirit turned to thee!

And now, with gleams of half-extinguished thought,
With many recognitions dim and faint,
60 And somewhat of a sad perplexity,
The picture of the mind revives again;
While here I stand, not only with the sense
Of present pleasure, but with pleasing thoughts
That in this moment there is life and food
65 For future years. And so I dare to hope,
Though changed, no doubt, from what I was when first
I came among these hills; when like a roe
I bounded o'er the mountains, by the sides
Of the deep rivers, and the lonely streams,
70 Wherever nature led—more like a man
Flying from something that he dreads than one
Who sought the thing he loved. For nature then
(The coarser[4] pleasures of my boyish days,

4. I.e., primarily physical.

And their glad animal movements all gone by)
75 To me was all in all.—I cannot paint
What then I was. The sounding cataract° waterfall
Haunted me like a passion; the tall rock,
The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood,
Their colors and their forms, were then to me
80 An appetite; a feeling and a love,
That had no need of a remoter charm,
By thought supplied, nor any interest
Unborrowed from the eye.—That time is past,
And all its aching joys are now no more,
85 And all its dizzy raptures. Not for this
Faint° I, nor mourn nor murmur; other gifts become discouraged
Have followed; for such loss, I would believe,
Abundant recompense. For I have learned
To look on nature, not as in the hour
90 Of thoughtless youth; but hearing oftentimes
The still, sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh nor grating, though of ample power
To chasten and subdue. And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
95 Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man:
100 A motion and a spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still
A lover of the meadows and the woods,
And mountains; and of all that we behold
105 From this green earth; of all the mighty world
Of eye, and ear—both what they half create,
And what perceive; well pleased to recognize
In nature and the language of the sense
The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,
110 The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
Of all my moral being.

Nor perchance,
If I were not thus taught, should I the more
Suffer my genial° spirits° to decay: creative / powers
For thou art with me here upon the banks
115 Of this fair river; thou my dearest Friend,[5]
My dear, dear Friend; and in thy voice I catch
The language of my former heart, and read
My former pleasures in the shooting lights
Of thy wild eyes. Oh! yet a little while
120 May I behold in thee what I was once,
My dear, dear Sister! and this prayer I make,
Knowing that Nature never did betray

5. His sister, Dorothy.

The heart that loved her; 'tis her privilege,
Through all the years of this our life, to lead
125 From joy to joy: for she can so inform
The mind that is within us, so impress
With quietness and beauty, and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men,
130 Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all
The dreary intercourse of daily life,
Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith, that all which we behold
Is full of blessings. Therefore let the moon
135 Shine on thee in thy solitary walk;
And let the misty mountain winds be free
To blow against thee: and, in after years,
When these wild ecstasies shall be matured
Into a sober pleasure; when thy mind
140 Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms,
Thy memory be as a dwelling place
For all sweet sounds and harmonies; oh! then,
If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief
Should be thy portion, with what healing thoughts
145 Of tender joy wilt thou remember me,
And these my exhortations! Nor, perchance—
If I should be where I no more can hear
Thy voice, nor catch from thy wild eyes these gleams
Of past existence—wilt thou then forget
150 That on the banks of this delightful stream
We stood together; and that I, so long
A worshiper of Nature, hither came
Unwearied in that service; rather say
With warmer love—oh! with far deeper zeal
155 Of holier love. Nor wilt thou then forget,
That after many wanderings, many years
Of absence, these steep woods and lofty cliffs,
And this green pastoral landscape, were to me
More dear, both for themselves and for thy sake!

The Ruined Cottage[6]

First Part

'Twas Summer and the sun was mounted high.
Along the south the uplands feebly glared
Through a pale steam, and all the northern downs,
In clearer air ascending, showed far off
5 Their surfaces with shadows dappled o'er
Of deep embattled clouds. Far as the sight

6. A shorter version of a narrative that comprised the first book of The Excursion (1814). First published by Jonathan Wordsworth in The Music of Humanity (1969).

Could reach those many shadows lay in spots
Determined° and unmoved, with steady beams exactly fixed
Of clear and pleasant sunshine interposed—
10 Pleasant to him who on the soft cool grass
Extends his careless limbs beside the root
Of some huge oak whose agèd branches make
A twilight of their own, a dewy shade
Where the wren warbles while the dreaming man,
15 Half conscious of that soothing melody,
With sidelong eye looks out upon the scene,
By those impending branches made more soft,
More soft and distant.

Other lot was mine.
Across a bare wide Common I had toiled
20 With languid feet which by the slippery ground
Were baffled still, and when I stretched myself
On the brown earth my limbs from very heat
Could find no rest, nor my weak arm disperse
The insect host which gathered round my face
25 And joined their murmurs to the tedious noise
Of seeds of bursting gorse that crackled round.
I rose and turned towards a group of trees
Which midway in that level stood alone;
And thither come at length, beneath a shade
30 Of clustering elms that sprang from the same root
I found a ruined house, four naked walls
That stared upon each other. I looked round
And near the door I saw an agèd Man,
Alone and stretched upon the cottage bench,
35 An iron-pointed staff lay at his side.
With instantaneous joy I recognized
That pride of nature and of lowly life,
The venerable Armytage, a friend
As dear to me as is the setting sun.

Two days before
40 We had been fellow travelers. I knew
That he was in this neighborhood, and now
Delighted found him here in the cool shade.
He lay, his pack of rustic merchandise
Pillowing his head. I guess he had no thought
45 Of his way-wandering life. His eyes were shut,
The shadows of the breezy elms above
Dappled his face. With thirsty heat oppressed
At length I hailed him, glad to see his hat
Bedewed with waterdrops, as if the brim
50 Had newly scooped a running stream. He rose
And pointing to a sunflower, bade me climb
The [ ][7] wall where that same gaudy flower
Looked out upon the road.

7. Blank space in the manuscript.

It was a plot
Of garden ground now wild, its matted weeds
55 Marked with the steps of those whom as they passed,
The gooseberry trees that shot in long lank slips,
Or currants hanging from their leafless stems
In scanty strings, had tempted to o'erleap
The broken wall. Within that cheerless spot,
60 Where two tall hedgerows of thick alder boughs
Joined in a damp cold nook, I found a well
Half covered up with willow flowers and grass.
I slaked my thirst and to the shady bench
Returned, and while I stood unbonneted
65 To catch the motion of the cooler air,
The old Man said, "I see around me here
Things which you cannot see. We die, my Friend,
Nor we alone, but that which each man loved
And prized in his peculiar nook of earth
70 Dies with him, or is changed, and very soon
Even of the good is no memorial left.
The Poets, in their elegies and songs
Lamenting the departed, call the groves,
They call upon the hills and streams to mourn,
75 And senseless rocks—nor idly, for they speak
In these their invocations with a voice
Obedient to the strong creative power
Of human passion. Sympathies there are
More tranquil, yet perhaps of kindred birth,
80 That steal upon the meditative mind
And grow with thought. Beside yon spring I stood,
And eyed its waters till we seemed to feel
One sadness, they and I. For them a bond
Of brotherhood is broken; time has been
85 When every day the touch of human hand
Disturbed their stillness, and they ministered
To human comfort. When I stopped to drink
A spider's web hung to the water's edge,
And on the wet and slimy footstone lay
90 The useless fragment of a wooden bowl.
It moved my very heart.

"The day has been
When I could never pass this road but she
Who lived within these walls, when I appeared,
A daughter's welcome gave me, and I loved her
95 As my own child. Oh Sir, the good die first,
And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust
Burn to the socket. Many a passenger
Has blessed poor Margaret for her gentle looks
When she upheld the cool refreshment drawn
100 From that forsaken spring, and no one came
But he was welcome, no one went away
But that it seemed she loved him. She is dead,

The worm is on her cheek, and this poor hut,
Stripped of its outward garb of household flowers,
105 Of rose and sweetbriar, offers to the wind
A cold bare wall whose earthy top is tricked
With weeds and the rank spear grass. She is dead,
And nettles rot and adders sun themselves
Where we have sate together while she nursed
110 Her infant at her breast. The unshod colt,
The wandring heifer and the Potter's ass,
Find shelter now within the chimney wall
Where I have seen her evening hearthstone blaze
And through the window spread upon the road
115 Its cheerful light. You will forgive me, sir,
But often on this cottage do I muse
As on a picture, till my wiser mind
Sinks, yielding to the foolishness of grief.

"She had a husband, an industrious man,
120 Sober and steady. I have heard her say
That he was up and busy at his loom
In summer ere the mower's scythe had swept
The dewy grass, and in the early spring
Ere the last star had vanished. They who passed
125 At evening, from behind the garden fence
Might hear his busy spade, which he would ply
After his daily work till the daylight
Was gone, and every leaf and flower were lost
In the dark hedges. So they passed their days
130 In peace and comfort, and two pretty babes
Were their best hope next to the God in Heaven.

"You may remember, now some ten years gone,
Two blighting seasons when the fields were left
With half a harvest. It pleased heaven to add
135 A worse affliction in the plague of war,
A happy land was stricken to the heart,
'Twas a sad time of sorrow and distress.
A wanderer among the cottages,
I with my pack of winter raiment saw
140 The hardships of that season. Many rich
Sunk down as in a dream among the poor,
And of the poor did many cease to be,
And their place knew them not. Meanwhile, abridged
Of daily comforts, gladly reconciled
145 To numerous self-denials, Margaret
Went struggling on through those calamitous years
With cheerful hope. But ere the second autumn
A fever seized her husband. In disease
He lingered long, and when his strength returned
150 He found the little he had stored to meet
The hour of accident, or crippling age,
Was all consumed. As I have said, 'twas now

A time of trouble: shoals of artisans
Were from their daily labor turned away
155 To hang for bread on parish charity,
They and their wives and children, happier far
Could they have lived as do the little birds
That peck along the hedges, or the kite
That makes her dwelling in the mountain rocks.

160 "Ill fared it now with Robert, he who dwelt
In this poor cottage. At his door he stood
And whistled many a snatch of merry tunes
That had no mirth in them, or with his knife
Carved uncouth figures on the heads of sticks.
165 Then idly sought about through every nook
Of house or garden any casual task
Of use or ornament, and with a strange
Amusing but uneasy novelty
He blended where he might the various tasks
170 Of summer, autumn, winter, and of spring.
But this endured not, his good humor soon
Became a weight in which no pleasure was,
And poverty brought on a petted° mood irritable
And a sore temper. Day by day he drooped.
175 And he would leave his home, and to the town
Without an errand would he turn his steps,
Or wander here and there among the fields.
One while he would speak lightly of his babes
And with a cruel tongue, at other times
180 He played with them wild freaks of merriment.
And 'twas a piteous thing to see the looks
Of the poor innocent children. 'Every smile,'
Said Margaret to me here beneath these trees,
'Made my heart bleed.' "

At this the old Man paused
185 And looking up to those enormous elms
He said, " 'Tis now the hour of deepest noon.
At this still season of repose and peace,
This hour when all things which are not at rest
Are cheerful, while this multitude of flies
190 Fills all the air with happy melody,
Why should a tear be in an old man's eye?
Why should we thus with an untoward mind,
And in the weakness of humanity,
From natural wisdom turn our hearts away.
195 To natural comfort shut our eyes and ears.
And, feeding on disquiet, thus disturb
The calm of Nature with our restless thoughts?"

END OF THE FIRST PART

Second Part

He spake with somewhat of a solemn tone,
But when he ended there was in his face
200 Such easy cheerfulness, a look so mild,
That for a little time it stole away
All recollection, and that simple tale
Passed from my mind like a forgotten sound.
A while on trivial things we held discourse
205 To me soon tasteless. In my own despite
I thought of that poor woman as of one
Whom I had known and loved. He had rehearsed
Her homely tale with such familiar power,
With such an active countenance, an eye
210 So busy, that the things of which he spake
Seemed present, and, attention now relaxed,
There was a heartfelt chillness in my veins.
I rose, and turning from that breezy shade
Went out into the open air, and stood
215 To drink the comfort of the warmer sun.
Long time I had not stayed ere, looking round
Upon that tranquil ruin, I returned
And begged of the old man that for my sake
He would resume his story.

He replied,
220 "It were a wantonness, and would demand
Severe reproof, if we were men whose hearts
Could hold vain dalliance with the misery
Even of the dead, contented thence to draw
A momentary pleasure, never marked
225 By reason, barren of all future good.
But we have known that there is often found
In mournful thoughts, and always might be found,
A power to virtue friendly; were't not so
I am a dreamer among men, indeed
230 An idle dreamer. 'Tis a common tale
By moving accidents[8] uncharactered,
A tale of silent suffering, hardly clothed
In bodily form, and to the grosser sense
But ill adapted, scarcely palpable
235 To him who does not think. But at your bidding
I will proceed.

"While thus it fared with them
To whom this cottage till that hapless year
Had been a blessed home, it was my chance
To travel in a country far remote;
240 And glad I was when, halting by yon gate
That leads from the green lane, again I saw

8. High adventures. Shakespeare's Othello speaks "of moving accidents by flood and field" (1.3.134).

These lofty elm trees. Long I did not rest:
With many pleasant thoughts I cheered my way
O'er the flat common. At the door arrived,
245 I knocked, and when I entered, with the hope
Of usual greeting, Margaret looked at me
A little while, then turned her head away
Speechless, and sitting down upon a chair
Wept bitterly. I wist not what to do,
250 Or how to speak to her. Poor wretch, at last
She rose from off her seat, and then, oh Sir,
I cannot tell how she pronounced my name.
With fervent love, and with a face of grief
Unutterably helpless, and a look
255 That seemed to cling upon me, she enquired
If I had seen her husband. As she spake
A strange surprise and fear came to my heart,
Nor had I power to answer ere she told
That he had disappeared—just two months gone.
260 He left his house: two wretched days had passed,
And on the third by the first break of light,
Within her casement full in view she saw
A purse of gold.[9] 'I trembled at the sight,'
Said Margaret, 'for I knew it was his hand
265 That placed it there. And on that very day
By one, a stranger, from my husband sent,
The tidings came that he had joined a troop
Of soldiers going to a distant land.
He left me thus. Poor Man, he had not heart
270 To take farewell of me, and he feared
That I should follow with my babes, and sink
Beneath the misery of a soldier's life.'

"This tale did Margaret tell with many tears,
And when she ended I had little power
275 To give her comfort, and was glad to take
Such words of hope from her own mouth as served
To cheer us both. But long we had not talked
Ere we built up a pile of better thoughts,
And with a brighter eye she looked around,
280 As if she had been shedding tears of joy.
We parted. It was then the early spring:
I left her busy with her garden tools,
And well remember, o'er that fence she looked,
And, while I paced along the footway path,
285 Called out and sent a blessing after me,
With tender cheerfulness, and with a voice
That seemed the very sound of happy thoughts.

"I roved o'er many a hill and many a dale
With this my weary load, in heat and cold,
290 Through many a wood and many an open ground,

9. The payment her husband had received for enlisting.

In sunshine or in shade, in wet or fair,
Now blithe, now drooping, as it might befall;
My best companions now the driving winds
And now the 'trotting brooks'[1] and whispering trees,
295 And now the music of my own sad steps,
With many a short-lived thought that passed between
And disappeared.

"I came this way again
Towards the wane of summer, when the wheat
Was yellow, and the soft and bladed grass
300 Sprang up afresh and o'er the hay field spread
Its tender green. When I had reached the door
I found that she was absent. In the shade,
Where we now sit, I waited her return.
Her cottage in its outward look appeared
305 As cheerful as before, in any show
Of neatness little changed, but that I thought
The honeysuckle crowded round the door,
And from the wall hung down in heavier tufts,
And knots of worthless stonecrop started out
310 Along the window's edge, and grew like weeds
Against the lower panes. I turned aside
And strolled into her garden. It was changed.
The unprofitable bindweed spread his bells
From side to side, and with unwieldy wreaths
315 Had dragged the rose from its sustaining wall
And bent it down to earth. The border tufts,
Daisy, and thrift, and lowly camomile,
And thyme, had straggled out into the paths
Which they were used to deck.

"Ere this an hour
320 Was wasted. Back I turned my restless steps,
And as I walked before the door it chanced
A stranger passed, and guessing whom I sought,
He said that she was used to ramble far.
The sun was sinking in the west, and now
325 I sate with sad impatience. From within
Her solitary infant cried aloud.
The spot though fair seemed very desolate,
The longer I remained more desolate;
And looking round I saw the cornerstones,
330 Till then unmarked, on either side the door
With dull red stains discolored, and stuck o'er
With tufts and hairs of wool, as if the sheep
That feed upon the commons thither came
Familiarly, and found a couching place
Even at her threshold.

1. Slightly misquoted ("trotting burns") from Robert Burns's "Epistle to William Simpson," a poem in praise of natural feelings.

335 "The house clock struck eight:
I turned and saw her distant a few steps.
Her face was pale and thin, her figure too
Was changed. As she unlocked the door she said,
'It grieves me you have waited here so long,
340 But in good truth I've wandered much of late,
And sometimes, to my shame I speak, have need
Of my best prayers to bring me back again.'
While on the board she spread our evening meal,
She told me she had lost her elder child,
345 That he for months had been a serving boy,
Apprenticed by the parish. 'I perceive
You look at me, and you have cause. Today
I have been traveling far, and many days
About the fields I wander, knowing this 350 Only, that what I seek I cannot find.
And so I waste my time: for I am changed,
And to myself,' she said, 'have done much wrong,
And to this helpless infant. I have slept
Weeping, and weeping I have waked. My tears
355 Have flowed as if my body were not such
As others are, and I could never die.
But I am now in mind and in my heart
More easy, and I hope,' she said, 'that heaven
Will give me patience to endure the things
Which I behold at home.'

360 "It would have grieved
Your very soul to see her. Sir, I feel
The story linger in my heart. I fear
'Tis long and tedious, but my spirit clings
To that poor woman. So familiarly
365 Do I perceive her manner and her look
And presence, and so deeply do I feel
Her goodness, that not seldom in my walks
A momentary trance comes over me,
And to myself I seem to muse on one
370 By sorrow laid asleep or borne away,
A human being destined to awake
To human life, or something very near
To human life, when he shall come again
For whom she suffered. Sir, it would have grieved
375 Your very soul to see her: evermore
Her eyelids drooped, her eyes were downward cast,
And when she at her table gave me food
She did not look at me. Her voice was low,
Her body was subdued. In every act
380 Pertaining to her house affairs appeared
The careless stillness which a thinking mind
Gives to an idle matter. Still she sighed,
But yet no motion of the breast was seen,
No heaving of the heart. While by the fire

385 We sate together, sighs came on my ear,
I knew not how, and hardly whence they came.
I took my staff, and when I kissed her babe
The tears stood in her eyes. I left her then
With the best hope and comfort I could give:
390 She thanked me for my will, but for my hope
It seemed she did not thank me.

"I returned
And took my rounds along this road again
Ere on its sunny bank the primrose flower
Had chronicled the earliest day of spring.
395 I found her sad and drooping. She had learned
No tidings of her husband; if he lived,
She knew not that he lived; if he were dead,
She knew not he was dead. She seemed the same
In person or appearance, but her house
400 Bespoke a sleepy hand of negligence.
The floor was neither dry nor neat, the hearth
Was comfortless,
The windows too were dim, and her few books,
Which one upon the other heretofore
405 Had been piled up against the corner panes
In seemly order, now with straggling leaves
Lay scattered here and there, open or shut,
As they had chanced to fall. Her infant babe
Had from its mother caught the trick of grief,
410 And sighed among its playthings. Once again
I turned towards the garden gate, and saw
More plainly still that poverty and grief
Were now come nearer to her. The earth was hard,
With weeds defaced and knots of withered grass;
415 No ridges there appeared of clear black mold,
No winter greenness. Of her herbs and flowers
It seemed the better part were gnawed away
Or trampled on the earth. A chain of straw,
Which had been twisted round the tender stem
420 Of a young apple tree, lay at its root;
The bark was nibbled round by truant sheep.
Margaret stood near, her infant in her arms,
And, seeing that my eye was on the tree,
She said, 'I fear it will be dead and gone
Ere Robert come again.'

425 "Towards the house
Together we returned, and she enquired
If I had any hope. But for her Babe,
And for her little friendless Boy, she said,
She had no wish to live—that she must die
430 Of sorrow. Yet I saw the idle loom
Still in its place. His Sunday garments hung
Upon the selfsame nail, his very staff

Stood undisturbed behind the door. And when
I passed this way beaten by Autumn winds,
435 She told me that her little babe was dead,
And she was left alone. That very time,
I yet remember, through the miry lane
She walked with me a mile, when the bare trees
Trickled with foggy damps, and in such sort
440 That any heart had ached to hear her, begged
That wheresoe'r I went I still would ask
For him whom she had lost. We parted then,
Our final parting; for from that time forth
Did many seasons pass ere I returned
Into this tract again.

445 "Five tedious years
She lingered in unquiet widowhood,
A wife and widow. Needs must it have been
A sore heart-wasting. I have heard, my friend,
That in that broken arbor she would sit
450 The idle length of half a sabbath day;
There, where you see the toadstool's lazy head;
And when a dog passed by she still would quit
The shade and look abroad. On this old Bench
For hours she sate, and evermore her eye
455 Was busy in the distance, shaping things
Which made her heart beat quick. Seest thou that path?
The green sward° now has broken its gray line— grassy land
There to and fro she paced through many a day
Of the warm summer, from a belt of flax
460 That girt her waist, spinning the long-drawn thread
With backward steps. Yet ever as there passed
A man whose garments showed the Soldier's red,
Or crippled Mendicant in Sailor's garb,
The little child who sate to turn the wheel
465 Ceased from his toil, and she, with faltering voice,
Expecting still to hear her husband's fate,
Made many a fond enquiry; and when they
Whose presence gave no comfort, were gone by,
Her heart was still more sad. And by yon gate,
470 Which bars the traveler's road, she often stood,
And when a stranger horseman came, the latch
Would lift, and in his face look wistfully,
Most happy if from aught discovered there
Of tender feeling she might dare repeat
The same sad question.

475 "Meanwhile her poor hut
Sunk to decay; for he was gone, whose hand
At the first nippings of October frost
Closed up each chink, and with fresh bands of straw
Chequered the green-grown thatch. And so she lived
480 Through the long winter, reckless° and alone, not caring for herself

Till this reft° house, by frost, and thaw, and rain, emptied
Was sapped; and when she slept, the nightly damps
Did chill her breast, and in the stormy day
Her tattered clothes were ruffled by the wind
485 Even at the side of her own fire. Yet still
She loved this wretched spot, nor would for worlds
Have parted hence; and still that length of road,
And this rude° bench, one torturing hope endeared, roughly made
Fast rooted at her heart. And here, my friend,
490 In sickness she remained; and here she died,
Last human tenant of these ruined walls."

The old Man ceased: he saw that I was moved.
From that low bench rising instinctively,
I turned aside in weakness, nor had power
495 To thank him for the tale which he had told.
I stood, and leaning o'er the garden gate
Reviewed that Woman's sufferings; and it seemed
To comfort me while with a brother's love
I blessed her in the impotence of grief.
500 At length towards the cottage I returned
Fondly, and traced with milder interest,
That secret spirit of humanity
Which, 'mid the calm oblivious tendencies
Of nature, 'mid her plants, her weeds and flowers,
505 And silent overgrowings, still survived.
The old man seeing this resumed, and said,
"My friend, enough to sorrow have you given,
The purposes of Wisdom ask no more:
Be wise and cheerful, and no longer read
510 The forms of things with an unworthy eye.
She sleeps in the calm earth, and peace is here.
I well remember that those very plumes,
Those weeds, and the high spear grass on that wall,
By mist and silent raindrops silvered o'er,
515 As once I passed, did to my mind convey
So still an image of tranquility,
So calm and still, and looked so beautiful
Amid the uneasy thoughts which filled my mind,
That what we feel of sorrow and despair
520 From ruin and from change, and all the grief
The passing shows of being leave behind,
Appeared an idle dream that could not live
Where meditation was. I turned away,
And walked along my road in happiness."

525 He ceased. By this the sun declining shot
A slant and mellow radiance, which began
To fall upon us where beneath the trees
We sate on that low bench. And now we felt,
Admonished thus, the sweet hour coming on:
530 A linnet warbled from those lofty elms,

A thrush sang loud, and other melodies
At distance heard, peopled the milder air.
The old man rose and hoisted up his load.
Together casting then a farewell look
535 Upon those silent walls, we left the shade;
And, ere the stars were visible, attained
A rustic inn, our evening resting place.

Anecdote for Fathers

"Retine vim istam, falsa enim dicam, si coges."
EUSEBIUS.[2]

I have a boy of five years old;
His face is fair and fresh to see;
His limbs are cast in beauty's mold,
And dearly he loves me.

5 One morn we strolled on our dry walk,
Our quiet home all full in view,
And held such intermitted talk
As we are wont to do.

My thoughts on former pleasures ran;
10 I thought of Kilve's[3] delightful shore,
Our pleasant home when spring began,
A long, long year before.

A day it was when I could bear
Some fond regrets to entertain;
15 With so much happiness to spare,
I could not feel a pain.

The green earth echoed to the feet
Of lambs that bounded through the glade,
From shade to sunshine, and as fleet
20 From sunshine back to shade.

Birds warbled round me—and each trace
Of inward sadness had its charm;
Kilve, thought I, was a favored place,
And so is Liswyn farm.

25 My boy beside me tripped, so slim
And graceful in his rustic dress!

2. Latin translation by Eusebius (Preparatio Evangelica 6.5) of a Greek line from Porphyro that purports to be the warning of Apollo (Greek and Roman god of sunlight, prophecy, music, and poetry) to any who would try to coerce the oracle: "Restrain your violence, for I shall lie if you force me."
3. Village on the Bristol Channel.

And, as we talked, I questioned him,
In very idleness.

"Now tell me, had you rather be,"
30 I said, and took him by the arm,
"On Kilve's smooth shore, by the green sea,
Or here at Liswyn farm?"

In careless mood he looked at me,
While still I held him by the arm,
35 And said, "At Kilve I'd rather be Than here at Liswyn farm."

"Now, little Edward, say why so:
My little Edward, tell me why."—
"I cannot tell, I do not know."—
40 "Why, this is strange," said I;

"For, here are woods, hills smooth and warm:
There surely must some reason be
Why you would change sweet Liswyn farm
For Kilve by the green sea."

45 At this, my boy hung down his head,
He blushed with shame, nor made reply;
And three times to the child I said,
"Why, Edward, tell me why?"

His head he raised—there was in sight,
50 It caught his eye, he saw it plain—
Upon the house-top, glittering bright,
A broad and gilded vane.

Then did the boy his tongue unlock,
And eased his mind with this reply:
55 "At Kilve there was no weather-cock;
And that's the reason why."

O dearest, dearest boy! my heart
For better lore would seldom yearn,
Could I but teach the hundredth part
60 Of what from thee I learn.

From The Prelude

From Book I

Fair seedtime had my soul, and I grew up
Fostered alike by beauty and by fear:
Much favored in my birthplace,[4] and no less

4. Cockermouth, a town in the northern part of the English Lake District.

In that belovèd Vale[5] to which erelong
305 We were transplanted—there were we let loose
For sports of wider range. Ere I had told
Ten birthdays, when among the mountain slopes
Frost, and the breath of frosty wind, had snapped
The last autumnal crocus, 'twas my joy
310 With store of springes° o'er my shoulder hung snares
To range the open heights where woodcocks run
Along the smooth green turf. Through half the night,
Scudding away from snare to snare, I plied
That anxious visitation—moon and stars
315 Were shining o'er my head. I was alone,
And seemed to be a trouble to the peace
That dwelt among them. Sometimes it befell
In these night wanderings, that a strong desire
O'erpowered my better reason, and the bird
320 Which was the captive of another's toil
Became my prey; and when the deed was done
I heard among the solitary hills
Low breathings coming after me, and sounds
Of undistinguishable motion, steps
325 Almost as silent as the turf they trod.

Nor less, when spring had warmed the cultured° Vale, cultivated
Moved we as plunderers where the mother bird
Had in high places built her lodge; though mean
Our object and inglorious, yet the end
330 Was not ignoble. Oh! when I have hung
Above the raven's nest, by knots of grass
And half-inch fissures in the slippery rock
But ill sustained, and almost (so it seemed)
Suspended by the blast that blew amain,° at full speed
335 Shouldering the naked crag, oh, at that time
While on the perilous ridge I hung alone,
With what strange utterance did the loud dry wind
Blow through my ear! the sky seemed not a sky
Of earth—and with what motion moved the clouds!

340 Dust as we are, the immortal spirit grows
Like harmony in music; there is a dark
Inscrutable workmanship that reconciles
Discordant elements, makes them cling together
In one society. How strange that all
345 The terrors, pains, and early miseries,
Regrets, vexations, lassitudes interfused
Within my mind, should e'er have borne a part,
And that a needful part, in making up
The calm existence that is mine when I
350 Am worthy of myself! Praise to the end!
Thanks to the means which Nature deigned to employ;
Whether her fearless visitings, or those

5. Esthwaite, also in the Lakes.

That came with soft alarm, like hurtless light
Opening the peaceful clouds; or she may use
355 Severer interventions, ministry
More palpable, as best might suit her aim.

One summer evening (led by her) I found
A little boat tied to a willow tree
Within a rocky cave, its usual home.
360 Straight I unloosed her chain, and stepping in Pushed from the shore. It was an act of stealth
And troubled pleasure, nor without the voice
Of mountain echoes did my boat move on;
Leaving behind her still, on either side,
365 Small circles glittering idly in the moon,
Until they melted all into one track
Of sparkling light. But now, like one who rows,
Proud of his skill, to reach a chosen point
With an unswerving line, I fixed my view
370 Upon the summit of a craggy ridge,
The horizon's utmost boundary; for above
Was nothing but the stars and the gray sky.
She was an elfin pinnace;° lustily small boat
I dipped my oars into the silent lake,
375 And, as I rose upon the stroke, my boat
Went heaving through the water like a swan;
When, from behind that craggy steep till then
The horizon's bound, a huge peak, black and huge,
As if with voluntary power instinct,
380 Upreared its head. I struck and struck again,
And growing still in stature the grim shape
Towered up between me and the stars, and still,
For so it seemed, with purpose of its own
And measured motion like a living thing,
385 Strode after me. With trembling oars I turned,
And through the silent water stole my way
Back to the covert of the willow tree;
There in her mooring place I left my bark,
And through the meadows homeward went, in grave
390 And serious mood; but after I had seen
That spectacle, for many days, my brain
Worked with a dim and undetermined sense
Of unknown modes of being; o'er my thoughts
There hung a darkness, call it solitude
395 Or blank desertion. No familiar shapes
Remained, no pleasant images of trees,
Of sea or sky, no colors of green fields;
But huge and mighty forms, that do not live
Like living men, moved slowly through the mind
400 By day, and were a trouble to my dreams.

Wisdom and Spirit of the universe!
Thou Soul that art the eternity of thought,

That givest to forms and images a breath
And everlasting motion, not in vain
405 By day or starlight thus from my first dawn
Of childhood didst thou intertwine for me
The passions that build up our human soul;
Not with the mean and vulgar° works of man, commonplace
But with high objects, with enduring things—
410 With life and nature—purifying thus
The elements of feeling and of thought,
And sanctifying, by such discipline,
Both pain and fear, until we recognize
A grandeur in the beating of the heart.
415 Nor was this fellowship vouchsafed to me
With stinted kindness. In November days,
When vapors rolling down the valley made
A lonely scene more lonesome, among woods,
At noon and 'mid the calm of summer nights,
420 When, by the margin of the trembling lake,
Beneath the gloomy hills homeward I went
In solitude, such intercourse was mine;
Mine was it in the fields both day and night,
And by the waters, all the summer long.

425 And in the frosty season, when the sun
Was set, and visible for many a mile
The cottage windows blazed through twilight gloom,
I heeded not their summons: happy time
It was indeed for all of us—for me
430 It was a time of rapture! Clear and loud
The village clock tolled six—I wheeled about,
Proud and exulting like an untired horse
That cares not for his home. All shod with steel,
We hissed along the polished ice in games
435 Confederate, imitative of the chase
And woodland pleasures—the resounding horn,
The pack loud chiming, and the hunted hare.
So through the darkness and the cold we flew,
And not a voice was idle; with the din
440 Smitten, the precipices rang aloud;
The leafless trees and every icy crag
Tinkled like iron; while far distant hills
Into the tumult sent an alien sound
Of melancholy not unnoticed, while the stars
445 Eastward were sparkling clear, and in the west
The orange sky of evening died away.
Not seldom from the uproar I retired
Into a silent bay, or sportively
Glanced sideway, leaving the tumultuous throng,
450 To cut across the reflex° of a star reflection
That fled, and, flying still before me, gleamed
Upon the glassy plain; and oftentimes,
When we had given our bodies to the wind,

And all the shadowy banks on either side
455 Came sweeping through the darkness, spinning still
The rapid line of motion, then at once
Have I, reclining back upon my heels,
Stopped short; yet still the solitary cliffs
Wheeled by me—even as if the earth had rolled
460 With visible motion her diurnal° round! daily
Behind me did they stretch in solemn train,° succession
Feebler and feebler, and I stood and watched
Till all was tranquil as a dreamless sleep.

Ye Presences of Nature in the sky
465 And on the earth! Ye Visions of the hills!
And Souls of lonely places! can I think
A vulgar hope was yours when ye employed
Such ministry, when ye, through many a year
Haunting me thus among my boyish sports,
470 On caves and trees, upon the woods and hills,
Impressed upon all forms the characters° signs
Of danger or desire; and thus did make
The surface of the universal earth
With triumph and delight, with hope and fear,
Work° like a sea? seethe
475 Not uselessly employed,
Might I pursue this theme through every change
Of exercise and play, to which the year
Did summon us in his delightful round.

We were a noisy crew; the sun in heaven
480 Beheld not vales more beautiful than ours;
Nor saw a band in happiness and joy
Richer, or worthier of the ground they trod.
I could record with no reluctant voice
The woods of autumn, and their hazel bowers
485 With milk-white clusters hung; the rod and line,
True symbol of hope's foolishness, whose strong
And unreproved enchantment led us on
By rocks and pools shut out from every star,
All the green summer, to forlorn cascades
490 Among the windings hid of mountain brooks.
—Unfading recollections! at this hour
The heart is almost mine with which I felt,
From some hill-top on sunny afternoons,
The paper kite high among fleecy clouds
495 Pull at her rein like an impetuous courser;
Or, from the meadows sent on gusty days,
Beheld her breast the wind, then suddenly
Dashed headlong, and rejected by the storm.

Ye lowly cottages wherein we dwelt,
500 A ministration of your own was yours;
Can I forget you, being as you were

So beautiful among the pleasant fields
In which ye stood? or can I here forget
The plain and seemly countenance with which 505 Ye dealt out your plain comforts? Yet had ye
Delights and exultations of your own.
Eager and never weary we pursued
Our home-amusements by the warm peat-fire
At evening, when with pencil, and smooth slate
510 In square divisions parceled out and all
With crosses and with cyphers scribbled o'er,
We schemed and puzzled, head opposed to head
In strife too humble to be named in verse:
Or round the naked table, snow-white deal,° pine board
515 Cherry or maple, sate in close array,
And to the combat, Loo or Whist,[6] led on
A thick-ribbed army; not, as in the world,
Neglected and ungratefully thrown by
Even for the very service they had wrought,
520 But husbanded through many a long campaign.
Uncouth assemblage was it, where no few
Had changed their functions; some, plebeian cards
Which Fate, beyond the promise of their birth,
Had dignified, and called to represent
525 The persons of departed potentates.
Oh, with what echoes on the board they fell!
Ironic diamonds,—clubs, hearts, diamonds, spades,
A congregation piteously akin!
Cheap matter offered they to boyish wit,
530 Those sooty knaves, precipitated down
With scoffs and taunts, like Vulcan[7] out of heaven:
The paramount ace, a moon in her eclipse,
Queens gleaming through their splendor's last decay,
And monarchs surly at the wrongs sustained
535 By royal visages. Meanwhile abroad
Incessant rain was falling, or the frost
Raged bitterly, with keen and silent tooth;
And, interrupting oft that eager game,
From under Esthwaite's splitting fields of ice
540 The pent-up air, struggling to free itself,
Gave out to meadow grounds and hills a loud
Protracted yelling, like the noise of wolves
Howling in troops along the Bothnic main.[8]

Nor, sedulous° as I have been to trace diligent
545 How Nature by extrinsic° passion first unrelated
Peopled the mind with forms sublime or fair,
And made me love them, may I here omit
How other pleasures have been mine, and joys

6. Card games resembling poker and bridge; the pack of cards described in lines 516–35 through long use has been damaged and repaired, with low ("plebeian," line 522) cards made into high ("potentates," line 525) and others partially defaced.
7. In Roman mythology, the god of fire, or the smith of the gods (hence "sooty," line 530); his father, Jove, once hurled him out of heaven.
8. A northern gulf of the Baltic Sea.

Of subtler origin; how I have felt,
550 Not seldom even in that tempestuous time,
Those hallowed and pure motions of the sense
Which seem, in their simplicity, to own
An intellectual° charm; that calm delight — spiritual
Which, if I err not, surely must belong
555 To those first-born° affinities that fit — innate
Our new existence to existing things,
And, in our dawn of being, constitute
The bond of union between life and joy.

Yes, I remember when the changeful earth,
560 And twice five summers on my mind had stamped
The faces of the moving year, even then
I held unconscious intercourse with beauty
Old as creation, drinking in a pure
Organic pleasure from the silver wreaths
565 Of curling mist, or from the level plain
Of waters colored by impending° clouds. — overhanging

The sands of Westmoreland, the creeks and bays
Of Cumbria's rocky limits,[9] they can tell
How, when the Sea threw off his evening shade,
570 And to the shepherd's hut on distant hills
Sent welcome notice of the rising moon,
How I have stood, to fancies such as these
A stranger, linking with the spectacle
No conscious memory of a kindred sight,
575 And bringing with me no peculiar sense
Of quietness or peace; yet have I stood,
Even while mine eye hath moved o'er many a league
Of shining water, gathering as it seemed,
Through every hairbreadth in that field of light,
580 New pleasure like a bee among the flowers.
Thus oft amid those fits of vulgar joy
Which, through all seasons, on a child's pursuits
Are prompt attendants, 'mid that giddy bliss
Which, like a tempest, works along the blood
585 And is forgotten; even then I felt
Gleams like the flashing of a shield—the earth
And common face of Nature spake to me
Rememberable things; sometimes, 'tis true,
By chance collisions and quaint accidents
590 (Like those ill-sorted unions, work supposed
Of evil-minded fairies), yet not vain
Nor profitless, if haply they impressed
Collateral objects and appearances,
Albeit lifeless then, and doomed to sleep
595 Until maturer seasons called them forth
To impregnate and to elevate the mind.
—And if the vulgar joy by its own weight

9. Coastline areas of the Lake District.

Wearied itself out of the memory,
The scenes which were a witness of that joy
600 Remained in their substantial lineaments
Depicted on the brain, and to the eye
Were visible, a daily sight; and thus
By the impressive discipline of fear,
By pleasure and repeated happiness,
605 So frequently repeated, and by force
Of obscure feelings representative
Of things forgotten, these same scenes so bright,
So beautiful, so majestic in themselves,
Though yet the day was distant, did become 610 Habitually dear, and all their forms
And changeful colors by invisible links
Were fastened to the affections.° feelings
I began
My story early—not misled, I trust,
By an infirmity of love for days
615 Disowned by memory—fancying flowers where none,
Not even the sweetest, do or can survive
For him at least whose dawning day they cheered.
Nor will it seem to thee, O Friend![1] so prompt
In sympathy, that I have lengthened out
620 With fond and feeble tongue a tedious tale.
Meanwhile, my hope has been, that I might fetch
Invigorating thoughts from former years;
Might fix the wavering balance of my mind,
And haply meet reproaches too, whose power
625 May spur me on, in manhood now mature,
To honorable toil. Yet should these hopes
Prove vain, and thus should neither I be taught
To understand myself, nor thou to know
With better knowledge how the heart was framed
630 Of him thou lovest; need I dread from thee
Harsh judgments, if the song be loth to quit
Those recollected hours that have the charm
Of visionary things, those lovely forms
And sweet sensations that throw back our life,
635 And almost make remotest infancy
A visible scene, on which the sun is shining?

One end at least hath been attained; my mind
Hath been revived, and if this genial° mood creative
Desert me not, forthwith shall be brought down
640 Through later years the story of my life.
The road lies plain before me—'tis a theme
Single and of determined bounds; and hence
I choose it rather at this time, than work
Of ampler or more varied argument,
645 Where I might be discomfited and lost:

1. Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834; see pp. 805–31), the poet and philosopher to whom The Prelude was addressed; Wordsworth's particular friend and collaborator.

And certain hopes are with me, that to thee
This labor will be welcome, honored Friend!

She Dwelt among the Untrodden Ways

She dwelt among the untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove.[2]
A Maid whom there were none to praise
And very few to love;

5 A violet by a mossy stone
Half hidden from the eye!
—Fair as a star, when only one
Is shining in the sky.

She lived unknown, and few could know
10 When Lucy ceased to be;
But she is in her grave, and, oh,
The difference to me!

Three Years She Grew

Three years she grew in sun and shower,
Then Nature said, "A lovelier flower
On earth was never sown;
This Child I to myself will take;
5 She shall be mine, and I will make
A Lady of my own.

"Myself will to my darling be
Both law and impulse: and with me
The Girl, in rock and plain,
10 In earth and heaven, in glade and bower,
Shall feel an overseeing power
To kindle or restrain.

"She shall be sportive as the fawn
That wild with glee across the lawn
15 Or up the mountain springs;
And hers shall be the breathing balm,
And hers the silence and the calm
Of mute insensate things.

2. Several rivers in England are named Dove.

"The floating clouds their state shall lend
20 To her; for her the willow bend;
Nor shall she fail to see
Even in the motions of the Storm
Grace that shall mold the Maiden's form
By silent sympathy.

25 "The stars of midnight shall be dear
To her; and she shall lean her ear
In many a secret place
Where rivulets dance their wayward round,
And beauty born of murmuring sound
30 Shall pass into her face.

"And vital feelings of delight
Shall rear her form to stately height,
Her virgin bosom swell;
Such thoughts to Lucy I will give
35 While she and I together live
Here in this happy dell."

Thus Nature spake—the work was done—
How soon my Lucy's race was run!
She died, and left to me
40 This health, this calm, and quiet scene;
The memory of what has been,
And never more will be.

A Slumber Did My Spirit Seal

A slumber did my spirit seal;
I had no human fears:
She seemed a thing that could not feel
The touch of earthly years.

5 No motion has she now, no force;
She neither hears nor sees;
Rolled round in earth's diurnal° course, daily
With rocks, and stones, and trees.

Resolution and Independence

I

There was a roaring in the wind all night;
The rain came heavily and fell in floods;

But now the sun is rising calm and bright;
The birds are singing in the distant woods;
5 Over his own sweet voice the Stock-dove broods;
The Jay makes answer as the Magpie chatters;
And all the air is filled with pleasant noise of waters.

All things that love the sun are out of doors;
The sky rejoices in the morning's birth;
10 The grass is bright with rain-drops;—on the moors
The hare is running races in her mirth;
And with her feet she from the plashy earth
Raises a mist; that, glittering in the sun,
Runs with her all the way, wherever she doth run.

15 I was a Traveler then upon the moor;
I saw the hare that raced about with joy;
I heard the woods and distant waters roar;
Or heard them not, as happy as a boy:
The pleasant season did my heart employ:
20 My old remembrances went from me wholly;
And all the ways of men, so vain and melancholy.

But, as it sometimes chanceth, from the might
Of joy in minds that can no further go,
As high as we have mounted in delight
25 In our dejection do we sink as low;
To me that morning did it happen so;
And fears and fancies thick upon me came;
Dim sadness—and blind thoughts, I knew not, nor could name.

I heard the sky-lark warbling in the sky;
30 And I bethought me of the playful hare:
Even such a happy Child of earth am I;
Even as these blissful creatures do I fare;
Far from the world I walk, and from all care;
But there may come another day to me—
35 Solitude, pain of heart, distress, and poverty.

My whole life I have lived in pleasant thought,
As if life's business were a summer mood;
As if all needful things would come unsought
To genial faith, still rich in genial good;
40 But how can He expect that others should
Build for him, sow for him, and at his call
Love him, who for himself will take no heed at all?

I thought of Chatterton,[3] the marvelous Boy,
The sleepless Soul that perished in his pride;
45 Of Him[4] who walked in glory and in joy
Following his plow, along the mountain-side:
By our own spirits are we deified:
We Poets in our youth begin in gladness;
But thereof come in the end despondency and madness.

50 Now, whether it were by peculiar grace,
A leading from above, a something given,
Yet it befell, that, in this lonely place,
When I with these untoward thoughts had striven,
Beside a pool bare to the eye of heaven
55 I saw a Man before me unawares:
The oldest man he seemed that ever wore gray hairs.

As a huge stone is sometimes seen to lie
Couched on the bald top of an eminence;
Wonder to all who do the same espy,
60 By what means it could thither come, and whence;
So that it seems a thing endued with sense:
Like a sea-beast crawled forth, that on a shelf
Of rock or sand reposeth, there to sun itself;

10

Such seemed this Man, not all alive nor dead,
65 Nor all asleep—in his extreme old age:
His body was bent double, feet and head
Coming together in life's pilgrimage;
As if some dire constraint of pain, or rage
Of sickness felt by him in times long past,
70 A more than human weight upon his frame had cast.

11

Himself he propped, limbs, body, and pale face,
Upon a long gray staff of shaven wood:
And, still as I drew near with gentle pace,
Upon the margin of that moorish flood
75 Motionless as a cloud the old Man stood,
That heareth not the loud winds when they call;
And moveth all together, if it move at all.

12

At length, himself unsettling, he the pond
Stirred with his staff, and fixedly did look
80 Upon the muddy water, which he conned,° studied

3. Thomas Chatterton (1752–1770), a gifted young English poet who committed suicide.

4. Robert Burns (1759–1796; see pp. 747–60), who died before achieving his later great renown.

As if he had been reading in a book:
And now a stranger's privilege I took;
And, drawing to his side, to him did say,
"This morning gives us promise of a glorious day."

13

85 A gentle answer did the old Man make,
In courteous speech which forth he slowly drew:
And him with further words I thus bespake,
"What occupation do you there pursue?
This is a lonesome place for one like you."
90 Ere he replied, a flash of mild surprise
Broke from the sable orbs of his yet-vivid eyes.

14

His words came feebly, from a feeble chest,
But each in solemn order followed each,
With something of a lofty utterance drest—
95 Choice word and measured phrase, above the reach
Of ordinary men; a stately speech;
Such as grave Livers[5] do in Scotland use,
Religious men, who give to God and man their dues.

15

He told, that to these waters he had come
100 To gather leeches,[6] being old and poor:
Employment hazardous and wearisome!
And he had many hardships to endure:
From pond to pond he roamed, from moor to moor;
Housing, with God's good help, by choice or chance;
105 And in this way he gained an honest maintenance.

16

The old Man still stood talking by my side;
But now his voice to me was like a stream
Scarce heard; nor word from word could I divide;
And the whole body of the Man did seem
110 Like one whom I had met with in a dream;
Or like a man from some far region sent,
To give me human strength, by apt admonishment.

17

My former thoughts returned: the fear that kills;
And hope that is unwilling to be fed;
115 Cold, pain, and labor, and all fleshly ills;

5. Those who live austerely and gravely. See Wordsworth's "The Excursion," 1.113–17; the reference is to a Scottish family:

> Pure livers were they all, austere and grave,
> And fearing God; the very children taught
> Stern self-respect, a reverence for God's word,
> And an habitual piety, maintained
> With strictness scarcely known on English ground.

6. Aquatic bloodsuckers, once widely used for medicinal bloodletting.

And mighty Poets in their misery dead.
—Perplexed, and longing to be comforted,
My question eagerly did I renew,
"How is it that you live, and what is it you do?"

18

120 He with a smile did then his words repeat;
And said, that, gathering leeches, far and wide
He traveled; stirring thus about his feet
The waters of the pools where they abide.
"Once I could meet with them on every side;
125 But they have dwindled long by slow decay;
Yet still I persevere, and find them where I may."

19

While he was talking thus, the lonely place,
The old Man's shape, and speech—all troubled me:
In my mind's eye I seemed to see him pace
130 About the weary moors continually,
Wandering about alone and silently.
While I these thoughts within myself pursued,
He, having made a pause, the same discourse renewed.

20

And soon with this he other matter blended,
135 Cheerfully uttered, with demeanor kind,
But stately in the main; and when he ended,
I could have laughed myself to scorn to find
In that decrepit Man so firm a mind.
"God," said I, "be my help and stay° secure; support (noun)
140 I'll think of the Leech-gatherer on the lonely moor!"

It Is a Beauteous Evening[7]

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free,
The holy time is quiet as a Nun
Breathless with adoration; the broad sun
Is sinking down in its tranquility;
5 The gentleness of heaven broods o'er the Sea:
Listen! the mighty Being is awake,
And doth with his eternal motion make
A sound like thunder—everlastingly.
Dear Child! dear Girl! that walkest with me here,
10 If thou appear untouched by solemn thought,
Thy nature is not therefore less divine:

7. The "Dear Child" was Caroline (then ten years old), his daughter by Annette Vallon.

Thou liest in Abraham's bosom[8] all the year,
And worship'st at the Temple's inner shrine,[9]
God being with thee when we know it not.

London, 1802

Milton! thou shouldst be living at this hour:
England hath need of thee: she is a fen
Of stagnant waters: altar, sword, and pen,
Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower,
5 Have forfeited their ancient English dower
Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
Oh! raise us up, return to us again;
And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power.
Thy soul was like a Star, and dwelt apart;
10 Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea:
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
So didst thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay.

1802 1807

Composed upon Westminster Bridge, September 3, 1802

Earth has not anything to show more fair:
Dull would he be of soul who could pass by
A sight so touching in its majesty;
This City now doth, like a garment, wear
5 The beauty of the morning; silent, bare,
Ships, towers, domes, theaters, and temples lie
Open unto the fields, and to the sky;
All bright and glittering in the smokeless air.
Never did sun more beautifully steep
10 In his first splendor, valley, rock, or hill;
Ne'er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep!
The river glideth at his own sweet will:
Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
And all that mighty heart is lying still!

8. Where souls in heaven rest (as in Luke 16.22).
9. The holy of holies (as in the ancient temple in Jerusalem); where God is present.

Nuns Fret Not at Their Convent's Narrow Room

Nuns fret not at their convent's narrow room;
And hermits are contented with their cells;
And students with their pensive citadels;
Maids at the wheel, the weaver at his loom,
5 Sit blithe and happy; bees that soar for bloom,
High as the highest Peak of Furness-fells,[1]
Will murmur by the hour in foxglove bells:
In truth the prison, into which we doom
Ourselves, no prison is: and hence for me,
10 In sundry moods, 'twas pastime to be bound
Within the Sonnet's scanty plot of ground;
Pleased if some Souls (for such there needs must be)
Who have felt the weight of too much liberty,
Should find brief solace there, as I have found.

My Heart Leaps Up

My heart leaps up when I behold
  A rainbow in the sky:
So was it when my life began;
So is it now I am a man;
5 So be it when I shall grow old,
  Or let me die!
The Child is father of the Man;
And I could wish my days to be
Bound each to each by natural piety.

Ode

Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood

The Child is father of the Man;
And I could wish my days to be
Bound each to each by natural piety.[2]

I

There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream,
The earth, and every common sight,
    To me did seem
  Appareled in celestial light,

1. Mountains in the English Lake District.
2. Final lines of Wordsworth's "My Heart Leaps Up" (above).

5 The glory and the freshness of a dream.
It is not now as it hath been of yore—
Turn whereso'er I may,
By night or day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more.

10 The Rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the Rose,
The Moon doth with delight
Look round her when the heavens are bare,
Waters on a starry night
15 Are beautiful and fair;
The sunshine is a glorious birth;
But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath passed away a glory from the earth.

Now, while the birds thus sing a joyous song,
20 And while the young lambs bound
As to the tabor's° sound, small drum's
To me alone there came a thought of grief:
A timely utterance gave that thought relief,
And I again am strong:
25 The cataracts blow their trumpets from the steep;
No more shall grief of mine the season wrong;
I hear the Echoes through the mountains throng,
The Winds come to me from the fields of sleep,
And all the earth is gay;
30 Land and sea
Give themselves up to jollity,
And with the heart of May
Doth every Beast keep holiday—
Thou Child of Joy,
35 Shout round me, let me hear thy shouts, thou happy Shepherd-boy!

Ye blessèd Creatures, I have heard the call
Ye to each other make; I see
The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee;
My heart is at your festival,
40 My head hath its coronal,° circlet of wildflowers
The fullness of your bliss, I feel—I feel it all.
Oh, evil day! if I were sullen
While Earth herself is adorning,
This sweet May morning,
45 And the Children are culling
On every side,
In a thousand valleys far and wide,
Fresh flowers; while the sun shines warm,
And the Babe leaps up on his Mother's arm—

50 I hear, I hear, with joy I hear!
—But there's a Tree, of many, one,
A single Field which I have looked upon,
Both of them speak of something that is gone:
The Pansy at my feet
55 Doth the same tale repeat:
Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star,
60 Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar:
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
65 From God, who is our home:
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
Shades of the prison-house begin to close
Upon the growing Boy
But he
70 Beholds the light, and whence it flows,
He sees it in his joy;
The Youth, who daily farther from the east
Must travel, still is Nature's Priest,
And by the vision splendid
75 Is on his way attended;
At length the Man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day.

Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own;
Yearnings she hath in her own natural kind,
80 And, even with something of a Mother's mind,
And no unworthy aim,
The homely° Nurse doth all she can simple; kindly
To make her foster child, her Inmate Man,
Forget the glories he hath known,
85 And that imperial palace whence he came.

Behold the Child among his newborn blisses,
A six-years' Darling of a pygmy size!
See, where 'mid work of his own hand he lies,
Fretted° by sallies of his mother's kisses, vexed
90 With light upon him from his father's eyes!
See, at his feet, some little plan or chart,
Some fragment from his dream of human life,
Shaped by himself with newly-learnèd art;
A wedding or a festival,

95 A mourning or a funeral;
And this hath now his heart,
And unto this he frames his song;
Then will he fit his tongue
To dialogues of business, love, or strife;
100 But it will not be long
Ere this be thrown aside,
And with new joy and pride
The little Actor cons° another part; commits to memory
Filling from time to time his "humorous stage"[3]
105 With all the Persons,° down to palsied Age, dramatis personae
That Life brings with her in her equipage;° group of servants
As if his whole vocation
Were endless imitation.

8

Thou, whose exterior semblance doth belie
110 Thy Soul's immensity;
Thou best Philosopher, who yet dost keep
Thy heritage, thou Eye among the blind,
That, deaf and silent, read'st the eternal deep,
Haunted forever by the eternal mind—
115 Mighty Prophet! Seer blest!
On whom those truths do rest,
Which we are toiling all our lives to find,
In darkness lost, the darkness of the grave;
Thou, over whom thy Immortality
120 Broods like the Day, a Master o'er a Slave,
A Presence which is not to be put by;
Thou little Child, yet glorious in the might
Of heaven-born freedom on thy being's height,
Why with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
125 The years to bring the inevitable yoke,
Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?
Full soon thy Soul shall have her earthly freight,
And custom lie upon thee with a weight,
Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life!

130 O joy! that in our embers
Is something that doth live,
That nature yet remembers
What was so fugitive!
The thought of our past years in me doth breed
135 Perpetual benediction: not indeed
For that which is most worthy to be blest;
Delight and liberty, the simple creed
Of Childhood, whether busy or at rest,
With new-fledged hope still fluttering in his breast—

3. I.e., playing the parts of characters with various temperaments, called "humors" by Elizabethan poets and playwrights. "Humorous stage" is a quotation from line 1 of a sonnet by Samuel Daniel (ca. 1562–1619; for some of his sonnets and other poems, see pp. 230–35).

140 Not for these I raise
The song of thanks and praise;
But for those obstinate questionings
Of sense and outward things,
Fallings from us, vanishings;
145 Blank misgivings of a Creature
Moving about in worlds not realized,° seeming real
High instincts before which our mortal Nature
Did tremble like a guilty Thing surprised;
But for those first affections,
150 Those shadowy recollections,
Which, be they what they may,
Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
Are yet a master light of all our seeing;
Uphold us, cherish, and have power to make 155 Our noisy years seem moments in the being
Of the eternal Silence: truths that wake,
To perish never;
Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavor,
Nor Man nor Boy,
160 Nor all that is at enmity with joy,
Can utterly abolish or destroy!
Hence in a season of calm weather
Though inland far we be,
Our Souls have sight of that immortal sea
165 Which brought us hither,
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the Children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.

10

Then sing, ye Birds, sing, sing a joyous song!
170 And let the young Lambs bound
As to the tabor's sound!
We in thought will join your throng,
Ye that pipe and ye that play,
Ye that through your hearts today
175 Feel the gladness of the May!
What though the radiance which was once so bright
Be now forever taken from my sight,
Though nothing can bring back the hour
Of splendor in the grass, of glory in the flower;
180 We will grieve not, rather find
Strength in what remains behind;
In the primal sympathy
Which having been must ever be;
In the soothing thoughts that spring
185 Out of human suffering;
In the faith that looks through death,
In years that bring the philosophic mind.

11

And O, ye Fountains, Meadows, Hills, and Groves,
Forebode not any severing of our loves!
190 Yet in my heart of hearts I feel your might;
I only have relinquished one delight
To live beneath your more habitual sway.
I love the Brooks which down their channels fret,
Even more than when I tripped lightly as they;
195 The innocent brightness of a newborn Day
Is lovely yet;
The clouds that gather round the setting sun
Do take a sober coloring from an eye
That hath kept watch o'er man's mortality;
200 Another race hath been, and other palms° are won. symbols of victory
Thanks to the human heart by which we live,
Thanks to its tenderness, its joys, and fears,
To me the meanest° flower that blows° can give most ordinary / blooms
Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.

1802–04 1807

I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host, of golden daffodils;
5 Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line
10 Along the margin of a bay:
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced; but they
Outdid the sparkling waves in glee;
15 A poet could not but be gay,
In such a jocund° company; cheerful
I gazed—and gazed—but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought:

For oft, when on my couch I lie
20 In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude;
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils.

1804 1807

She Was a Phantom of Delight

She was a Phantom° of delight — vivid image
When first she gleamed upon my sight;
A lovely Apparition, sent
To be a moment's ornament;
5 Her eyes as stars of Twilight fair;
Like Twilight's, too, her dusky hair;
But all things else about her drawn
From May-time and the cheerful Dawn;
A dancing Shape, an Image gay,
10 To haunt, to startle, and way-lay.

I saw her upon nearer view,
A Spirit, yet a Woman too!
Her household motions light and free,
And steps of virgin-liberty;
15 A countenance in which did meet
Sweet records, promises as sweet;
A Creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food;
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
20 Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles.

And now I see with eye serene
The very pulse of the machine;° — organism
A Being breathing thoughtful breath,
A Traveler between life and death;
25 The reason firm, the temperate will,
Endurance, foresight, strength, and skill;
A perfect Woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort, and command;
And yet a Spirit still, and bright
30 With something of angelic light.

1804 — 1807

The World Is Too Much with Us

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little we see in Nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!° — gift
5 This Sea that bares her bosom to the moon,
The winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers,
For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be
10 A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;

So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,° open meadow
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathèd horn.[4]

1802–04 1807

The Solitary Reaper

Behold her, single in the field,
Yon solitary Highland Lass!
Reaping and singing by herself;
Stop here, or gently pass!
5 Alone she cuts and binds the grain,
And sings a melancholy strain;
O listen! for the Vale° profound valley
Is overflowing with the sound.

No Nightingale did ever chaunt
10 More welcome notes to weary bands
Of travelers in some shady haunt,
Among Arabian sands;
A voice so thrilling ne'er was heard
In springtime from the Cuckoo bird,
15 Breaking the silence of the seas
Among the farthest Hebrides.

Will no one tell me what she sings?—
Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
For old, unhappy, far-off things,
20 And battles long ago;
Or is it some more humble lay,
Familiar matter of today?
Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain,
That has been, and may be again?

25 Whate'er the theme, the Maiden sang
As if her song could have no ending;
I saw her singing at her work,
And o'er the sickle bending—
I listened, motionless and still;
30 And, as I mounted up the hill,
The music in my heart I bore,
Long after it was heard no more.

1805 1807

4. In Greek mythology, Proteus, the "Old Man of the Sea," rises from the sea at midday and can be forced to read the future by anyone who holds him while he takes many frightening shapes. Triton is the son of the sea god, Neptune; the sound of his conch-shell horn calms the waves.

Surprised by Joy

Surprised by Joy—impatient as the Wind
I turned to share the transport—Oh! with whom
But thee,[5] deep buried in the silent tomb,
That spot which no vicissitude can find?
5 Love, faithful love, recalled thee to my mind—
But how could I forget thee? Through what power,
Even for the least division of an hour,
Have I been so beguiled as to be blind
To my most grievous loss!—That thought's return
10 Was the worst pang that sorrow ever bore,
Save one, one only, when I stood forlorn,
Knowing my heart's best treasure was no more;
That neither present time, nor years unborn
Could to my sight that heavenly face restore.

1813–14 1815

Mutability

From low to high doth dissolution climb,
And sink from high to low, along a scale
Of awful notes, whose concord shall not fail;
A musical but melancholy chime,
5 Which they can hear who meddle not with crime,
Nor avarice, nor over-anxious care.
Truth fails not; but her outward forms that bear
The longest date do melt like frosty rime,° thin coating
That in the morning whitened hill and plain
10 And is no more; drop like the tower sublime
Of yesterday, which royally did wear
His crown of weeds, but could not even sustain
Some casual shout that broke the silent air,
Or the unimaginable touch of Time.

1821 1822

Scorn Not the Sonnet

Scorn not the sonnet; critic, you have frowned,
Mindless of its just honors; with this key
Shakespeare unlocked his heart; the melody
Of this small lute gave ease to Petrarch's[6] wound;

5. The poet's daughter Catharine, who died in 1812, at age four.
6. Italian poet (1304–1374), whose "wound" was his unconsummated love for a woman he called "Laura."

5 A thousand times this pipe did Tasso[7] sound;
With it Camöens soothed an exile's grief;[8]
The sonnet glittered a gay myrtle leaf
Amid the cypress with which Dante crowned
His visionary brow; a glow-worm lamp,
10 It cheered mild Spenser, called from Faeryland
To struggle through dark ways; and, when a damp° dark mist
Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
The thing became a trumpet; whence he blew
Soul-animating strains—alas, too few!

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE
1772–1834

The Aeolian Harp[1]

Composed at Clevedon, Somersetshire

My pensive Sara![2] thy soft cheek reclined
Thus on mine arm, most soothing sweet it is
To sit beside our Cot,° our Cot o'ergrown cottage
With white-flowered Jasmin, and the broad-leaved Myrtle,
5 (Meet° emblems they of Innocence and Love!) appropriate
And watch the clouds, that late were rich with light,
Slow saddening round, and mark the star of eve
Serenely brilliant (such should Wisdom be)
Shine opposite! How exquisite the scents
10 Snatched from yon bean-field! and the world so hushed!
The stilly murmur of the distant Sea
Tells us of silence.

And that simplest Lute,
Placed length-ways in the clasping casement, hark!
How by the desultory breeze caressed,
15 Like some coy maid half yielding to her lover,
It pours such sweet upbraiding, as must needs
Tempt to repeat the wrong! And now, its strings
Boldlier swept, the long sequacious° notes uninterruptedly flowing
Over delicious surges sink and rise,
20 Such a soft floating witchery of sound
As twilight Elfins make, when they at eve
Voyage on gentle gales from Fairy-Land,
Where Melodies round honey-dropping flowers,

7. Italian poet (1544–1595).
8. Camoëns (1524?–1580), Portuguese poet, was banished from the royal court.
1. The wind harp (named after Aeolus, Greek god of the winds) has a sounding board equipped with a set of strings that vibrate in response to air currents. German and English Romantic writers often presented it as a symbol of the mind.
2. Sara Fricker, whom Coleridge married in 1795. He wrote this poem during their honeymoon.

Footless and wild, like birds of Paradise,[3]
25 Nor pause, nor perch, hovering on untamed wing!
O! the one Life within us and abroad,
Which meets all motion and becomes its soul,
A light in sound, a sound-like power in light,
Rhythm in all thought, and joyance everywhere—
30 Methinks, it should have been impossible
Not to love all things in a world so filled;
Where the breeze warbles, and the mute still air
Is Music slumbering on her instrument.

And thus, my Love! as on the midway slope
35 Of yonder hill I stretch my limbs at noon,
Whilst through my half-closed eyelids I behold
The sunbeams dance, like diamonds, on the main,
And tranquil muse upon tranquility:
Full many a thought uncalled and undetained,
40 And many idle flitting phantasies,
Traverse my indolent and passive brain,
As wild and various as the random gales
That swell and flutter on this subject Lute!

And what if all of animated nature
45 Be but organic Harps diversely framed,
That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweeps
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze,
At once the Soul of each, and God of all?

But thy more serious eye a mild reproof
50 Darts, O belovèd Woman! nor such thoughts
Dim and unhallowed dost thou not reject,
And biddest me walk humbly with my God.
Meek Daughter in the family of Christ!
Well hast thou said and holily dispraised
55 These shapings of the unregenerate mind;
Bubbles that glitter as they rise and break
On vain Philosophy's aye-babbling spring.
For never guiltless may I speak of him,
The Incomprehensible! save when with awe
60 I praise him, and with Faith that inly feels;
Who with his saving mercies healèd me,
A sinful and most miserable man,
Wildered and dark, and gave me to possess
Peace, and this Cot, and thee, heart-honored Maid!

This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison

In the June of 1797, some long-expected Friends paid a visit to the author's cottage and on the morning of their arrival, he met with an accident, which disabled him from walking during the whole time of their stay. One evening, when they had left him for a few hours he composed the following lines in the garden bower.[4]

Well, they are gone, and here must I remain,
This lime-tree bower my prison! I have lost
Beauties and feelings, such as would have been
Most sweet to my remembrance even when age
5 Had dimmed mine eyes to blindness! They, meanwhile,
Friends, whom I never more may meet again,
On springy[5] heath, along the hill-top edge,
Wander in gladness, and wind down, perchance,
To that still roaring dell, of which I told;
10 The roaring dell, o'erwooded, narrow deep,
And only speckled by the mid-day sun;
Where its slim trunk the ash from rock to rock
Flings arching like a bridge;—that branchless ash,
Unsunned and damp, whose few poor yellow leaves
15 Ne'er tremble in the gale, yet tremble still,
Fanned by the water-fall! and there my friends
Behold the dark green file of long lank weeds,
That all at once (a most fantastic sight!)
Still nod and drip beneath the dripping edge
20 Of the blue clay-stone.

Now, my friends emerge
Beneath the wide wide Heaven—and view again
The many-steepled tract magnificent
Of hilly fields and meadows, and the sea,
With some fair bark, perhaps, whose sails light up
25 The slip of smooth clear blue betwixt two Isles
Of purple shadow! Yes! they wander on
In gladness all; but thou, methinks, most glad,
My gentle-hearted Charles! for thou hast pined
And hungered after Nature,[6] many a year,
30 In the great City pent, winning thy way
With sad yet patient soul, through evil and pain
And strange calamity![7] Ah! slowly sink
Behind the western ridge, thou glorious sun!
Shine in the slant beams of the sinking orb,

4. In fact, in July 1797, Coleridge's wife, Sara, accidentally spilled boiling milk on his foot during a visit from the poet William Wordsworth (1770–1850; see pp. 763–805); Wordsworth's sister, Dorothy; and the essayist and critic Charles Lamb, to whom the earliest printed text of this poem was "Addressed."

5. "Elastic, I mean" [Coleridge's note].

6. In fact, Lamb, a devoted Londoner, considered nature "dead."

7. About ten months earlier, Lamb's sister, Mary, in a fit of insanity, had stabbed their mother to death.

35 Ye purple heath-flowers! richlier burn, ye clouds!
Live in the yellow light, ye distant groves!
And kindle, thou blue ocean! So my Friend
Struck with deep joy may stand, as I have stood,
Silent with swimming sense; yea, gazing round
40 On the wide landscape, gaze till all doth seem
Less gross than bodily; and of such hues
As veil the Almighty Spirit, when yet he makes Spirits perceive his presence.

A delight
Comes sudden on my heart, and I am glad
45 As I myself were there! Nor in this bower,
This little lime-tree bower, have I not marked
Much that has soothed me. Pale beneath the blaze
Hung the transparent foliage; and I watched
Some broad and sunny leaf, and loved to see
50 The shadow of the leaf and stem above
Dappling its sunshine! And that walnut-tree
Was richly tinged, and a deep radiance lay
Full on the ancient ivy, which usurps
Those fronting elms, and now, with blackest mass
55 Makes their dark branches gleam a lighter hue
Through the late twilight: and though now the bat
Wheels silent by, and not a swallow twitters,
Yet still the solitary humble bee
Sings in the bean-flower! Henceforth, I shall know
60 That Nature ne'er deserts the wise and pure;
No plot so narrow, be but Nature there,
No waste so vacant, but may well employ
Each faculty of sense, and keep the heart
Awake to Love and Beauty! and sometimes
65 'Tis well to be bereft of promised good,
That we may lift the Soul, and contemplate
With lively joy the joys we cannot share.
My gentle-hearted Charles! when the last rook
Beat its straight path along the dusky air
70 Homewards, I blessed it! deeming its black wing
(Now a dim speck, now vanishing in light)
Had crossed the mighty orb's dilated glory,
While thou stood'st gazing; or when all was still,
Flew creeking o'er thy head, and had a charm
75 For thee, my gentle-hearted Charles, to whom
No sound is dissonant which tells of Life.

Kubla Khan[8]

Or a Vision in a Dream. A Fragment

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
5 Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And there were gardens bright with sinuous° rills,° curving / streams
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
10 And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!
A savage place! as holy and enchanted
15 As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon lover!
And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,
As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,
A mighty fountain momently was forced:
20 Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst
Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,
Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail:
And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever
It flung up momently the sacred river.
25 Five miles meandering with a mazy motion
Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,
Then reached the caverns measureless to man,
And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean:
And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far
30 Ancestral voices prophesying war!

8. The first khan, or ruler, of the Mongol dynasty, in thirteenth-century China. The topography and place-names are fictitious. In a prefatory note to the poem, Coleridge gave the following background: "In the summer of the year 1797, the author, then in ill health, had retired to a lonely farmhouse between Porlock and Linton, on the Exmoor confines of Somerset and Devonshire. In consequence of a slight indisposition, an anodyne had been prescribed, from the effects of which he fell asleep in his chair at the moment that he was reading the following sentence, or words of the same substance, in Purchas's Pilgrimage: 'Here the Khan Kubla commanded a palace to be built, and a stately garden thereunto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground were inclosed with a wall.' The author continued for about three hours in a profound sleep, at least of the external sense, during which time he has the most vivid confidence that he could not have composed less than from two to three hundred lines; if that indeed can be called composition in which all the images rose up before him as things, with a parallel production of the correspondent expressions, without any sensation or consciousness of effort. On awaking he appeared to himself to have a distinct recollection of the whole, and taking his pen, ink, and paper, instantly and eagerly wrote down the lines that are here preserved. At this moment he was unfortunately called out by a person on business from Porlock, and detained by him above an hour, and on his return to his room, found, to his no small surprise and mortification, that though he still retained some vague and dim recollection of the general purport of the vision, yet, with the exception of some eight or ten scattered lines and images, all the rest had passed away like the images on the surface of a stream into which a stone has been cast, but, alas! without the after restoration of the latter!"

The shadow of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the waves;
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the caves.
35 It was a miracle of rare device,
A sunny pleasure dome with caves of ice!

A damsel with a dulcimer[9]
In a vision once I saw:
It was an Abyssinian maid,
40 And on her dulcimer she played,
Singing of Mount Abora.
Could I revive within me
Her symphony and song,
To such a deep delight 'twould win me,
45 That with music loud and long,
I would build that dome in air,
That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
And all who heard should see them there,
And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
50 His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
Weave a circle round him thrice,
And close your eyes with holy dread,
For he on honey-dew hath fed,
And drunk the milk of Paradise.

Frost at Midnight

The Frost performs its secret ministry,
Unhelped by any wind. The owlet's cry
Came loud—and hark, again! loud as before.
The inmates of my cottage, all at rest,
5 Have left me to that solitude, which suits
Abstruser musings: save that at my side
My cradled infant[1] slumbers peacefully.
'Tis calm indeed! so calm, that it disturbs
And vexes meditation with its strange
10 And extreme silentness. Sea, hill, and wood,
This populous village! Sea, and hill, and wood,
With all the numberless goings-on of life,
Inaudible as dreams! the thin blue flame
Lies on my low-burnt fire, and quivers not;
15 Only that film,[2] which fluttered on the grate,
Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing.
Methinks its motion in this hush of nature

9. A harplike instrument.
1. Coleridge's eldest son, Hartley.
2. Bits of soot fluttering in a fireplace; in folklore, said to foretell the arrival of an unexpected guest, and hence called "strangers" (lines 26, 41).

Gives it dim sympathies with me who live,
Making it a companionable form,
20 Whose puny flaps and freaks the idling Spirit
By its own moods interprets, everywhere
Echo or mirror seeking of itself,
And makes a toy of Thought.

But O! how oft,
How oft, at school, with most believing mind,
25 Presageful,° have I gazed upon the bars, foretelling
To watch that fluttering stranger! and as oft
With unclosed lids, already had I dreamt
Of my sweet birthplace, and the old church tower,
Whose bells, the poor man's only music, rang
30 From morn to evening, all the hot Fair-day,[3]
So sweetly, that they stirred and haunted me
With a wild pleasure, falling on mine ear
Most like articulate sounds of things to come!
So gazed I, till the soothing things, I dreamt,
35 Lulled me to sleep, and sleep prolonged my dreams!
And so I brooded all the following morn,
Awed by the stern preceptor's° face, mine eye schoolmaster's
Fixed with mock study on my swimming book:[4]
Save if the door half opened, and I snatched
40 A hasty glance, and still my heart leaped up,
For still I hoped to see the stranger's face,
Townsman, or aunt, or sister more beloved,
My playmate when we both were clothed alike![5]

Dear Babe, that sleepest cradled by my side,
45 Whose gentle breathings, heard in this deep calm,
Fill up the interspersèd vacancies
And momentary pauses of the thought!
My babe so beautiful! it thrills my heart
With tender gladness, thus to look at thee,
50 And think that thou shalt learn far other lore,
And in far other scenes! For I was reared
In the great city, pent 'mid cloisters dim,
And saw nought lovely but the sky and stars.
But thou, my babe! shalt wander like a breeze
55 By lakes and sandy shores, beneath the crags
Of ancient mountain, and beneath the clouds,
Which image in their bulk both lakes and shores
And mountain crags: so shalt thou see and hear
The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible
60 Of that eternal language, which thy God
Utters, who from eternity doth teach
Himself in all, and all things in himself.
Great universal Teacher! he shall mold
Thy spirit, and by giving make it ask.

3. Market day, often a time of festivities.
4. I.e., seen unclearly because of emotion.
5. In early childhood, when boys and girls wore the same kind of infants' clothing.

65 Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to thee,
Whether the summer clothe the general° earth — generative, vernal
With greenness, or the redbreast sit and sing
Betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch
Of mossy apple tree, while the nigh thatch
70 Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eave-drops fall
Heard only in the trances of the blast,
Or if the secret ministry of frost
Shall hang them up in silent icicles,
Quietly shining to the quiet Moon.

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner

IN SEVEN PARTS

Facile credo, plures esse Naturas invisibles quam visibiles in rerum universitate. Sed horum [sic] omnium familiam quis nobis enarrabit? et gradus et cognationes et discrimina et singulorum munera? Quid agunt? quae loca habitant? Harum rerum notitiam semper ambivit ingenium humanum, nunquam attigit. Juvat, interea, non diffiteor, quandoque in animo, in tabulâ, majoris et melioris mundi imaginem contemplari: ne mens assuefacta hodiernae vitae minutiis se contrahat nimis, et tota subsidat in pusillas cogitationes. Sed veritati interea invigilandum est, modusque servandus, ut certa ab incertis, diem a nocte, distinguamus.

—T. BURNET[6]

Part I

An ancient Mariner meeteth three Gallants bidden to a wedding feast, and detaineth one.

It is an ancient Mariner
And he stoppeth one of three.
—"By thy long gray beard and glittering eye,
Now wherefore stopp'st thou me?

The Bridegroom's doors are opened wide, 5
And I am next of kin;
The guests are met, the feast is set:
May'st hear the merry din."

He holds him with his skinny hand,
"There was a ship," quoth he. 10
"Hold off! unhand me, graybeard loon!"
Eftsoons° his hand dropped he. — straightway

6. Thomas Burnet, seventeenth-century English theologian, from his Archaeologiae Philosophiae: "I can easily believe that there are more invisible than visible beings in the universe. But of their families, degrees, connections, distinctions, and functions, who shall tell us? How do they act? Where are they found? About such matters the human mind has always circled without attaining knowledge. Yet I do not doubt that sometimes it is well for the soul to contemplate as in a picture the image of a larger and better world, lest the mind, habituated to the small concerns of daily life, limit itself too much and sink entirely into trivial thinking. But meanwhile we must be on watch for the truth, avoiding extremes, so that we may distinguish certain from uncertain, day from night."

The Wedding Guest is spellbound by the eye of the old seafaring man, and constrained to hear his tale.

He holds him with his glittering eye—
The Wedding Guest stood still,
And listens like a three years' child: 15
The Mariner hath his will.

The Wedding Guest sat on a stone:
He cannot choose but hear;
And thus spake on that ancient man,
The bright-eyed Mariner. 20

"The ship was cheered, the harbor cleared,
Merrily did we drop
Below the kirk,° below the hill, church
Below the lighthouse top.

The Mariner tells how the ship sailed southward with a good wind and fair weather, till it reached the line.

The Sun came up upon the left, 25
Out of the sea came he!
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea.

Higher and higher every day,
Till over the mast at noon—" 30
The Wedding Guest here beat his breast,
For he heard the loud bassoon.

The Wedding Guest heareth the bridal music; but the Mariner continueth his tale.

The bride hath paced into the hall,
Red as a rose is she;
Nodding their heads before her goes 35
The merry minstrelsy.

The Wedding Guest he beat his breast,
Yet he cannot choose but hear;
And thus spake on that ancient man,
The bright-eyed Mariner. 40

The ship driven by a storm toward the South Pole.

"And now the STORM-BLAST came, and he
Was tyrannous and strong;
He struck with his o'ertaking wings,
And chased us south along.

With sloping masts and dipping prow, 45
As who pursued with yell and blow
Still treads the shadow of his foe,
And forward bends his head,
The ship drove fast, loud roared the blast,
And southward aye we fled. 50

And now there came both mist and snow,
And it grew wondrous cold:
And ice, mast-high, came floating by,
As green as emerald.

The land of ice, and of fearful sounds where no living thing was to be seen.

And through the drifts the snowy clifts° — cliffs — 55
Did send a dismal sheen:
Nor shapes of men nor beasts we ken—
The ice was all between.

The ice was here, the ice was there,
The ice was all around: — 60
It cracked and growled, and roared and howled,
Like noises in a swound!° — swoon

Till a great sea bird, called the Albatross, came through the snow-fog, and was received with great joy and hospitality.

At length did cross an Albatross,
Thorough the fog it came;
As if it had been a Christian soul, — 65
We hailed it in God's name.

It ate the food it ne'er had eat,
And round and round it flew.
The ice did split with a thunder-fit;
The helmsman steered us through! — 70

And lo! the Albatross proveth a bird of good omen, and followeth the ship as it returned northward through fog and floating ice.

And a good south wind sprung up behind;
The Albatross did follow,
And every day, for food or play,
Came to the mariners' hollo!

In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud,[7] — 75
It perched for vespers° nine; — evenings
Whiles all the night, through fog-smoke white,
Glimmered the white Moon-shine."

The ancient Mariner inhospitably killeth the pious bird of good omen.

"God save thee, ancient Mariner!
From the fiends, that plague thee thus!— — 80
Why look'st thou so?"—With my crossbow
I shot the ALBATROSS.

Part II

The Sun now rose upon the right:
Out of the sea came he,
Still hid in mist, and on the left — 85
Went down into the sea.

And the good south wind still blew behind,
But no sweet bird did follow,
Nor any day for food or play
Came to the mariners' hollo! — 90

7. Rope supporting a mast.

His shipmates cry out against the ancient Mariner, for killing the bird of good luck.

And I had done a hellish thing,
And it would work 'em woe:
For all averred, I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow.
Ah wretch! said they, the bird to slay, 95
That made the breeze to blow!

But when the fog cleared off, they justify the same, and thus make themselves accomplices in the crime.

Nor dim nor red, like God's own head,
The glorious Sun uprist:° arose
Then all averred, I had killed the bird
That brought the fog and mist. 100
'Twas right, said they, such birds to slay,
That bring the fog and mist.

The fair breeze continues; the ship enters the Pacific Ocean, and sails northward, even till it reaches the Line.° equator

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free;
We were the first that ever burst 105
Into that silent sea.

The ship hath been suddenly becalmed.

Down dropped the breeze, the sails dropped down,
'Twas sad as sad could be;
And we did speak only to break
The silence of the sea! 110

All in a hot and copper sky,
The bloody Sun, at noon,
Right up above the mast did stand,
No bigger than the Moon.

Day after day, day after day, 115
We stuck, nor breath nor motion;
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

And the Albatross begins to be avenged.

Water, water, everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink; 120
Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink.

The very deep did rot: O Christ!
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs 125
Upon the slimy sea.

About, about, in reel and rout
The death-fires[8] danced at night;
The water, like a witch's oils,
Burnt green, and blue and white. 130

8. Either St. Elmo's fire—light from atmospheric electricity on a ship's rigging (regarded as a portent of disaster)—or ignis fatuus, "foolish fire" (Latin) caused by the decomposition of putrescent matter in the ocean.

A Spirit had followed them; one of the invisible inhabitants of this planet, neither departed souls nor angels; concerning whom the learned Jew, Josephus, and the Platonic Constantinopolitan, Michael Psellus, may be consulted. They are very numerous, and there is no climate or element without one or more.

And some in dreams assurèd were
Of the Spirit that plagued us so;
Nine fathom deep he had followed us
From the land of mist and snow.

And every tongue, through utter drought, 135
Was withered at the root;
We could not speak, no more than if
We had been choked with soot.

The shipmates, in their sore distress, would fain throw the whole guilt on the ancient Mariner: in sign whereof they hang the dead sea bird round his neck.

Ah! well-a-day! what evil looks
Had I from old and young! 140
Instead of the cross, the Albatross
About my neck was hung.

Part III

There passed a weary time. Each throat
Was parched, and glazed each eye.
A weary time! a weary time! 145
How glazed each weary eye,
When looking westward, I beheld
A something in the sky.

The ancient Mariner beholdeth a sign in the element afar off.

At first it seemed a little speck,
And then it seemed a mist; 150
It moved and moved, and took at last
A certain shape, I wist.° — knew

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist!
And still it neared and neared:
As if it dodged a water sprite, 155
It plunged and tacked and veered.

At its nearer approach, it seemeth him to be a ship; and at a dear ransom he freeth his speech from the bonds of thirst.

With throats unslaked, with black lips baked,
We could nor laugh nor wail;
Through utter drought all dumb we stood!
I bit my arm, I sucked the blood, 160
And cried, A sail! a sail!

A flash of joy;

With throats unslaked, with black lips baked,
Agape they heard me call:
Gramercy!° they for joy did grin, — thank heavens!
And all at once their breath drew in, 165
As they were drinking all.

And horror follows. For can it be a ship that comes onward without wind or tide?

See! see! (I cried) she tacks no more!
Hither to work us weal;° — benefit
Without a breeze, without a tide,
She steadies with upright keel! 170

The western wave was all aflame.
The day was well nigh done!
Almost upon the western wave
Rested the broad bright Sun;
When that strange shape drove suddenly 175
Betwixt us and the Sun.

It seemeth him but the skeleton of a ship.

And straight the Sun was flecked with bars,
(Heaven's Mother send us grace!)
As if through a dungeon grate he peered
With broad and burning face. 180

And its ribs are seen as bars on the face of the setting Sun.

Alas! (thought I, and my heart beat loud)
How fast she nears and nears!
Are those her sails that glance in the Sun,
Like restless gossameres?° cobwebs

The Specter-Woman and her Deathmate, and no other on board the skeleton ship.

Are those her ribs through which the Sun 185
Did peer, as through a grate?
And is that Woman all her crew?
Is that a DEATH? and are there two?
Is DEATH that woman's mate?

Like vessel, like crew!

Her lips were red, her looks were free, 190
Her locks were yellow as gold:
Her skin was as white as leprosy,
The Nightmare LIFE-IN-DEATH was she,
Who thicks man's blood with cold.

Death and Life-in-Death have diced for the ship's crew and she (the latter) winneth the ancient Mariner.

The naked hulk alongside came, 195
And the twain were casting dice;
"The game is done! I've won! I've won!"
Quoth she, and whistles thrice.

No twilight within the courts of the Sun.

The Sun's rim dips; the stars rush out:
At one stride comes the dark; 200
With far-heard whisper, o'er the sea,
Off shot the specter-bark.

At the rising of the Moon,

We listened and looked sideways up!
Fear at my heart, as at a cup,
My lifeblood seemed to sip! 205
The stars were dim, and thick the night,
The steersman's face by his lamp gleamed white;
From the sails the dew did drip—
Till clomb° above the eastern bar climbed
The hornèd Moon, with one bright star 210
Within the nether tip.

One after another,

One after one, by the star-dogged Moon,
Too quick for groan or sigh,

Each turned his face with ghastly pang,
And cursed me with his eye. 215

His shipmates drop down dead.

Four times fifty living men,
(And I heard nor sigh nor groan)
With heavy thump, a lifeless lump,
They dropped down one by one.

But Life-in-Death begins her work on the ancient Mariner.

The souls did from their bodies fly— 220
They fled to bliss or woe!
And every soul, it passed me by,
Like the whizz of my cross-bow!

Part IV

The Wedding Guest feareth that a Spirit is talking to him;

"I fear thee, ancient Mariner!
I fear thy skinny hand! 225
And thou art long, and lank, and brown,
As is the ribbed sea-sand.

But the ancient Mariner assureth him of his bodily life, and proceedeth to relate his horrible penance.

I fear thee and thy glittering eye,
And thy skinny hand, so brown."—
Fear not, fear not, thou Wedding Guest! 230
This body dropped not down.

Alone, alone, all, all alone,
Alone on a wide wide sea!
And never a saint took pity on
My soul in agony. 235

He despiseth the creatures of the calm,

The many men, so beautiful!
And they all dead did lie:
And a thousand thousand slimy things
Lived on; and so did I.

And envieth that they should live, and so many lie dead.

I looked upon the rotting sea, 240
And drew my eyes away;
I looked upon the rotting deck,
And there the dead men lay.

I looked to heaven, and tried to pray;
But or ever a prayer had gushed, 245
A wicked whisper came, and made
My heart as dry as dust.

I closed my lids, and kept them close,
And the balls like pulses beat,
For the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky 250
Lay like a load on my weary eye,
And the dead were at my feet.

But the curse liveth for him in the eye of the dead men.

The cold sweat melted from their limbs,
Nor rot nor reek did they:
The look with which they looked on me 255
Had never passed away.

An orphan's curse would drag to hell
A spirit from on high;
But oh! more horrible than that
Is the curse in a dead man's eye! 260
Seven days, seven nights, I saw that curse,
And yet I could not die.

In his loneliness and fixedness he yearneth towards the journeying Moon, and the stars that still sojourn, yet still move onward; and everywhere the blue sky belongs to them, and is their appointed rest, and their native country and their own natural homes, which they enter unannounced, as lords that are certainly expected and yet there is a silent joy at their arrival.

The moving Moon went up the sky,
And nowhere did abide:
Softly she was going up, 265
And a star or two beside—

Her beams bemocked the sultry main,
Like April hoar-frost spread;
But where the ship's huge shadow lay,
The charmèd water burnt alway 270
A still and awful red.

By the light of the Moon he beholdeth God's creatures of the great calm.

Beyond the shadow of the ship,
I watched the water snakes:
They moved in tracks of shining white,
And when they reared, the elfish light 275
Fell off in hoary° flakes. gray or white

Within the shadow of the ship
I watched their rich attire:
Blue, glossy green, and velvet black,
They coiled and swam; and every track 280
Was a flash of golden fire.

Their beauty and their happiness.

O happy living things! no tongue
Their beauty might declare:
A spring of love gushed from my heart,

He blesseth them in his heart.

And I blessed them unaware: 285
Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
And I blessed them unaware.

The spell begins to break.

The self-same moment I could pray;
And from my neck so free
The Albatross fell off, and sank 290
Like lead into the sea.

Part V

Oh sleep! it is a gentle thing,
Beloved from pole to pole!

To Mary Queen the praise be given!
She sent the gentle sleep from Heaven, 295
That slid into my soul.

By grace of the holy Mother, the ancient Mariner is refreshed with rain.

The silly° buckets on the deck, lowly; harmless
That had so long remained,
I dreamt that they were filled with dew;
And when I awoke, it rained. 300

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank;
Sure I had drunken in my dreams,
And still my body drank.

I moved, and could not feel my limbs: 305
I was so light—almost
I thought that I had died in sleep,
And was a blessèd ghost.

He heareth sounds and seeth strange sights and commotions in the sky and the element.

And soon I heard a roaring wind:
It did not come anear; 310
But with its sound it shook the sails,
That were so thin and sere.° dry; withered

The upper air burst into life!
And a hundred fire-flags sheen,[9]
To and fro they were hurried about! 315
And to and fro, and in and out,
The wan stars danced between.

And the coming wind did roar more loud,
And the sails did sigh like sedge;[1]
And the rain poured down from one black cloud; 320
The Moon was at its edge.

The thick black cloud was cleft, and still
The Moon was at its side:
Like waters shot from some high crag,
The lightning fell with never a jag, 325
A river steep and wide.

The bodies of the ship's crew are inspirited, and the ship moves on;

The loud wind never reached the ship,
Yet now the ship moved on!
Beneath the lightning and the Moon
The dead men gave a groan. 330

They groaned, they stirred, they all uprose,
Nor spake, nor moved their eyes;

9. Shone. The "fire-flags" may be St. Elmo's fire (see note 8, p. 815), the Southern Lights, or lightning.
1. Rushlike plants bordering streams and lakes.

It had been strange, even in a dream,
To have seen those dead men rise.

The helmsman steered, the ship moved on; 335
Yet never a breeze up-blew;
The mariners all 'gan work the ropes,
Where they were wont to do;
They raised their limbs like lifeless tools—
We were a ghastly crew. 340

The body of my brother's son
Stood by me, knee to knee:
The body and I pulled at one rope,
But he said nought to me.

But not by the souls of the men, nor by demons of earth or middle air, but by a blesséd troop of angelic spirits, sent down by the invocation of the guardian saint.

"I fear thee, ancient Mariner!" 345
Be calm, thou Wedding Guest!
'Twas not those souls that fled in pain,
Which to their corses° came again, corpses
But a troop of spirits blest:

For when it dawned—they dropped their arms, 350
And clustered round the mast;
Sweet sounds rose slowly through their mouths,
And from their bodies passed.

Around, around, flew each sweet sound,
Then darted to the Sun; 355
Slowly the sounds came back again,
Now mixed, now one by one.

Sometimes a-dropping from the sky
I heard the sky-lark sing;
Sometimes all little birds that are, 360
How they seemed to fill the sea and air
With their sweet jargoning!° warbling

And now 'twas like all instruments,
Now like a lonely flute;
And now it is an angel's song, 365
That makes the heavens be mute.

It ceased; yet still the sails made on
A pleasant noise till noon,
A noise like of a hidden brook
In the leafy month of June, 370
That to the sleeping woods all night
Singeth a quiet tune.

Till noon we quietly sailed on,
Yet never a breeze did breathe:

Slowly and smoothly went the ship, 375
Moved onward from beneath.

The lonesome Spirit from the South Pole carries on the ship as far as the Line, in obedience to the angelic troop, but still requireth vengeance.

Under the keel nine fathom deep,
From the land of mist and snow,
The spirit slid: and it was he
That made the ship to go. 380
The sails at noon left off their tune,
And the ship stood still also.

The Sun, right up above the mast,
Had fixed her to the ocean:
But in a minute she 'gan stir, 385
With a short uneasy motion—
Backwards and forwards half her length
With a short uneasy motion.

Then like a pawing horse let go,
She made a sudden bound: 390
It flung the blood into my head,
And I fell down in a swound.

The Polar Spirit's fellow demons, the invisible inhabitants of the element, take part in his wrong; and two of them relate, one to the other, that penance long and heavy for the ancient Mariner hath been accorded to the Polar Spirit, who returneth southward.

How long in that same fit I lay,
I have not[2] to declare;
But ere my living life returned, 395
I heard and in my soul discerned
Two voices in the air.

"Is it he?" quoth one, "Is this the man?
By him who died on cross,
With his cruel bow he laid full low 400
The harmless Albatross.

The spirit who bideth by himself
In the land of mist and snow,
He loved the bird that loved the man
Who shot him with his bow." 405

The other was a softer voice,
As soft as honey-dew:
Quoth he, "The man hath penance done,
And penance more will do."

Part VI

FIRST VOICE

"But tell me, tell me! speak again, 410
Thy soft response renewing—
What makes that ship drive on so fast?
What is the ocean doing?"

2. I.e., have not the knowledge.

SECOND VOICE

"Still as a slave before his lord,
The ocean hath no blast; 415
His great bright eye most silently
Up to the Moon is cast—

If he may know which way to go;
For she guides him smooth or grim.
See, brother, see! how graciously 420
She looketh down on him."

FIRST VOICE

The Mariner hath been cast into a trance; for the angelic power causeth the vessel to drive northward faster than human life could endure.

"But why drives on that ship so fast,
Without or wave or wind?"

SECOND VOICE

"The air is cut away before,
And closes from behind. 425

Fly, brother, fly! more high, more high!
Or we shall be belated:
For slow and slow that ship will go,
When the Mariner's trance is abated."

The supernatural motion is retarded; the Mariner awakes, and his penance begins anew.

I woke, and we were sailing on 430
As in a gentle weather:
'Twas night, calm night, the moon was high;
The dead men stood together.

All stood together on the deck,
For a charnel-dungeon fitter: 435
All fixed on me their stony eyes,
That in the Moon did glitter.

The pang, the curse, with which they died,
Had never passed away:
I could not draw my eyes from theirs, 440
Nor turn them up to pray.

The curse is finally expiated.

And now this spell was snapped: once more
I viewed the ocean green,
And looked far forth, yet little saw
Of what had else been seen— 445

Like one, that on a lonesome road
Doth walk in fear and dread,
And having once turned round walks on,
And turns no more his head;
Because he knows, a frightful fiend 450
Doth close behind him tread.

But soon there breathed a wind on me,
Nor sound nor motion made:
Its path was not upon the sea,
In ripple or in shade. 455

It raised my hair, it fanned my cheek
Like a meadow-gale of spring—
It mingled strangely with my fears,
Yet it felt like a welcoming.

Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship, 460
Yet she sailed softly too:
Sweetly, sweetly blew the breeze—
On me alone it blew.

And the ancient Mariner beholdeth his native country.

Oh! dream of joy! is this indeed
The lighthouse top I see? 465
Is this the hill? is this the kirk?
Is this mine own countree?

We drifted o'er the harbor-bar,
And I with sobs did pray—
O let me be awake, my God 470
Or let me sleep alway.

The harbor-bay was clear as glass,
So smoothly it was strewn!
And on the bay the moonlight lay,
And the shadow of the Moon. 475

The rock shone bright, the kirk no less,
That stands above the rock:
The moonlight steeped in silentness
The steady weathercock.

And the bay was white with silent light, 480
Till rising from the same,

The angelic spirits leave the dead bodies,

Full many shapes, that shadows were,
In crimson colors came.

A little distance from the prow
Those crimson shadows were: 485

And appear in their own forms of light.

I turned my eyes upon the deck—
Oh, Christ! what saw I there!

Each corse lay flat, lifeless and flat,
And, by the holy rood!° — cross of Christ
A man all light, a seraph°-man, — angel-like
On every corse there stood.

This seraph-band, each waved his hand:
It was a heavenly sight!

They stood as signals to the land,
Each one a lovely light; 495

This seraph-band, each waved his hand,
No voice did they impart—
No voice; but oh! the silence sank
Like music on my heart.

But soon I heard the dash of oars, 500
I heard the Pilot's cheer;
My head was turned perforce away
And I saw a boat appear.

The Pilot and the Pilot's boy,
I heard them coming fast: 505
Dear Lord in Heaven! it was a joy
The dead men could not blast.

I saw a third—I heard his voice:
It is the Hermit good!
He singeth loud his godly hymns 510
That he makes in the wood.
He'll shrieve[3] my soul, he'll wash away
The Albatross's blood.

Part VII

The Hermit of the Wood

This Hermit good lives in that wood
Which slopes down to the sea. 515
How loudly his sweet voice he rears!
He loves to talk with marineres
That come from a far countree.

He kneels at morn, and noon, and eve—
He hath a cushion plump: 520
It is the moss that wholly hides
The rotted old oak stump.

The skiff-boat neared: I heard them talk,
"Why, this is strange, I trow!
Where are those lights so many and fair, 525
That signal made but now?"

Approacheth the ship with wonder.

"Strange, by my faith!" the Hermit said—
"And they answered not our cheer!
The planks looked warped! and see those sails,
How thin they are and sere! 530

3. Set free from sin.

I never saw aught like to them,
Unless perchance it were

Brown skeletons of leaves that lag
My forest-brook along;
When the ivy tod° is heavy with snow, bushy clump 535
And the owlet whoops to the wolf below,
That eats the she-wolf's young."

"Dear Lord! it hath a fiendish look,"
The Pilot made reply,
"I am a-feared"—"Push on, push on!" 540
Said the Hermit cheerily.

The boat came closer to the ship,
But I nor spake nor stirred;
The boat came close beneath the ship,
And straight a sound was heard. 545

The ship suddenly sinketh.

Under the water it rumbled on,
Still louder and more dread:
It reached the ship, it split the bay;
The ship went down like lead.

The ancient Mariner is saved in the Pilot's boat.

Stunned by that loud and dreadful sound, 550
Which sky and ocean smote,
Like one that hath been seven days drowned
My body lay afloat;
But swift as dreams, myself I found
Within the Pilot's boat. 555

Upon the whirl, where sank the ship,
The boat spun round and round;
And all was still, save that the hill
Was telling of the sound.

I moved my lips—the Pilot shrieked 560
And fell down in a fit;
The holy Hermit raised his eyes,
And prayed where he did sit.

I took the oars: the Pilot's boy,
Who now doth crazy go, 565
Laughed loud and long, and all the while
His eyes went to and fro.
"Ha! ha!" quoth he, "full plain I see,
The Devil knows how to row."

And now, all in my own countree, 570
I stood on the firm land!
The Hermit stepped forth from the boat,
And scarcely he could stand.

The ancient Mariner earnestly entreateth the Hermit to shrieve him; and the penance of life falls on him.

"O shrieve me, shrieve me, holy man!"
The Hermit crossed[4] his brow. 575
"Say quick," quoth he, "I bid thee say—
What manner of man art thou?"

Forthwith this frame of mine was wrenched
With a woeful agony,
Which forced me to begin my tale; 580
And then it left me free.

And ever and anon throughout his future life an agony constraineth him to travel from land to land;

Since then, at an uncertain hour,
That agony returns:
And till my ghastly tale is told,
This heart within me burns. 585

I pass, like night, from land to land;
I have strange power of speech;
That moment that his face I see,
I know the man that must hear me:
To him my tale I teach. 590

What loud uproar bursts from that door!
The wedding guests are there:
But in the garden-bower the bride
And bridemaids singing are:
And hark the little vesper bell, 595
Which biddeth me to prayer!

O Wedding Guest! this soul hath been
Alone on a wide wide sea:
So lonely 'twas, that God himself
Scarce seemèd there to be. 600

O sweeter than the marriage feast,
'Tis sweeter far to me,
To walk together to the kirk
With a goodly company!

To walk together to the kirk, 605
And all together pray,
While each to his great Father bends,
Old men, and babes, and loving friends
And youths and maidens gay!

And to teach, by his own example, love and reverence to all things that God made and loveth.

Farewell, farewell! but this I tell 610
To thee, thou Wedding Guest!
He prayeth well, who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast.

He prayeth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small; 615

4. Made the sign of the cross upon.

For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

The Mariner, whose eye is bright,
Whose beard with age is hoar,
Is gone: and now the Wedding Guest 620
Turned from the bridegroom's door.

He went like one that hath been stunned,
And is of sense forlorn:° forsaken
A sadder and a wiser man,
He rose the morrow morn. 625

Dejection: An Ode

Late, late yestreen I saw the new Moon,
With the old Moon in her arms;
And I fear, I fear, my master dear!
We shall have a deadly storm.
Ballad of Sir Patrick Spence[5]

I

Well! If the bard was weather-wise, who made
The grand old ballad of Sir Patrick Spence,
This night, so tranquil now, will not go hence
Unroused by winds, that ply a busier trade
5 Than those which mold yon cloud in lazy flakes,
Or the dull sobbing draft, that moans and rakes
Upon the strings of this Aeolian lute,[6]
Which better far were mute.
For lo! the New-moon winter-bright!
10 And overspread with phantom light,
(With swimming phantom light o'erspread
But rimmed and circled by a silver thread)
I see the old Moon in her lap, foretelling
The coming-on of rain and squally blast.
15 And oh! that even now the gust were swelling,
And the slant night shower driving loud and fast!
Those sounds which oft have raised me, whilst they awed,
And sent my soul abroad,
Might now perhaps their wonted° impulse give, usual
20 Might startle this dull pain, and make it move and live!

A grief without a pang, void, dark, and drear,
A stifled, drowsy, unimpassioned grief,

5. An early modern ballad (see p. 103).
6. The wind harp (named after Aeolus, Greek god of the winds) has a sounding board equipped with a set of strings that vibrate in response to air currents.

Which finds no natural outlet, no relief,
In word, or sigh, or tear—
25 O Lady! in this wan and heartless mood,
To other thoughts by yonder throstle° wooed, song thrush
All this long eve, so balmy and serene,
Have I been gazing on the western sky,
And its peculiar tint of yellow green:
30 And still I gaze—and with how blank an eye!
And those thin clouds above, in flakes and bars,
That give away their motion to the stars;
Those stars, that glide behind them or between,
Now sparkling, now bedimmed, but always seen:
35 Yon crescent Moon, as fixed as if it grew
In its own cloudless, starless lake of blue;
I see them all so excellently fair,
I see, not feel, how beautiful they are!

My genial° spirits° fail; creative / energies
40 And what can these avail
To lift the smothering weight from off my breast?
It were a vain endeavor,
Though I should gaze forever
On that green light that lingers in the west:
45 I may not hope from outward forms to win
The passion and the life, whose fountains are within.

O Lady! we receive but what we give,
And in our life alone does Nature live:
Ours is her wedding garment, ours her shroud!
50 And would we aught behold, of higher worth,
Than that inanimate cold world allowed
To the poor loveless ever-anxious crowd,
Ah! from the soul itself must issue forth
A light, a glory, a fair luminous cloud
55 Enveloping the Earth—
And from the soul itself must there be sent
A sweet and potent voice, of its own birth,
Of all sweet sounds the life and element!

O pure of heart! thou need'st not ask of me
60 What this strong music in the soul may be!
What, and wherein it doth exist,
This light, this glory, this fair luminous mist,
This beautiful and beauty-making power.
Joy, virtuous Lady! Joy that ne'er was given,
65 Save to the pure, and in their purest hour,
Life, and Life's effluence, cloud at once and shower,
Joy, Lady! is the spirit and the power,

Which wedding Nature to us gives in dower
  A new Earth and new Heaven,
70 Undreamt of by the sensual and the proud—
Joy is the sweet voice, Joy the luminous cloud—
    We in ourselves rejoice!
And thence flows all that charms or ear or sight,
  All melodies the echoes of that voice,
75 All colors a suffusion from that light.

There was a time when, though my path was rough,
  This joy within me dallied with distress,
And all misfortunes were but as the stuff
  Whence Fancy made me dreams of happiness:
80 For hope grew round me, like the twining vine,
And fruits, and foliage, not my own, seemed mine.
But now afflictions bow me down to earth:
Nor care I that they rob me of my mirth;
    But oh! each visitation
85 Suspends what nature gave me at my birth,
  My shaping spirit of Imagination.

For not to think of what I needs must feel,
  But to be still and patient, all I can;
And happily by abstruse research to steal
90 From my own nature all the natural man—
  This was my sole resource, my only plan:
Till that which suits a part infects the whole,
And now is almost grown the habit of my soul.

Hence, viper thoughts, that coil around my mind,
95 Reality's dark dream!
I turn from you, and listen to the wind,
  Which long has raved unnoticed. What a scream
Of agony by torture lengthened out
That lute sent forth! Thou Wind, that rav'st without,
100 Bare crag, or mountain tairn,° or blasted tree, pool
Or pine grove whither woodman never clomb,
Or lonely house, long held—the witches' home,
  Methinks were fitter instruments for thee,
Mad lutanist! who in this month of showers,
105 Of dark-brown gardens, and of peeping flowers,
Mak'st devils' yule,[7] with worse than wintry song,
The blossoms, buds, and timorous° leaves among. timid
  Thou actor, perfect in all tragic sounds!
Thou mighty poet, e'en to frenzy bold!
110 What tell'st thou now about?
    'Tis of the rushing of an host in rout,
  With groans, of trampled men, with smarting wounds—
At once they groan with pain, and shudder with the cold!

7. A winter storm in spring; hence an unnatural or "devils' " Christmas.

But hush! there is a pause of deepest silence!
115 And all that noise, as of a rushing crowd,
With groans, and tremulous shudderings—all is over—
It tells another tale, with sounds less deep and loud!
A tale of less affright,
And tempered with delight,
120 As Otway's[8] self had framed the tender lay—
'Tis of a little child
Upon a lonesome wild,
Not far from home, but she hath lost her way:
And now moans low in bitter grief and fear,
125 And now screams loud, and hopes to make her mother hear.

'Tis midnight, but small thoughts have I of sleep:
Full seldom may my friend such vigils keep!
Visit her, gentle Sleep! with wings of healing,
And may this storm be but a mountain birth,
130 May all the stars hang bright above her dwelling,
Silent as though they watched the sleeping Earth!
With light heart may she rise,
Gay fancy, cheerful eyes,
Joy lift her spirit, joy attune her voice;
135 To her may all things live, from pole to pole,
Their life the eddying of her living soul!
O simple spirit, guided from above,
Dear Lady! friend devoutest of my choice,
Thus mayest thou ever, evermore rejoice.

Rose Aylmer[1]

Ah what avails the sceptered race,
Ah what the form divine!
What every virtue, every grace!
Rose Aylmer, all were thine.
5 Rose Aylmer, whom these wakeful eyes
May weep, but never see,
A night of memories and of sighs
I consecrate to thee.

Past Ruined Ilion Helen[2] Lives

Past ruined Ilion Helen lives,
Alcestis[3] rises from the shades;
Verse calls them forth; 'tis verse that gives
Immortal youth to mortal maids.

5 Soon shall Oblivion's deepening veil
Hide all the peopled hills you see,
The gay, the proud, while lovers hail
In distant ages you and me.

The tear for fading beauty check,
10 For passing glory cease to sigh;
One form shall rise above the wreck,
One name, Ianthe,[4] shall not die.

There is delight in singing, though none hear
Beside the singer; and there is delight
In praising, though the praiser sit alone
And see the praised far off him, far above.
5 Shakspeare is not our poet, but the world's,
Therefore on him no speech; and short for thee,
Browning! Since Chaucer was alive and hale,
No man hath walked along our roads with step
So active, so inquiring eye, or tongue
10 So varied in discourse. But warmer climes
Give brighter plumage, stronger wing; the breeze

Dying Speech of an Old Philosopher

I strove with none, for none was worth my strife:
Nature I loved, and, next to Nature, Art:
I warmed both hands before the fire of Life;
It sinks; and I am ready to depart.

GEORGE GORDON, LORD BYRON
1788–1824

Written after Swimming from Sestos to Abydos[1]

If, in the month of dark December,
Leander, who was nightly wont° accustomed
(What maid will not the tale remember?)
To cross thy stream, broad Hellespont!

5 If, when the wintry tempest roared,
He sped to Hero, nothing loath,
And thus of old thy current poured,
Fair Venus! how I pity both!

For me, degenerate modern wretch,
10 Though in the genial month of May,
My dripping limbs I faintly stretch,
And think I've done a feat today.

But since he crossed the rapid tide,
According to the doubtful story,

8. In Greek mythology, the Sirens drowned themselves in despair when Odysseus escaped the lure of their song. Sorrento and Amalfi: towns near Naples that Browning visited on his second trip to Italy in 1844 and that figure in some of his early poems.

1. The Hellespont, or Dardanelles, is the strait separating Europe from Asia Minor, between Abydos on the Greek shore and Sestos on the Asian. In Greek mythology, Leander used to swim from Abydos to visit his sweetheart, Hero, at Sestos.

15 To woo—and—Lord knows what beside,
And swam for Love, as I for Glory;

'Twere hard to say who fared the best:
Sad mortals! thus the gods still plague you!
He lost his labor, I my jest;
20 For he was drowned, and I've the ague.° chills and fever

She Walks in Beauty

I

She walks in beauty, like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies;
And all that's best of dark and bright
Meet in her aspect and her eyes:
5 Thus mellowed to that tender light
Which heaven to gaudy day denies.

One shade the more, one ray the less,
Had half impaired the nameless grace
Which waves in every raven tress,
10 Or softly lightens o'er her face;
Where thoughts serenely sweet express
How pure, how dear their dwelling place.

And on that cheek, and o'er that brow,
So soft, so calm, yet eloquent,
15 The smiles that win, the tints that glow,
But tell of days in goodness spent,
A mind at peace with all below,
A heart whose love is innocent!

The Destruction of Sennacherib[2]

I

The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

2. Assyrian king, whose armies, while besieging Jerusalem (701 B.C.E.), were attacked by a violent plague (2 Kings 19.35).

5 Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay withered and strown.

For the Angel of Death spread his wings on the blast,
10 And breathed in the face of the foe as he passed;
And the eyes of the sleepers waxed deadly and chill,
And their hearts but once heaved, and forever grew still!

And there lay the steed with his nostril all wide,
But through it there rolled not the breath of his pride;
15 And the foam of his gasping lay white on the turf,
And cold as the spray of the rock-beating surf.

And there lay the rider distorted and pale,
With the dew on his brow, and the rust on his mail:
And the tents were all silent, the banners alone,
20 The lances unlifted, the trumpet unblown.

And the widows of Ashur° are loud in their wail, Assyria
And the idols are broke in the temple of Baal;[3]
And the might of the Gentile,[4] unsmote by the sword,
Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!

When We Two Parted

When we two parted
In silence and tears,
Half broken-hearted
To sever for years,
5 Pale grew thy cheek and cold,
Colder thy kiss;
Truly that hour foretold
Sorrow to this.

The dew of the morning
10 Sunk chill on my brow—
It felt like the warning

3. Deity of the Assyrians.

4. A non-Jewish person; here, Sennacherib.

Of what I feel now.
Thy vows are all broken,
And light is thy fame;
15 I hear thy name spoken,
And share in its shame.

They name thee before me,
A knell to mine ear;
A shudder comes o'er me—
20 Why wert thou so dear?
They know not I knew thee,
Who knew thee too well—
Long, long shall I rue thee,
Too deeply to tell.

25 In secret we met—
In silence I grieve,
That thy heart could forget,
Thy spirit deceive.
If I should meet thee
30 After long years,
How should I greet thee?—
With silence and tears.

So We'll Go No More A-Roving

So we'll go no more a-roving
So late into the night,
Though the heart be still as loving,
And the moon be still as bright.

5 For the sword outwears its sheath,
And the soul wears out the breast,
And the heart must pause to breathe,
And Love itself have rest.

Though the night was made for loving,
10 And the day returns too soon,
Yet we'll go no more a-roving
By the light of the moon.

From Don Juan[5]

Fragment on the Back of the Ms. of Canto I

I would to Heaven that I were so much clay,
  As I am blood, bone, marrow, passion, feeling—
Because at least the past were passed away,
  And for the future—(but I write this reeling,
5 Having got drunk exceedingly to-day,
  So that I seem to stand upon the ceiling)
I say—the future is a serious matter—
And so—for God's sake—hock[6] and soda-water!

From Canto the First

I want° a hero: an uncommon want, lack
  When every year and month sends forth a new one,
Till, after cloying the gazettes[7] with cant,
  The age discovers he is not the true one;
5 Of such as these I should not care to vaunt,
  I'll therefore take our ancient friend Don Juan—
We all have seen him, in the pantomime,[8]
Sent to the Devil somewhat ere his time.

Vernon, the butcher Cumberland, Wolfe, Hawke,
10 Prince Ferdinand, Granby, Burgoyne, Keppel, Howe,[9]
Evil and good, have had their tithe° of talk, due tribute
  And filled their sign-posts then, like Wellesley now;
Each in their turn like Banquo's monarchs stalk,
  Followers of Fame, "nine farrow" of that sow:[1]
15 France, too, had Buonaparté and Dumourier
Recorded in the Moniteur and Courier.[2]

Barnave, Brissot, Condorcet, Mirabeau,
  Petion, Clootz, Danton, Marat, La Fayette[3]
Were French, and famous people, as we know;

5. Pronounced in the English fashion, Don Joó-un. The hero is a legendary Spanish nobleman, a notorious seducer of women; in most versions, but not Byron's satire, finally carried off to hell. Canto I comprises 222 stanzas; stanzas 1–119, given here, conclude with the beginning of the romance between Don Juan and Donna Julia.
6. Rhine wine, a supposed remedy for the hangover.
7. Official notices or newspapers.
8. I.e., on the stage, in one or another of many adaptations.
9. British military leaders of the eighteenth century, their fame extinguished by more recent "heroes," such as Wellesley (line 12), the duke of Wellington, who defeated Napoleon at Waterloo.
1. Cf. Shakespeare's Macbeth 4.1, lines 80–81 ("Pour in sow's blood that hath eaten / Her nine farrow") and 118–19 ("shall Banquo's issue ever / Reign in this kingdom?"). The sow, Fame, eats her offspring—i.e., the heroes just listed.
2. "Buonaparté" is Napoleon, and Dumourier a French general, both of whose victories and defeats were chronicled in the French newspapers Gazette Nationale; ou le Moniteur Universel and le Courier Republicain.
3. French generals and politicians connected with the French Revolution, many of them guillotined.

20 And there were others, scarce forgotten yet,
Joubert, Hoche, Marceau, Lannes, Desaix, Moreau,[4]
And many of the military set,
Exceedingly remarkable at times,
But not at all adapted to my rhymes.

25 Nelson[5] was once Britannia's god of War,
And still should be so, but the tide is turned;
There's no more to be said of Trafalgar,
'Tis with our hero quietly inurned;
Because the army's grown more popular,
30 At which the naval people are concerned;
Besides, the Prince is all for the land-service,
Forgetting Duncan, Nelson, Howe, and Jervis.[6]

Brave men were living before Agamemnon[7]
And since, exceeding valorous and sage,
35 A good deal like him too, though quite the same none;
But then they shone not on the poet's page,
And so have been forgotten:—I condemn none,
But can't find any in the present age
Fit for my poem (that is, for my new one);
40 So, as I said, I'll take my friend Don Juan.

Most epic poets plunge "in medias res"[8]
(Horace makes this the heroic turnpike road),
And then your hero tells, when'er you please,
What went before—by way of episode,
45 While seated after dinner at his ease,
Beside his mistress in some soft abode,
Palace, or garden, paradise, or cavern,
Which serves the happy couple for a tavern.

That is the usual method, but not mine—
50 My way is to begin with the beginning;
The regularity of my design
Forbids all wandering as the worst of sinning,
And therefore I shall open with a line
(Although it cost me half an hour in spinning),
55 Narrating somewhat of Don Juan's father,
And also of his mother, if you'd rather.

4. Other French military men; most of these died in battle.
5. British naval hero, fatally wounded at the Battle of Trafalgar (1805).
6. British naval commanders. The Prince: the prince of Wales.
7. Commander of the Greeks at the siege of Troy.
8. In Ars Poetica 148–49, the Roman poet and satirist Horace (65–8 B.C.E.) asserted that the writer of an epic should rush his readers "into the middle of the story."

In Seville was he born, a pleasant city,
  Famous for oranges and women—he
Who has not seen it will be much to pity,
60 So says the proverb—and I quite agree;
Of all the Spanish towns is none more pretty,
  Cadiz perhaps—but that you soon may see;
Don Juan's parents lived beside the river,
A noble stream, and called the Guadalquivir.

65 His father's name was Jóse[9]—Don, of course,—
  A true Hidalgo,[1] free from every stain
Of Moor or Hebrew blood, he traced his source
  Through the most Gothic gentlemen of Spain;[2]
A better cavalier ne'er mounted horse,
70 Or, being mounted, e'er got down again,
Than José, who begot our hero, who
Begot—but that's to come—Well, to renew:

10

His mother was a learnèd lady, famed
  For every branch of every science known—
75 In every Christian language ever named,
  With virtues equaled by her wit alone:
She made the cleverest people quite ashamed,
  And even the good with inward envy groan,
Finding themselves so very much exceeded,
80 In their own way, by all the things that she did.

11

Her memory was a mine: she knew by heart
  All Calderon and greater part of Lopé,[3]
So, that if any actor missed his part,
  She could have served him for the prompter's copy;
85 For her Feinagle's[4] were an useless art,
  And he himself obliged to shut up shop—he Could never make a memory so fine as
That which adorned the brain of Donna Inez.

12

Her favorite science was the mathematical,
90 Her noblest virtue was her magnanimity,
Her wit (she sometimes tried at wit) was Attic[5] all,
  Her serious sayings darkened to sublimity;

9. The Spanish spelling is José, but Byron's meter requires Jóse.
1. Spanish noble of minor degree.
2. Descended from the Visigoths, who conquered Spain in the fifth century.
3. Calderón de la Barca (1600–1681) and Lope de Vega (1562–1635), preeminent Spanish dramatists.
4. Gregor von Feinagle (1765–1819), originator of mnemonics, a method of memorization. He lectured in England in 1811.
5. Athenian; i.e., refined, learned.

In short, in all things she was fairly what I call
  A prodigy—her morning dress was dimity,
95 Her evening silk, or, in the summer, muslin,
And other stuffs, with which I won't stay puzzling.

13

She knew the Latin—that is, "the Lord's prayer,"
  And Greek—the alphabet—I'm nearly sure;
She read some French romances here and there,
100 Although her mode of speaking was not pure;
For native Spanish she had no great care,
  At least her conversation was obscure;
Her thoughts were theorems, her words a problem,
As if she deemed that mystery would ennoble 'em.

14

105 She liked the English and the Hebrew tongue,
  And said there was analogy between 'em;
She proved it somehow out of sacred song,
  But I must leave the proofs of those who've seen 'em;
But this I heard her say, and can't be wrong,
110 And all may think which way their judgments lean 'em,
" 'Tis strange—the Hebrew noun which means 'I am,'[6]
The English always use to govern d——n."[7]

15

Some women use their tongues—she looked a lecture,
  Each eye a sermon, and her brow a homily,
115 An all-in-all sufficient self-director,
  Like the lamented late Sir Samuel Romilly,[8]
The Law's expounder, and the State's corrector,
  Whose suicide was almost an anomaly—
One sad example more, that "All is vanity"[9]—
120 (The jury brought their verdict in "Insanity!")

16

In short, she was a walking calculation,
  Miss Edgeworth's novels stepping from their covers,
Or Mrs. Trimmer's books on education,
  Or "Coelebs' Wife"[1] set out in quest of lovers,
125 Morality's prim personifation,
  In which not Envy's self a flaw discovers;
To others' share let "female errors fall,"[2]
For she had not even one—the worst of all.

6. The name of God, "I am that I am" (Exodus 3.14).
7. English gentlemen traveling on the European continent were sometimes known as "Goddams," from their habitual profanity.
8. Lawyer for Byron's wife in a suit for separation.
9. Cf. Ecclesiastes 1.2.
1. A novel by Hannah More (1745–1833; see pp. 707–11), who like Maria Edgeworth (line 122) and Sarah Trimmer (line 123) was a writer Byron could not take seriously.
2. Quoted from Alexander Pope, The Rape of the Lock 2.17. Errors: frailties or foibles.

17

Oh! she was perfect past all parallel—
130 Of any modern female saint's comparison;
So far above the cunning powers of Hell,
Her Guardian Angel had given up his garrison;
Even her minutest motions went as well
As those of the best time-piece made by Harrison;[3]
135 In virtues nothing earthly could surpass her,
Save thine "incomparable oil," Macassar![4]

18

Perfect she was, but as perfection is
Insipid in this naughty world of ours,
Where our first parents[5] never learned to kiss
140 Till they were exiled from their earlier bowers,
Where all was peace, and innocence, and bliss,
(I wonder how they got through the twelve hours),
Don Jóse, like a lineal son of Eve,
Went plucking various fruit without her leave.

19

145 He was a mortal of the careless kind,
With no great love for learning, or the learned,
Who chose to go where'er he had a mind,
And never dreamed his lady was concerned;
The world, as usual, wickedly inclined
150 To see a kingdom or a house o'erturned,
Whispered he had a mistress, some said two.
But for domestic quarrels one will do.

20

Now Donna Inez had, with all her merit,
A great opinion of her own good qualities;
155 Neglect, indeed, requires a saint to bear it,
And such, indeed, she was in her moralities;° moralizing
But then she had a devil of a spirit,
And sometimes mixed up fancies with realities,
And let few opportunities escape
160 Of getting her liege lord into a scrape.

21

This was an easy matter with a man
Oft in the wrong, and never on his guard;
And even the wisest, do the best they can,
Have moments, hours, and days, so unprepared,
165 That you might "brain them with their lady's fan";[6]
And sometimes ladies hit exceeding hard,

3. John Harrison (1693–1776) improved the accuracy of watches and chronometers.
4. A much-advertised hairdressing.
5. I.e., Adam and Eve; see Genesis.
6. Modified quotation from Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV 2.4.19.

And fans turn into falchions° in fair hands, swords
And why and wherefore no one understands.

22

'Tis pity learnèd virgins ever wed
170 With persons of no sort of education,
Or gentlemen, who, though well born and bred,
Grow tired of scientific conversation:
I don't choose to say much upon this head,
I'm a plain man, and in a single station,
175 But—Oh! ye lords of ladies intellectual,
Inform us truly, have they not hen-pecked you all?

23

Don Jóse and his lady quarrelled—why,
Not any of the many could divine,
Though several thousand people chose to try,
180 'Twas surely no concern of theirs nor mine;
I loath that low vice—curiosity;
But if there's anything in which I shine,
'Tis in arranging all my friends' affairs,
Not having, of my own, domestic cares.

24

185 And so I interfered, and with the best
Intentions, but their treatment was not kind;
I think the foolish people were possessed,
For neither of them could I ever find,
Although their porter afterwards confessed—
190 But that's no matter, and the worst's behind,
For little Juan o'er me threw, down stairs,
A pail of housemaid's water unawares.

25

A little curly-headed, good-for-nothing,
And mischief-making monkey from his birth;
195 His parents ne'er agreed except in doting
Upon the most unquiet imp on earth;
Instead of quarrelling, had they been but both in
Their senses, they'd have sent young master forth
To school, or had him soundly whipped at home,
200 To teach him manners for the time to come.

26

Don Jóse and the Donna Inez led
For some time an unhappy sort of life,
Wishing each other, not divorced, but dead;
They lived respectably as man and wife,
205 Their conduct was exceedingly well-bred,
And gave no outward signs of inward strife,

Until at length the smothered fire broke out,
And put the business past all kind of doubt.

27

For Inez called some druggists and physicians,
210 And tried to prove her loving lord was mad,
But as he had some lucid intermissions,
She next decided he was only bad;
Yet when they asked her for her depositions,
No sort of explanation could be had,
215 Save that her duty both to man and God
Required this conduct—which seemed very odd.

28

She kept a journal, where his faults were noted,
And opened certain trunks of books and letters,
All which might, if occasion served, be quoted;
220 And then she had all Seville for abettors,
Besides her good old grandmother (who doted);
The hearers of her case became repeaters,
Then advocates, inquisitors, and judges,
Some for amusement, others for old grudges.

29

225 And then this best and meekest woman bore
With such serenity her husband's woes,
Just as the Spartan ladies did of yore,
Who saw their spouses killed, and nobly chose
Never to say a word about them more—
230 Calmly she heard each calumny that rose,
And saw his agonies with such sublimity,
That all the world exclaimed, "What magnanimity!"

30

No doubt this patience, when the world is damning us,
Is philosophic in our former friends;
235 'Tis also pleasant to be deemed magnanimous,
The more so in obtaining our own ends;
And what the lawyers call a "malus animus"[7]
Conduct like this by no means comprehends:
Revenge in person's certainly no virtue,
240 But then 'tis not my fault, if others hurt you.

31

And if our quarrels should rip up old stories,
And help them with a lie or two additional,
I'm not to blame, as you well know—no more is
Any one else—they were become traditional;
245 Besides, their resurrection aids our glories
By contrast, which is what we just were wishing all:

7. Malicious intent (Latin).

And Science profits by this resurrection—
Dead scandals form good subjects for dissection.

32

Their friends had tried at reconciliation,
250 Then their relations, who made matters worse.
('Twere hard to tell upon a like occasion
To whom it may be best to have recourse—
I can't say much for friend or yet relation):
The lawyers did their utmost for divorce,
255 But scarce a fee was paid on either side
Before, unluckily, Don Jóse died.

33

He died: and most unluckily, because,
According to all hints I could collect
From Counsel learnéd in those kinds of laws,
260 (Although their talk's obscure and circumspect)
His death contrived to spoil a charming cause;° legal case
A thousand pities also with respect
To public feeling, which on this occasion
Was manifested in a great sensation.

34

265 But ah! he died; and buried with him lay
The public feeling and the lawyers' fees:
His house was sold, his servants sent away,
A Jew took one of his two mistresses,
A priest the other—at least so they say:
270 I asked the doctors after his disease—
He died of the slow fever called the tertian,[8]
And left his widow to her own aversion.

35

Yet Jóse was an honorable man,
That I must say, who knew him very well;
275 Therefore his frailties I'll no further scan,
Indeed there were not many more to tell:
And if his passions now and then outran
Discretion, and were not so peaceable
As Numa's (who was also named Pompilius),[9]
280 He had been ill brought up, and was born bilious.° bad tempered

36

Whate'er might be his worthlessness or worth,
Poor fellow! he had many things to wound him.
Let's own—since it can do no good on earth—
It was a trying moment that which found him
285 Standing alone beside his desolate hearth,

8. A form of malaria.
9. Ancient Roman king, famed for the comparative peace of his forty-three-year reign.

Where all his household gods lay shivered° round him: broken
No choice was left his feelings or his pride,
Save Death or Doctor's Commons° so he died. divorce courts

37

Dying intestate,° Juan was sole heir leaving no will 290 To a chancery suit,[1] and messuages,° and lands, household lands
Which, with a long minority[2] and care,
Promised to turn out well in proper hands:
Inez became sole guardian, which was fair,
And answered but to Nature's just demands;
295 An only son left with an only mother
Is brought up much more wisely than another.

38

Sagest of women, even of widows, she
Resolved that Juan should be quite a paragon,
And worthy of the noblest pedigree,
300 (His Sire was of Castile, his Dam from Aragon):
Then, for accomplishments of chivalry,
In case our Lord the King should go to war again,
He learned the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
And how to scale a fortress—or a nunnery.

39

305 But that which Donna Inez most desired,
And saw into herself each day before all
The learnéd tutors whom for him she hired,
Was, that his breeding should be strictly moral:
Much into all his studies she inquired,
310 And so they were submitted first to her, all,
Arts, sciences—no branch was made a mystery
To Juan's eyes, excepting natural history.

40

The languages, especially the dead,
The sciences, and most of all the abstruse,
315 The arts, at least all such as could be said
To be the most remote from common use,
In all these he was much and deeply read:
But not a page of anything that's loose,
Or hints continuation of the species,
320 Was ever suffered, lest he should grow vicious.

41

His classic studies made a little puzzle,
Because of filthy loves of gods and goddesses,
Who in the earlier ages raised a bustle,
But never put on pantaloons or bodices;

1. Drawn-out legal proceedings over inheritance of property.
2. Before he should come of age.

325 His reverend tutors had at times a tussle,
And for their Aeneids, Iliads, and Odysseys,
Were forced to make an odd sort of apology,
For Donna Inez dreaded the Mythology.

42

Ovid's a rake, as half his verses show him,
330 Anacreon's morals are a still worse sample,
Catullus scarcely has a decent poem,
I don't think Sappho's Ode a good example,[3]
Although Longinus[4] tells us there is no hymn
Where the Sublime soars forth on wings more ample;
335 But Virgil's songs are pure, except that horrid one
Beginning with "Formosum Pastor Corydon."[5]

43

Lucretius' irreligion is too strong
For early stomachs, to prove wholesome food;
I can't help thinking Juvenal was wrong,
340 Although no doubt his real intent was good,
For speaking out so plainly in his song,
So much indeed as to be downright rude;
And then what proper person can be partial
To all those nauseous epigrams of Martial?[6]

44

345 Juan was taught from out the best edition,
Expurgated by learnèd men, who place,
Judiciously, from out the schoolboy's vision,
The grosser parts; but, fearful to deface
Too much their modest bard by this omission,
350 And pitying sore his mutilated case,
They only add them all in an appendix,[7]
Which saves, in fact, the trouble of an index;

45

For there we have them all "at one fell swoop,"[8]
Instead of being scattered through the pages;
355 They stand forth marshaled in a handsome troop,
To meet the ingenuous youth of future ages,
Till some less rigid editor shall stoop
To call them back into their separate cages,
Instead of standing staring all together,
360 Like garden gods[9]—and not so decent either.

3. These lines name Greek and Roman classic and erotic poets.
4. The presumed author (first century C.E.) of a treatise on "the sublime" in literature.
5. "Handsome Shepherd Corydon": opening words of Virgil's Second Eclogue (a pastoral poem), concerned with love between young men.
6. Like Lucretius (line 337) and Juvenal (line 339), a Roman poet. Lucretius was a philosophic atheist; Juvenal and Martial were severe and sometimes obscene satirists.
7. "Fact! There is, or was, such an edition, with all the obnoxious epigrams of Martial placed by themselves at the end" [Byron's note].
8. Allusion to Macduff's reaction upon learning of the death of his family: "What! All my pretty chickens and their dam / At one fell swoop?" (Shakespeare, Macbeth 4.3.219–20).
9. Statues of fertility deities, often phallic.

46

The Missal too (it was the family Missal)
Was ornamented in a sort of way
Which ancient mass-books often are, and this all Kinds of grotesques illumined; and how they,
365 Who saw those figures on the margin kiss all,
Could turn their optics to the text and pray,
Is more than I know—But Don Juan's mother
Kept this herself, and gave her son another.

47

Sermons he read, and lectures he endured,
370 And homilies, and lives of all the saints;
To Jerome and to Chrysostom[1] inured,
He did not take such studies for restraints;
But how Faith is acquired, and then insured,
So well not one of the aforesaid paints
375 As Saint Augustine[2] in his fine Confessions,
Which make the reader envy his transgressions.

48

This, too, was a sealed book to little Juan—
I can't but say that his mamma was right,
If such an education was the true one.
380 She scarcely trusted him from out her sight;
Her maids were old, and if she took a new one,
You might be sure she was a perfect fright;
She did this during even her husband's life—
I recommend as much to every wife.

49

385 Young Juan waxed in goodliness and grace;
At six a charming child, and at eleven
With all the promise of as fine a face
As e'er to man's maturer growth was given:
He studied steadily, and grew apace,
390 And seemed, at least, in the right road to Heaven,
For half his days were passed at church, the other
Between his tutors, confessor,° and mother. private chaplain

50

At six, I said, he was a charming child,
At twelve he was a fine, but quiet boy;
395 Although in infancy a little wild,
They tamed him down amongst them: to destroy
His natural spirit not in vain they toiled,
At least it seemed so; and his mother's joy
Was to declare how sage, and still, and steady,
400 Her young philosopher was grown already.

1. Saints and teachers of the early Church.
2. Another early father of the Church; his autobiography candidly describes his worldly life before conversion.

51

I had my doubts, perhaps I have them still,
  But what I say is neither here nor there:
I knew his father well, and have some skill
  In character—but it would not be fair
405 From sire to son to augur good or ill:
  He and his wife were an ill-sorted pair—
But scandal's my aversion—I protest
Against all evil speaking, even in jest.

52

For my part I say nothing—nothing—but
410 This I will say—my reasons are my own—
That if I had an only son to put
  To school (as God be praised that I have none),
'Tis not with Donna Inez I would shut
  Him up to learn his catechism[3] alone,
415 No—no—I'd send him out betimes to college,
For there it was I picked up my own knowledge.

53

For there one learns—'tis not for me to boast,
  Though I acquired—but I pass over that,
As well as all the Greek I since have lost:
420 I say that there's the place—but "Verbum sat,"[4]
I think I picked up too, as well as most,
  Knowledge of matters—but no matter what—
I never married—but, I think, I know
That sons should not be educated so.

54

425 Young Juan now was sixteen years of age,
  Tall, handsome, slender, but well knit: he seemed
Active, though not so sprightly, as a page;
  And everybody but his mother deemed
Him almost man; but she flew in a rage
430 And bit her lips (for else she might have screamed)
If any said so—for to be precocious
Was in her eyes a thing the most atrocious.

55

Amongst her numerous acquaintance, all
  Selected for discretion and devotion,
435 There was the Donna Julia, whom to call
  Pretty were but to give a feeble notion
Of many charms in her as natural
  As sweetness to the flower, or salt to Ocean,

3. A brief summary of Christian teaching.

4. A word to the wise suffices (Latin).

Her zone to Venus,[5] or his bow to Cupid,
440 (But this last simile is trite and stupid.)

56

The darkness of her Oriental eye
Accorded with her Moorish origin;
(Her blood was not all Spanish; by the by,
In Spain, you know, this is a sort of sin;)
445 When proud Granada fell, and, forced to fly,
Boabdil[6] wept: of Donna Julia's kin
Some went to Africa, some stayed in Spain—
Her great great grandmamma chose to remain.

57

She married (I forget the pedigree)
450 With an Hidalgo, who transmitted down
His blood less noble than such blood should be;
At such alliances his sires would frown,
In that point so precise in each degree
That they bred in and in, as might be shown,
455 Marrying their cousins—nay, their aunts, and nieces,
Which always spoils the breed, if it increases.

58

This heathenish cross restored the breed again,
Ruined its blood,[7] but much improved its flesh;
For from a root the ugliest in Old Spain
460 Sprung up a branch as beautiful as fresh;
The sons no more were short, the daughters plain:
But there's a rumor which I fain would hush,
'Tis said that Donna Julia's grandmamma
Produced her Don more heirs at love than law.

59

465 However this might be, the race went on
Improving still through every generation,
Until it centered in an only son,
Who left an only daughter; my narration
May have suggested that this single one
470 Could be but Julia (whom on this occasion
I shall have much to speak about), and she
Was married, charming, chaste, and twenty-three.

60

Her eye (I'm very fond of handsome eyes)
Was large and dark, suppressing half its fire
475 Until she spoke, then through its soft disguise
Flashed an expression more of pride than ire,

5. The magical girdle ("zone") of Venus, Roman goddess of love and beauty, made its wearer sexually attractive.
6. The last Moorish king of Granada, a province of Spain.
7. Bloodline, i.e., pure lineage.

And love than either; and there would arise
  A something in them which was not desire,
  But would have been, perhaps, but for the soul
480 Which struggled through and chastened down the whole.

61

Her glossy hair was clustered o'er a brow
  Bright with intelligence, and fair, and smooth;
Her eyebrow's shape was like the aërial bow,° rainbow
  Her cheek all purple° with the beam of youth, rosy
485 Mounting, at times, to a transparent glow,
  As if her veins ran lightning; she, in sooth,
Possessed an air and grace by no means common:
Her stature tall—I hate a dumpy woman.

62

Wedded she was some years, and to a man
490 Of fifty, and such husbands are in plenty;
And yet, I think, instead of such a ONE
  'Twere better to have TWO of five-and-twenty,
Especially in countries near the sun:
  And now I think on't, "mi vien in mente,"[8]
495 Ladies even of the most uneasy virtue
Prefer a spouse whose age is short of thirty.

63

'Tis a sad thing, I cannot choose but say,
  And all the fault of that indecent sun,
Who cannot leave alone our helpless clay,
500 But will keep baking, broiling, burning on,
That howsoever people fast and pray,
  The flesh is frail, and so the soul undone:
What men call gallantry, and gods adultery,
Is much more common where the climate's sultry.

64

505 Happy the nations of the moral North!
  Where all is virtue, and the winter season
Sends sin, without a rag on, shivering forth
  ('Twas snow that brought St. Anthony to reason);[9]
Where juries cast up what a wife is worth,
510 By laying whate'er sum, in mulct,[1] they please on
The lover, who must pay a handsome price,
Because it is a marketable vice.

65

Alfonso was the name of Julia's lord,
  A man well looking for his years, and who
515 Was neither much beloved nor yet abhorred:

8. It comes to my mind (Italian).
9. St. Anthony recommended the application of snow as a remedy for lust.
1. As a fine.

They lived together as most people do,
Suffering each other's foibles by accord,
And not exactly either one or two;
Yet he was jealous, though he did not show it,
520 For Jealousy dislikes the world to know it.

66

Julia was—yet I never could see why—
With Donna Inez quite a favorite friend;
Between their tastes there was small sympathy,
For not a line had Julia ever penned:
525 Some people whisper (but, no doubt, they lie,
For Malice still imputes some private end)
That Inez had, ere Don Alfonso's marriage,
Forgot with him her very prudent carriage;° behavior

67

And that still keeping up the old connection,
530 Which Time had lately rendered much more chaste,
She took his lady also in affection,
And certainly this course was much the best:
She flattered Julia with her sage protection,
And complimented Don Alfonso's taste;
535 And if she could not (who can?) silence scandal,
At least she left it a more slender handle.

68

I can't tell whether Julia saw the affair
With other people's eyes, or if her own
Discoveries made, but none could be aware
540 Of this, at least no symptom e'er was shown;
Perhaps she did not know, or did not care,
Indifferent from the first, or callous grown:
I'm really puzzled what to think or say,
She kept her counsel in so close a way.

69

545 Juan she saw, and, as a pretty child,
Caressed him often—such a thing might be
Quite innocently done, and harmless styled,
When she had twenty years, and thirteen he;
But I am not so sure I should have smiled
550 When he was sixteen, Julia twenty-three;
These few short years make wondrous alterations,
Particularly amongst sun-burnt nations.

70

Whate'er the cause might be, they had become
Changed; for the dame grew distant, the youth shy,
555 Their looks cast down, their greetings almost dumb,
And much embarrassment in either eye;

There surely will be little doubt with some
   That Donna Julia knew the reason why,
But as for Juan, he had no more notion
560 Than he who never saw the sea of Ocean.

71

Yet Julia's very coldness still was kind,
   And tremulously gentle her small hand
Withdrew itself from his, but left behind
   A little pressure, thrilling, and so bland
565 And slight, so very slight, that to the mind
   'Twas but a doubt; but ne'er magician's wand
Wrought change with all Armida's[2] fairy art
Like what this light touch left on Juan's heart.

72

And if she met him, though she smiled no more,
570   She looked a sadness sweeter than her smile,
As if her heart had deeper thoughts in store
   She must not own, but cherished more the while
For that compression in its burning core;
   Even Innocence itself has many a wile,
575 And will not dare to trust itself with truth,
And Love is taught hypocrisy from youth.

73

But Passion most dissembles, yet betrays
   Even by its darkness; as the blackest sky
Foretells the heaviest tempest, it displays
580   Its workings through the vainly guarded eye,
And in whatever aspect it arrays
   Itself, 'tis still the same hypocrisy;
Coldness or Anger, even Disdain or Hate,
Are masks it often wears, and still too late.

74

585 Then there were sighs, the deeper for suppression,
   And stolen glances, sweeter for the theft,
And burning blushes, though for no transgression,
   Tremblings when met, and restlessness when left;
All these are little preludes to possession,
590   Of which young Passion cannot be bereft,
And merely tend to show how greatly Love is Embarrassed at first starting with a novice.

75

Poor Julia's heart was in an awkward state;
   She felt it going, and resolved to make
595 The noblest efforts for herself and mate,

2. An enchantress who seduces Christian knights in Tasso's epic poem Jerusalem Delivered (sixteenth century).

For Honor's, Pride's, Religion's, Virtue's sake:
Her resolutions were most truly great,
And almost might have made a Tarquin[3] quake:
She prayed the Virgin Mary for her grace,
600 As being the best judge of a lady's case.

76

She vowed she never would see Juan more,
And next day paid a visit to his mother,
And looked extremely at the opening door,
Which, by the Virgin's grace, let in another;
605 Grateful she was, and yet a little sore—
Again it opens, it can be no other,
'Tis surely Juan now—No! I'm afraid
That night the Virgin was no further prayed.

77

She now determined that a virtuous woman
610 Should rather face and overcome temptation,
That flight was base and dastardly, and no man
Should ever give her heart the least sensation,
That is to say, a thought beyond the common
Preference, that we must feel, upon occasion,
615 For people who are pleasanter than others,
But then they only seem so many brothers.

78

And even if by chance—and who can tell?
The Devil's so very sly—she should discover
That all within was not so very well,
620 And, if still free,[4] that such or such a lover
Might please perhaps, a virtuous wife can quell
Such thoughts, and be the better when they're over;
And if the man should ask, 'tis but denial:
I recommend young ladies to make trial.

79

625 And, then, there are such things as Love divine,
Bright and immaculate, unmixed and pure,
Such as the angels think so very fine,
And matrons, who would be no less secure,
Platonic, perfect, "just such love as mine;"
630 Thus Julia said—and thought so, to be sure;
And so I'd have her think, were I the man
On whom her reveries celestial ran.

80

Such love is innocent, and may exist
Between young persons without any danger.

3. In Shakespeare's Rape of Lucrece (based on Roman legend), the rapist of a Roman noblewoman renowned for her chastity.
4. I.e., if she were not already married.

635 A hand may first, and then a lip be kissed;
For my part, to such doings I'm a stranger,
But hear these freedoms form the utmost list
Of all o'er which such love may be a ranger:
If people go beyond, 'tis quite a crime,
640 But not my fault—I tell them all in time.

81

Love, then, but Love within its proper limits,
Was Julia's innocent determination
In young Don Juan's favor, and to him its Exertion might be useful on occasion;
645 And, lighted at too pure a shrine to dim its
Ethereal luster, with what sweet persuasion
He might be taught, by Love and her together—
I really don't know what, nor Julia either.

82

Fraught with this fine intention, and well fenced
650 In mail of proof—her purity of soul—
She, for the future, of her strength convinced,
And that her honor was a rock, or mole,° breakwater
Exceeding sagely from that hour dispensed
With any kind of troublesome control;
655 But whether Julia to the task was equal
Is that which must be mentioned in the sequel.

83

Her plan she deemed both innocent and feasible,
And, surely, with a stripling of sixteen
Not Scandal's fangs could fix on much that's seizable,
660 Or if they did so, satisfied to mean
Nothing but what was good, her breast was peaceable—
A quiet conscience makes one so serene!
Christians have burnt each other, quite persuaded
That all the Apostles would have done as they did.

84

665 And if in the mean time her husband died,
But Heaven forbid that such a thought should cross
Her brain, though in a dream! (and then she sighed)
Never could she survive that common loss;
But just suppose that moment should betide,
670 I only say suppose it—inter nos:[5]
(This should be entre nous, for Julia thought
In French, but then the rhyme would go for nought.)

85

I only say, suppose this supposition:
Juan being then grown up to man's estate

5. Just between ourselves (Latin).

675 Would fully suit a widow of condition,
Even seven years hence it would not be too late;
And in the interim (to pursue this vision)
The mischief, after all, could not be great,
For he would learn the rudiments of Love,
680 I mean the seraph° way of those above. angelic, pure

86

So much for Julia! Now we'll turn to Juan.
Poor little fellow! he had no idea
Of his own case, and never hit the true one;
In feelings quick as Ovid's Miss Medea,[6]
685 He puzzled over what he found a new one,
But not as yet imagined it could be a
Thing quite in course, and not at all alarming,
Which, with a little patience, might grow charming.

87

Silent and pensive, idle, restless, slow,
690 His home deserted for the lonely wood,
Tormented with a wound he could not know,
His, like all deep grief, plunged in solitude:
I'm fond myself of solitude or so,
But then, I beg it may be understood,
695 By solitude I mean a Sultan's (not
A Hermit's), with a harem for a grot.° grotto

88

"Oh Love! in such a wilderness as this,
Where Transport and Security entwine,
Here is the Empire of thy perfect bliss,
700 And here thou art a God indeed divine."
The bard[7] I quote from does not sing amiss,
With the exception of the second line,
For that same twining "Transport and Security"
Are twisted to a phrase of some obscurity.

89

705 The Poet meant, no doubt, and thus appeals
To the good sense and senses of mankind,
The very thing which everybody feels,
As all have found on trial, or may find,
That no one likes to be disturbed at meals
710 Or love—I won't say more about "entwined"
Or "Transport," as we knew all that before,
But beg "Security" will bolt the door.

6. In Ovid's Metamorphoses, the young Medea finds herself irresistibly infatuated with the hero Jason.

7. Byron's contemporary, Thomas Campbell, whose Gertrude of Wyoming is here paraphrased.

90

Young Juan wandered by the glassy brooks,
  Thinking unutterable things; he threw
715 Himself at length within the leafy nooks
  Where the wild branch of the cork forest grew;
There poets find materials for their books,
  And every now and then we read them through,
So that their plan and prosody are eligible,
720 Unless, like Wordsworth,[8] they prove unintelligible.

91

He, Juan (and not Wordsworth), so pursued
  His self-communion with his own high soul,
Until his mighty heart, in its great mood,
  Had mitigated part, though not the whole
725 Of its disease; he did the best he could
  With things not very subject to control,
And turned, without perceiving his condition,
Like Coleridge,[9] into a metaphysician.

92

He thought about himself, and the whole earth,
730 Of man the wonderful, and of the stars,
And how the deuce they ever could have birth;
  And then he thought of earthquakes, and of wars,
How many miles the moon might have in girth,
  Of air-balloons, and of the many bars
735 To perfect knowledge of the boundless skies;—
And then he thought of Donna Julia's eyes.

93

In thoughts like these true Wisdom may discern
  Longings sublime, and aspirations high,
Which some are born with, but the most part learn
740 To plague themselves withal, they know not why:
'Twas strange that one so young should thus concern
  His brain about the action of the sky;
If you think 'twas Philosophy that this did,
I can't help thinking puberty assisted.

94

745 He pored upon the leaves, and on the flowers,
  And heard a voice in all the winds; and then
He thought of wood-nymphs and immortal bowers,
  And how the goddesses came down to men:
He missed the pathway, he forgot the hours,
750 And when he looked upon his watch again,
He found how much old Time had been a winner—
He also found that he had lost his dinner.
